Asan, in 'Oru veena poovu' (A fallen flower, 1907), Nalini (1911), Leela (1914) and Chintavishtayaya Sita (Sita lost in thought, 1919), enlarged the scope of poetry by adopting new images, new expressions, new attitudes. A fallen flower could provoke feelings too deep for tears. Nalini could realize that there was a form of love infinitely superior to the one that sought worldly fulfilment. Leela at the end of a wild pursuit of her love seeks unity with him through death. Sita, the most loyal of wives, could still assert her independence of spirit when pushed to the extreme. These images of a new sensibility brought about important changes in Malayalam poetry. In Duravastha (Tragic plight, 1922) Asan portrayed with remarkable foresight the marriage of a Brahmin girl to a Harijan boy; in Chandalabhikshuki (The Harijan mendicant, 1923) he made the Buddha denounce the practice of untouchability; and in Karuna (Compassion, 1923) he exalted spiritual love and compassion above personal and selfish passion and possessiveness. After such a flood-tide of revolutionary changes, there was no question of going back to the old ways. Ulloor also, in spite of catering to the lingering neo-classical tastes by writing the mahakavya Umakeralam, turned very soon to short narratives like Karnabhooshanam and Pingala and simple lyrics on themes from everyday life like 'Bhoothakkannadi' (The microscope), 'Annum innum' (Then and now) and 'Premasangitam' (The music of love). He sang of the glories of ancient India, the power of universal love, and the value of virtue in personal life.

Vallattol, the youngest of the three, too started in the neo-classical vein and wrote an epic, Chitrayogam, but soon changed over to the new style. Short narratives like Bandhanasthanaya Aniruddhan (Aniruddha in prison, 1914), Shishyanum makanum (Disciple and son, 1918) and Magdalana Mariyam (Mary Magdalene, 1921) made a direct appeal to the reading public. The lyrics collected in successive volumes of Sahitya manjari (Literary anthology, 1916 onwards) had a tremendous popularity. They popularized Dravidian metres, not in great favour since Kunchan Nambiar; they idealized and glorified the values of life cherished in ancient India in the days of the Upanishads and the puranas; they took the message of Indian nationalism under the leadership of Gandhiji to the common people. Vallattol's special appeal as a poet lay in his capacity to awaken buried memories of the past, to render in highly sensuous terms experiences from everyday life like going on a boat journey or walking in the rain, and to dramatize scenes from domestic life or even historical situations. A great patron of Kathakali, he was also an indefatigable translator all his life. Among the works he translated into Malayalam are Valmiki Ramayana, the plays of Bhasa and Kalidasa, several of the puranas and the Rig Veda.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The second quarter of the twentieth century was still dominated by the influence of these three poets, but there were a few important poets who came in their wake and distinguished themselves during that period. Nalappatt Narayana Menon, Kuttippurath Kesavan Nair, K.M. Panikkar and Palathu Raman are the most significant of their immediate successors, while G. Sankara Kurup, Vennikulam Gopala Kurup, P. Kunhiraman Nair, Edappally Raghavan Pillai, Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, Vyloppillil Sreedhara Menon, Palai Narayanan Nair, M.P. Appan and Nalankal Krishna Pillai belong to the next generation. Nalappatt Narayana Menon's best known work is Kannunirtulli (Tears), an elegy on the death of his wife. He has succeeded in fusing personal sorrow with a stoic philosophy and in finding an idiom adequate for its expression. Kuttippurath Kesavan Nair is remembered for his poem Grameena kanyaka (The village maid) which describes in simple language the pleasures of life in a village in the pre-industrial days.

G.Sankara Kurup (1900-1978) is probably the most widely acclaimed of the second generation of romantic poets in Malayalam. He came early under the influence of Rabindranath Tagore and in poems like 'Suryakanti' (The sunflower) explores an experience bordering on mysticism. He specialized in short lyrics and dramatic narratives and lyrical monologues. 'Vishvadarshanam' (The cosmic vision) is his most philosophical poem. 'Perumthachan' (The master carpenter) retells the folk tale of an old carpenter who caused the death of his son out of envy.

Vennikkulam Gopala Kurup (1902-1980) also wrote in the nationalist romantic vein, and in his best poems displayed a mastery of word music and delicate pictorial-quality. He also translated into Malayalam Tulsidas's Ramacharitmanas from Hindi and Valluvar's Tirukkural and Bharati's poems from Tamil.

P. Kunhiraman Nair (1909-1978) was at first known as a devotional poet, but he soon began to deal with contemporary problems from the point of view of a spokesman of traditional values. His best poems capture the picturesqueness of the landscape of Kerala and are full of little vignettes of the Malayali ethos and culture. Edappally Raghavan Pillai (1909-1936) and Changampuzha Krishna Pillai (1911-1948) were the undoubted masters of the romantic lyric in Malayalam; coming from the same village they together represent what is sometimes called the Edappally school, which had a great vogue among young writers in the 1940s. Raghavan Pillai committed suicide and his friend wrote a play in verse in the style of a pastoral elegy, Ramanan, which became an all-time best seller in Malayalam. Their poems are marked by spontaneity, sincerity, natural flow and intensity of emotion. Balamani Amma reveals a typical Indian feminine sensibility in her early poems about domestic life. But in her mature poems like 'Mazhuvinte katha' (The story of the axe) and 'Vishvamitran', she reveals a spiritual passion and great inwardness.

Vyloppillil Sreedhara Menon (b.1911) is the last of the romantics. Starting as 'a mere poet of beauty' he extended his concept of beauty to cover all aspects of life. In Kudiyozhikkal (Eviction) he achieves a rare fusion of the aesthetic and the sociological dimensions of his mature poetry. He is a meticulous craftsman in his use of imagery and in the subtle manipulation of verse.

The modernist phase in Malayalam poetry begins after the death of Changampuzha in 1948. Already there were tendencies against the mellifluousness and over-effusiveness as well as the diffuseness of decadence that the romantic school had reached in the works of the imitators of Changampuzha. Perhaps the first poet to write in a deliberately different style was Edassari Govindan Nair who brought in a sense of realism, used a colloquial idiom, exercised greater control over the verse, and enlarged the scope of poetry so as to include the so-called 'unpoetic' subjects. One of his early poems in the new style is 'Panimudakku' (Strike), where he espouses the cause of power as against mere romantic lament and expressions of sentimental grief.

N.V. Krishna Warrior further advanced this anti-romantic trend by writing plain unadorned narrative poems as well as satires like 'Madirasiyile oru sayahnam' (An evening in Madras), which exposes to ridicule the romantic concept of love; he also wrote poems voicing sharp criticism of social abuses as in Kalladeivangal (Fake deities) and Gandhiyum Godseyum (Gandhi and Godse). A still further step was taken by M.Govindan who in his riddles and long narratives presents a more complex awareness of the problems of modern life. Govindan is a master of irony and his poetic strategy has an intellectual component also to it. Olappamanna too is a practitioner of the anti-romantic style in his best poems; social consciousness is raised to a high level of pathos in poems like Nangemakutty. Akkitam Achyuthan Nambudiri is famous as the author of Irupatham noottantinte itihasam (The epic of the twentieth century) where he explores the agonized consciousness of a modern archetype representing the victims of political parties committed to an ideology. His later poem Balidarshanam is perhaps less powerful, but is a more finished work.

P. Bhaskaran started as a politically committed writer, employing the language and style of Changampuzha for political propaganda, but he soon outgrew that and has in recent years evolved a style of his own, very different from the earlier one of excellent imitation.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Vayalar Rama Varma and O.N.V. Kurup also wrote in the same vein to begin with, but personal experiences and intellectual maturity enabled them to come out of their earlier delusions. In their later work there is a strong humanist faith which has taken the place of the earlier dogma. A similar course of development may be seen in a number of other poets like Punaloor Balan, but with varying degrees of ideological independence.

The fifties also saw the growth of a new trend combining ideological freedom with liberation from the decadent romanticism which was still the popular mode. It had a basis in modernist poetics but it appeared to go far ahead in the direction that could be seen in Edasseri Govindan Nair, N.V.Krishna Warrior and M. Govindan. The changes which were taking place in poetry towards the end of the 1950s were later corroborated by parallel developments in fiction, drama and criticism as well. An oversimplified approach to life as well as art was now replaced by a more complex awareness of their undercurrents. A work of art had to justify its own existence in terms of what the actual work itself contained. No patronage by any extra-literary agency could lighten the labour of the creative artist. Perhaps this awareness for the first time found expression in Ayyappa Paniker's Kurukshetram, written in 1952-57, but published only in 1961. Since 1952 Paniker had been experimenting in prosody and poetic language, and in his poems about Kuttanad he tried to deal with unorthodox subjects too. His later development may be seen in 'Mrutyupooja' (Hymn to death), 'Kutumba puranam' (The family saga) and 'Pakalukal ratrikal' (Days nights). Attoor Ravi Varma is the master of an incisive style and in poems like 'Pithrugamanam' and 'Samkramanam' achieves steel–like hardness rarely matched in Malayalam verse. N.N. Kakkad fuses the classical and the modernist to produce unusual effects. His sense of rhythm and power of evocation through weird images give a unique character to his best poems. Madhavan Ayyappath tries to achieve special effects by combining in intricate ways the romantic style with the modernist. The image of the bird in some of his poems is a very effective device. M.N. Paloor, who for many years has been living in Bombay, presents the images of urban-industrial life against the primordial and timeless myths taken from the puranas and the Mahabharata. His early poems were marked by a strong bitterness which is replaced in the more recent poems by an equally strong tenderness and compassion.

Sughathakumari is easily the best of the women poets in Malayalam since Balamani Amma. She has a rare mastery of verbal melody and visionary imagery. In 'Kaliyamardanam' and 'Rathrimazha' (Night rain) the full range of her mythic imagination may be seen. Vishnu Narayanan Nambudiri is also gifted with a visionary imagination, and in his best poems employs the mythic mode with great success. G. Kumara Pillai was perhaps imitative of Changampuzha in his early poems, but his mature style has revealed a sober and independent poetic voice. His use of irony in recent poems is particularly remarkable. P.Narayana Kurup is also distinguished by a pungency of style and sparkling wit. O.M. Anujan is a scholar poet with an individuality of his own. S. Ramesan Nair's poetry is marked by a deep tenderness and delicacy of feeling. The perfect master of a unique form and unique voice is Kunjunny, whose witty and tender limericks and riddle-like pieccs are tremendously popular. The ironic twist in some of his very short poems is widely appreciated. Kadammanitta Ramakrishnan very effectively employs folk rhythms and archetypal images to comment on the anomalies in modern life. His poems like 'Santha' and 'Kurathi' are among the most popular poems in the language. He is a very powerful reciter of his poems too. K.Satchidanandan is distinguished by an acute perception of subterranean reality, and has an uncanny awareness of changing sensibilities. His own poems have a vibrant awareness of what is going on around him not only in the village where he lives but in any part of the world. He has a truly international imagination. In his most successful poems there is a perfect fusion of intellect and emotion. Kavalam Narayana Panicker is a master of folk idiom and folk music which he puts to great use in his poems. K.G.Sankara Pillai and Balachandran Chullikkad have a revolutionary fervour in their poems, perfectly controlled and marked by a keenness rare in any poetry.

Poetry in Malayalam today is in a process of steady evolution. Gone are the days when the scholarly ones could lament the loss of popularity of poetry. Already the post-modernist phase is in the offing; and right now the styles are in the process of further change. There is a tendency to create new myths from everyday life, which may be seen in almost all the young writers: in Sugathakumari, O.N.V. Kurup, Ayyappa Paniker, Vishnu Narayanan, Kadammanitta, Satchidanandan, Ravi Varma, Sankara Pillai and Balachandran. Among other writers who are coming into the fore are A. Ayyappan, U. Jayachandran, Kunhappa Baby, Krishnankutty, Usha, Lalita and Ravunni.

K.A.P.

POETRY (Marathi). The first poem in Marathi, a song was composed by Someshwar in AD 1129, and the first Marathi poetic work, Vivek-sindhu (Ocean of wisdom), was by Mukundraj of the twelfth century. Marathi poetry was, indeed, reared by two religious sects, the Mahanubhav and the Varakari sects, towards the end of the thirteenth century. The former did not believe in the Vedas, preached non-violence and insisted on the use of the Marathi language. It was founded by Chakradhar, a Gujarati king. Some of its texts are Rukmini swayamvar (1229) by Narendra, Shishupal vadh (1308) by Bhaskar-bhatta Borikar and some descriptive verses by Sahayadri and Riddhiyur.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The dominant trend, however, was that of Bhakti (devotional poetry). The important saint-poets, who had Vitthal as their main deity and who welcomed devotees from all walks of life—tailors, potters, gardeners, grocers, barbers and even untouchables—were Namdev (1227-1350), Jnaneshwar of Jnandev (1275-1296), Eknath (1532-1599), Mukteshwar (1574-1645), Tukaram (1608-1649) and Ramdas (1608-1681).

Dasopant (16th c.) and Shridhar (1658-1729) were two other devotional poets. Devotional poetry influenced even foreigners. Father Thomas Stephens (1549-1619) wrote in chaste Marathi, and in the style of Marathi classics composed an epic on Jesus Christ called Krista purana.

The achievements of devotional poets were manifold. They preached the philosophy of Vaishnavism to the masses in musical Marathi. Jnaneshwari, the highest water-mark of epic Marathi poetry, a verse commentary on Gita, is a classic composed by Jnaneshwar at the young age of twenty (even included in Guru granth sahib). The lyrics of Namdev in Marathi, Hindi and Punjabi, the translations of the Ramayana and the Bhagavata by Eknath, the translation of the Mahabharata by Mukteshwara, the popular and deeply moving Abhangas of Tukaram, who exposed the hypocrisies of pretentious sadhus, and the practical wisdom contained in Swami Ramadas's Dasabodha, are some of the highlights of early devotional poetry. It was the first wave of awakening amongst Marathi people to stand unitedly against foreign onslaught. The wave included even Muslim saints like Sheikh Muhammad (17th c.) and Husain Ambari (17th c.) and Lingayat poets like Shantalinga. The saint-poets were mostly devotees of Vishnu as incarnated in Vitthala at Pandharpur. They advocated equality of man in the eyes of God and castigated caste-distinctions. Emphasis was on devotion as the only way to attain salvation.

Alauddin Khilji of Devgiri (Daulatabad) invaded Maharashtra in 1296, and the Yadav dynasty was liquidated in 1378. At this time the revival of the Bhagavata cult came as a great succour and spiritual support to the masses. As far as the art of poetry is concerned it projected itself in two genres: the prabandha, a long narrative or epic form, and the short hymns like the padas. There are some mystic flights in Jnaneshwar's Amritanubhava, and many deep poetic insights in Tukaram and Namdev's verses; but the general tone of the bulk of poetry is more didactic than reflective or philosophical.

Though Shivaji was crowned in 1674, he had come to power in 1645. His inspiration gave a boost to folk poets for composing ballads and popular love lyrics, called powada and lavani respectively. But by the seventeenth century Marathi poetry was divided into two schools, the Pandit poets and the Shahirs (minstrels). The poetry for the elite was dominated by Sanskrit verses and the poetry for the masses used a different racy, down-to-earth language and style. The prominent Pandit poets were: Vaman Pandit (Yathartha-dipika, Venu-sudha), Hari Pandit (Bhavabodhini), Raghunath Pandit (Nala-Damayanti swayamvarakhyana, translated by Abul Faizi into Persian in 1594-1995), Uddhara Chidghana (Shuka-Rambha samvad), Krishna Dayarnava (Harivarada) and Moropant (Mahabharata, Ramayana, Bhagavata).

The interesting translations from Sanskritic mythological themes into folk-poetry based on impromptu versification brought about a sea-change in the late seventeenth and eighteenth century poetry. Spiritualism was no more the forte of Marathi poets; secular subjects like the glorification of the heroic deeds of Marathi warriors, the erotic themes and Byronic descriptions of female charms and coquettishness dominated the scene. The former style of poetry also changed from pedantic, archaic 'ganavrittas' to simple, folk-songs. Now the poets were no more devotees of Vitthal nor were they Brahmin pandits, but many of them were from the lower and the underprivileged classes. The first Shahir was Admyanadas (b. 1659) or Agnidas who composed the heroic ballad (powda) 'Afzalkhan vadh' at the instance or Jijabai, Shivaji's mother. Then we had Ramjoshi (b. 1762) and Anantaphandi who portrayed the terrible famine of Pune, Honaji Bala, Sagan Bhau (a Muslim from Jejuri), Prabhakar, Parashram (a tailor) who described new Mumbai under the British rule, and Rao Barve who wrote an invocation to a Hindu god in 1856. This transition was not without its accompanying loss. No more long mythological epics full of philosophical passages and abstruse dialogues, no more verbal virtuosity and intricate play of puns and extravagance of metaphors. The new poet came from the common masses, his audience was also the lowly peasant, and so his approach to the reality around him was earthy.

This shift in the purpose of poetry from religious instruction or solace to the soul to realistic delineation of the milieu, regaling the masses and eulogizing the royalty who offered patronage made Marathi poetry more lively. It was no more abstract and confined to the amusement of upper classes. From the Brahminic base, poetry came down to a broader social base. Muslims, Christians, Jains and even poets from the lowly working classes and farmers came forward to write poetry. Poetry was no more the monopoly or exclusive exercise of the privileged and the high-brow.

Like other Indian languages, Marathi poetry was exposed to western influence, particularly English romantic poetry, through Palgrave's Golden Treasury prescribed in all schools and colleges. The reaction to English education, to missionary zeal in conversions and to imperial design in exploiting the masses was also reflected in the strongly worded nationalist and even Hindu revivalist poetry. Amritrai (1698-1753) was the last of the folk-traditionalist poets, who introduced the Persian-metre ghazal and masnavi-like narrative form in Katav verse. There was decline in Marathi poetry after the fall of Maratha empire in 1818.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In 1854 Parashurampanttatya Godbole edited an anthology of Marathi poetry, entitled Navnit, on the lines of the Golden Treasury. It ran into more than twenty editions. A few translations and adaptations of English poetry followed, for example B.R. Pradhan's (1838-1886) Daivaseni was an adaptation of Walter Scott's The Lady of the Lake; K.R. Kirtikar's (1849-1917) Indira (1884) was an adaptation of Tennyson's Princess. In this poem women's equality was advocated. H.M. Mahajani's Kusumanjali had translations of forty-one poems of the English romantic poets. The first elegy in Marathi on the death of the poet's wife, Vilap-lahari (1882) was written by Kirtikar. M.M. Kunte (1835-88) wrote a long historical poem Raja Shivaji (1817), with a preface in English, advocating the use of the common man's language for poetry.

Modernity in Marathi poetry was pioneered by Krishnaji Keshav Damle, better known by his pen-name 'Keshavsut' (1866-1905). He was a teacher who spent his life in poverty. His poems were published posthumously. He heralded the new age in his poem 'Nava sipahi' (The new soldier).

> Not Brahmin, not Hindu, I belong to no one sect,
> They are the fallen ones who narrow the universal.

He was the first poet who wrote poems in Marathi on the plight of an untouchable and on the starving child of a mill-worker on strike. Though a romantic at heart, Keshavsut wrote poems with fervent reformist zeal. He was also a radical in many ways, wrote poems in unadorned diction and avoided flowery, pedantic idiom.

The romantic upsurge in Marathi poetry at the turn of the century and in the early decades of the twentieth century, introduced many western forms like the sonnet, the ode and the dramatic monologue. Love of nature, advocacy of social equality, pride in the glorious past, dislike of urbanization and blind imitation of the west are some of the favourite themes of this poetry. Frank expression of love between two persons, irrespective of caste or class, yearning for the abstract, and mystic universalism are also seen in these poets. Narayan Vaman Tilak (1865-1919) was a Christian and wrote poems of nature and tender affection; Narayan Murlidhar Gupte alias 'Bee' (1872-1947) was a poet with mystic overtones, with a passion for beauty; 'Govindagraj' (Ram Ganesh Gadkari, 1885-1919) was a playwright and a passionate 'Bard of Love'; 'Balakavi' (Tryambak Bapuji Thombre, 1890-1918) was a nature-intoxicated poet who also wrote a historical narrative.

This romantic trend was continued and sustained by Bhaskar Ramchandra Tambe (1874-1941) who was deeply influenced by Tagore in his lyrics. 'Madhav Julian' (Madhav Tryambak Patwardhan, 1894-1939), a scholar in Persian, was influenced by Persian poetry. He compiled a Persian-Marathi dictionary. Balkrishna Bhagavant Borkar (1910-1985) who wrote in Konkani and Marathi wrote a long unfinished epic on Mahatma Gandhi. One of the old romantics still living is Nagorao Ghanashyam Deshpande (b. 1909) who has written lyrics since 1930. He was honoured with the Sahitya Akademi Award for his collection of poems Khoonganthi in 1987.

The nationalistic and realistic trends were advocated by many poets who were patriotic activists like Vinayak Damodar Savarkar (1883-1966) and Pandurang Vaman Sane alias 'Sane Guruji' (1899-1950). Savarkar was a political prisoner in Andaman for many decades where he composed impassioned long poems like Kamala and Gomantak. Socialist Sane Guruji's Patre was not allowed to be published. There were other socially committed poets like the members of the 'Ravi-kiran-Mandal', a Sunday Club of seven poets who organised a publishing co-operative. Shankar Keshav Kanetkar 'Girish' (1893-1973) wrote about the plight of a widow and Yashwant Dinkar Pendharkar (1899-1985) wrote reformative poems and an epic on Shivaji. Madhav Julian wrote Sudharak (1928) and Prahlad Keshav Atre (1893-1969), who wrote poems under the pen-name 'Keshavakumar', made great fun of the pseudo-romantics and pseudo-nationalists in his devastatingly humorous collection of parodies, Jhenduchi phulen (Marigold Flowers, 1925). Some living socialist and communist poets are Vasant Bapat, Narayan Surve and Vinda Karandikar. Amongst those poets with social awareness, the seniormost and highly respected poet is Vishnu Vaman Shirwadkar alias 'Kusumagraj' (b. 1912) whose works like Vishakha inspired the younger generation to participate in the Freedom Struggle. Another sweet-voiced Marxist, a ballad singer, was Amar Shekh who died young. V.R. Kant (b. 1913) wrote Rudravina and added an international dimension by writing on the 36th parallel. So did N.G. Joshi, who wrote Vishwa-manav after Gandhi's assassination, taking themes from the apartheid and the Sino-Japanese War. A.R. Deshpande 'Anil' (1901-82) began as a romanticist, wrote poems with social content, and ended as a mystic.

Modernist poetry is multi-dimensional. Experimental, formalist, existentialist, it began flowering during the last World War. The author of Nava-kavya was Bal Sitaram Mardhekar (1909-1956), whose Shishiragam (Advent of autumn, 1939) was a more or less traditional collection of poems with unrequited love as its undertone. But Kahi kavita (1947) and Anakhi kahi kavita (1952), meaning 'some poems' and 'some more poems', stirred the poetic scene thoroughly. It ushered in a stark, Eliotean idiom, anti-romantic and anti-didactic.

The existentialist 'Angik' was underlining Mardhekar's strangely rhyming cryptic verses, juxtaposing harsh reality with grandiose and pseudo-sublime utterances. He used a scientific-technological terminology for the first time in Marathi poetry, and also employed dialect and flavoured language to add poignancy to his treatment of the sordid and acid reality.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Purushottam Shivaram Rege (1910-1978) experimented with poetic language, exploring the frontiers of meaning. He believed in a kind of neo-classical poetic idiom, rejecting modernity. He was constantly using a private imagery which is obscure at places. He was influenced by Gatha saptashati, folk poetry and Sanskrit classics, and handled eternal subjects like man-woman relationship in his compact and suggestive poems.

Indira Sant (b. 1914), Vinda Karandikar (Govinda Vinayaka Karandikar, b. 1918), G.D. Madgulkar (1919-1978), Sharatchandra Muktibodh (1921-1984), Sadanand Rege (1923-1982), Dilip Chitre (b. 1928), Mangesh Padgaonkar (b. 1929), C.T. Khanolkar alias 'Arati Prabhu' (1930-1976), Manik Godghate 'Grace' (b. 1937), N.D. Mahanor (b. 1942) are some of the significant Marathi poets who have dominated the poetic scene for the last three decades. Except Muktibodh who had Marxist commitment, all others had their own individual styles and achievements. Only Madgulkar achieved a wide audience through his Geet Ramayan which sold one lakh copies, thanks to its being set to music by Sudhir Phadke.

One of the most disturbingly significant movements in Marathi poetry is Dalit poetry. As the name suggests, it is poetry written by the oppressed and the exploited, hitherto ignored or patronisingly referred to as depressed classes. No doubt poverty and the consequent social injustice born of inequality have always been referred to and written about, but this poetry of protest and revolt assumed a more militant posture at the hands of the poets of the underprivileged classes. They came straight from the slum and did not gloss over the stink and stench that belonged to the slum. Daya Pawar, Namdev Dhasal, Keshav Meshram and Yashwant Mahanor are some of the important poets of this movement. When they rose together as a movement two decades ago, they were mistaken to be an appendage to or extension of the Beatnik or Holy Barbarian or the 'Hungry generation' type of movement. This was not poetic Naxalism, and though some of them were committed Marxists and ultra-leftists in their convictions or political sympathies, their wound was deeper and older. They found the atrocity of man towards fellow human beings and racial discrimination unbearable: it is not mere economic backwardness which Marx had analysed. Untouchability described by Gandhiji as a bad patch on Hinduism had become a serious cause for communication gap in the literary fraternity. Marathi young poets are trying to bridge this gap by extending the frontiers of their interests. Some collections like Golpitha (The name of a red-light area) by Namdev Dhasal proved to be a hallmark. Vijay Tendulkar in its preface confessed that he had to learn a new kind of vocabulary and language to appreciate these poems fully.

From Jnaneshwar to Dalits, the Marathi poetry of the last seven hundred years has undergone, like Tennyson's Brook, many a twist and turn, passing through hill and dale, but in this development from the theo-centric and regio-centric to the homocentric poetry the Marathi psyche is reflected in a crystal clear manner. Udyotana Suri, the Jain poet in his Kuvalaya-mala in the eighth century, described the Marhatte as 'Dadhamadaha, samalange, sahcre, abhimana, kalahasile' which means: Marathas are stockily built and strong, darkish in complexion, very hard-working, can suffer the vagaries of nature, very much full of self-respect, and constantly quarrelling (amongst themselves). Probably all these qualities are reflected in their heroic, patriotic, passionate and protesting poetry over the centuries. Uncompromising yet compassionate, the Marathi Muse continues to be a part of All-India creation. In its themes, classical or modern, it does not avoid reality. The worldly and the other-worldly have a constant dialogue in the poetic musing, the imagery is neither too sentimental nor too intellectual. The form is changing with the times. From Sanskritized prosodic rigid structures to the flowing folk-forms, from rhyming, jingling compositions to near prose, ultra-modern, most stark lines, the procession of poetry is majestically proceeding, absorbing the Zeitgiest. Even in an age of science and technological onslaught, poetry has not become extinct like some lost species; on the contrary the young writers can still surprise the readers with a haiku, or a folk-song, a long poem documenting the incogruities and inner contradictions of the age, or a soul-stirring experience of a significant and sensitive moment with appropriate words. New poetry cannot be strait-jacketed in one 'ism' or one school.

P.M.

POETRY (Nepali). Nepali scholars divide the history of Nepali poetry into the following periods:

The period of Heroic poetry (1742-1815); Devotional period (1816-1882); Ritikal or erotic period (1883-1917); New age (1918-1950); Contemporary poetry (From 1951).

Subananda Das is said to be the first Nepali poet, his works being the first written verse in Nepali literature. During the rule of Prithivi Narayan Shah and his sons, some poets such as Udaya Nanda Aryal seem to have been inspired by the outstanding courage of the Shah Kings. Aryal wrote poems praising the heroic deeds of Prithivi Narayan Shah.

Devotional poems of the Indian saint poets came to influence the Nepali poets who by 1816 began to write 'bhakti' poems. Beginning with Gumani Panta, most of the poets up to the time of Patanjali Gajurel were the followers of the Krishnabhakti cult. There were some poets like Raghunath and Bhanubhakta who followed the Ramabhakti cult. Vidyaranya Keshari (b.1806), Basanta Sharma (b.1825) and Indiras (b.1827) were contemporaries. Indiras translated the tenth chapter of the Srimad- bhagavadgita and the Gopika-stuti in Nepali. Vidyaranya Keshari translated Draupadi-stuti, Yugal-git and Benu-git in Nepali. Basanta Sharma wrote Krishna-charitra. He is regarded by some scholars as the first Nepali poet with a genuine poetic sense. He used more words of Nepali origin than Indiras and Vidyaranya Keshari did. The last two used more Bhojpuri, Avadhi and Arabic words which resulted in a kind of mixed language. Basanta Sharma's Krishna-charitra has been regarded by Mathura Dutta Pandeya as the first Nepali epic. His next famous long poem is Samudra-lahari. Yadu Nath Pokharyal (1833) wrote a short poem, also called 'Krishna-charitra'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Shashidar (b.1747) was the founder of another Bhakti cult, that of Jasamani saints. He composed a famous poem called Sachidananda lahari. The other poets of this tradition were Premdil Das and Gyandil Das (b.1821). By the efforts of Saint Gyandil Das this new cult spread up to Darjeeling and Sikkim. He made Rangbul (Darjeeling) his centre where he composed many devotional songs and a long poem of 109 stanzas, called Udaya-lahari (1877), which has been described as the first poem in the Nepali language written in Darjeeling.

Raghunath Bhatta (b.1811) of the Ram-bhakti cult translated the 'Sundarakanda' of the Ramayana. Some scholars are of the opinion that he also translated the 'Balakanda' and 'Ayodhyakanda', but these two have been lost. Another poet was Bhanubhakta Acharya (1814-1869) who translated the Adhyatma Ramayana into simple and lucid Nepali.

Bhanubhakta is also noted for his shorter poems. Apart from the Ramayana he also translated the Prashnottari. Bhakta-mala and Badhu-siksha are his long poems. His short poems are ironical and descriptive and manifest a romantic sensibility. Judged by his writings and also for the love he showed for the Nepali language, he has been called the 'Adikavi', the father of modern Nepali literature.

From 1883 begins the Erotic period or Ritikalin kavita. Motiram Bhatta was the first poet of this tradition. He had his education at Banaras, and knew Persian, Sanskrit and English. He was influenced by the Hindi Riti poetry and Bharatendu Harishchandra. He gathered together the like-minded youths of his period and formed a poetic forum. He also published a collection of his poems called Manodwayga pramaha (The flow of the excited heart). Riti kavya stretched over a period of about forty years, and quite a large number of poets including Lekhnath Paudyal and Dadhiram Marasini enriched the genre. In this period Rajivalochan Joshi, Laxmidatta Panta, Gopinath Lohani, Tejbahadur Rana, Nardev Pand, Sambhuprasad Dhungel, Dadhiram Marasini, Ratna Narayan Pradhan, Chandradhuj Rai, Taraman Gurung and Prasad Singh Rai, whether from Nepal or Darjeeling, sang the glory of sensuous beauty and love.

Till Motiram's era verse dominated the literary scene. Poets like Bhanubhakta, Raghunath and Motiram chose verse as the medium of expression even in letter writing. Motiram Bhatta employed a verse style in the stories of 'Gajendra-moksha' and 'Prahlad bhakti-katha'.

In 1913, with the advent of Lekhnath Paudyal, Nepali poetry saw the beginning of a new era. Lekhnath was a bridge between the medieval and modern periods. His poems appeared in various Nepali magazines, published from Banaras and Darjeeling. His collections of longer poems include Satyakali sambad, Mero Ram, Buddhi vinod, Ritu-bichar, Satya-smriti and Lalitya (in two parts) Tarun tapasi and an incomplete epic Ganga gauri.

By this time Chandrika (1918), a literary magazine, edited by Paras Mani Pradhan from Kurseong (Darjeeling) introduced another poet, Pandit Dharni Dhar Sharma. His poems had a popular appeal. Out and out a traditionalist in outlook and a classicist in style, Dharni Dhar used mostly short metres which perfectly matched his feelings and thoughts. He brought poetry within the reach of all. Naibedya, a collection of his short poems, was published in 1920. During this period another poet, Mahananda Sapkota, attracted attention with his lyrics. His Man lahari, a long poem, was published in 1923. In this he attacked drug habit and exhorted people, to refrain from all extravagance. His preoccupation was with the welfare of the people, and so his poems were very popular with the masses.

From 1935 a new band of poets began to write in Sarda. Laxmi Prasad Devkota, Siddhi Charan Shrestha, Yuddha Prasad Misra, Bal Krishna Sama, Gopal Prasad Rimal, Bhavani Bikshu were some of them. Laxmi Prasad Devkota introduced new romantic ideas in Nepali poetry. In his early life, he had been a dreamer toying with fanciful ideas, but very soon he understood what the people wanted. He attacked the administration in caustic satires and urged people to shake off their stupor and work for social changes. Gopal Prasad Rimal was a more ardent revolutionary and an optimist. Devkota, Siddhi Charan Shrestha, Gopal Prasad Rimal, Bal Krishna Sama and, a few years afterwards, Dhruba and Kedar Man 'Vyathith' turned from nature to romantic revolutionary zeal. Gopal Prasad Rimal was the first poet to introduce free verse in Nepali poetry. Indeed, these poets brought about a radical change in the theme and style of Nepali verse. Laxmi Prasad Devkota surpassed his contemporaries in literary output. He wrote epics, long and short poems, essays, short stories, works of criticism and also a drama and a novel. He is remarkable for his craftsmanship, rich imagination, profound ideas and humanitarian attitude. He is orthodox in his use of classical metres, but he is at heart a romantic. This trait of romanticism is reflected in the free play of his imagination and in his use of blank verse. His contribution to Nepali literature is, indeed, of tremendous value.

Bal Krishna Sama appeared on the poetic scene with his free verse and philosophical ideas, though he had already become famous for his play, Mutuko vyatha

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(1929). He wrote at least thirty-six plays in blank verse, and one long poem 'Ago ra pani' and one epic, Chiso chulo. His epic marks a departure from tradition both in theme and in style. With his progressive and humanitarian outlook he seems to be the writer of the downtrodden.

During the period 1945-1951 Darjeeling and Sikkim saw the appearance of a group of young poets endowed with romantic sensibility. They were Narendraprasad Kumai, Birendra, Daniel Khaling, Bhaichand Pradhan, Dhruba, Okiwuyama Gwyn, Agam Singh Giri, Tulsi Apatan, and a few years later Nar Bahadur Dahal. There were some women poets also who wrote during this time and became famous. They were Prem Rajeswari Thapa, Lakhi Devi Sundas, Sanumati Rai Sabitri Singh (Sundas) and Benita Singh.

The year 1963 saw the Three Dimensional Movement in literature. The movement centred in Darjeeling. Its mouthpiece was a slender magazine, Tesro ayam, published in May 1963. The Movement was led by Indra Bahadur Rai, Iswar Ballav and Bairagi Kanhila. The first was a critic, short story writer and novelist, while the other two were poets. In the first issue of Tesro ayam, 'Mateko manche ko bhasan', a long poem by Bairagh Kanhila, a short poem by Iswar Ballav, a short story by Indra Bahadur Rai, and the editorial (which was the manifesto of the movement) appeared. The poems and the story conformed to the tenets of the movement. The editorial said: "The writing of today must present a total picture of man. A man is the sum total of all senses, heart and mind. Literature should depict this totality of man. To do this, it should break away from the norms of one dimensional literature. The depiction of life should be elevated from the individual level to the universal level. Such literature should be a blend of philosophy, politics and intellectualism. Then it will be a third dimensional writing." The 'dimensional' writers discarded sentimentalism and romantic ideals. They advocated a realistic approach to life. They believed that literature should give a new meaning to life and open up new vistas.

Kanhila's 'Mateko manche ko bhasan' reflected on life, age and society. He used a very simple but direct language, using eastern and western symbols. For him a poem is not a spontaneous overflow of feelings but an intellectual enterprise. Iswar Ballav, another poet of the Dimensional Movement, first appeared on the scene with his poetical magazine, Phul, pal patkar. In some of his poems he caught the lyrical moments of life. But most of his poems are predominantly intellectual. Frequent use of western symbols makes his poetry very intricate. These two poets did not always share the same views about the dimensional announcement, but both rejected the old style and norm of writing. It was because of this that they are regarded as new trend-setters and as 'dimensional' poets. Two collections of Iswar Ballav's verse have been published. They are Aga ka phul haru hun, Aga ka phul haru hoinana and Euta shahar ko kinarama. One collection, entitled Bairagi Kanhila ko kavita, was published in 1978. It included the dimensional and non-dimensional poems Kanhila had written till the 1970's.

Agam Singh Giri of Darjeeling, a poet of the romantic period, is known for his lyrical style. By the mid-sixties he leaned towards progressivism. He sang with feeling for the weak and the downtrodden and lamented, loudly protesting that one's misery was due to one's failure to raise voice against tyranny and injustice. A very sensitive and nostalgic poet, he is widely read. Collections of his poems include Atma vyatha, Jivan git and Jalayko pratibimba royeko pratidwani. Besides these, he published three long poems called Yad, Ansu and Yuddha ra yoddha.

Contemporary poetry: In the opinion of Taranath Sharma, Nepali poetry started undergoing changes from 1950. By 1971, a group of new poets appeared. They were remarkable for their clarity of perception matched by simplicity of language. They were largely influenced by Marx, T.S. Eliot, Pablo Neruda, Sartre and Camus. For them poetry 'didn't mean but conveyed', and meaning was not everything. They experimented with different styles, free verse 'muktak' of four lines, and a new form of poetry known as mini poetry. Poetry of this period became more meaningful, and dwelling on reality it lost its musical charm and softness. The poets wrote simple and direct prose and shunned metaphors. They used familiar symbols which would not distort the ideas they wanted to express.

From 1971 the Marxist influence became apparent on the young poets of Assam and West Bengal. Among them were Asit Rai (Octopus, 1971), Sarad Chhetri (Choitiyeko aakash macchiyeko chetna, 1978), Lakshaman Srimal (Srimal ka kavita haru, 1982), Bikas Gotame (Aanastha pahad ka git haru), Jas Yonzen 'Pyasi' (Euta sahar ko khoj ma) and Man Prasad Subba (Bukhya che haru ko desh Ma). In the poems of two other poets Norden Rumba (Prachep) and Norjyang Syangden (Murchana) there is a search for a new meaning of life. Almost all the young poets of this period have used the prose idiom, and their tone is one of satire. Contemporary poetry is more or less like a long speech addressed to an audience. Almost all the poets have used the same style and their works often tend to be monotonous.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Abhi Subedi, Nepali Literature: Background and History (1978); Babu Ram Acharya, Purana kavi ra kavita; Daya Ram Srestha Sambhava and Mohan Raj Sharma, Nepali sahitya ko sanchipta itihas (1977); Tara Nath Sharma, Nepali sahitya ko itihas (3rd edn., 1982); Yagya Raj Satyal, Nepali sahitya ko bhumika (1960).

L.D.S.

POETRY (Oriya). Early and medieval phase. Oriya poetry until the modern period can be broadly divided into four different ages: Pre-Sarala (13th to 15th c.),

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sarala (15th c.), Panchasakha (16th c.) and Riti (16th to 19th c.). Works written until the 16th century and those written between the 16th and 19th centuries belong respectively to the Early and the Medieval phases in Oriya poetry. Sarala Das is generally assumed to be the first important poet, though the poetic tradition goes back to Charya pada.

As all the works written before Sarala Das have not yet been evaluated properly, the Pre-Sarala period is not considered important. However, for about two centuries it was a period of formulation and anticipation, and witnessed many social and religious changes. The important works of this period are Sisuveda, Amarakosa, Kalasa chautisa and Kesava koili. Besides, there were numerous short compositions by Siddhas and Nathas. Both Kalasa chautisa and Kesava koili mark the beginning of two important forms of medieval Oriya poetry,the chautisa and the koili. The next phase of Oriya poetry is generally identified as the Sarala age, and Sarala Das is accepted as the first great Oriya poet. The Sarala age covers the second half of the 15th century. Three of his epics, the Vichitra Ramayana, Mahabharata and Chandipurana are so far known, out of which the Mahabharata is his best creation. The Vichitra Ramayana gives the story of Sita's punishment, the Mahabharata is modelled on the Sanskrit Mahabharata and Chandipurana is the story of goddess Durga killing Mahishasura. While the themes of all his works were borrowed from the classics, their treatment was always his own.

The form of his works was also his own as they were composed in a new metre called dandak or dandi, in which each line in a couplet has eighteen letters, usually. Though he knew different modes of music and had mentioned about thirty-six in his Mahabharata, he chose a rhythmic mode which could be used both descriptively and narratively. This particular rhythmic mode influenced the latter poet Balram Das and became very popular.

Sarala Das's poetry is simple and forceful, and his diction is free from Sanskritization and rich with colloquial words. He is considered primarily a poet of the common man. He was the first Oriya poet to portray the typical Oriya social life and the first poet who related his story-telling to common life, even when he retold mythological and religious tales. His art of story telling influenced Balaram Das of the Panchasakha group in a number of ways.

The Panchasakha period in Oriya literature produced different types of poets and philosophers. Some critics argue that the poets of this period, Balaram Das, Jagannath Das, Sisu Ananta Das, Jasobanta Das and Achyutananda Das who occupy a prominent position in the development of Oriya poetic tradition, were not actually 'panchasakhā' (five friends) but 'panchasākha' (five branches) of Oriya literature. Most of their works were philosophical and religious in nature.

Balaram Das (15th-16th c.) created the Ramayana tradition in Orissa in his famous work Jagamohan Ramayana, and Jagannath Das (15th-16th c.), an exponent of Vaishnavism, concentrated on the Krishna katha in his Bhagabata. Both poets have followed the epic themes of the original Sanskrit Ramayana and Bhagavata but their works also bear sociological concern. The Jagamohan Ramayana is a social document of the 16th century Orissa, while the Bhagabata is an unmatched document of the pursuit of spiritualism and of social life. This great work of Jagannath Das has not only influenced Oriya culture but also played a dynamic role in the development of the puranic tradition. Though the poets were not free from Sanskrit influence, the judicious mixing of local language and Sanskrit made their works lyrical and philosophical. Balaram Das followed in his Ramayana the dandak or dandi metre created by Sarala Das, but Jagannath Das experimented with a new form, known as Nabakshari brutta (nine-letter metre), which influenced many contemporary and later poets.

Other works of Balaram Das are Brahmanda bhugole, Udhaba gita, Bata abakasa, Bhaba samudra, Laxmi purana, Mruguni stuti and Bedanta sara gita. Besides his Bhagabata, Jagannath Das wrote Tula bhina, Artha koili, and Daru bramha gita. A large variety of verse forms were also attempted by these two poets. Arthakoili was written as a philosophical and spiritual version of Kesava koili . Tula bhina dealt with philosophy and social practice related to Vaishnavism, and Daru bramha gita dealt with Lord Jagannath of Puri. Gaja stuti and Mruguni stuti were prayers (stuti). Thus we notice a variety of verse forms in the Panchasakha period.The other prominent works of this period were: Haribamsa, Suryasamhita and Gyanodaya koili by Achyutananda Das and Gobindachandra, Premabhakti, Bramha gita and Sivasarodaya by Jasobanta Das as well as several other gitas and malikas. Different forms evolved in poetry in this age and influenced contemporary poets as well as those of the 17th century.

The Riti or stylistic age came after the Panchasakha period and continued up to the second decade of 19th century. This age may be divided into three divisions: pre-Riti (15th-17th c.), Riti (17th-18th c.) and post-Riti (18th-19th c.).

The prominent figures of the pre-Riti period were Arjun Das (15th-16th c.) and Narasimha Sena Mahapatra (16th c.), and their works were Ramabibha, Parimala and Rahasyamanjari. The characteristics of the age may be seen in these works which dealt with the Rama and Krishna stories, including them even in an imaginary work like Parimala. Later, this trend spread to the works of the other poets who can be safely placed in the pre-Riti period. Other important works written between the 16th and 17th centuries, following the Riti tradition but also using concepts like Rasa and Alankara, are Usha bhilasa by Sisu Sankar Das, Rukmini bibha by Kartik Das, Kapata pasa by Bheema Dhibara, Premalochana by Bishnu Das, Kanchi Kaveri by Purusottama Das, Shashisena by Pratap

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ray, Leelabati by Raghunath Harichandan, Raghunath vilasa and Ichhabati by Dhananjay Bhanja. Rasakallola by Dinakrushna Das, Prema panchamrita by Bhupati Pandita and Padmabati parinaya by Lokanath Das.

The existing style of depicting themes and characters was by-passed by the poets of this period. Ordinary characters were taken up along with characters like Radha and Krishna, Rama and Sita. Imaginary characters like Parimala, Sarbanga Sundari, Leelabati, Anangarekha and Chitrakala also appeared in Oriya poetry. In the description of love episodes between princes and princesses more of human experiences were described than the spiritual love of the mythical characters.

Oriya poetry in the early phase of the stylistic age and until much later greatly depended on royal patronage.The Sanskrit poets of this period received maximum patronage from the king and the affluent elite, but they not only neglected the composition of simple Oriya verses but also had a derisive attitude towards it. This period has great significance in the Oriya poetic tradition. It was at this time that Dinakrushna's poetic fame reached the court of King Dibyasinha Dev, who asked him to compose poems in his honour. Dinakrushna refused the proposal and finally got imprisoned. Despite such harassment Dinakrushna Das (1650-1710) made his contribution to the 'Krishna lila' tradition of poetry with his famous work Rasakallola and established himself as a celebrated Oriya poet.

The Oriya poetry of this period was written more for the purpose of singing than reading. Rasakallola is a brilliant example. It contains thirty-four cantos using the 'ka''akshara niyama'- a new technique created for the first time in Oriya literature. All the cantos portray Srikrishna's human and supernatural 'lila'. The poet's depiction of the different moods of Radha and Krishna is unique. An advocate of the 'Raganuraga bhakti' of Sri Chaitanya, he concentrated on the Gopa-lila of Krishna.

The stylistic age achieved its perfection in the writings of Upendra Bhanja (1670-1740), the 'Kabi samrat', of the age. In his works riti was used as a particular mode of writing, and dhvani was included as a concept along with rasa and alankara. To him poetry meant as much edification as pleasure, perhaps the former more than the latter. He, therefore, wrote only for an elite audience. He was well-versed in Sanskrit classics and was greatly indebted to the great poets, Kalidasa, Magha, Banabhatta, Sriharsha, Bhavabhuti and Bharavi, and integrated Sanskrit poetics into the Oriya poetic tradition. He wrote as a scholar aesthete and the royal taste dominated his writings. He was prolific and his works admit a number of divisions. To all major groups of verses he gave a new turn. His works were neat in form and sweet in versification. The most popular among his works are Baidehisha bilasa, Labanya bati, Koti brahmanda sundari, Subhadra parinaya, Kalakautuka, Rasa panchaka and a number of lyrics.

Baidehisha bilasa was designed in 'ba' akshara niyama like Dinakrushna's Rasakallola. Bhanja wrote on the love between Rama and Sita, a theme that evolves from the Rama katha in the Jagamohan Ramayana. He avoided devotional and spiritual aspects and concentrated only on the theme of love. Besides, his ideas on the aesthetics of poetry were integrated into his kavyas, Rasa panchaka and Rasa manjari, with reference to Rama and Krishna katha. However, on the whole, the poet's emphasis was on 'shringara' rasa in almost all his works.

Upendra Bhanja created a tradition of 'bandha kavya' in his Chitrakavya bandhodaya but no other poet worked on this form after him. The scholarly presentation in Bhanja's poetry inspired many a king who not only started writing short poems but also patronised poetic talents who wrote different kinds of lyrics.

The famous works of the post-Riti period were Padmabati abhilasa by Rani Nisanka Ray, Sashirekha by Padmanabh Srichandan, Mathura mangala by Bhakta Charan Das, Chataichhabati by Banamali Das, Brajabihari by Dasharathi Das, Rasa lahari by Raghunath Bhanja, Jugala rasamrita lahari by Sadananda Brahma, Gopibhasa by Danei Das, Ambika bilasa and Shyama rasotsaba by Brajanath Badajena, Bidagdha chintamani by Abhimanyu Samanta Simhara, Chandrakala by Baladev Rath and Raghaba bilasa by Jadumani Mahapatra.

Among the Riti poets of the 18th and 19th centuries Brajanath Badajena, Abhimanyu Samanta Simhara and Baladev Rath were the prominent figures. Brajanath Badajena (1730-95) emphasized the naturalness of style and preferred the plain to the ornate. The first phase of his writing thus carried the Riti tradition, but later he wrote satires and long kavyas, describing historical events. Among his writings two deserve special mention, Ambika bilasa for its 'akshara niyama' and Samara taranga for its war episode. His language there is neither too ornamental nor too commonplace.

Another dominant literary figure of this period was Abhimanyu Samanta Simhara (1757-1807). His principal works are Bidagdha chintamani, Prema chintamani, Rasabati Rasalekha and Sulakshana. Besides, he wrote shorter poems Baghageeta and Chadheia geeta and a number of 'chautisas'.Like other Riti poets Abhimanyu's Sulakshana is composed with 'sa' 'akshara niyama'. In all his works the poet's religious and devotional feelings and poetic powers are well expressed. Bidagdha chintamani is his best creation. The principal aim of the poet was to express the essence of 'Madhura' rasa and his devotion to Krishna. He was an exponent of Gaudiya Vaishnavism, and his poetry is rich in melody and apt use of words. Like Upendra Bhanja, Abhimanyu also paid particular attention to the use of words.

Baladev Rath (1789-1845) is generally remembered for his Kishore chandrananda champu in the Riti tradition. He was honoured with the title 'Kabisurya', the sun among the poets. Two definite trends of the Riti age were retained by him, the thematic trend originating from the Sanskrit epics and the composition of free musical verses like chhanda, chaupadi and chautisa. He also experimented with a completely new form in his Kishore chandrananda champu, a kavya with lyrical force and dramatic power narrated in the form of questions and answers. It primarily deals with the shringara rasa arising out of the sport of love between Radha and Krishna. This work deserves mention also for the harmonious combination of chaupadi and chautisa, the two popular forms of Oriya poetry. Besides, he composed a number of chhandas which express his feelings of poverty and frustration.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bhakti literature has had a strong and rich tradition in Oriya, led by Salabeg (17th c.) and Banamali Das. A large number of poets belonging to the Panchasakha tradition and the Riti period have written in the Bhakti tradition and attempted forms, such as the purana, janana, stuti and chautisa. The important puranas are Hari bansa by Achyutananda Das, Jaimini Bharata by Nilambar Das, Vishnukeshari purana and Markandeya purana by Mahadev Das and Nrisingha purana by Pitambar Das. Chautisa has its origin in Bachha Das's Kalasa chautisa which became very popular in medieval Oriya poetry. Almost all Riti poets have shown their interest in this particualr form which is a poem of thirty-four stanzas on a par with the thirty-four letters of the Oriya alphabet. It generally begins with the alphabet 'ka' or in the reverse way, the form known as 'Olata chautias'. The poets who have written chautisas are Damodar Das, Balaram Das, Dinakrushna Das, Bhaktacharan Das, Bishnu Das, Dhananjay Bhanja, Danei Das, Banamali Das and Bhupati Pandita.The subject-matter of chautisas is varied, depending on the expression of devotion, mythological and ideological concepts and love among mythical characters.

Bhajana and Janana are two distinct literary forms in Bhakti poetry which had their origin in the writings of Panchasakha and were enriched by Salabeg, Baladev Rath and Bhima Bhoi. Jananas are simple lyrics. Salabeg's verses are simple and short and express the poet's feelings of sorrow due to poverty and frustration in his personal life. Baladev Rath expresses his strong devotion to the Lord in his Jagannath janana and says that a complete dedication of body and soul is necessary to feel the essence of God in man. In Sarpa janana the poet compares God with 'kalasarpa' (primordial snake).

Bhima Bhoi (1855-1895), a tribal Kondh poet and an exponent of Mahima or Alekh cult, is known for his bhajans and Stuti chintamani, a collection of 100 cantos. The work bears autobiographical references and remarks on the degeneration of social values and ends with a long discourse on the Mahima cult. His bhajans are deeply religious and demand complete surrender before Mahima Gosain. All his verses are written in a simple style, using folk idiom and colloquial speech.

Other forms of poetry written in this period are 'sodasa', a form like chuatisa where sixteen vowels are used at the beginning of the lines; 'chitau' or letter form to send a message; 'padia', a very short poem and named according to the number of stanzas in it; 'poi' another short poem; mangala geeta, generally sung at marriage; 'ogala', a popular song sung by the cowboys, and 'samhita', 'patala', 'malika' about the philosophy of life. And finally, a different lyrical form that deserves mention was used by Gopala Krushna Pattanayak (1785-1862) to express the deep love between Radha and Krishna. In intensity of feeling and musical quality he is far ahead of his time.

Early and medieval Oriya poetry has thus a long history and has influenced modern poets in various ways.

P.C.P.

THE MODERN ERA:

Radhanath Ray (1848-1908) is generally accepted as the first modern poet in Oriya. His "modernity" was primarily based upon the use of local colour, local legends, traditions, places and stories and a near-total absence of religious themes except in his last major incomplete work Mahayatra (The last journey). The medieval love-lyrics and their obsession with the Radha-Krishna theme seemed to have been forgotten. His language was also largely free from the earlier Sanskritic moorings. Despite this newness his poetry was largely descriptive and celebrative and only rarely concerned with deeper probings into the problems of existence. Madhusudan Rao (1853-1912) added another quality to this emerging pattern of Oriya poetry. His was the intensely personal voice seeking to discover the divine and reading his message and designs in life and nature. His language had a lyrical charm and was loaded with a high degree of intense personal emotion. Madhusudhan's work has been collected in six volumes and most important among them are Kabita bali (Poems, 1875), Basanta gatha (Ballads of spring, 1901) and Bibidha kabita (Miscellaneous poems, 1915). His prayer songs are recited even today by the school students at the beginning of the school everyday. Madhusudan is popularly known as Bhakta Kabi or the devotee-poet.

The third voice in modern Oriya poetry was Gangadhar Meher (1862-1924). Gangadhar did not have much formal education. He was virtually self-taught and wrote poetry which was extremely lyrical and superbly crafted. While for themes Radhanath looked to the West and local legends, Gangadhar took his themes from the puranas and Sanskrit literature. He excelled in longer poems. His most celebrated work is Tapaswini (The nun, 1914). It is the story of the banishment of Sita and her life in the forest in exile.

In addition to these three, mention may also be made of Nandakishore Bala (1885-1928) who wrote a number of exquisite lyrical poems depicting rural life. His Nanabaya geeta (Nursery rhymes, 1915) and Palli chitra (Vignettes of village) are deservedly popular. It may not be out of place to mention here that Fakirmohan Senapati, the pioneer of modern Oriya fiction, also composed a number of well-written poems.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The first two decades of this century saw the growth of a patriotic spirit which brought in a new voice into Oriya poetry. There emerged a group of poets who were intensely patriotic and also had a flair for reforming society and inspiring the people with the patriotic zeal and spirit. This socio-literary movement later came to be known as Satyabadi juga and its guiding spirit was Pandit Gopabandhu Das (1877-1982). Das was not merely a great social worker and a friend of the poor, the lonely and the lost, but also composed a number of fine lyrics and longer poems like Bandir atmakatha (Autobiography of a prisoner, 1923) and Kara kabita (Poems in the prison, 1928). Nilakantha Das (1894-1967), who also belonged to this group, had a very important work in Konarke (At Konark, 1947). Godabarish Mishra wrote a number of lyrical poems and ballads like Kali jai (1923) and Kalika (The bud, 1921). From the late twenties till about the end of the forties Oriya poetry came to have a distinctly romantic tone. The poets who called themselves Sabuja, formed a distinct group and their poetry took its pattern from Tagore and his romantic metaphysical verse. Despite its borrowed inspiration it brought in a mellowed softness and personal emotion in delicate lyrical language. The theme was generally love and the sufferings arising out of love. Quite a bit of this poetry was simple and intensely personal. This tradition of poetry created by the Sabujas, in fact, extended all the way from Annadasankar Ray and Kalindi Charan Panigrahi to Mayadhar Mansinha and Radhamohan Garnaik. Among them the poetry of Baikunthanatha Pattanayak was well-crafted and based on a mystic contemplation of life not divorced from an awareness of contemporary realities. Mayadhar Mansinha, another important poet of this trend, was more prolific and more popular. He wrote a number of long poems and a very large number of smaller poems which have been collected in fourteen volumes. Love and its subtle nuances are the mainstay in Mansinha's poetry. There is also wistfulness for Orissa's past heritage. Kalindi Panigrahi, who is well-known for his novel Matira manisha, also wrote a number of lyrical poems. His important collections are Chhuritiye loda (A knife is needed, 1939) and Mane nahin (I don't remember, 1947). Radhamohan Garnaik, who made good use of Orissa's ancient ballads in his beautiful lyrical poetry is another very popular poet of this period. Kuntala Kumari Sabat, yet another major voice in this period, contributed to the growth of modern Oriya poetry by her strong personal voice and metaphysical tone.

As against this continuing romantic trend Godabarish Mahapatra, whose collection of poems Kanta o phula (The thorn and the flower, 1958) received the Sahitya Akademi Award, created a poetry which had a strong element of satire and was also very different from the revolutionary poetry of early Sochi Routray where the theme and treatment of poetry continued to be romantic, even when it was given a coating of revolution. Godabarish Mahapatra's poetry reveals that it is possible to laugh at things and situations irreverently and overcome destiny. This added a new dimension to modern Oriya poetry.

When Sochi Routray published his Pandulipi in 1947 it did mark the emergence of a new kind of language despite its political overtone and rhetoric. For the first time it was possible to see that the protagonist was a time-conscious individual who looked upon contemporary history with critical eyes and who had a deeper realisation of his own experiences and emotions and who did not look to mystic experiences for a solution to the problems of existence. The language is primarily based upon the spoken idiom of the people. Routray was, at one end, with the revolutionary progressive poets of the thirties whose main voice was Ananta Patnaik and, at the other end, with the more introspective poets that had emerged around the fifties. Ananta Patnaik, whose poetic voice provided the mainstay for the Nabayuga Sahitya Sansad, wrote poetry which was intense and deep and in a language that was rich and colloquial. The early Sochi Routray wrote a number of beautiful poems on village life as in Pallisree. The best of his earlier poetry is Baji Raut, a long poem composed in 1938 in memory of a young boat-man boy who sacrificed his life during the revolt against the British Raj. Pandulipi. Baji Raut, Pallishree and Kabita (1962) represent the excellence of Sochi Routray in the field of modern Oriya poetry. They incorporate the use of a new language wedded to the everyday speech and themes which are both intimate and metaphysical. But unfortunately Routray has almost come full circle towards the end of the 1960s to the less substantial, progressive rhetorical poems of his earlier years. Besides, in spite of his success with his experiments for a new language and technique, he could not discover the individual and unique idiom which is the hall-mark of a great poet.

In 1955 a slim volume of poems entitled Nutan kavita was published. It was a combined anthology of Guruprasad Mohanty and Bhanuji Rao. In a sense it was an odd anthology, for the two poets were very different in their approach to poetry and poetic techniques. Taken together the poems had power and passion and were completely free from the rhetoric and posturing of the poetry of the past two decades. Guruprasad published another anthology, Samudra snan (The sea-bath) which won the Sahitya Akademi Award. Love with its myriad colours is the theme of Guruprasad. Love is seen not as romantic fancy nor is it valued for its historical associations. Instead, it is attached to commonplace objects and situations in life such as the crumpled clothes, the meaningless table-talks, the paper flowers, cigarette ashes, etc. Life becomes a way of realising the passage of time and its futility. Bhanuji

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rao's Visada eka rutu (Sorrow is a season) is also a celebration of love and its different moods. He writes in an intimate voice and the poems are like beautiful Chinese scrolls. They have power, a romantic appeal and often convey a deep sense of pathos.

Ramakanta Rath, another important poet has experimented ceaselessly with various techniques and themes. His first anthology Kete dinara contains poems which are meditative and anguished in tone, lyrical in flow and often have a distinctly intellectual content. He has later published three more anthologies including Saptama rutu which won the Sahitya Akademi Award. His poems reveal an intense poetic sensibility and a capacity to probe into the psyche of the protagonist in most intimate terms. In his poems one comes across a cruel and heartless destiny which presides over human affairs.

Soubhagya Mishra's five collections of poems, particularly the last two, Andha mahumachhi and Bajrajan, mark him out as a sensitive and evocative poet who is concerned with the despair and loneliness inherent in the ritual of routine living and the agony arising out of this realisation. His poem Andha mahumachhi is indeed one of the finest poems in contemporary Oriya poetry and it delineates the destiny of the protagonist who goes through all experiences, as blindly as the bee seeking the honey, of meaning and relevance in their inexorable movement. The blind bee's movement is no doubt compulsive but it also symbolises the individual's quest for sweetness and light. Dipak Mishra, another powerful poet, has published ten anthologies of poems and is considered an important voice in the flowering of modern Oriya poetry. His themes, like Ramakanta's, are primarily death and time and he uses known and real characters as well as mythological characters to delineate human destiny against the backdrop of inevitable death.

Rajendra Panda has published six anthologies of poems including his latest Choukathare chirakala. He is a highly innovative poet and his language is exceptionally rich and lyrical. He has a firm grip on the spoken idiom as also on the classical idiom and a very rich repertoire of themes. A zest for living and the ceaseless quest for meaning are the more essential qualities of his poetry. For him life is its own justification and living incorporates all meaning.

Jagannath Prasad Das writes of his intense awareness of loneliness, instability and death. His apprehension of life's ecstasy and agony is through a complex insight into existence.

Prativa Satpathy has brought a charming new voice to modern Oriya poetry in her delicate lyrical style, the feminine grace in the themes and a metaphysical tone. There is a strong passionate commitment to life and all that it offers despite all agony. She has already published five anthologies of poems and is a force to watch.

Kamalakanta Lenka has also published a number of poems (anthologies) and has expressed many new facets of language and experience. Among the other significant poets mention must be made of Harihar Mishra with his colloquial rich idiom, Sourindra Barik with the charming economy and compactness of his poems, Hara Prasad Das and his mellow meditative poems, Sarat Pradhan's fine blending of myth and colloquial language and Saroj Mohanty with the wide range of his poems and their intense quests. Others, who have also distinguished themselves during this period, include Nityananda Nayak (Bidirna marala, 1976), Bansidhar Sarangi (Samaya asamaya, 1977), Nrusingha Rath, Debadas Chhotray, Phani Mohanty (Bidagdha hrudaya), Amaresh Patnaik (Manaru manaku), etc. It may also be noted that the poetic tradition of the thirties and forties still continues in the works of Binod Nayak (who is a Sahitya Akademi Award winner), Janaki Mohanty, Chitamoni Behera, Benudhar Raut who write in the romantic vein. On the other hand the continuation of the progressive revolutionary tradition may be seen in poets such as Rabi Singh, Brajanath Rath and Prasanna Patsahani. Among them Rabi Singh is perhaps the most important voice and is the finest and fiercest voice in Oriya progressive poetry. There is power as also rhetoric in his poems. Brajanath Rath has greater lyricism and delicacy of idiom in his poetry. Prasanna Patsahani combines the power of Rabi Singh with the delicacy of Brajanath Rath.

Modern Oriya poetry is a many-coloured mosaic and has developed along various lines each with its power, grace and charm. It represents today the best in the creative flowering of modern Oriya literature.

Si.M.

POETRY (Pali) is a metrical composition that formulates a concentrated imaginative awareness of experience in language arranged to create a specific emotional response through meaning, sound and rhythm. Although the word 'Pali' denotes the wide range of Middle Indian dialects which were generally used in India in an oral form as early as the middle of the first millenium BC, yet it is the language of the Buddha's teachings and the Buddhist sacred texts. Though the word 'Pali' is absent in the canon, tantibhasha or pariyatti suggests for the texts or scriptures the Pali language. In other words it is said that 'Pali' is a language of Tipitakas. The word Tipitaka means 'a threefold basket' consisting of the Vinayapitaka, the Sutta pitaka and the Abhidhammapitaka.

Pali literature falls mainly into two divisions 'Tipitaka' (Tripitaka) or the canonical, and 'Anupitaka' or the non-canonical. It is said that Pali literature is mainly religious and philosophical which consists of the canon, commentaries, the digests of Buddhist philosophy and the like. But in the vast range of the Buddhist literature from the literary point of view Suttapitaka is the most important. It is a great collection of five Nikayas (Digha, Majjhima, Samyutta, Anguttara and Khuddakanikaya).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Mostly it comprises the sutras which are written in prose.

'Jatkas are the divine songs of the Bodhisattva ideal', as Lamba Angarika Govinda puts it, 'and those are lyrical which speak directly to the human heart and which, therefore, are not only understandable to the wise but even to the simplest mind.'

The Dhammapada is an anthology of sayings chiefly referring to the ethical doctrines of Buddhism. In the Pali version of the text, there are 423 verses divided into 26 groups (vaggas). The style of composition is lucid, chaste and elegant.

The canonical book of Jataka includes only the Gathas. The Jatakathakathha is a well-planned and comprehenssive work of Buddist tales. It contains various stories which are of a great variety out of which the epic poems have evolved. Bhikshu Sangharakshita remarks: "One must read the Jatakas, if one wants to be moved, as one reads poetry, that is to say with a 'willing suspension of disbelief'."

The 'Jatakas' or stories of the former-birth of Buddha included in the Khuddakanikaya are important not only from the literary point of view but also because they make a great contribution towards the social and moral advancement of mankind. The Jataka book, however, of the Pali cannon contains only verses. It is the Jataka commentary which gives 550 stories in detail. Some birth stories of the Buddha are scattered throughout the Nikayas of the Suttapitaka. It is said that the total number of stories in the Jatakas is about three thousand.

The whole Buddhist literature was composed in two languages, viz. Pali and Sanskrit, and into five Nikayas (Shastras). The five Nikayas are: (i) Dighnikaya, (ii) Majjhimanikaya, (iii) Samyuttanikaya, (iv) Anguttaranikaya and (v) Khuddakanikaya.

Suttapitaka in Pali comprises both prose and poetry. Thergatha and Therigatha are the important books of Khuddakanikaya. Both are in verse form. Thergatha contains 1279 gathas which are divided into twenty-one Nipatas, but Therigatha consists of only 522 gathas and is divided into sixteen Nipatas. The descriptions are so real and graphic that they attract everybody. Thergatha abounds in natural descriptions and intuitive experiences, while Therigatha describes more intimate individual expressions than those found in Thergatha. M. Winternitz thinks that descriptions of nature in Thergatha are the real gems of Indian lyric poetry.

Tipitaka is the last collection of Buddha's words since 300 BC. Based on this text are famous Atthakathas written by Buddhadatta, Buddhaghosha and Dhammapala. Buddhaghosha is a great and famous figure in the non-canonical Pali literature. His Visuddhimagga is considered an encyclopaedia of Buddhism. It is the most prominent work that is divided into twenty-three chapters.

The Kathavatthu is a Buddhist book of debate on matters of theology, philosophy, cosmology and so on. In its present form, and as commented by Buddhaghosha, it contains twenty-three sections. It is the last composition of Abhidhammapitaka. The work was composed into twenty-two cantos. It refutes other sects and propounds sthaviravada.

Buddhacharita in Sanskrit is the epic masterpiece of Ashvaghosha. In Pali also we find Jinacharita which was composed by Medhankara in 472 stanzas. The poem narrates the whole life of Lord Buddha. It was inspired and influenced by great Sanskrit poets, Kalidasa and Ashvaghosha. Like Buddhacharita, Jinacharita has been regarded as the epic masterpiece in Pali literature.

There is a long list of kavyas in Pali literature. Jinalamkara of Buddharakshita is an ornate poem of 1156 A.D. It comprises two hundred and fifty gathas only. It is called a chitrakavya and does not have a regular flow of emotions and sentiments or decorative descriptions of numerous objects as cycle of seasons, imaginative pictures of nature, etc. The writing is artificial.

Saddhammopayana is an important kavya which comprises 629 gathas. The nature of the work is ethical and religious. It propagates the doctrines of Buddha in a lucid and eloquent language. Besides these kavyas, there are some other varieties of Pali poetry called 'Ekartha kavyas' and 'Laghukavyas'. Among them Pajjamadhu by Buddhappiya is an elegant shataka (containing one hundred and four gathas) kavya. In excellent expressions they praise the Buddha. There are some other works like the Buddhalamkara (15th c.) by Shilavansha and Lokadipasara (14th c.) by the Burmese monk Medhankara which possess the quality and diversity of kavyas.

From the twelfth to the nineteenth centuries AD many small poems were composed in praise of important persons like kings and chieftains and in celebration of the triumph of good over evil. These poems, however, are not enduring in effect, nor are they artistic and literary pieces.

During the fifteenth century, Burma was a remarkable centre for Pali literature from the viewpoint of artistic creation and scholarship. Some writers who made their name were of the Ariyavansha, Saddhammasri, Silavansha and Ratthasara.

In our own times explanatory commentaries, rather than works of creative literature, are being produced in Pali.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bharatasingh Upadhyaya, History of Pali literature (in Hindi; Prayaga, 1963); M. Winternitz, A History of Indian Literature. Vol. II (revised ed., 1933).

D.S.

POETRY (Prakrit). Prakrit poetry is rich in a variety of forms and expressions. Like Sanskrit literature, Prakrit literature, too, had its beginnings in classical poetry. The author of Sanskrit poetics Acharya Anandavardhana has referred to Khandakatha, Sakalakatha and Parikatha, the first two being in Prakrit proper. The Jains also wrote secular works like the Panchatantra. The Panchakhyana of Purnabhadrasuri has became so much a part of world literature that the readers, including the Jains themselves, have forgotten the Jain origin of the work. Although Panchakhyana was composed in Sanskrit, numerous stories have been incorporated in it from Prakrit literature. The Vaddhakaha of Gunadhya was the main source of the Prakrit narrative literature. The Jain tradition greatly contributed to Prakrit fiction, and various cycles of popular tales, historical records and anecdotes were combined in the collections prepared under this tradition. Like the story of Naravahandatta, one of the most important stories, 'Vasudevanidhi' was composed by Sanghadasgani in about the 5th century AD. These stories were composed in prose and poetry both. Poetry in Prakrit was written on a variety of subjects. This poetry is replete with wonderful imagery and suggestiveness. The imagery in some cases is worked out with such subtlety that it assumes the nature of conceits. A lady tells her faithless lover that the red threads in her eyes are not expressive of anger, but they are a texture made in amorous sport by his red nail-scars upon her body.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Prakrit poets, from Vimalasuri onwards, were deeply fascinated by Nature. In his Paumachariyam, an epic on the theme of the Ramayana, Vimalsuri gives many descriptions of nature, sometimes in ornate verse. While describing the spring season, the poet presents it as if it were a lion:

> Ankolatikkhanakho, malliyanayno asoyadalajiho
> Kuravayakaraladasano, sahayarasukesarasanio
> Kusumarayapinjarango, ahamuttalayasabhusiyakaraggo
> Patto Vasantasiho, gayavahayanam bhayam dento

(The Ankola tree is the sharp nail of the lion (spring); the flowers of Mallika are its eyes, the new leaves of Ashoka its tongue, Kuravaka are its sharp teeth, and Muktakalata its paws. The lion has arrived in full glory and looks, indeed, awesome.)

Most of these poetical works pertain to the domain of love poetry and delineate subtle nuances of feelings. In one of the poems a young woman, deceived in love, bids her lover go to his new love and let her alone with her sighs and lamentations lest he should also suffer the same fate:

> Vachcha mahavvie Ekke ihontu nisasa roiavvain
> Ma tujjha vi tia vina dakkhivanna iassa jaantu (quoted in Dhvanyaloka).

Most of the monastic poets chose their themes from the lives of the Thirthankaras and wrote prabandha kavyas in the traditional style.

The Prakrit poets have a great advantage over the Sanskrit poets in achieving 'shlesha', because the same word in Prakrit can stand for more than one word (unlike Sanskrit) and can also have more than one meaning as in Sanskrit. Besides, Prakrit poetry is rich in imagery and upmas, utprekshas, etc. It is well known that Vakpati is unequalled in the use of utprekshas just as Kalidasa was unrivalled in the use of upamas. It has now been proved that Pravarsena lent many ideas and images to subsequent Sanskrit poets.

Prakrit poetry is relatively free from the dominance of feudal lords, aristocrats and orthodox priests. But later when the Brahmins began to write in Prakrit they brought back the overwhelming influence of the Sanskrit court epics. So when one reads prabhandha kavyas like Setubandha. Gaudavaho, Lilavai (Lilavati), Kamsavaho (Kamsavadha), or the Prakrit sections in the so-called Sanskrit plays, one finds the writers writing under the shadow of Sanskrit.

There is much variety in Prakrit poetry. Dhurtakhyana by Haribhadrasuri is a unique satire, while Gathasaptasati is one of the earliest specimens of erotic literature. Vajjalagga, again, is another example of love poetry. Gahakosha, which consists of the popular songs of Hala, is a self-sufficient unit, depicting an idea or a situation in words, remarkably colourful and catching. As a secular text, it stands unparalleled in popularity. It contains seven hundred verses in gaha (gatha) metre. Many anonymous gathas were later introduced with the result that 'saptasati' turned out to be 'dashasati' and so on.

In Prakrit literature Setubandha is an epic of such excellence in technique and diction that it has often been ascribed to the great Sanskrit poet Kalidasa, even by Ramdasbhupati, the commentator of this great epic.

Kummaputtachariyam is a fine poetical composition by Anantahansa of the 16th century. He wrote only 198 verses in Prakrit. Some Sanskrit verses were, however, inserted in between.

An epic Dvyashraya by Hemachandra presents the perfect instance of classical Sanskrit literature. The descriptions of natural scenes are alive and charming. Besides, verses have been interwoven as examples to illustrate grammatical rules and show different Prakrit dialects. The poet is unparalleled in his use of the figures of speech. Here is an example of a perfect simile:

> Vijju-chalam mahura-giro dinto lachchhim jano chhuhattana
> Bhisao khu jaha sarao disana pausa-kilantana

Thus the Prakrit poets established a lofty academic tradition. They also proved that the religious spirit can be a perennial source of inspiration, not only for poets and scholars but also society as a whole.

D.S.

POETRY (Punjabi). The first authentic poetic composition in Punjabi, available so far, is that by Sheikh Farid. His poetry is included in Guru Granth, the holy scripture of the Sikhs, which was compiled by the fifth Sikh Guru

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Arjan in 1604. Sheikh Farid flourished before Guru Nanak (1469-1539). Guru Granth contains 112 shlokas and three hymns of Sheikh Farid. His poetry expresses man's tragic lot in this world.

It was in the beginning of the sixteenth century that the religio-social verse of Guru Nanak came to the fore which was subsequently preserved in Guru Granth by the fifth Sikh Guru Arjan. Keeping in view the content of his verse, it appears that his poetry can be divided into two types, i.e. philosophical and lyrical. His philosophical compositions are Japa, Siddha goshti and Onkar. The general tone of these works refutes most of the common assumptions of the various creeds and then intuitively asserts the principle of human effort to transcend the ordinary in order to reach the state of selflessness. The real basis of his lyrical poetry is the distressing human situation in his day when the common people were oppressed by the alien forces. In his compositions in Asa di var, he censures and condemns without reserve the social injustice and superstitious unreason of the Brahminical dispensation.

Guru Nanak was followed by Guru Ram Das and Guru Amar Das, who composed hymns of lyrical intensity. The pattern followed is the wife's longing for union with her husband, and the Guru's experience in these terms the pangs of the human soul for union with the divine incarnate in the Guru.

Nearly half of Guru Granth contains the hymn compositions by Guru Arjan Dev. The tone of his hymns is subdued but courageous, and this might have been due to tensions prevailing in his times between the Sikh leadership and the Mughal Administration. The best known of his compositions is a long poem, Sukhmani.

Another poet of these times was Bhai Gurudas, who was a contemporary of the third, fourth, fifth and sixth Gurus. He wrote in Brajbhasha as well as in Punjabi. His Punjabi compositions comprise forty long poems of twenty to thirty stanzas each, called 'Vars'. The subject-matter of his compositions is religio-social and socio-ethical, conforming to the doctrine of the Sikh religion, and they have been written in a pure Punjabi idiom.

Shah Hussain was the first Sufi poet. He was followed by other Sufi poets like Bulleh Shah, Sultan Bahu and others in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Hadayat Ullah flourished later. His poetry is lyrical, but its import is social also as in the poetry of Bulleh Shah. It advocates ceaseless devotion to the Divine. Bulleh Shah, in his poetry, is rather outspoken in his opposition to rigorous Muslim conventions and bigotry in general. The language of his poetry is nearly similar to the folk idiom and is highly emotional.

The trend of romance flourished in Punjabi poetry along with Sufi lyricism. This trend was started by Damodar Gulati, a contemporary of Shah Hussain. The love story of Hir and Ranjha was versified by him in his native dialect of Jhang. Subsequently, this romantic love story became a Punjabi classic along with other love stories like Yusuf Zulaikha, Laila Majnu, Shirin Farhad, Sohini Mahival and Sassi Punnu. Pilu a contemporary of Damodar, wrote the verse romance of Mirza and Sahiban in the heroic verse form of Punjabi. Half a century later, Hafiz Barkhurdar wrote some other romances besides Mirza Sahiban.

More poets subsequently wrote their own versions of the love story of Hir and Ranjha; of them Waris Shah (1735-1781) is most celebrated. He is preceded in this by Hamid, Muqbal and some others of lesser merit. After Waris Shah, this love story along with other love stories, has been versified up to the modern period by every poet of some note, and the compositions of many poets like Hashim Shah and Ahmad Yar of the period of Ranjit Singh, and Joga Singh, Kishan Singh Arif, Bhagwan Singh and Fazal Shah of the later nineteenth century achieved distinction.

In Punjabi poetry the modern period may be presumed to have started more or less with the work of Bhai Vir Singh (1872-1957) towards the end of the nineteenth century. Bhai Vir Singh's first work of poetry, Rana Surat Singh, which may also be called the work of excellence, was published in 1901. It is the story of Rani Raj Kaur lamenting the death of her husband, Rana Surat Singh, in a patriotic war.

Bhai Vir Singh's other poems are published in four collections: Bijlian da har (Garlands of lightning, 1927), Lahir hulare (Waves and swings, 1928), Matak hulare (Swings of dignity, 1948), and Mere sainya jio (My lord, live long, 1953) which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1955).

Bhai Vir Singh is modern in his technique, though his consciousness has many medieval strains and his outlook is by and large revivalist.

Charan Singh (1887-1935), Shahid and Dhani Ram Chatrik (1876-1954) are other younger contemporaries of Vir Singh. Charan Singh, in his compositions, is secular and indulges in mirthful satire of the Punjabi middle class. Chatrik is a classicist in his outlook and his technique is largely borrowed from contemporary Urdu poetry.

Puran Singh (1881-1931) composed his poems on the model of those of the American poet, Walt Whitman. He was, like Whitman, a frankly sensuous poet.

The freedom struggle and the struggle for Sikh Gurdwara Reform had their impact on Punjabi literature. The movements brought to the fore many poets who had modern consciousness.

The eminent among them were Hira Singh Dard (1889-1964), Gurumukh Singh Musafir (1899-1976), Ferozdin Sharf (1901-1955) and Vidhata Singh Tir (b. 1901). However, it was Mohan Singh (1905-1978) who broke away from the traditional poetry in the mid-thirties. He had started with the semi-modern outlook of poets of the period of freedom struggle, as in Save pattar (Green leaves, 1936), which also contains some romantic poems of a comparatively modern tone. In Kusumbhara (Red oleander, 1937), as also in Adhvate (Half-way, 1938), he is strongly influenced by the Freudian mode of thought. In Kach sach (Falsehood and truth, 1945), he professes to make a transition from the romantic to the socialist progressive mode. This progress is maintained in his Sahitya Akademi Award winning book Wadda vela (Late morning, 1958), Avazan (Voices, 1950) Jaya mir (Victory of peace, 1953). In the last stages of his poetry, he becomes rather pessimistic, but maturer both in outlook and in technique, as in Jandare (Locks, 1975) and Buhe (Doors, 1977). The epic poem on the life of Guru Nanak, Nanakayana (The epic of Nanak, 1974), is a curious mixture of traditional religious conformity and the modern interpretation, but it is executed in excellent technique.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Amrita Pritam (b. 1919) published, under her parental name Amrit Kaur, juvenile verses under the title Amrit lahran (The ambrosial waves) in 1936. She was also soon drawn into the romantic and progressive atmosphere of the literary circles of the time and sang out her heart as a young woman whose spirit was stifled by social compulsions. The poems in her collections Jionda jiwan (The life exultant, 1939), Trel dhote phul (Dew-washed flowers, 1941), O Gitan valia (O, master of songs, 1942), Badalan de palle vich (In the lap of the clouds, 1943), Sanjh di lali (The twilight, 1943) and Lok peer (The people's anguish, 1944) were more modern in tone and construction, reflecting what may be termed as romantic progressivism. But reacting to Marxist-realist criticism, she modified her romantic sentiment to a rather feminist and mordant irony over woman's lot in the world and adopted quite a strident tone against man's treatment of woman, as in Patther gite (Gravel stones, 1946). She scaled the heights of poetic achievement in her ironical as well as emotional reaction to the tragic side-effects of Independence, the arson, rapes and killings that followed the division of Punjab and the mass migration of Hindu and Muslim population from one part of the land to the other. The poetry of this mood is published in two collections. Lammian vatan (Long journeys, 1948) and Sarghi vela (The hour of dawn, 1952). However, she turned back to romantic melancholy in Sunehure (Messages, 1952), which brought her the Sahitya Akademi Award (1956), In her latest mode, she has nearly reached the borders of existentialism, betraying a preciosity of expression and imagery as in Ashoka cheti (1957). One of her collections. Kaghaz te kanvas (Paper and canvas, 1973) won her the prestigious Jnanpith Award in 1981.

Harbhajan Singh (b. 1920) started as a progressive aesthete in Lasan (Weals, 1954) and Adharaini (The midnight, 1962). In his poetic play Tar tupka (The hanging drop, 1955), he nearly entered the realms of the Marxist doctrine realising the danger of nuclear war but, perhaps, as a consequence of academic sophistication (he was Professor of Punjabi in the University of Delhi), he involved himself in the study of modern American criticism and structuralism, which affected his creative talent and led him into the quagmire of existentialist questions and surrealist paradox, as is visible in his poems collected in the Sahitya Akademi Award winner, Na dhupe na chhaven (Neither sunshine nor shade, 1967), Sarak di safe te (On the page of the road), and Main jo bit gaya (I, who is a past).

Prabhjot Kaur (b. 1924) started with juvenile romantic sentiment, much as Amrita Pritam did, but she did not turn to the progressivist trend, and after a period of romantic poetry in volumes like Supane sadharan (Dreams and desires, 1949), Van kapasi (1958), Pankheru (Birds), began to feel the youth passing away, a sophisticated ennui, to which she has given powerful expression in the collections of her poems, such as the Sahitya Akademi Award winner Pabbi (The plateau, 1962), Khari (Gulf, 1967), Vaddarshi shisha (The magnifying glass, 1973) and Chander yug (The moon age, 1977).

Sohan Singh Misha (b. 1934) has broken new ground in the collections of his poems, Chaurasta (Crossroads, 1961), Dastak (Knock on the door, 1966) and Kach de vastar (Attire of falsehood, 1974), which are suffused with an ironical and sophisticated realism and which question all human relations, the common intellectual's political and class awareness marred by timidity.

But the most convincing achievement in Punjabi poetry after Mohan Singh can be attributed to Shiv Kumar (1936-1973). He started with a poignantly lyrical preciosity in Piran de paraga (A fare of aches) and continued to add to his achievement with collections like Lajwanti (1962), Mainu vida karo (Bid me farewell, 1963), Ate dian chirian (The sparrows made of flour, 1964), and Birha tun Sultan (Yearning, you are the sovereign, 1965). The height of achievement is reached in his verse play, Luna (1966), in which he seeks to vindicate the solicitation of the adolescent Puran by his young stepmother, Luna, and shifts the blame to Puran's father for marrying a woman much younger in age. It is a great technical achievement and won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1967). His last work, Main te main (I and I, 1970), in which Shiv Kumar gives a poetically modern version of the sin of motherhood and the vulnerability of young women, of which he may have had personal experience, is perhaps his masterpiece.

Takht Singh (b. 1914), Jaswant Singh Neki (b. 1925), Sukhpal Vir Singh Hasrat (b. 1936), Jagtar Singh and Randhir Singh Chand (b. 1943) are some other poets of the middle generation who have some poetic achievement to their credit.

Neki's Karuna di chhan ton magron received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1979. Another poet to win the 1983 award of the Akademi is Pritam Singh Safeer for his book Anik Bisthar.

The youngest generation of poets can be divided into two groups, the militants and the existentialists. Of the former, Avtar Singh Pash may be considered a trend-setter. In his paradoxical style he combines natural descriptions of the poverty of the peasant and rural worker, the oppression of police and administration and intellectual militancy that marks the failure of the Indian communists to stage revolution. Surjit Singh Patar, who uses the same paradoxical style, is less militant but more lyrical. Manjit Kaur Tiwana is existentialist, and very vocal in her criticism of the older generation.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Very remarkable contribution to Punjabi poetry has been made by some poets who have been living abroad for many years past. Of these Ravinder Singh Gill (Ravi) now in Canada, Sati Kumar in Sweden and Ajaib Kamal in Kenya deserve mention. They have published many volumes of poems which may live as daring experiments in the field of Punjabi poetry.

S.S.S.

POETRY (Rajasthani) spans over a period of twelve centuries. In the past poetical compositions mainly centred round wars, deeds of valour, cultural traditions, and devotion to Almighty. It were the Charanas (bards) who evolved a form and style of their own, commonly called 'dingal git', and laid down some principles of poetics. There are well over fifty thousand gits 'according to a rough estimate. More numerous than the gits are the 'duhas' which easily run into lakhs. These two genres, along with some classic metres, have been popular up to 1935, whereafter attempts were made to change over to such forms and metres as were in vogue in Hindi.

Modern Rajasthani poetry can conveniently be classified under the following broad heads: Heroic, Ethical, Devotional, Nationalistic, Romantic, Satirical, Progressive, Realistic, and Nature Poetry. The genres adopted are epic lyric, narrative story, and folk song, and the metres used are either traditional metres or blank verse.

Heroic poetry forms the very core of Rajasthani poetry. A majority of modern poets have sung of the heroic deeds of great warriors and exhorted people to draw inspiration from them. Narayansingh Bhatti's Durgadas, Satyanarayan Aman's Shishdan, Meghraj Mukul's Sainani, Suman's Delyam ro divalo, Nathusingh's Vir satasai and Shrimali's Hadi Rani are some of the prominent poems. Chandrasingh, considered father of modern poetry, is the foremost poet of nature. The trend set by him in his Vadali and Lu was carried on, though in their own styles, by a number of poets, e.g., by Nanuram Sankarta (Kalyan), Sumersingh Shekhawat (Meghmal), Udayvir Sharma (Damphi) and Narayan Singh Bhati (Sanjh). Ethical poetry is more or less traditional, and the famous names in this genre are: Udayraj Ujal (Bhaniyai ra duha), Bhomraj Bhambhiru (Ek bisi, Mungha moti) and Kanhaiyalal Sethia (Ramaniyai ra soratha). There has not been much of devotional poetry in modern times, and the only poets worth mentioning are Kanha Maharsi' Maru mayank, Rajshri Sadhana's Pada and Chatarsingh's Duha. With the coming of Gandhi on the national scene, there was a flow of nationalistic literature which partly developed into progressivism too, trying to absorb theories of Socialism and Marxism. Ganeshlal Vyas Sumanesh Joshi, Revatdan Kalpit and Gajanan Varma are regarded as pioneers in the field. Eminent lyricists of romantic poetry are Kishor Kalpanakant, S.P. Joshi (Diva kampai kyum, Bol bharmali), N. Singh Bhati (Jivan dhan), Kalyan Singh Rajawat (Ramatiya mata toda), Gajanan Varma (Sono nipajai reta main, Bara maso) and Madan Gopal Sharma (Gokhai ubhi goradi). Satirical poetry has been attempted by Vimalesh (Chhedkhani, Kucharani, etc.), Buddhiprakash Parik (Chuntakya, Chabadaka, etc.) and S. Aman (Chunthiya). On the pattern of the New Hindi poetry, the following poets have taken the lead in Rajasthani poetry also: Mani Madhukar (Pagpheto), Nand Bharadwaj (Andhara pakha), Gordhansingh (Kirakar), Paras Arora (Jhala), Chandraprakash Devala (Pagi), Bhupatiram Sakariya (Cheto) and K.G. Sharma (Chetana ri dhuni).

Talking of genres, prabhandha kavya has been attempted by poets who want to reinterpret the classical and historical events in the modern context. Manakho by Girdharisingh, Radha and Bol bharmali by S.P. Joshi, Ramdut by S.K. Vyas, Shakuntala by Karanidan Bharat are a few examples. Folk songs have been written by Ganeshlal Vyas. Manohar Sharma, Gajanan Varma and Rawat Saraswat. Versified stories were introduced by Mukul, while the most noteworthy writer to use traditional metres is Mukan Singh.

Raw.S.

POETRY (Sanskrit). The term 'kavya' (poetry) in Sanskrit means much more than what it does in Western literary criticism. In Sanskrit, kavya is not confined to a verse form, but signifies all ornate works composed in verse or prose or a mixed form together with prose and verse. Thus, the Sanskrit term kavya is more pervasive and wider in meaning than the Western word poetry.

The origin of Sanskrit poetry is traced back to the distant Vedic hymns, and its prototype is discovered in the 'Narashamsi' and the 'Danastuti' panegyrics and in the magnificent description of the Vedic gods. But in reality the two great epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, are undoubtedly the precursors of Sanskrit poetry, as they have offered to later poets and dramatists almost inexhaustible material for their works. Out of the two epics the Ramayana is an ornate poem which served as a model to which later Sanskrit poets aspired. The ingredients of Sanskrit poetry, in which greater importance is attached to the form than to the matter and in which literary embellishments and decorative devices are frequently employed to give it brilliance, glamour and colour, are rooted firmly in the Ramayana. Accordingly, the

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Mahabharata, which is composed in simple undecorated verse form, is regarded merely as 'itihasa', whereas the Ramayana is credited with the title 'Adikavya', the first creation, par excellence, in poetry.

Hence beginning with Ashvaghosha, who composed the Buddha-charita on the model of the Ramayana, and coming down to Kumardasa, Bhavabhuti, etc. we amazingly observe the full impact of the Ramayana on them. Even in the present century the literature in India is greatly influenced by this epic. There is a wide gap in time between the composition of the Ramayana and the first ornate poems composed by Kalidasa and Asvaghosha, but the long interval does not mean that there was no poetic activity during this period. The direct reliable evidence for the production of Sanskrit poetry in its various phases and forms is furnished by the testimony in Patanjali's Mahabhashya (2nd c. BC) which refers to three Akhyayikas (prose romances) namely, Vasavadatta, Sumanottara and Bhaimarathi and also mentions two other poetic works, Kamsavadha and Valivadha which were probably dramatic compostions. The Mahabhashya preserves a few quotations, mostly metrical but fragmentary, in which one can find eulogistic, erotic and gnomic themes in polished kavya style. The inscriptions of Rudradaman at Girnar, dated AD 150, is composed in a fully developed kavya style interspersed with figures of speech of various kinds. The famous Allahabad inscriptions, containing Harisena's panegyrics of Samudragupta and Vatsabhatt about the sun temple at Mandsor are moulded in an ornate literary style and demonstrate their close affinity with later fully developed kavya style of Bharavi or Magha. This evinces that there was a continued growth of poetic activity since the days of the Ramayana until it emerged in its fully developed form in the ornate poems of Kalidasa, Bharavi and Magha.

Sanskrit poetry is not only one of the oldest in world literature, it is also magnificent and superb in its various forms and varieties. Viewed in its rich heritage, the fascinating charm of its words and its flexibility of expression, Sanskrit poetry occupies a prominent place in the history of world literature.

In brief, Sanskrit poetry can be classified into 'charita-kavya' or 'mahakavya' which generally depicts the life of gods or great personages; the lyric poem, called khanda-kavya or giti-kavya, in which mostly love-romances and love-messages are portrayed; the century collections, known as shatakas, in which various themes like love, devotion and ethical values are elaborated; the different types of dramas, known as natakas; the adoration hymns styled as stotras; the panegyrical verses, known as prashastis, in praise of kings and religious teachers; the work composed in prose and verse and designated as champu; the narrative literature called katha; the didactic verses known as niti-kavyas; prose-romances composed in highly decoratic style and termed gadya-kavya; and many more. All these writings, whether in verse or prose, are designated kavya (poetry) in Sanskrit.

The source material of Sanskrit kavya is very wide and old, as it draws for its material not only upon the great epics but also the Vedas, smritis, puranas, itihasa, sectarian doctrines, the science of erotics (Kamashastra) the science of polity (Arthashastra), social customs, manners, traditions, beliefs, indeed upon every branch of knowledge.

Mahakavya: A highly acclaimed variety of Sanskrit poetry is mahakavya, the great poem. To be honoured a great poet, mahakavi, the poet has to compose a great poem defined as mahakavya. In the composition of mahakavya the poet gets ample opportunity to display his poetic skill in employing a rich variety of poetic embellishments and the power of delineating various aspects of nature and his ability to use artificial internal rhyming and artistically constituted metres. He shows his scholarship in the use of rare and obsolete words, long compound words and the amazing play of words with more than one meaning.

Ashvaghosha's two poems, Buddha-charita which depicts the life of Buddha and Saundarananda which concentrates on the love of Sundari and Nanda, the half brother of Buddha, are the earliest available mahakavyas composed in about 1st century AD. Kalidasa's two works, Raghuvamsha, and Kumarasambhava, are highly admired mahakavyas. In Raghuvamsha the history of the race of Raghu, the ancestors of Rama, and Rama's own life are recounted, followed by an account of the successors to Rama. The theme of Kumarasambhava is the marriage of Lord Shiva and Uma, the daughter of the Himalaya, and the birth of Karttikeya who vanquished Taraka, the demon. The poems are fine examples of Kalidasa's charming fancy, and are regarded as the finest specimens of Sanskrit mahakavya, which set the high standard of formal finish and glamour for later poetry. Other prominent mahakavyas are Kiratarjuniya of Bharavi based on the Mahabharata, describing how Arjuna obtained the 'Pashupata' weapon from Lord Shiva; Ravana-vadha, popularly known as Bhatti-kavya, based on the Ramayana and composed with the sole object of illustrating the rules of Sanskrit grammar; Janakiharana of Kumaradasa, based on the Ramayana as the title indicates; the renowned poem Shishupala-vadha by Magha based on the Mahabharata, depicting the death of Shishupala at the hands of Srikrishna; Sri Harsha's Naishadhiya-charita, portraying the fascinating story of Nala and Damayanti. The poets of the mahakavyas display their extraordinary skill in the different branches of Sanskrit lore and their unique command of the intricacies of Sanskrit grammar, rhetoric, prosody and lexicon. Other less known mahakavyas are Hayagrivavadha, a lost work by Bhartrmentha, Kapphinabhyudaya by Shivaswamin, Haravijaya by Ratnakara, Raghava-Pandaviya by Kavi-raja, Par- shvabhyudha by Jineshvara, Shrikanthacharita by Mankha, Sahridayananda by Krishnanada, etc.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The tradition of writing mahakavyas is still continued with a good deal of success. A few compositions of the present century deserve mention. They are P.K. Narayana Pillai's Kristubhagavata, S.B. Varnekar's Shivarajyodaya, Vasanta Shevde's Vindhyavasinivijaya, T.A. Bhandarkar's Sri Vivekanandacharita, etc.

Lyric Poetry (Giti kavya): Lyrics are the oldest Indian poetical compositions and mostly consist of love songs in which amorous feelings are beautifully portrayed. A highly admired Sanskrit lyric is Meghaduta (Cloud-messenger) by Kalidasa. The theme is the communication of a message from an exiled Yaksha by the clouds to his wife dwelling far away at Alaka in the Himalayas. The work set so popular a trend in message poetry that no less than fifty Duta-kavyas (messenger poems) were modelled on the Meghaduta. Other known lyrical works are Ghata-karpara (Potshred), called after the author's name; Chaura-panchashika (Fifty stanzas by a thief) by the Kashmiri poet Bilhana; and Pavana-duta (Wind-messenger) by Dhoyi. The most marvellous lyrics are, however, the Amaru-shataka (Hundred stanzas of Amaru), portraying lovers in all their moods, bliss and dejection, anger and passion; the three shatakas, by Bhartrihari, namely Shringara shataka dealing with erotic sentiment, Niti-shataka dealing with polity, and Vairagya-shataka, dealing with renunciation; the Gita Govinda of Jayadeva, depicting the love of the cowherd Srikrishna for the cowherdess Radha and based on the Krishna-cult. In Sanskrit literature, lyric poetry is conspicuous for its portrayal of the superb beauty of Indian girls, blossoming trees fragrant with flowers, gurgling rivers, snow-capped mountains, variegated birds and agile animals. Composing poems in lyric style became so popular that lyric poetry no longer remained confined to love songs only. Lyrics were also composed on secular, religious, gnomic and didactic subjects.

Dramatic poetry (Natakas): Indian poetic tradition regards drama as the best of kavya, and the dramatist the best poet. So goes the saying: 'Kavyeshu natakam ramyam.' Sanskrit dramas are idealistic and romantic in character, and more importance is given to the portrayal of sentiments rather than the individualised characterisation and the sustained development of the plot. Hence Sanskrit dramatic characters are mostly set types and the story of the plays is stereotype and conventional.

Gadya kavyas: Though the beginning of Sanskrit ornate prose can be traced to dim antiquity, the prominent extant prose works are Dashakumaracharita by Dandin, Vasavadatta by Subandhu and Harshacharita and Kadambari by Banabhatta. Dashakumaracharita, written in simple fluent prose, describes the interesting exploits of princes and brings out admirably social degradation prevalent in its time. Subandhu's Vasavadatta portrays the love story of Prince Kandarpa Ketu and Vasavadatta, hence the title Vasavadatta. The poet boasts that he has displayed in this work his rare ability in the employment of pun in every syllable in his words. Banabhatta, undoubtedly the greatest of Sanskrit prose writers, glorifies his patron King Harsha Vardhana in his Harshacharita, a historical prose kavya. His Kadambari, a higly admired prose romance, vividly describes the love story in several births of ardent lovers. It is not the story but the grandiloquent style, the power in the graphic description of objects, the extraordinary mastery over the rule-ridden Sanskrit language and the smooth and elegant diction that have earned for Bana an unparalleled panegyric 'Banocchishtam jagat sarvam.' The eulogy is true to its form and spirit, as most of the subsequent prose writers like Dohapala and Soddhala have unhesitatantly imitated him and drawn inspiration from his Kadambari.

Champus: Besides, there are kavyas called champus in the mixed form with prose and verse, prominent among them being Nalachampu, Ramayanachampu, Bharata champu; historical poetry like Navasahasamkacharita, Vikramanka deva charita, Rajatarangini; ethical poetry like Moha Mudgara, Bhaminivilasa; and stotra kavyas like Bana's Chandishataka and Mayura's Surya shataka or Adi Shankara's Laharis. In short, Sanskrit poetry touches every aspect of human personality and almost all varying phases of nature, flora and fauna, history, religion, philosophy, polity, rhetoric and prosody. It has wonderful imagery, fascinating grace of diction and acrobats with the intricacies of Sanskrit grammar. In its richness of theme and graphic expression, it is as noble and admirable as any great poetry in the world.

Rav.N.

POETRY (Sindhi). Although Sindhi is an old language a mention of which appears in the Rigveda, we do not find any documentary record of its literature, leave alone its poetry, till the sixteenth centrury. As such, we can trace the development of Sindhi poetry only from 1520 onwards. Based on this, the development of Sindhi poetry is divided in three distinctive periods:

(i) From 1520 to 1850 or pre-British era; (ii) From 1850 to 1947 or British era; and (iii) From 1947 till date.

However, it is necessary to look at the background against which Sindhi poetry grew and developed from 1520 and onwards. Sindh, being an integral part of India, must have followed the literary tradition prevalent in the mainland, based on Vedantism, inheritance of the Rishis and afterwards of Jainism and Buddhism. Being in the western part of the country, it had always been a target of foreign invasions and repeated destruction of its literature. Starting from Alexander the Great, right up to Mughals and Nadir Shah, the process repeated itself for innumerable times. However, after the invasion of the Arabs in the eighth century AD, 150 years' rule of Arabs and Ghaznavis witnessed the influx of a number of Muslim saints and missionaries, who came here to propagate Islam. The Muslim saints brought with them the mysticism of sufi cult which professed that God was one, and man who was a part of God perpetually suffered the pangs of separation and tried to be one with Him. For this man practises abnegation of the self and strives for the welfare of all. Since a part of Vedantism corresponds to the same kind of mysticism, sufi mysticism was accepted and assimilated by people in their life and literature. For the next 500 years two Sindhi dynasties, the Sumras and the Sammas, ruled over Sindh. During their reign, bards and court minstrels composed verses in praise of their protectors, their valour during wars, their generosity in peace and their love affairs. In the course of time these praises and narrations turned into legends and folk-tales. In addition, the 'Bhakti Movement' of the medieval period in India also influenced the Sindhi poets. They eagerly adopted it, although their compostions are lost to the posterity. When discovered, these compositions will change the history of Sindhi literature.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The poets of the sixteenth century, thus, turned to the following sources for their compositions:

(a) Religious scriptures of India as well as those of the Persian mystics or sufis;
(b) Legends, historical and pseudo historical romances, heroic wars and folk-tales well-known to Sindhis;
(c) Variations observed by them in changing moods of nature in different seasons which enabled them to establish oneness with God; and
(d) Emphasis on Indian heritage, i.e. the only knowledge worth knowing, the 'Jnan', that has any value.

Pre-British Era: On such material, the Sindhi poets of the period from 1520 to 1700 composed their verses in two oldest forms of Sindhi poetry, viz. duho and soratho. They, however, experimented on these forms by introducing more than two lines in each of duho or soratho. In Sindhi these are called 'Bayts'. The fore-runners of this period are a trio of Qazi Qadan, Shah Abdul Karim of Bulri and Shah Miyon Inat of Jhonk. Qazi Qadan brought the Sindhi language out of the shackles of the narratives of court minstrels and religious propaganda of priests and 'Mullahs'. By using new imagery and new style, he enabled Sindhi language to express deep thoughts of Vedantism and sufism. His similes and metaphors are drawn from his environment and therefore do not sound alien to the reader. Shah Abdul Karim's language has sweetness and music tinged with the mysticism of the type of Rumi's of Persian literature, but his imagery is thoroughly Sindhi. In addition to Vedantism and mysticism, he has taken folk-tales as well for some of his narrative poems. Shah Inat, who is the last of this trio, used classical Sindhi and employed the classical form of Sindhi bayt. Unlike Qazi Qadan and Shah Karim, who had kept the two trends of the narratives of minstrels and the spiritual poetry of sufi saint poets distinctly apart, he brought in the synthesis of the two and became a saint poet of the people by singing about their heroes in war and peace, narrating their traditional tales and romances as well as the tales about the traders, weavers and the monsoon rains on which depended the prosperity of the people. He also treated spiritual themes of love and hope and sang the praise of the saints and selfless devotees in search of God in his compositions.

The later half of the pre-British era, i.e. the period from 1700 to 1850, is considered the golden age or the classical period of Sindhi poetry. During this period, another trio of Sindhi poets, Shah, Sachal and Sami shone on the poetic sky of Sindhi literature. All three of them were poets of the people in the true sense of the term. Shah Abdul Latif of Bhit, the greatest exponent of this period, followed Shah Inat in form and technique, but he had more skill and insight. He soared high in the realms of ideas. Like Shah Inat, he not only combined various trends prevalent in Sindhi poetry, but also emphasised the sentiment of patriotism which had resulted from his close observation of Sindhis striving hard to throw off the foreign yoke of Afghans and Mughals. Shah Abdul Latif introduced 'Wai', a form of one-line verse, which was very lyrical. Sachal, who was the inheritor of Shah Latif, extended 'Wai' to two lines and it became known as 'Kafi', the most popular, the most expressive and the most touching of all Sindhi verse till this day. Sachal's kafis represent the high watermark reached by lyrical poetry in the Sindhi language. Like Kabir, he revolted against falsehood, cant and silly dogmas of his times. He exposed Mullahs, Akhunds and Makhdums who were the literary and spiritual directors of people's conscience in his days. He stood for classless society. Like Jayadeva he reached the extreme trance while singing to himself and uttering the gems of lyrics. He was, therefore, called the Sachal 'Sarmast' (Sachal the intoxicated). The third poet of this trio of classical Sindhi poetry was Bhai Chainrai Lund 'Sami'. Like a saint, he always remained cool and serene, wrapped up in contemplation of his inner self and love of God. He interpreted the deep philosophy of Vedantism, exhorting people to tear off the veil of 'Maya' (Illusion) which hides the 'Reality' from our eyes and become one with God. His language is simple, and appealing to untutored minds of ordinary and rustic people. There is clarity, serenity and harmony in his poetry.

During this period, the court language was Persian and many minor poets tried to compose poetry based on Persian prosody. Thus 'Maddah' (apostrophe, praise), 'Maulud' (Prophet's praise), 'Marsia' (elegy on the death of a celebrity) and 'Masnavi' (connected narrative) appeared in Sindhi poetry, besides traditional forms of bayt, wai and kafi. This marked the beginning of measured verse according to Persian prosody which was much practised in later periods of Sindhi poetry. These poets showed craftsmanship rather than artistry.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

POETRY (SINDHI)

British Era: After the creation of a new script for Sindhi by the British, Sindhi poetry followed the rigid Persian prosodic forms. All tried to enrich and develop their language by composing marsia, qasida, khutba and musaddas. These forms, which had a beginning in pre-British era, were patronised by Muslim rulers, who had now turned into landlords. Three new forms were introduced on the lines of Persian prosody and Persian thinking. These were ghazal, masnavi and rubai (Quatrain). Ghazal, though introduced by Sachal, drifted away from his allegorical description of the beauty of the Beloved or God as seen by a sufi saint, and indulged in description of the beauty of the earthly beloved. It reached new heights in the ghazals of Khalifo Gul Muhammad 'Gul' and Sangi. The latter came out with an open expression of romance in ghazals. Lekhraj Aziz achieved the art of composing ghazals perfect in form and metre. All poets of this period vied with one another in describing the charms of a beautiful woman and pangs of separation of the helpless lovers. Along with ghazals, the form of rubai was also perfected during this period. A number of Diwans were produced, and it was the age of erotics in Sindhi poetry which lasted till the third decade of the present century.

With the advent of the fourth decade of the twentieth century, the success of the Russian revolution as well as the Indian freedom struggle urged people to turn towards realism. The period of mythology and erotism was over as realism dawned on literature. A new literary movement emerged out of this situation and the subsequent growth of new creative tendencies in India found their echo in the compositions of Kishinchand Khatri 'Bevas'. Social realism dictated by Marxism, critical realism as depicted by the Bengali writers in unfolding and ridiculing social vices, and the popular wave of patriotism — all these trends were reflected in the poetry of 'Bevas'. He wrote against taboos, introduced new subjects, created new themes, brought in new phrases and new rhythm and gave new direction to Sindhi poetry. He stood for enlightened conservativism and restricted erotism. He enshrined his individual reflection and distinctive emotions in millions of hearts. His poems were sung by school children, in temples and beside the cradles; they haunted the hearts of women, attracted the attention of the labourers and workers and were admired by common man for their simplicity and sweetness. His poetry is marked by unsurpassed earnestness of purpose and emotional intensity.

In form too, 'Bevas' broke away from the familiar forms like duho, wai and kafi as well as from rubai and ghazal, and composed 'Nazm', another form of Persian poetry, which is still in vogue. He filled this lyrical form with satiating sweetness, colour of idealism, splendour of language and richness of imagery. He invested it with the freshness of phrase and style. His disciples carried his torch further. Hundraj Dukhayal expressed sentiments of patriotism and nationalism. Hari Dilgir followed his optimism. Prabhu 'Wafa' enhanced magnetic lyrical charm and Ram Panjwani expressed devotion and faith in his compositions.

During this period, the poets who came into contact with western literature, tried their hand at composing 'Sonnets' and 'Quatrains'. Narayan Shyam and Sheikh Ayaz were such two starlets who introduced these two forms in Sindhi poetry.

Post-1947 Era: The partition of India separated Sindhi Hindus from their land and brought them into a new environment of refugee camps. The sufferings they had to undergo in alien environment, their hard endeavour to get their footing, baffled Sindhi poets and made them inactive for some time. Soon the callousness of their leaders, pining for their motherland, filthy and horrible surroundings of refugee camps, all found expression in their poetry. This reality was quite different from the picture visualised by progressive writers. The poets, therefore, brought in a new wave of realism in the place of idealism, socialism, romanticism and nationalism. Their contact with different literatures such as Hindi, English, French, Japanese, etc. made them shed inhibitions, and they tried their skill at composing poems in new forms like 'lalit pada', sonnet, triolet, haiku, tanha, panjakira, kundalini, ballad, blank verse, free verse, etc. However, they maintained the artistic grace of Sindhi poetry and were fully aware of their complex literary heritage. They expressed Hindu philosophy in Islamic phrases and sang Indian music with Persian expression. They composed ghazals with organic unity and artistic beauty, with full command of language. The poetry of this period has been composed in various forms like bayt, duho, sorathos, geet, ghazal, qita, nazm, etc., by all prominent poets, such as Narayan 'Shyam', Krishin 'Rahi', H.I. Sadarangani 'Khadim', Hari 'Dilgir', Moti Prakash, Prabhu 'Wafa', Goverdhan 'Bharati', Arjan 'Hasid', M. Kamal and many others. In short, Sindhi poetry which depicted agony, acute depression and disappointment immediately after partition, entered the realms of contemporary reality and the quest for truth began.

Modern man's collusion with the confusion of modern life has compelled the poet to depict his dilemma in the form of 'Nai kavita' and 'A-kavita'. Modern Sindhi poet has dispensed with everything that is conventional— style, technique, rhyme, rhythm, form, noble sentiments, purity of language, etc. He is not obliged to follow the established rules or to link his poetry with beauty or aesthetic enjoyment, because in real life all these have no meaning. His poetry is not the outcome of his heart; it is a product of his thoughts. Sindhi poetry, like that of other literatures, makes the reader alive to intellectual truth by making him aware of the ugliness of modern life and misery of man. The darker side of the life dominates the Sindhi new poetry. The new generation of poets like, M. Kamal, Arjan Hasid, Vasdev 'Mohi', Harish Vaswani, Shyam Jaisinghani, etc. have succeeded in giving Sindhi poetry a modern outlook. It contains ripe thought, clear image and new philosophy.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

M.D.B.

POETRY (Tamil). A continuous record of Tamil poetry is available for the last 2500 years, a history which is varied in poetic forms, rich in poetic thought and equalling any cultured nation's literature in creativity. All writing in the language had been poetry till the introduction of printing in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

A vast extent of land now named Lemuria south of Cape Kanyakumari is believed to have existed in the distant past, housing two Tamil academies patronized by the Pandiya rulers at South Madurai and Kapatapuram (mentioned by Valmiki), and when these were submerged in the seas many millennia ago, a new capital was formed at the present city of Madurai with a third academy. All the poetical works, grammar and treatises on music and drama, which flourished in the first two academies had been lost, except for Tolkappiyam, a treatise on grammar, said to belong to the second academy.

The period when the third academy flourished under the patronage of the Pandiyas in modern Madurai during the period 300 BC to about 250 is generally known as the Sangam Age. About 2380 verses and poems (long and short) were written by the 470 poets of this period, excluding some verses and poems which were lost. Of these 1854 verses relate to 'akam' or romantic poetry , 486 to 'puram' or heroic poetry, and twenty-four musical pieces, the remaining being fragments. All the verses are grouped into nine anthologies, one of them, Pattuppattu, with ten long poems and the others with short verses. Of these eight anthologies two are on puram, five on akam and one is a collection of musical pieces.

Tolkappiyam, the earlier grammar, conventionalises poetry, a convention fully adopted by this period. Love poetry is related to the five physio-graphical regions: 'kurinji'–hills: the lovers' tryst; 'mullai'-the forests: dalliance; 'marudam'–the plains: separation; 'neidal'-the coast; forbearance; and 'palai'-desert: lament. Heroic poetry also follows a parallel conventional pattern of warfare from seizing the cowherds of the enemy to the celebration of victory; all these themes, on both love and war, are symbolized by flowers.

Of the puram anthologies, Purananuru contains a vast volume of historical material shedding light on the three ruling houses of the peirod. Besides, it is the one work which is a compendium of the life of the Tamil people of the day, their social life, their ambitions and ideals, the status of women, the exalted position of the poets, the heroism of the common people and similar characteristics. The other anthology is Padirruppattu, the ten tens, of which only eight tens are available. This is a collection of the songs on the several rulers of the Chera dynasty and is also valuable as historical source material.

Paripadal is an anthology of seventy musical compositions of which only twenty-four are available today. Though the composer, the music and the tune-setter are indicated in each verse, the music has been totally lost. However this book is the only evidence to indicate that there was the classification of Muttamil—iyal, isai and natakam—in that early period as poetry, music and dance.

The akam poems are all fine lyrical poetry of a high order. Kalittokai, in 150 verses in the kalippa metre, has a fine short drama enacted in every one of its verses. Ainguru nuru has 500 short verses, each verse in just three to six lines expressing a simple love thought. The other three poems, Kuruntokai, Narrinai and Akananuru have asiriyam verses running up to eight, thirteen and thirty-two lines respectively, each expressing a love theme uttered by the lady, the lover or the maid and so on. They are fine chiselled pieces, especially the shorter ones, expressing a simple mood in simple elegant language. Here is a verse from Kuruntokai:

Vaster than the earth,
Loftier than the heavens,
Deeper than the seas,
Is my love for my lover,
The Lord of the hills,
Where the sturdy kurinji
Generates honey.

Tirukkural (Kural with its honorific title 'tiru'– holy) is acclaimed as the greatest Tamil classic. It expresses the most profound thoughts on the most baffling problems of life; yet it has the greatest economy of words and perfection of style. 'Kural' means short: each verse in the book is written as a couplet, where the first line has four feet and the second only three; kural is a variant of the 'venba'. The venba metre has a rigid sequence in the arrangement of its syllables between two successive feet. Even with this handicap and the shortness of size, the author has produced a classical masterpiece which had been inimitable in all later history.

By about 250 AD an alien clan raided Madurai and captured the Pandiya kingdom driving out the Pandiyas. The clan ruled Madurai till about 575 AD when again the Pandiya rule was restored. This period is said to be a dark period in the history of Tamilnadu, both political and literary. Cultural values were trampled down by the alien rule and so thinking minds wrote many short didactic poems upholding ethical values and conduct. These works naturally had been guided by the earlier Tirukkural. All of them employ the short venba metre.

Naladi and Palamoli, each in 400 verses, are the most popular and important. The first is said to be the compilation of the thoughts of 400 Jain monks and it contains poetry of a high order. The book dwells on transience of life, of youth and of riches, but emphasises the fundamental and universal values. A number of similar books in a shorter compass had been written, of which Nanmanikkadigai and Tirikadukam, each in hundred verses, are important in poetic value.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A few akam poems also had been written now in imitation of Sangam poetry but they fail as great poetry. A fragment of Muttollayiram (900 verses) on the three crowned monarchs is available to the extent of only 110 verses and these are highly chiselled gems of poetry on both akam and puram themes.

The Ramayanam written by Kamban in the ninth century in 10368 verses (excluding an interpolation of about 1300), is one of the supreme achievements of the Tamil muse, equalled only by Tirukkural. Kamban took the skeleton of the story from Valmiki but narrated it in his own way so that it might be acceptable and in line with the great culture of the Tamil people. Earlier than Kamban, the Tamil language had been perfected in range of vocabulary, thought, precision, lucidity of expression and poetic lyricism. He took, as it were, the well-formed language and forged a great and unequalled epic on the anvil of his imagination. His epic is unequalled in characterization, dramatic scene effects, dialogue, imagery and lyricism.

The Chola imperial rule had given rise to a large and significant volume of new poetic forms which we may designate as court poetry. The victory of Kulottunga Chola I over the Kalingas in about 1105 was the subject of a very fine heroic poem named Kalingattu-bharani. The conception of the poem, its narration, its very metre, are all new and the author has achieved a great measure of poetic excellence. Ghosts go and complain to Kali that because of the peaceful rule of the Cholas and the absence of battles they had no corpses to feed upon and so were hungry. Just then the news comes that the Cholas had waged a war against the Kalingas and secured a stunning victory. The ghosts rush to the field, cook the flesh of the fallen and have a feast. The poet has done the whole poem in about 700 couplets, maintaining not only a high tempo of narration but also a high quality of lyricism.

The innovations in the poetic theme of Kalingattu bharani had given rise to another poem on the same pattern by poet Ottakkuttar, praising Raja Raja Chola II (1150-63) and celebrating the legend of the destruction of Daksha's 'yajna' by Virabhadra under the orders of Lord Shiva. Other kovai and ula poems had also been written in this period on the Chola monarchs.

Even philosophy had been written in fine poetic form in the Tamil language. The earliest such writing was Manimekalai (the Buddhist epic). Nilakasi (10th c.), Arumgala-seppu in 'kural' metre (12th c.) and Jiva sambodhanai (14th c.) are good works on Jain philosophy.

Meykantar wrote his Sivajnana bodham in twelve aphorisms (40 lines) giving the essence of Shaiva philosophy. It was followed immediately by some fine metrical expositions by the disciples and today there are a hundred Shaiva treatises in good verse form.

All Vaishnava philosophical writing was in a Sanskrit-Tamil prose form, called manipravala, except for a few small Tamil poems by Vedanta Desikar (1269-1369).

Writings on Vedanta have been many. Bhattanar's Bhagavadgita in Tamil (13th c), Tattuvarayar's many works (10th c) including Isvara gita and Brahma gita, Alavandar's Jnanavasishtam, and Tiru Venkata nathar's Probodha chandrodayam deserve mention. Kaivalya navanitam (The essence of Absolute Oneness) by one Tandavarayar (18th c) was an immediate classic translated into other languages.

Virashaiva writings have also been many. Prabulinga lilai and Siddhanta shikhamani by Sivaprakasa Swami, and Kumara devar sastra (all 17th c) and Basava purana (18th c) by an unknown author are some good works.

Prabandha is a general term by which many types of minor poetic compositions written in praise of a deity or patron came to be known in the later period. We have quite a large variety of such poems, on akam and puram themes, having even more than 400 verses. Arruppadai is a long poem in 'asiriyam' where the bard who returns receiving presents from a patron directs another to go to him and get presents. Pillait-Tamil is a poem of a hundred long 'viruttam' verses divided into ten sections where the deity or the patron is fondled as a child from the fifth month onwards. Some of the most delightful poetry in the language is this type of poem. Sung in musical concerts, these poems are favourites with the audience.

'Dutu' and 'ula' are two types of love poems each in a long drawn Kalivenba metre. Dutu is the love message sent by the ladylove to her lover who is the hero of the poem. Ula is the poem describing the pangs of love experienced by woman in the conventional seven stages on seeing the hero go in procession along the streets. Both are popular classical types.

Kalambakam is another classical type of poem in a hundred verses of different metres embodying all aspects of the poetic themes both in the akam and in the puram classification. Because of the variety of subjects and of metres, the poem is always fresh and attractive and is most popular.

Puranic writing is a significant feature of Tamil literary activity in the second millennium after Christ. Periyapuranam of Sekkilar took shape as the Shaiva hagiology and a great testament of devotion. It is a large work of epic proportions, directing the people along the path to God. This is a biographical purana, immediately followed by another short metrical biography of Manikkavachakar.

Some of the mahapuranas like the Matsyapurana, Kurmapurana, Lingapurana and Skandapurana had been fully rendered into Tamil in thousands of verses. The Kanda puranam in Tamil is an example, giving the story of Skanda in 10345 verses; it had been conceived of as a grand epic.

Sthala puranas, or puranas collecting together local legends glorifying the village temple have been written in hundreds, from the thirteenth to the nineteenth centuries. Some of them do possess fine poetic value. Mention may be made of Tiruvilayadal, Kanchi, Tanihai and Kurrala puranas.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Simple narrative wrting on secular subjects, employing a story or an incident, is almost absent in the Tamil language because all writing here was with a purpose, devotional or didactic, and where the poet desired to record an experience or an emotion it went into an epic as part of it. A story for its own sake is thus absent. There is probably only one poem of fifty-one verses by Tiruttakkadevar, author of the large epic Chintamani (9th c), called Nari viruttam (The story of the jackal) written by him to satisfy his master that he could write poetry without introducing the love theme.

The only other poem worth mentioning is Nalavenba by Punhalendi (13th c), giving the story of Nala and Damayanti in 424 delightful venba verses. This is quite a fine piece of work, popular even with the school going children. It is remarkable for introducing greater ease and freedom of movement in the rigid classical venba metre.

Three episodes from the Mahabharata had been written by three eminent poets of the sixteenth century on the stories of Nala, Harischandra and Pururava.

Kuchelopakhyanam (the episode of Kuchela taken from the Bhagavata) ranks high with Nalavenba in felicity of expression and easy flow of the story as a narrative poem. It is in 733 viruttam verses and was published in the name of Vallur Devaraja Pillai. The element of bhakti is the key-note of the poem, and yet it is a good secular narrative poem.

Two poems on the subject of the Mahabharata are available although tradition and inscriptions mention at least five translations; it is remarkable that one of these could have been of the earlier centuries but it is not available. The earlier one is Bharata venba of Perumdevanor (9th c) in verse and prose; only a fragment of this in about 1000 verses is available and it is good poetry. The later one is Bharatam by Villiputhurar (14th c). This narrates in Tamil only ten out of the eighteen Sanskrit parvas, in 4339 viruttam verses. This large book is popular even with the semi literates; the author's characterization and his 'chhandam' (rhythmic pattern of verses) are responsible for its popularity. The author, though a Vaishnava, gives equal praise to Shiva.

One of the greatest of Tamil epic poems, Silappadikaram, was composed at the beginning of the period of the epics. The story revolves round the anklet of Kannaki. While trying to sell it, her husband Kovalan was ordered to be killed by the Pandiya prince on charge of theft. When she came to know how he was killed, she flew into a fit of righteous fury, proved her husband's innocence to the king and, her anger not yet appeased, burnt his city of Madurai and later was made a celestial. The epic has a great heroine but no hero. The story is very simple and has absolutely no complication. The later addition of the Senguttuvan episode makes it look historical. The epic was conceived by the poet with a definite purpose and is purely an imaginative romantic tragedy. Ilango, the author, was a great poet well versed in Tamil letters, music and drama, and seems to have gathered from folklore the story of Kannaki to bring into play therein these three divisions of Tamil poetry. He has marvellously succeeded in his aim and today the only book which treats of these three is his book.

Silappadikaram is a tragedy which reaches its climax with the burning of the city of Madurai by Kannaki. But the Indian tradition of art and letters would not consider tragedy as the end of literature and so the story in the third part was invented and probably added on much later, bringing together many popular stories, some fact and more fiction.

Manimekalai, said to be a sequel to Silappadikaram, can in no way claim to be a great epic. It is the story of a young woman, who declined to fall into the snares of love because of the tragic story of her mother's love. She made a detailed investigation of the doctrines of various religious sects and ultimately entered the holy orders of Buddhism. Its only importance lies in its antiquity and in the fact that it is the only Buddhist work extant.

Perumkathai (The great story) is the story of Prince Udayanan, his many love affairs, the affairs of his son and his ultimate renunciation. The plot in this epic is not closely knit, because of the narrative which is a mere jumble of war, love and jealousy. There is no pronounced Jain propaganda here as Buddhism is in Manimekalai. But Perumkathai is important to Tamil literary history for its descriptions of the life of the Tamilians, their glory and splendour, their arts, music and dance, their games, warfare, craftsmanship, and other skills.

The next two important works are Jivaka chintamani and Chulamani, both Jain works. Except for occasional flashes of poetry, there is neither plot nor character in them. They are one long series of adventure, amour and fighting, culminating in the Jain way of renunciation.

The richest legacy of Tamil literature is its devotional poetry. This had been existing in the language even from the Sangam period as is evident from Paripadal but the centuries (6th to 9th) have produced the largest volume of supremely devotional poems. Tiru Mular wrote his Tirumantram in the fifth century. It is the tenth book of the Shaiva canon and is at once both a book of fine devotional poetry and a book of high philosophy. Karraikkal Ammai of the same period sang a few devotional songs, characterized by devotion akin to a child's faith in its mother.

The three 'devaram' hymnists all lived in the seventh century. They directed the Tamil people who had thrown off their shackles of Jainism and Buddhism along the path of devotion to Shiva. All were inspired poets whose spiritual intoxication is visible in every line of their songs. Tiru Jnanasambandhar (633-651) has given 4158 verses.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

He is responsible for resurrecting Tamil music and placing it on the high pedestal it had earlier occupied. He toured the entire country, directing the masses to the grace of God in the local shrines. People everywhere learned to sing his songs and preserve them. He has made many innovations in the Tamil poetic forms and metres.

Similarly Appar (590-671), his elder contemporary, also toured the country singing his songs in temples and also doing everywhere the manual service of cleaning the temple premises. He has given the people the simple message that service is worship of God. His language is simple and easily understood by the masses.

Sundarar (685-703) lived perhaps a generation after Appar and has contributed 1000 devaram verses. He is considered a comrade of Shiva and his language is personal and more intimate. His intimacy makes him take liberty with codes of conduct and he is relentlessly punished by God. His passionate cry for relief from suffering is truly heart rending. His songs are also simple and popular. His song enumerating the names of the sixty-three men of God later gave rise to the Periya puranam.

Manikkavachakar (end of the 9th c) composed Tiruvachakam, the 'Holy Utterance' in 656 verses which is a profound poem in Tamil. A considerable amount of the Shaiva philosophy is seen in his poetry which is considered to be a mystic expression of divine experience. His songs are a hymn of self-surrender resulting in a communion of the soul with God. The expression is so simple and the experience so rich and infective that the songs have moved even the hearts of foreign missionaries.

The songs of these four form the first eight books of the Shaiva canon and the saints are hailed as the Shaiva acharyas.

Vaishnavism had been a parallel cult in Tamilnadu and its hymnists, numbered twelve, are known as the Alvars. The songs of the Alvars are collected together and counted as a total of four thousand and are known by the name Nalayira divya prabandham. They are in four general sub-divisions of about a thousand verses each. The larger songs of Tirumangai Alvar and Nammalvar are each over a thousand verses and so they have been grouped into two separate books, the Periya tirumoli of Tirumanagai Alvar and the Tiruvaymoli of Nammalvar. Of the other songs, the musical pieces of the first volume are collected as Mudal ayiram (the first thousand), and the non-musical pieces grouped as the third book called Iyal pa.

A beautiful legend says that the first three Alvars, Poyahai, Bhutan and Pey, met one dark stormy night in the corridor of a house in Toruk-Kovalur and had a vision of Vishnu and they each sang of him in an Antati poem of a hundred verses. These are the early poems in Vaishnavism and they show a considerable degree of simplicity and religious tolerance, and a wonder and joy born out of full and limitless experience of divine grace.

Tirup-Panalvar was a bard from the lowest caste, but it is said that his devotion and music were recognized by Lord Ranganatha who bade the brahmin priest to carry him into the temple on his shoulders. Going in, Pana sang a short decade pouring forth his longing for Him in the manner of a girl longing for her lover: "Let not my eyes which saw His smile see anything else.". Tiru Malisai Alvar has sung 220 verses and Tondar Adippodi fifty-five verses. Both have sung poems of high philosophic and lyrical quality, but there is considerable intolerance in their writing. Kulasekhara, a prince of the west coast, has sung in 105 verses many moving stories of Rama and Krishna, but his supplication to the Lord of Tiruvenkatam hill is unsurpassed in the beauty of self-effacement.

Periyalvar thought of himself as the mother of Krishna and thus earned the title 'Periya' or elder. His songs are some of the greatest poetry not only in Vaishnavism but in all Tamil literature. As contributions to Tamil literature his verses on the Pillai Tamil pattern, the lullaby etc. are the first in many respects. Andal, his adopted daughter, the only woman poet, chose Lord Ranganatha for her bridegroom. Her songs are household words among the Vaishnavas, forming part of their social ceremonies. Her Tiruppavai is the most famous, being a supplication of all souls as gopis for the grace of Krishna.

Nammalvar is the singer of the Tamil Veda. He has introduced the element of bridal mysticism in his Tiruvaymoli which is both heart-melting poetry and an expression of the quintessence of divine experience. It is the fountainhead of all later Vaishnava philosophic development. His address to the world at large is a message of hope, through love and surrender.

Arunagirinathar lived around 1400 and is the greatest of all the later devotional poets. His songs are all addresses to Muruka and a large number of them are available. His religious zeal and supplication to God and the sense of joy and harmony emanating from devotion captured the imagination of the masses as no other song has done before or since. His songs are known as Tiruppukal, 'Praise of the Lord'.

Tayumanavar (early 18th c) wrote 1000 verses of supreme devotional hymns perhaps intended to reconcile the different religious systems, such as Shaiva, Vedanta and Siddha. A vein of high philosophy runs through all his songs.

Ramalinga who lived in the mid-nineteenth century composed several thousands of songs. Following the line of Tayumanavar, he had a mission in life, the mission of compassion to all creation.

There has been a large volume of devotional hymns on Shakti in many forms. Abhirami antati by Abiramibhattar in the early eighteenth century is the most popular.

The Siddhars (14th-15th centuries) evolved a devotional philosophy of their own, which condemns ritualistic worship and emphasises inner devotion. They had no faith in caste, brahminism and rituals of any kind, and were staunch devotees of Shiva.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Nayaks had been rulers in Tamilnadu during and after the Vijayanagar dynasty. They were responsible for introducing some new features into Tamil poetry.

The Yakshaganas of the Kannada and Telugu areas were introduced to Tamil poets and they now took up this kind of composition. Tamil poetry had always been dedicated to the Supreme and so these poets under the Nayak patronage adopted this theme in relation to their favourite deities. Thus came into existence the Kuram, Kuravanji, Pallu and Nondinatakam. The important feature about these poems which have only a limited number of characters (ranging from one to four), is that they are all poetic dramas, and all their characters, from the moment of their appearance on the stage to the moment of their final exit, always sing and dance. All dialogues are in the form of song and dance. These compositions helped to retain the culture of the people rooted in their past heritage and in their temple worship.

Another important feature of this period (17th-18th centuries) is the introduction of the kirtana song form into Tamil literary compositions. Muthuttandavar (1600-1650) was responsible for starting the kirtana form with pallavi, anu pallavi and charanam, pouring forth his kirtanas on Nataraja at Chidambaram and composing also padams or love songs on Nataraja. His innovation caught the imagination, and the great men of letters, Arunachalakkavi and Marimutta Pillai, followed him with may kirtanas and padas. Today no musical concert is considered satisfying unless it has one or two songs from these masters. The great Tiruvarur trio, Shyama Sastri, Thyagaraja Swami and Mutuswami Dikshitar, took their inspiration from these pioneers and composed their songs in Telugu and Sanskrit.

The modern age in Tamil poetry is said to have begun in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Among the prominent early writers, who broke the traditional insularity of Tamil and inaugurated a new trend in literature were Gopalakrishna Bharati (19th c), Vedanayagam Pillai (1824-89) and Sundaram Pillai (1855-97).

The poems of Subramania Bharati (1882-1921) mark a new beginning in Tamil literature. Bharati came under the influence of Western literature and moulded his poetry to suit the spirit of the times. While the neo-classical trend was opposed to change in the structure and content of traditional Tamil poetry, Bharati welcomed modernism 'with new taste, new content, new beauty and new diction, which will never die'.

The theme of patriotism was predominant in the poetry of Subramania Bharati. He exhorted his countrymen to forget racial and ethnic differences and unite against the alien forces. Among his poems, Panchali sapatham (The vow of Draupadi, 1912), gave a new interpretation to the Mahabharata. His other memorable poems include 'Kuyil pattu' (1912) and 'Kannan pattu' (1917).

After Subramania Bharati, the new trend was followed by Bharatidasan, whose nom de plume itself suggests his admiration for Bharati. Bharatidasan espoused the cause of the Tamil people and pioneered their awakening. He believed that the Aryan infiltration was the main reason for the decline of Tamil culture. He also introduced the element of atheism in Tamil poetry. He is labelled as a revolutionary poet in Tamil poetry. Poems like 'Sanjivi parvatattin saral' (Valley of the Sanjivi mountain, 1930) are significant. The love poem 'Etirparata muttam' (Unexpected kiss, 1941) also brings out his pride in the Tamil heritage and culture. In 'Kutumba vilakku' he underscores the importance of marital love and domesticity. Thus he was an idealist with several dimensions to his poetic craft.

The impact of Bharati and Bharatidasan changed the course of Tamil poetry and many poets like Desika Vinayakam Pillai (1876-1952), Mutiarasan (b.1920) and Suradha (b.1921) followed their trend. There were also others like Suddhananda Bharati and S. D.S. Yogi who wrote inspired poems on nationalistic themes. Kannadasan (1926-81) was one of the most popular poets who followed Bharatidasan. The Dravidian Movement was espoused by poets like Perunchitran, Ponnadiyan, Salai Ilanthiraiyan and Kovendan. Other notable poets are Kothamangalam Subbu, Surabhi and S.D. Sundaram.

The modern movement which was mainly inspired by the western model came to Tamil with the emergence of a new kind of verse (Putukkavitai). N.Pichamoorthy made experiments with form. Eluttu, a literary peridoical started in 1959, gave an impetus to the New poetry movement. A collection of poems entitled Putukkuralkal (New voices) was brought out in 1962. The prominent modern poets of the period were Vallikkannan, K.N. Subramanyam, Venugopalan, Sundara Ramaswamy, Darumu Sivaramu among others. T.K.Doraiswamy and C.Mani (b.1936) wrote experimental poems. Mani's 'Narakam' (Hell, 1962) is reminiscent of T.S. Eliot's poems.

The satirical mode in poetry was introduced in the sixties by Gnanakoothan (b.1938). Kalapriya Somasundaram, Sachidanandam, R. Meenakshi, Neela Padmanabhan, Dakshinamoorthy, Rajaram, Balakumaran, Hari Srinivasan are among the other poets of the period who wrote good poems, reflecting the spirit of the contemporary period.

Another dominant idea that took root in Tamil poetry was that of progressivism. Fascinated by the socialist ideology of Marx and Lenin and by the 'committed' poetry of Bharatidasan, prominent poets and scholars were attracted to the progressive movement in poetry. In 1948, the Progressive Writers' Association was formed in Tamilnadu. Jeeva (P. Jivanandam, 1907-1963), K.C.S. Arunachalam (b. 1921) and C. Raghunathan (b. 1923) contributed poems to a progressive literary magazine, called Tamarai. Later poets like N. Kamarajan (b.1942), Meera, Sirpi, Puviarasu, Navabharati, Agniputran, Tamizhnadan, Saktikkanal and K. Rajaram contributed to the progressive movment in Tamil. A number of translations also appeared from other Indian and foreign languages. In 1971, another group of progressive poets under the name of 'Vanambadis' (Skylarks) came together and published a magazine, called Vanambadi.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

All modern poets are not mere radicals or nonconformists. They have drawn sustenance from the poetic tradition of Tamilnadu and adapted it to suit contemporary needs. The new poets seem to assert a strong sense of values and moral commitment.

M.Ar.

POETRY (Telugu). Telugu literature is generally divided into six periods, viz., the pre-Nannaya period, the age of the puranas, the age of Srinatha, the age of prabandhas, the southern period and the modern period.

The pre-Nannaya period extends roughly from the beginning of the Christian era to AD 1000. There is evidence to say that Telugu was current among the people in the first century, but inscriptions in Telugu are found from AD 575 only. Some of the inscriptions laid during the Eastern Chalukya period are in the form of verses and the Addanki inscription of Pandaranga (AD 848) is the first one which contains a verse 'Taruvoja'. In the Kandukuru and Dharmavaram inscriptions verses in the 'sisa' metre are seen. The verses in the inscriptions of the ninth and tenth centuries belong to the 'deshi' type. As the scholars did not like it, they began to write verses of the 'marga' type. The Guduru inscription can be cited as an example. Palkuriki Somanatha mentioned some padas belonging to the deshi type in his Panditaradhya charitra and scholars are of the opinion that several such padas might have been written by poets in the pre-Nannaya period. Some scholars hold that two or three Jain poets wrote poems towards the end of the pre-Nannaya period but they are not available now. All the poets in Telugu from the beginning to the modern period adopted the champu form, the only exception being Nirvachanottara Ramayana by Tikkana. The works written in Dwipada also do not contain any prose pieces. Though all the works written during that period are in champu form, the number of prose pieces in them when compared with the number of verses is very small.

During the next phase of Telugu poetry (AD 1000-1350), there appeared several translations of Sanskrit works. Nannaya translated the 'Adi' and 'Sabha' Parvas of the Mahabharata, at the instance of Rajarajanarendra, the Chalukya King. Nannaya formulated exhaustive rules for using almost all the Sanskrit words in Telugu. In this effort, he received the help of Narayanabhatta, who was also a great scholar and poet. Nannaya is called the Adikavi in Telugu not because there was no poetry in Telugu prior to him but because he was the first poet to write a standard work dealing with an exalted theme in chaste language, conforming to the rules of grammar. Apart from the 'Adi' and 'Sabha' Parvas, he also wrote three cantos and 142 verses in the 'Aranya' Parva, before his death. While translating Vyasa's Bharata, Nannaya introduced some additions here and there though he followed the story of the original closely. He omitted some portions and made a few changes for the sake of propriety. The method adopted by him was afterwards followed by Tikkana and Yerrapragada. On the whole, the Telugu translation of the Bharata appears more as an original composition than as a mere translation.

After the death of Nannaya, Basaveshwara, the Minister of Bijjala, founded the Virashaiva sect, which took root in Andhra also.

The first Shaiva poet in Telugu is Nannechoda whose date is controversial. Many scholars believe that he lived in the first half of the twelfth century. He was a great devotee of Shiva, though not a Virashaiva. He wrote Kumarasambhava which contains twelve cantos.

Mallikarjuna Panditaradhya (1100-1180) and Palkuriki Somanatha (13th c.) are the great Virashaiva poets in Telugu. They wrote several works in Telugu, Kannada and Sanskrit. Panditaradhya's most famous work in Telugu is Sivatatvasaramu. This is the first standard work on Virashaiva philosophy. He wrote it in Kannada also. Panditaradhya was a contemporary of Basaveshvara, the founder of Virashaiva sect.

Palkuriki Somanatha is considered a great poet both in Kannada and in Telugu. A Virashaiva poet, he wrote two kavyas, Basavapuranamu and Panditaradhya charitra, in dvipada metre. The first one is the history of Basaveshvara and the second one is on Mallikarjuna Panditaradhya. Somanatha wrote a shataka on Basaveshvara, called Vrashadhipa shatakam. He wrote seven kavyas in Telugu, seven in Kannada and a few in Sanskrit also.

Andhra was religiously in a chaotic condition during the twelfth century as there were severe differences of opinion between the Shaivites and the Vaishnavites. It was at such a critical time that Tikkana (1210-1290) wrote Nirvachanottara Ramayana and dedicated it to Manumasiddhi. It is a free translation of Valmiki's Uttarakanda. Tikkana left off the portion which describes the death of Rama, and Jayanti Ramabhatta, later on, wrote it in a single canto. Tikkana's greatest contribution to Telugu literature is his translation of the fifteen parvas of the Mahabharata beginning with the 'Virata parva'. He followed Nannaya in the method of translation. He displayed great originality in depicting the various sentiments and characters. Tikkana adopted deshi style and tried to use idiomatic Telugu words giving up big and complicated Sanskrit compounds in order to make his poem intelligible to all sections of society. He has two titles, 'Kavibrahma' and 'Ubhayakavimitra'. His place in Telugu literature is unique.He dedicated his Bharata to Hariharanatha, combined the forms of Shiva and Vishnu to show that there was no difference between them.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Mulaghatika Ketana, called 'Abhinava Dandi', was a friend of Tikkana, and translated Dandi's Dashakumara charita, a Sanskrit prose work, and dedicated it to Tikkana. Marana was Tikkana's disciple, and translated Markandeyapurana which contains the sources of the stories in Manucharitra, Harishchandropakhyana and Kuvalayashvacharitra which are famous prabandhas. Adharvanacharya who is said to have translated the Bharata from 'Virataparva' and Badde Bhupala, the author of Nitisara muktavali, also belong to this age.

The third poet who completed the Mahabharata by translating the latter portion of 'Aranya Parva' which Tikkana did not attempt is Yerrapragada (14th c). The portion written by him can rightly be called a bridge that links the writings of Tikkana and Nannaya. The second work written by Yerrapragada is the translation of Valmiki's Ramayana which is now extinct. His poetry reached perfection in his third work Harivamsha which is also a translation from Sanskrit. It describes in detail the story of the dynasty of Hari (Krishna). His last work is Lakshminarasimha purana which deals mainly with the story of Prahlada. Yerrana makes use of Sanskrit and Telugu words equally. His style is simple, chaste and idiomatic. Yerrana has two titles, 'Prabandhaparameshvara' and 'Shambhudasa'.

Bhaskara Ramayana is one of the important works written during this period. It is written by four authors viz., Hulakki Bhaskara, his son Mallikarjuna Bhattu, disciple Kumara Rudra Deva, and friend Ayyalarya. It is modelled on the Ramayana written by Bhaskara, the grand father of Tikkana, and so the work is named after him. Since Bhaskara Ramayana is a work of composite authorship, its style lacks uniformity.

Nachana Somanatha's Uttara Harivamsha is another significant work, containing six cantos. Somanatha selected the best stories from the original and made some additions in the form of descriptions so that his work appears to be an independent work. He adopted the prabandha style in his poem.

Somanatha used a language full of figures of speech and long compounds. He is known by many titles, such as Sarvajna, Sakalabhashabhushana, Sahityarasaposhana, Samvidhana Chakravarty and Navina Gunasanatha.

Chimmapudi Amareshwara, the author of Vikramasenamu; Vinnakota Peddana, the author of Kavyalankara chudamani; Vemulavada Bhimakavi, who is said to be a very great poet but whose works are not available; Manchana, the author of Keyurabahu charitra; and Ravipati Tripurantaka, the author of Tripurantakodaharana, and many other poets lived in this period and enriched Telugu literature with their works.

The next age (1350-1500) belongs to Srinatha (1385-1475). During this period there appeared original writings and translations in Telugu. These works paved the way for the emergence of a new and popular literary form in Telugu, called the prabandha. The foremost among the poets of this period is Srinatha who lived in the court of Reddi Kings and acted as Vidyadhikari also. Many of his works are no doubt translations, but the skill he displayed in the art of translation is unparallelled. Of his works Maruttaratcharitra, Salvivahana saptashati and Panditaradhyacharitra are lost. Shrinagara naishadhamu is a translation of the famous Sanskrit Naishadha of Sriharsha and is considered a model to the later prabandhas.

His other works are Bhimakhandamu and Kashikhandamu, both adapted from Skandapurana. The other works are Harivilasa, Halahalabhaksana, Kiratarjuniya, Shivaratrimahatmya and Kridabhirama. Besides these works Srinatha composed many 'chatu' or occasional verses and also 'sisa' which are very popular in the country.

Potana (1420-1480), the great devotee poet, is a younger contemporary of Srinatha. Besides Bhoginidandakamu and Virabhadravijayamu, he translated the Sanskrit Bhagavata into Telugu which is very popular in the country. Though this is a translation, Potana added many devotional verses of his own. His language is full of Sanskrit words and compounds and abounds in figures speech. In spite of several requests from kings, he refused to dedicate his work to them; instead, he offered it to Lord Rama. Some portions of his Bhagavata were later replaced by those by Gangana, Singana and Naraya who were either his disciples or friends.

Jakkana (15th c) wrote Vikramarkacharitra, a narrative poem, which describes the exploits of Vikramarka. Then we have Anantamatya who wrote Rasabharana and Anantuni chandassu, besides Bhojarajiyamu, which is a narrative poem describing stories about King Bhoja.

Another famous poet of this age is Pillalamarri Pinavirabhadra (15th c). Of the many works said to have been written by him Shringarashakuntalam and Jaimini Bharatamu only are available. Like Shringara naishadhamu of Shrinatha, Shringarashakuntalamu also became a model to the later prabandhas. Jaimini Bharatamu is a Telugu translation of the 'Ashwamedha Parva' of Bharata, said to have been written by Jaimini, one of the disciples of Vyasa.

Nandi Mallaya and Ghanta Singana (15th c) are the first twin poets in Telugu. Prabodhachandrodayamu and Varahapuranamu are their works. The former is a translation of the Sanskrit drama of Krishnamishra in the form of kavya. This is the second instance where a Sanskrit play has been translated in the form of a poem.

Other important poets of the age are Madiki Singana, the author of the 'Uttarakanda' of Padmapuranamu, Vasishtha Ramayanamu and Sakalanitisammatamu; Daggupali Duggana who wrote Nachiketopakhyanamu; Koravi Goparaju, the author of Simhasanadvatrimsika; Dubagunta Narayana Kavi who translated the famous Panchatantra in champu form; and Vennelakanti Surana who translated Vishnupurana from Sanskrit.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The next phase of Telugu poetry covers what is popularly known as the Prabandha period (1500-1600). The word 'prabandha' in Sanskrit is analogous to kavya but in Telugu it has a different connotation. It is a particular type of kavya in which the theme is well known (i.e., taken from the puranas or the epics), the hero a 'dhirodatta' character and the main rasa shringara. This age is generally called the Golden Age of Telugu literature.

Among the major writers during this period, Krishnadevaraya (1485-1530), the emperor of Vijayanagar, is the greatest. He was himself a great poet and patronised the famous Ashtadiggaja poets, on account of which he was given the title, Andhra Bhoja. Besides many works in Sanskrit, he wrote an excellent prabandha in Telugu, called Amuktamalyada or Vishnuchittiyamu.

Among the Ashtadiggaja poets, Allasani Peddana was the foremost because of his age, scholarship and talent. He wrote Swarochisamanusambharamu (briefly called Manucharitra), one of the best prabandhas in Telugu. He took the theme from Markandeyapurana, and modified it into a new literary form. It is said that Peddana also wrote another work called Harikathasaramu.

Nandi Timmana who is said to have come with Tirumaladevi, one of the queens of Krishnadevaraya, wrote Parijatapaharanamu and dedicated it to Krishnadevaraya. The story of this prabandha is taken from Harivamsha. Timmana describes the delicate sentiment of shrinagara with a lot of sensitivity.

Madayagari Mallana wrote a prabandha, Rajashekhara charitra, and dedicated it to Appamatya, the son-in-law of Timmarusu. Among the other major writers of prabandha are Dhurjati who wrote Sri Kalahasti mahatmyamu and Sri Kalahastishwara shataka, Ayyalaraju Ramabhadra who wrote Ramabhyudayamu and Pingali Surana who wrote Raghavapandaviya, Kalapurnodayamu and Prabhavati Pradyumnamu. Pingali Surana is also included among the Ashtadiggajas but critics hold that he lived in the latter half of the sixteenth century. His Garuda purana is now extinct. Raghavapandaviya is a 'dvayarthi kavya' which describes the stories of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata simultaneously. In this work, Surana displayed great scholarship in both Sanskrit and Telugu. He dedicated this work to Akuviti Pedda Timmaraju. Surana's most famous work, however, is Kalapurnodayamu. which deals with an imaginary story invented by the poet himself. This was quite against the tradition of prabandhas. He dedicated his work to Nandyala Krishnaraja. Prabhavati Pradyumnamu describes the marriage of Pradyumna, the son of Krishna and Prabhavati, the daughter of Vajranabha, the Rakshasa king. Though this is a 'shravya prabandha', it appears to be a drama on account of its beautiful dialogues. He dedicated this work to his father.

Bhattumurthy indulged in writing extempore poetry. He wrote Narasabhupaliyamu, a work on rhetoric, besides Vasucharitra and Harishchandra Nalopakhyanamu. Vasucharitra is one of the best prabandhas written by him.

Some situations in the prabandha have a high dramatic appeal. It was also translated into Sanskrit and many poets afterwards imitated it. Harishchandra Nalopakhyanamu is a dvayarthi kavya like Raghavapandaviyamu and narrated the stories of Nala and Harishchandra simultaneously.

The famous Tenali Ramakrishna also seems to have lived in the court of Krishnadevaraya, though it is a matter of dispute. His humorous and occasional verses have become very popular throughout the Telugu country. He wrote three works—Udbhataradhya charitra, Ghatikachalamahatmyamu and Pandurangamahatmyamu. The first is a prabandha related to Shaivism which he might have written in his youth when he was still a Shaivite. Pandurangamahatmyamu and Ghatikachalamahatmyamu describe the greatness of the Panduranga temple (on the banks of the river Bhima) and the Ghatikachala temple respectively. The theme in both is taken from Skandapurana.

Sankusala Nrisimha Kavi (16th c) wrote Kavikarnarasayana, a prabandha containing six cantos, and dedicated it to God Shrirangeshwara. The foremost among Telugu poetesses is Atukuri Molla whose time cannot be exactly determined. She is famous for the version of the Ramayana which came to be called Molla Ramayanamu.

Kandukuri Rudrakavi (c. 16th-17th centuries) wrote a prabandha, Niramkushopakhyanamu, besides some other works, including Janardanashtakamu, which contains eight devotional verses describing the greatness of God Janardana of Kandukuru.

Among the poets who flourished during this age in Telangana the following deserve special mention: Charigonda Dharmanna, the author of Chitrabharata; Haribhattu who wrote Varahapuranamu, Matsyapuranamu VI, XI XII, Narsimhapurana and Skandhas of the Bhagavata; Pooneganti Telaganna, the author of Yayati charitra; Addanki Gangadhara Kavi who wrote Tapati Samvaranopakhyanamu; Sarangu Tammaya, the author of Vaijayantivilasamu (otherwise known as Vipranarayana charitra); and Mallareddy, the author of Shatchakravarti charitra, Shivadharmottara and Padmapurana. Telaganna's Yayaticharitra is the first Achcha Telugu poem. He took the story of Yayati from the Bharata and the Bhagavata and wrote this prabandha in a colloquial style which contains no Sanskrit words. No such work was written prior to him and he paved the way for a new literary form. Though he avoided Sanskrit words, he did manage the work ably with beautiful descriptions of nature.

The Southern age (1600-1875) is so called because

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

POETRY (TELUGU)

Telugu literature flourished in the south, especially in Madhura, Tanjore, Pudukkota, Chenji and Mysore. Krishnadevaraya conquered a large portion of the south and appointed Telugu officers to rule over certain parts. After the fall of the Vijayanagar empire many of them declared independence and established their own kingdoms. Among such, the Nayakdoms of Madhura and Tanjore are the most important. The Nayaks of these kingdoms were lovers of literature and arts and patronised poets and artists. Many poets and artists from Andhra went and settled there. In this way Telugu literature took root in the south also.

Among the patron-poets of the Tanjore areas, Nayaka Raghunatha was the most prominent. He can be compared to Krishnadevaraya in many respects. He was himself a poet and composed many works out of which the Ramayana, Valmikicharitra and two other dwipada kavyas are the most important. Only about four cantos of the 'Bala Kanda' of his Ramayana are available now. Chemakura Venkatakavi was one of the major poets who adorned the court of Raghunatha. He is the author of Sarangadhara charitra and Vijayavilasamu, both of which he dedicated to Raghunatha. Other poets who were patronised by Raghunatha were Krishnadhvari, the author of Naishadha parijatamu (a dvayarthi kavya) and Kalaya Kavi who wrote Rajagopala vilasamu, a prabandha in five cantos.

Rangajamma, who could write poetry in eight languages, adorned the court of Vijayaraghava, the son of Raghunatha. She is said to have written Sangraha Bhagavatamu, Sangraha Bharatamu, Sangraha Ramayanamu, Ushaparinayamu and Mannarudasa vilasamu. Savaramu China Narayana Raju, who belongs to the royal family of Chenji, wrote Kuvalayashacharitra, a prabandha, taking the story from Markandeyapurana.

Linganamakhi Kameshwara Kavi adorned the court of Muddalagiri and wrote a prabandha, Satyabhama santvanamu. Ganapavarapu Venkata Kavi (17th c) was a great scholar who wrote several works including the prabandha Raja Venkateshwara vijaya vilasamu. Among other poets mention may be made of Samukham Venkatakrishnappa Nayaka, the author of Ahalya sankrandanamu, and Radhika santvana and Sesham Venkatapati who wrote Tarasasanka vijayamu.

Vijaya Raghunatha (18th c), one of the kings of Pudukkota, patronised poets of the Nadurupati family. His son Raya Raghunatha wrote Parvatiparinayamu, one of the best prabandhas of that age. Some poets who flourished in the court of Mysore produced important poems. Of them Shuka saptati written by Palavekari Kadiripati stands foremost. It contains seventy (saptati) stories narrated by a parrot. Kadiripati is a good story teller, and his work vividly describes contemporary life. This work was translated into Parsi and from Parsi into Urdu.

During the southern period several poets and writers produced many poems in the Andhra and Telangana regions also. In Andhra, Damerala Vengalanyaka (17th c) wrote Krishna charitra and Bahulashvacharitra. Several historical poems were written during this period, of which mention may be made of Andugula Venkaya's Narapativijayamu which describes the valour of the kings of the Araviti dynasty. The second is Krishnarayavijayamu by Venkataraya who is otherwise called Kumara Dhurjati and who is a grandson of Dhurjati. It describes the foundation of the Vijayanagara empire and the victories of Krishnadevaraya. Kuchimanchi Timmakavi (1700-1756) wrote many works and obtained the title 'Kavisarvabhauma'. Of his works, prabandhas like Rukminiparinayamu, Rajashekharavilasamu, Rasikajanamanobhiramamu and Shivalilavilasamu, Achcha Telugu poems like Neelasundariparinayamu, Ramayanamu, Kukkuteshwarashatakamu and Sarvalakshanasarasangrahamu (a work on prosody and grammar) are noteworthy. His brother Jaggakavi wrote Subhadra parinayamu, a prabandha, Chandrarekhavilapamu, a satire, and Samadevarajiyamu. Enugu Lakshmanakavi, a contemporary of Timmakavi, wrote Rameshvaramahatmyamu, Vishwamitra charitra, Vishveshwarodaharana, Subhashsitaratnavali and others. Adidam Surakavi who belonged to the estate of Vijayanagaram (1730-1780) wrote Kavijanaranjanamu, Ramalingeshvarashatakamu, Kavisamasyavichchedamu (a work on rhetoric and grammar), Andhra chandralokamu and Andhranamaseshamu. Kavijanaranjanamu is the best of Surakavi's work. It deals with the marriage of Chandramati in three cantos and is modelled on Vasucharitra. Kanuparti Abbayamatya is the author of two prabandhas viz., Aniruddha charitra and Kavijanamanoranjanamu of which the latter describes the story of Pururavas. Kankanti Paparaju (1750-1800) wrote Uttararamacharitra in champu form as a prabandha. Dittakavi Narayanakavi wrote a historical poem by name Rangaraya charitra which describes the battle of Bobbili (1757). Mangalagiri Anandakavi and Pingali Ellanarya, both belonging to the latter half of the eighteenth century, wrote Vedantasaramu and Tobhyacharitra (or, Sarveshwaramahatmayam) respectively. Both these works are related to Christianity and contain descriptions in the prabandha style.

Of the poets who lived in the latter half of the eighteenth century and the early part of the nineteenth century Sistu Krishnamuri Sastri, Mandapaka Parvateeshwara Sastri, Gopinatham Venkatakavi and others deserve mention. Krishnamurti Sastri was a great scholar, musician and an expert in composing poetry extempore. Sarvakamadaparinayamu, Vaikunthachalamahatmyamu, Panchatantramu, Streeneetishastramu, and a commentary on Vasucharitra are his works.

Parvatishwara Sastri (1853-1897) was a great scholar patronised by the estate of Bobbili. He is said to have produced nearly eighty works including several shatakas, dandakas and vamshacharitras. His Kanchipuramahatmyamu and Radhakrishnasamvada have gained some popularity. Gopinatham Venkatakavi (1813-1892) who was a court poet at Venkatagiri wrote many works of which the translation of the Ramayana, called Gopinatha Ramayanamu after his name, is wellknown. He translated Magha's Shishupalavadha also into Telugu. His Krishnajanmakhandamu is a portion of Brahmavyavartapurana.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Of the poetesses that flourished during this period Tarigonda Venkamamba (19th c.) deserves special mention. She wrote Venkatachalamahatmyamu, Jnanavasishthamu and Rajayogasaramu. Venkamamba adopted a simple style. Even while describing spiritual and philosophical facts, she prefers popular usage.

There were some great poets in Telangana also during this period. Surabhi Madhavarayalu wrote a prabandha called Chandrikaparinaya which describes the love between Chandrika and Suchandra. Parasuramapantula Lingamurti (first half of the 18th c) of Warangal wrote a prabandha called Ratimanmatha vilasamu. He also wrote an excellent philosophical work, Sitaramanjaneyasamvadamu, which establishes the identity of 'Jiva' with 'Brahma'. Lingamurti's son, Ramamurti, wrote a philosophical poem called Shukacharitra. Maringanti Singaracharya was a great poet and scholar who wrote Dasharatharajanandana charitra, the story of the Ramayana in 'Niroshthya', Sitakalyana in pure Telugu and many other poems. Maringante Venkatanarasimhacharya wrote Srikrishnasatanandeeyamu and Chiluvapadagareni peranamu. Another poet by name Maringanti Narasimhacharya composed a poem, Thalankanandini parinayamu, which gives an account of the marriage customs prevalent in those days.

During 1775-1875, Telugu poetry showed a tendency to become stilted and pedantic, sometimes at the expense of content. The Saraswati Narada samvadamu by Kandukuri Veeresalingam Pantulu (1848-1919) gives a clear idea of this artificiality. As mere imitation became the fashion of the day, younger poets equipped with new education tried to save poetry from decayed traditions, by searching for new types and forms. The rudiments of modern Telugu poetry may be found roughly from the middle of the nineteenth century. Western education and study of English literature gave a new direction to Telugu literature, and several new literary forms came into being.

Kandukuri Viresalingam, the pioneer of the modern movement in poetry, started his literary career as an inheritor of the literary traditions of bygone ages but gradually evolved into an innovator, experimenting with new modes of literary expression. His translation of Kalidasa's Shakuntala gave evidence of a new poetic sensibility which could capture the charm of the original with rare facility.

During the period of transition C.R. Reddi (1880-1950) made his debut as a poet with an outstanding poem Musalamma maranamu in 1899. While observing the conventions of the prabandhas, he introduced a new content derived from a local legend which glorified the sacrifice of individual happiness for the welfare of society.

The most significant figures in the history of Telugu poetry are Gurajada Appa Rao (1861-1915) and Rayaprolu Subba Rao (1892-1984). Inspired by folk melodies Gurajada evolved a lilting metre called 'mutyala saram'. He displayed keen social awareness and based his poems on the joys and sorrows of ordinary men and women. His poems 'Purnamma', 'Kanyaka' and 'Lavana Raju Kala' dealt with tragic stories woven around ordinary women from the oppressed strata of society. Starting as a traditionalist, Rayaprolu Subba Rao ushered in the new age in Telugu poetry. His poems Lalita, Snehalata, and Kasta Kamala depicted the sentiments of love and pathos with rare mastery. His patriotic poems stirred deep national fervour, recreating the vanished glories of Andhra history. He stood for the concept of a free and united India. He also treated the theme of love from a modern perspective--love as a great bond which links the tiny worm beneath the mud with the mighty God on celestial heights. He introduced the element of suggestiveness in poetry. Swami Siva Sankara Sastri (1892-1967) is another major writer of the period who wrote lyrics.

The romantic movement, characterised by intense subjectivity, sensitive appreciation of nature's beauty, burning zeal for individual freedom, growing interest in the simple joys and sorrows of the common people, and ardent faith in love as a panacea for the ills of life, marked a new begining in Telugu poetry. The movement came to be known as 'bhavakavitwam'. Devulapalli Krishna Sastry (1897-1980), who wrote Krishna paksham, Urvashi and Pravasam explored the spiritual value of sorrow. In his devotional poems, he displays remarkable craftsmanship and breadth of vision.

Vedula Satyanarayana Sastry (1900-1965) excelled himself in expressing poignant feelings in his poems. During the romantic period love became the recurring theme of poetry. Drawing inspiration from folk melodies of Andhra, Nanduri Subba Rao (1895-1958) composed a series of love-songs, entitled Yenki patalu. Set in the rural background, the concept of love in these lyrics is highflown and idealistic. The poetry of Adivi Bapi Raju (1894-1952) shows rustic simplicity and naturalness, though he sometimes rises to great heights of poetic vision. His lyric describing the steps leading to the shrine at 'Tirupati' is a memorable piece of poetic achievement. The songs of Basavaraju Apparao (1894-1933) are highly subjective, written sometimes at the expense of poetic craft. Nanduri, Bapiraju and Basavaraju constitute the trinity among lyric poets whose work has freshness, vigour and passion. Abburi Ramakrishna Rao (1896-1976) and Nayani Subba Rao (1899-1977) made their mark as poets dealing mainly with the theme of love.

The rationalist trend in Telugu poetry is represented by Tripuraneni Ramaswami Choudary (1890-1993). His Sutapuranam expressed the spirit of revolt against the irrational and superstitious practices found in the puranas.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

He pleaded for an intellectual and analytical approach to the problems of life with a spirit of iconclasm, debunking the time-honoured concepts relating to God and destiny.

During the struggle for freedom poets like Garimella Satyanarayana (1893-1952) and Paidipati Subbarama Sastry expressed the patriotic sentiment in their poetry. A fervent plea for the formation of a separate state for the Andhras was made by poets like Rayaprolu, Viswanatha and Tummala.

During the hey-day of Romantic poetry, Jashua carved out a niche for himself by his commitment to the downtrodden sections of society. His Phiradausi, Mumtaz Mahal, Gabbilamu and Khandakavyamulu stand out as unique contributions to modern Telugu poetry.

Tummala Sitaramamurti is significant as the poet of Gandhian ideology. With admirable felicity and clarity he described the rural beauties of Andhra. Deriving his inspiration from Buddha's life, 'Karuna sree' distinguished himself as a poet of love and compassion. Soundara nandamu by Pingali and Katuri celebrated the power and glory of universal love as against the heat of lust.

Since romantic poetry was an escape from the harsh realities of daily life, 'Sri Sri' (1910-1983) became the founder of the progressive movement in poetry. Influenced by the dialectic materialism of Karl Marx, Sri Sri concentrated on the deplorable conditions of the underprivileged sections of society. The beggar by the wayside, the unemployed youth, the struggling workers and peasants provided the subject-matter for his poetry. He broke away from the fetters of traditional verse and forged a new style of expression to articulate the urges of the new age. His poems are marked by a rare dynamic vigour and offer a new vision of future for the exploited men and women in society.

Free verse came into vogue under the leadership of Kundurti Anjaneyulu (1922-1982), who dispensed with traditional metres and composed a new type of verse which reflected the fast tempo of the social and political changes that swept the land. He added a new dimension to prose-poetry with his innovative imagery.

In spite of several sweeping changes in form and content some poets continued to retain the traditional values and conventional style. Poems of epic magnitude were written by Gadiyaram Venkatasesha Sastry (1901-1981) and Madhunapantula Satyanarayana Sastry (b.1922). Vanamamalai Varadacharya's (1912-1984) Potana charitramu, Rajasekhara Satavadhani's (1888-1957) Rana Pratap charitra, Mudigonda Virabhadramurty's (1908-1987) Vandemataram belong to this category of long poems. Durganand's Bhitangana is a long poem with a difference, original in conception, skilful in execution and bold in imagination.

From the erstwhile Telangana region, there were some poets of outstanding merit. Dasarathi (1927-1987) played a memorable role in the struggle against the feudal regime of the Nizam. His poetry may be described as a relentless struggle against the forces of darkness and reaction. Though his compositions are highly rhetorical, they display lyrical tenderness. The poems of C.Narayana Reddi (b.1932) appeal to the aesthetic sense of the readers because of his lyricism and humanism; he employed folk idiom to express his deep concern for the lot of the common man. His achievement in the use of free verse is also creditable. He received the Jnanpith Award in 1989. Kaloji (b.1904) and Vanamamalai represent the older generation.

Puttaparthi Narayanacharya (b.1915) made a strong impact with his famous lyrical sequence 'Shivatandavam'. His poetry is a rare blend of intellectual vigour and verbal melody. The poems of Pathabhi and Arudra have introduced the urban setting, and their dexterous play on words along with technical innovations added a satirical strain to modern poetry. Viswanatha Satyanarayana (1895-1976) is eminent among modern poets. He received the coveted Jnanpith Award for his epic Ramayana kalpavriksham in 1975.

No survey of modern Telugu poetry will be complete without a reference to Duvvuri Rami Reddi (1895-1947), whose Krishivaludu (Peasant) was the first consistent attempt to present the life of the tillers of the soil, blending realism and idealism with a new poetic sensibility. The poems of Gunturu Seshendra Sarma (b.1927) demand attention by their variety of theme, startling imagery and new idiom. His poetry is a strange amalgam of romanticism, progressivism and individualism. Poetry in Telugu is thus resonant with many notes in our times.

D.V.

POETRY (Urdu). The Urdu language was born under diverse ethnic and cultural influences. Rekhta was the earliest form of Urdu and came into being as a result of the interaction of local Indian dialects, languages, strains of alien cultures and elements released into Indian environment by foreign invaders and conquerers of various descriptions. The Muslim conquest was the predominant influence. In the eleventh and the twelfth centuries, Rekhta (The mixed one) acquired almost a recognisable appearance. Generally speaking, Amir Khusrau, Kabir and Mirabai represent different facets of Rekhta. While Kabir and Mirabai have a colloquial ring and are inclined towards local dialects, Amir Khusrau has patches of Persianised vocabulary woven into Indian dialects.

The 16th century, perhaps, witnessed the maturation of Rekhta. Dakhani (Language of Deccan) developed from the middle of the fourteenth century to the early eighteenth century. The most important feature of Dakhani shairi (Poetry of Deccan) is its Indian ethos. The strain is feminine. The tone is delicate and elegant. There is an element of attachment to the soil in the Dakhani poets. The lyrical rhythm continued up to the age of Vali

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Dakhani. Vali travelled to Delhi during the last years of the seventeenth century and early years of the eighteenth. The eradication of Dakhani words and the words of Indian dialects, which had begun earlier, continued up to the times of Mir, Sauda and reached a point of culmination during the times of Nasikh. Eighteenth century witnessed the visible emergence of the Persian influence.

Three poetic forms like geet, ghazal and nazm have been popular throughout the history of Urdu poetry.

Vali, Mir, Sauda and Insha are lyrical, but the real beginning of the 'Song' (Geet) was made with Amanat's Indar sabha. The characters are of Persian and Arabic origin and, perhaps, the story is borrowed from the Masnavis (verse tales) such as Gulzare-e-nasim and Sihr-ul-bayan, but the composition carries the stamp of authenticity and lyrical grace. Agha Hashr added elements of popular appeal to geet. Azmatullah made the geet still more pliable and delicately poised. The process continued in the hands of Akhtar Shirani, Hafiz Jallandhri and Saghar Nizami. Among the poets of our times, Qatil Shafai, Nasir Shahzad, Nida Fazli and Kumar Pashi have written geet lyrics of proven merit besides other forms of poetry.

Ghazal was, perhaps, born of the Arabic Qasida. Notwithstanding structural limitations, ghazal has been the most popular form of expression with Urdu poets. The protagonist in geet is feminine. In ghazal, it has no gender as a matter of fact, though often, it sounds masculine. While geet speaks of feminine anguish, ghazal is a movement towards assertion of the self in an environment of elusiveness. Sometimes there is a wide chasm between the aspiration and the corresponding effort. The expression in ghazal is generalised to the extent of bordering on a statement. The experience in ghazal is not localised or fragmentary. It is representative of an age as much as it is essence of experience and not documentation of experience.

The affable ring about a ghazal couplet makes it evocative and transcendent in a very subtle way in sharp contrast to the process of Nazm in which concrete details acquire a metaphorical significance in eventual arrangement.

Urdu ghazal has multiple strains—mystical, erotic and dream-like. There is an aspiration to grow wings among a multitude of closing walls.

Dakhani ghazal moves under the overwhelming influence of geet. The comparative insulation of Deccan against hostile onslaughts allowed native linguistic and cultural influences to gain predominance. Ghawwasi's 'song' and Abdullah Qutb Shah's ghazal have something essentially common both in feeling and in expression, lyrical flavour transcending the barriers of song—geet and ghazal.

Pia bin payala pia jae na,
Pia bin yak til jia jae na,
Kehte hain pia bin saburi karun,
Kia jae jana kia jae na.

(Ghawwasi)

(I cannot drink from the cup without you, my love. Every moment is an ordeal without you, my love. I should have patience, they counsel. I cannot do, my love, I cannot do.)

Tu piari ishq bhi tera hai piara
Lagya hai bahut tus sun dil hamara.

(Abdullah Qutb Shah)

(I love you and your love for me. My heart is deeply bonded to you, my love.)

Vali has all the characteristics of the 'Age of Deccan' (Dakhani daur) as also the aspiration to express in true tradition of ghazal born out of Persian and Arabic influence. Vali is, in fact, a cross-bridge between the idol worshipper and the impressionistic bard:

Mukh tira aftab-e-mehshar hai
Nur iska jahan mein ghar ghar hai.

(Your face is like the glowing sun spreading sunshine in every home.)

Urdu ghazal in north India draws its special features from two schools of poetry, i.e. Delhi School and Lucknow School. Lucknow, perhaps, represents predominantly the carnal and the decadent. Mus-hafi and Atish are two exceptions. The poets of the so-called Delhi school of poetry, Sauda, Mir, Ghalib and others, are the poets of a very wide range. Mir and Ghalib, even Sauda in a way, have mystic strains. There is a touch of pantheism in Dard. These poets cannot be classified as poets of one particular viewpoint or intellectual stance. They represent a state of being torn between conflicting forces. Zauk is bogged down in superficialities.

Hijab-e-rukh-e-yar the ap hi nam
Khuli ankh jab koyi parda na deekha. (Mir)

(I myself was the veil on your face, my love, When I opened my eyes, there was no veil on your face)

Lekar azal se ta ba abad ek aan hai
Gar darmian hisab na ho mah-o-sal ka.

(Dard)

(From beginning to end, it is one stretch of flow, only if countable chunks of time did not interfere.)

Koi mere dil se puchhe tere tire nim kash ko
Yah khalish kahan se hoti jo jigar ke par hota.

(Ghalib)

(Ask me, it is only me who knows the half-drawn shaft. Had it pierced through the heart, how would I have known the pain?)

The reform of ghazal was attempted by Hali, followed by Ismail Merathi, Wahidudin, Salim Panipati,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Shad Azimabadi, Akbar Allahabadi under the influence of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan and Shibli. The purpose was to promote the use of a simple language and to enlarge the range of subjects of poetry. Fani Badayuni, Hasrat Mohani, Yagana, Asghar Gondavi, Jigar Moradabadi, Firaq Gorakhpuri, Nasir Kazmi, Faiz Ahmad Faiz, Bani, Mohmmad Alvi, Khalil-u-Rahman, Shahryar are some of the poets who have added new dimensions to ghazal in the nine decades of the twentieth century. Their contribution is significant in terms of both the use of language and the exploration of possibilities for ghazal as verse form. Firaq is as large as life. Nasir Kazmi moves with a sense of nostalgia and impending alienation. Bani has the forebodings of a fruitless journey.

The characteristics of nazm are its dynamism and its occasional leap into the unknown. Nazm preceded ghazal. In Dakhani, nazm existed in the form of masnavi, qasida and marsia (elegy). The general attitude was to describe things and events. In the early eighteenth century, the centre of Urdu literature shifted from Deccan to the north, and ghazal became the dominant form of expression, notwithstanding the fact that qasida, marsia and allied forms continued to flourish simultaneously. Siraj Aurangabadi, Mirza Dagh, Mir Hasan, Momin, Mirza Shauq and Daya Shankar Nasim have composed very fine masnavis.

Vasokht and masnavi are more or less identical forms, but, perhaps, masnavi avoids repetitive uniformity and consequent inanity. Siraj Aurangabadi's Bostan-e-khayal, Mirza Dagh's Faryad-e-Dagh, Mir Husan's Sihr-ul-bayan, Daya Shankar Nasim's Gulzar-e-Nasim and Mirza Shauq's Zahr-e-ishq are some of the celebrated masnavis of the Urdu language. Qasida, hijv, marsia are all descriptive, and considered to be the forms of nazm, the real poem. Marsia has both pathos and characterisation. Anis and Dabir are two of the greatest marsia writers. Marisa was a dominant form of expression in the age of Wajid Ali Shah. Apart from marsias that draw inspiration from the great martyrdom of Hazrat Imam Hasan and Hazrat Imam Hussain and other martyrs of Karbla, Momin's and Ghalib's elegies are based on personal grief.

We come across elements of the real poem, nazm, in Sauda, Mir, Nazir, Hali, Mohammad Hussain Azad and Ismail Merathi. 1857 marks the beginning of the growth of real Urdu nazm. In 1874, Hali and Mohammad Hussain Azad laid the foundation of 'Nai nazm' under the auspices of Anjuman-e-Punjab, Lahore. Hali and Azad seldom change the traditional verse patterns, but they have a flair for ideas and subjects. Akbar Allahabadi, Shibli, Wahidudin, Salim Panipati, Saroor Jahanabadi and Chakbast carry forward the quest for possibilities. Iqbal is the greatest Urdu poet of the twentieth century. He has a vision, a grand style and all abounding sensibility. Iqbal resolves the dichotomy of 'Man' and God through man's capacity to live in a state of love and spiritual awareness. Hafiz Jallandhri, Akhtar Sheerani, Josh Malihabadi and Saghar Nizami have variations of feeling and structure and vastly picturesque patches, but the real experimentation begins with Azmatullha Khan. The poets who introduced the western influences into Urdu nazm include Tasir, N.M. Rashid, Tassaduq Hussain Khalid and Miraji. The year 1936 and the year 1940 are two landmarks in the history of Urdu poetry. The Progressive Writers' Movement came into being in 1936 and Halqa-e-Arbab-e-Zauq was born in 1940. The former had deterministic leanings. The latter was disposed to experimentation to the extent of experimentalisation. The Progressive Writer's Movement was at its zenith in 1947 and produced such well-known poets as Faiz Ahmad Faiz, Sardar Jafri, Kaifi Azmi, Makhdoom, Jan Nisar Akhtar, Majaz and Sahir Ludhianvi. The influence of the movement declined by 1955. Halqa-e-Arbab-e-Zauk was not a movement. It was not intended to be one either. The poets associated with the Halqa were largely oblique, overwhelmingly symbolic and experimenters with rhythms and verse patterns. Rashid, Zia Jallandhri, Mukhtar Siddiqi, Miraji, Majid Amjad, Akhtaruliman are distinctly different from Sardar Jafri and Kaifi Azmi in that they seldom state and describe with a flourish of rhetoric as Sardar and Kaifi do. The experience is individual and for that matter essentially human rather than the so-called 'collective'. Makhdoom Mohiudin is the only progressive poet who 'feels his thoughts'. Faiz, in spite of his radicalism, is extremely mellow and wedded to traditions.

The modern trends started surfacing in mid-fifties or, perhaps, early fifties. The poets of this generation have preferred 'oblique' to the 'straight'. They have preferred rendering to saying. This generation has increasingly voiced the vulnerability of man in an all pervading climate of violence. Their idiom is strictly their own. In the poetry of Hali and Iqbal and poets of the progressive writers' movement, there are plausible solutions to social and spiritual maladies of human beings. Poets belonging to this movement tend to be definitive, deterministic, even ordained. Poets emerging in fifities seldom accept or subscribe to deterministic solutions. The emphasis has shifted from solutions to modalities of individual experience and pain and anguish of the ordeal of being. Intimate details of every-day experience are as good a material for poetry as scholastic pronouncements on human destiny.

Jab us ka bosa leta tha cigarette ki bu nathnon mein ghus jati thi
Main tambaku noshi ko ik aib smajhta aya hun
Lekin ab main adi hun ye meri zat ka hissa hai woh bhi mere danton ki badrangi se manoos hai, un ki adi hai.
(Akhtaruliman)

(Whenever I kissed her, the smell of cigarette entered my nostrils. I consider smoking a vice, but I'm used to it now; it's part of my life. Likwise she is used to my pale dirty teeth).

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Language too has undergone transformation. Words of common usage, colloquial expressions, snatches of conversation, even a dash of soliloquy, have become poetic material as well as poetic craft. 'Azad nazm' (Free verse) is not verse libre, but perhaps, a form of rhythmic verse. Rashid and Miraji experiment within the confines of rules of prosody. But in recent years traditional rhythms have given way to unconventional rhythms—even prose rhythms.

The last three decades have seen the meaningful fruition of Majid Amjad, Akhtaruliman, Munib-ul-Rahman, Qazi Salim, Wazir Agha, Balraj Komal, Amiq Hanfi, Khurshidul Islam, Mohammad Alvi, Khalil-u-Rahman Azmi, Wahid Akhtar, Shahryar, Baqar, Mehdi, Shaz Tamkanat, Kumar Pashi, Hamid Almas, Shams-u-Rahman Faruqi, Nida Fazli, Salah-u-Din Parvez. But Faiz Ahmed Faiz, Miraji, N.M. Rashid, Majid Amjad and Akhtaruliman are the most significant nazm poets of our times.

The climate of violence, decay and uncertainty have brought into prominence the existentialist leanings. This is an age of despair and hope, balancing one another in a precarious see-saw fashion. Voices of protest have also emerged, but they are either too feeble or too personalised. They may, perhaps, shape into articulate dissent, or perhaps, greater creativity. Meanwhile, inexorably we move on.

Ba. K,

POETRY CONTESTS (Malayalam) were very popular in Kerala from a very early period. One of the poetic contests which still enjoys a great deal of popularity in the literary and academic circles is 'akshara shloka' which tests the knowledge, skill and memory of the participants. The other main contests are concerned with versification and completion of a verse. The former could be conducted in two ways. In the first a poetic genre, theme, and the last date for receipt of entries are announced sufficiently early. Though all are legible to participate, generally only those who are more or less confident of success would respond. In the contests eminent poets like Kodungalloor Kunjikuttan Tampuran and K.C. Kesava Pillai used to take part; in fact the latter's masterpiece, Asanna marana chinta Shtatkam, is one of the finest products of such contests. A modified form of the same contest, in which the competitors are to complete the versification within the time limits and under the supervision of someone, is also popular today, especially in educational institutions as part of their annual literary competitions. Completion of a verse is called 'samasya puranam'. All these contests have served to encourage talented writers and promote the literary taste of the average man.

K.S.N

POETRY CONTESTS (Sanskrit). One of the singular characteristics that marks off classical Sanskrit literature from others is the excessive importance accorded to rhetorical rules of poetry and even in formally correct writing, to the perfection of word-artistry the aspirants aim for poetic fame. Poetic genius was recognised in one's capacity to write poetic stanzas extempore on a given subject.

We are told by Rajashekhara that ancient cities like Ujjayini and Pataliputra had become famous over the centuries for arranging open competitions among aspiring poets and men of learning, contesting for fame and recognition. While offering directives to ruling kings that they should patronise poets in their courts and cultivate the art of poetry themselves in order to be good at poetic judgement, Rajashekhara advises them that not only in their capitals but in other renowned cities of their realm, too, they should hold regular meetings of scholar-poets and organise poetic contests. Rajashekhara wrote this in his Kavyamimamsa in AD 900, but the tradition of poetry contest goes back to at least five centuries, for we find him mention the names of the following poets judged best at the poetry contests held in Ujjain: Kalidasa, Bhartri Mentha, Amara, Rupa, Sura, Bharavi, Harichandra and Chandragupta. A look at the names is enough to show how poets from all regions of India participated in the contests held in big cities under royal orders, and how the adjudicant committees or the Brahma-sabhas were held in high regard.

Historical epigraphs bear out the veracity of this tradition. We know from Harisena's 'Prashasti' or inscribed eulogy that Samudragupta held the title of 'Kaviraja', and from an invocatory verse in Subandhu's Vasavadatta we learn that King Vikramaditya had nine gems of poets at his court. We find that in the south, Bharavi found favour in the Ganga court, while Dandin was honoured in the Pallava court at Kanchi. The most graphic account, however, of a poet trying hard to get royal appreciation is found in Banabhatta's autobiography which precedes the biography of emperor Harsha in his Harshacharita. Even later than 900, we have a lot of evidence about the continuation of this tradition in royal courts till the medieval times. Thus the names of king Bhoja of Dhara (11th c.), Siddharaja and other kings of his line in Gujarat (12th c.), Vikramaditya VI of Karnataka (early 12th c.) in whose court Bilhana of Kashmir held the high post of Vidyapati, and Krisnadevaraya of Vijayanagar (c. 1500) stand out prominently in this connection.The practice had become so well-honoured that we find Mughal rulers like Shah Jahan having a panditaraja like Jagannatha in the royal court. And in all Indian states, the rulers patronised Sanskrit poetry in their courts till the middle of this century and held various contents. Jaipur, Baroda, Kolhapur, Mysore, Trivandrum, Kashi are some of the cities which have kept up this ancient tradition. In other centres, too, like Calcutta,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Navadvipa and Allahabad, and in Mutts at Shringeri, Kanchi, Dwarika, etc., Sanskrit poetry contests were not uncommon.

We have a whole genre in Sanskrit literature known as 'prabandha' recording a number of saucy and witty anecdotes connected with poetic contests. The most representative of them are Ballala's Bhojaprabandha (c. 1600) and Merutunga's Prabandhachintamani (c. 1300). They are like mines of good floating verses around which the fertile fancy of later times wove interesting lines. Scholars do not generally attach much historic value to them since they cut across all chronologies. We may note here a few examples:

Samasyapurana 'or completing a verse' to yield coherent sense by properly including the given line was a favourite exercise in poetry contests.

For example, the first line is provided by the problem-setter, King Bhoja. Bana, Maheshvara and Kalidasa add to it a line each of their own.

The Sun disappears in the ocean deep;
And the bee within the lotus asleep;
And the bird in the crevice of garden tree;
And Cupid in woman's bosom rests free.

Another form of the competition is 'question and answer' recognised in Sanskrit poetics as a figure of speech. A fine example of it we have in the supposed conversation of Bilhana and the student-princess, who were not allowed to see one another by the king's orders and were always kept apart by a curtain.

Bilhan: The night lily's life is vain,
As it cannot see the moon.
Princess: The rise of the moon is also vain
As it misses the lotus boon.

Sometimes a single verse is seen in anthologies as a joint composition of two poets:

Kalidasa: In women's speech does honey exist,

Megha: But their heart is poison-dipt.
That's why their lips are sipped,
And breast pressed hard by fist.

In the early decades of our own century, a poetry contest took place when Vasistha Ganapati from Andhra went to Navadvipa in Bengal to be recognised as poet. A vivid account of the test to which the teenager from the South was subjected by the veterans of the North is furnished by Kapali Sastri in his biography of his mentor, called Vasistha-vaibhavam. The interview is between Ambikadatta, the master and Ganapati. It starts with mutual introduction:

Ambikadatta: A Northerner I am, Ambikadatta my name,
Quick in writing verse of fame."
"A Southerner I am, Ganapati my name, Counted as one among poets of fame."

Samasya set: ".....she removes her blouse in bliss
And seeks her father-in-law's kiss."

Solution: Bhima's wife, in summer hot,
Hidimba is so distraught,
That she removes her blouse in bliss
And seeks her father-iun-law's kiss.

(We should remember that Bhima is the wind-god's son and Hidimba can only be welcoming the wind on a hot summer day.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.K. Warder, Indian Kavya Literature (Delhi, 1983); Kapali Sastri, Vasisthavaibhavam (Sirsi, 1944); Rajasekhara, Kavyamimamsa (Baroda, 1934); Vallabhadeva, Subhashitavali (Bombay, 1886).

K. Kr.

POIREITON KHUNTHOKPA (Manipuri) deals with the story of the wanderings of a horde of immigrants who came from their ancestral home under the leadership of Poireiton and settled in Manipur in AD 33 or a few years before that. Poireiton khunthokpa (Immigration of Poireiton) belongs to a class of books called 'Khunthok-lon'. Neither the name of the author nor the year of composition is given in the manuscript but the internal evidence places it in the tenth century AD. It remained in its manuscript form for a very long time and was published by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad only in 1981.

Poireiton khunthokpa does not say when or from where the immigrants came to Manipur, but historical evidence has established that the migration took place some years before AD 38. They were, however, not the first people to settle in Manipur as they found the place already inhabited by a people who cultivated rice, used baked pottery, lit sacrificial fire to enhance production of rice and cremated their dead.

The outline of the book is this : Thongaren, elder brother of Poireiton, asked him to migrate. At first, Poireiton was reluctant for he was a widower. Thongaren asked his eldest wife to accompany his brother. She said that people in the new country would mock her as she was squint-eyed and had under-developed breasts. Thongaren then told his youngest wife to go with Poireiton and she agreed. Arrangements were immediately made for them to set out. They planned to carry with them one hundred items to eat raw and another one hundred to be cooked before eating.

After a tearful farewell the party set out on its long and hazardous journey. They carried bows and arrows and had blacksmiths among them. They took with them wherever they went a tray of constantly burning fire. Poireiton carried a walking-stick of iron. They roamed over what is now called the Kabou Valley, passed through places inhabited by hill tribes such as the Marings, the Anals, the Moyang and the Tangkhuls, and reached the Manipur Valley. During the journey many suffered from fever. Poireiton said to his sister-in-law: 'Dear sister-in-law, this has happened because you forgot to bring the drug which could have saved our people from death and prevent their bodies from rotting after death'. She bowed her head in shame.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The purpose of the migration was to find men free from disease and death but they found none in their long and arduous search. At last Poireiton was absolutely disillusioned. He cried in anguish: 'A useless skyflower, my soles are torn and my iron walking-stick is worn out'. After this he lay down on a grassy hill and refused to walk further.

The beginning of the book reads like a legend. Taking into consideration the age in which it was produced, Poireiton khunthokpa is a tolerably good migration account. An inherent defect of the book is that it was written many centuries after the event narrated in the book had taken place. It was inevitably based on folk memory. Fact and fiction are mingled together. The book is a mixture of prose and poetry. The word-music in parts of the book is distinctly pleasant. This is the oldest extant work of its class. The existence of this book encouraged the Manipuris to write other books dealing with immigration of other peoples arriving and settling in Manipur in the subsequent ages.

R.K.J.S.

POKHREL, RAGHUNATH BHATT (Nepali; b. 1811, d. 1851) is regarded as 'Adi Kavi' in Nepali. His most important contribution to Nepali literature is the translation of Adhyatma Ramayana. It is said that he had completed the translation of all the seven cantos of this work before Bhanubhakta had done so. But unfortunately only his Sundarkand has survived. It was first published in 1889-90 at Banaras, and later at Darjeeling in 1932, edited by Kaviraj Dinanath Sapkota.

Critics in Nepali literature have divergent views about the quality of the two translations, one by Raghunath Bhatt and the other by Bhanubhakta Acharya. While Bhanubhakta has lucidity and simplicity and some original touches, the language of Raghunath Bhatt is full of Sanskrit, Urdu and Hindi words. Besides, his imagery is superb and he shows a fine poetic sensibility with a good sense of wit, humour and irony. Kaviraj Dinanath Sapkota has remarked that Pokhrel's translation is a far superior literary work and keeps to the spirit of the original.

There are five cantos in the Sundarkand Ramayana and a total of 187 shlokas. The poet has used the old Sanskrit metres like 'Indravajra', 'Upajati' and 'Mandakranta'. Besides the Sundarkand Ramayana, the poet wrote Usha charitra, a few original poems, and translated some verses of the Vedanta into Nepali.

R.P.L.

PONNA (Kannada) was a poet in the court of Krishna III (10th c). Sometimes he is referred to as one of the three gems ('Ratnatraya'), Ranna and Pampa being the other two. But the extant work does not justify this high praise. Probably he composed one secular poem, 'Ramakathe' (or, 'Bhuvanaikaramabhyudaya') and another poem 'Shanthipurana', related to his religion, Jainism. Only the latter is extant. It is the story of Shanthinatha Tirthankara. Ponna is a great master of language. His Gathaprathagatha also is not available. But since he has received high praise from Ranna, judgement has to await the discovery of his lost works.

Vi.

PORUNARARRUPPATAI (Tamil) is a poem giving guidance to a bard. In this poem, the poet Mutattamakkanniyar represents himself as a bard who received the bounty of a famous Chola king, Karikalan. The poem running into 248 lines, mostly in 'akaval' metre and sometimes in Vanchi metre, is included in Pattuppattu (Ten idylls).

On meeting a wandering poet accompanied by his wife, the poet introduces himself as another poet. He congratulates them on their good fortune in meeting him, as he is in a position to direct them to King Karikalan, a patron of literature. He tells them at length how he himself was treated and rewarded. Then he describes to them the glories of the king, his benign rule and the prosperity of his kingdom. He also advises them to meet such a patron so that they can lead an affluent life hereafter.

The poem throws light on the social life of the ancient Tamils. There are descriptions also of their arts and food habits. There is a detailed description of the seven stringed 'yal' (lute) and also a small drum used by the bards of the period. Dancing was one of the five arts encouraged at that time. Women wore garlands and ornaments such as pearl necklaces with floral designs appearing like the skin of serpents. The poem mentions the flesh of rams, deer and fish, rice, 'aval' (the parched rice), sweet cakes, honey, and toddy as food and drink of those days.

The poem is full of pen-pictures and similes. It starts with a picture of the yal thus: 'it has a head whose middle part is raised like fork resembling the hood of a deer. It has a leather cover which is red in colour like the flame of a lamp...The lute looks like a bride adorned, as though Lakshmi, the goodess of wealth, has her seat there.'

The description of the poet's wife is also remarkable. Each part of her body is described with an appropriate simile. For example, her eyebrows are compared to death-dealing bows, her lips to the petals of 'ilava' flowers, and her teeth to pearls.

The poet, like all ancient Tamil poets, is a great lover

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

of Nature. Here is a passage:

> E'ven at a time when the sun...
> Burns up the 'Kullai' plants and boughs of trees,
> Dries up the mountain streams, makes massive clouds,
> Forgets to drink the ocean's water up,
> And causes drought, thus bringing adverse times,
> The river Kaveri ceases not to flow.

Thus the poem in the 'arruppatai' genre praises the valour, virtues and the generosity of the Chola king, Karikalan, weaving into it fine descriptions of Nature and pen-pictures of social life through an evocative and expressive language.

C.B.

POTANA BAMMERA (Telugu; b. 15th century), the author of Andhra Mahabhagavatamu, was one of the greatest poets in Telugu. He is believed to have lived in the first half of the fifteenth century though his exact period is not known. There is evidence to show that he belonged to a place called Ekashila. But this is interpreted as Orugallu or Warangal by some and as Ontimitta near Cuddapah by others. The family name 'Bammera' places him near Warangal. Whatever be his place of birth, his poetry has a great appeal to all the people in the Telugu land.

Potana belonged to a Shaivite family. It is strange that a person born in such a family wholly devoted to the worship of Lord Shiva should undertake the composition of the Bhagavata. That in his early age he too must have been a devoted Shaivite is evident from his famous work Virabhadra vijayamu. This was perhaps his first work. According to some, this was a later composition than the Bhagavata. But the language and style employed in this work clearly indicate that this must have been written when the poet was in the formative years of his career. In his preamble to this work, he writes that he undertook this at the instance of his teacher, Somashekhara. Moreover, one can easily find the deep involvement of the poet in Shaiva philosophy throughout this work. The composition of the Bhagavata on the other hand presents a more balanced and mature picture of the poet. Apart from scholarship, the humility of the poet also becomes more pronounced in the Bhagavata which is definitely his later work. In his introduction to Virabhadra vijayamu, he attributes his poetic talent to the mercy of Lord Virabhadra, while in the Bhagavata he admits with all humility that the entire work is a result of the divine inspiration derived from Rama.

There is another work attributed to Potana which is known by the name of Bhogini dandakamu. The subject matter of this work raises a doubt in the minds of many readers whether this is really a composition by him. It describes the unsophisticated and genuine love of a girl of a very low birth for King Sarvajna Singa. When the king passes through the royal highway of the city, the girl happens to see him and is immediately attracted by his beauty and splendour. She prevails upon her mother to make a request to the king on her behalf to visit their house. The mother tries to convince the girl but ultimately, left with no alternative, she approaches the king and explains to him her predicament. The generous king readily complies with the request and accepts the sincere love of the girl, Bhogini. This is purely a love story. The admirers of Potana are not inclined to believe that a great devotee like Potana could have undertaken such a work just to please the king. The composition, however, shows a clear impress of Potana's style and genius. It is likely that in the early stages of his life he was not averse either to the royal patronage or to the passionate feelings of a human heart. It is only when he grew into eminence as the author of Andhra Mahabhagavatamu that he perhaps discarded both.

There is yet another work, Narayana shatakamu, attributed to Potana. This is a composition consisting of one hundred verses dedicated to Narayana. The authorship of this book is, however, doubtful as there is no clear evidence, internal or external, to show that it was written by Potana.

But the greatest contribution of Potana to Telugu is his Andhra Mahabharatamu. It is a strange coincidence that, as in Sanskrit, the composition of the Bhagavata followed that of the Mahabharata even in Telugu literature. The composition of Andhra Mahabhagavatamu is unique in the sense that no other poet attempted this work either before or after Potana. The poet holds that Shiva and Vishnu are the embodiments of compassion and truth. His Bhagavata is a glorification of both these virtues. In the very first verse in Andhra Mahabhagavatamu, the poet clarifies his objective in writing this great work. It is to realise the ultimate divinity manifest in every particle of the universe in the form of truth, compassion and bliss that he has chosen to write on this theme.

At the outset of this great work, Potana describes how he had a vision of Lord Rama who directed him to undertake the work of rendering the Shrimad Bhagavata into Telugu. Language was a natural gift to Potana. He had a natural facility of expression, and this made his book the most popular and celebrated work in Telugu literature.

In the technique of translation adopted by Potana, there is an improvement over his predecessors. He did not omit any important detail found in the original, nor did he add anything uncalled for. He handled both prose and poetry with equal ease. He combined Sanskrit vocabulary with native phraseology, making a pleasant blend of both. Very often he takes a hint from the original and develops it, making it appear as if it is his own creation. In this respect Potana's Bhagavatamu is a transcreation and not a mere translation. Being an ardent devotee himself, he describes the episodes of great devotees like Prahlada,

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ambarisha, Dhruva and Gajendra. Of all the episodes in Andhra Mahabhagavatamu, the episodes of Prahlada and Gajendra, and the wedding of Rukmini are supposed to be the best. Lines from Potana's Bhagavatamu have become part of everyday religious literature of the Telugu people.

Apart from the devotional aspect of Potana's Andhra Mahabhagavatamu, it is an encyclopaedia of Indian philosophy insofar as it relates to the Bhagavata philosophy. Even though in all humility he says that he is not a scholar, his work bears testimony to his profound scholarship and deep insight into the philosophy of devotion. He studied almost all commentaries on the Bhagavata and tried to incorporate their essential points including those of Sridhara in his translation.

It is significant that Potana was almost a predecessor, or at least a senior contemporary, of two prominent pioneers of the Krishna cult, Chaitanya and Vallabhacharya. Thus he paved the way for pioneering work in devotional writing and in the philosophy of devotion not only in Telugu but also in Indian literature.

I.P.R.

POTANA CHARITRAMU (Telugu) by Vanamamalai Varadarharyulu (otherwise known as Abhinava Potana) is a poem in which the poet Potana appears as the hero. It is a good blend of historical facts and legend.

Potana belonged to the Telangana region. Varadacharyalu, the author of the work, also hailed from the same place. Both of them found themselves in financial straits, and experienced difficulties in bringing out their works. Scholars entertain doubts about the life of Potana and about his great work, Bhagavatamu. What was Potana's native place? Why did he celebrate Shrikrishna in the last six verses of the canto and Sri Rama at the end piece of the canto? Why did Potana himself not replenish the moth-eaten section of his work? Were Srinatha and Potana close relatives? These queries are well answered in this work.

In Potana charitramu, Varadacharyulu introduced the supernatural element to increase its popularity with the masses. According to his account, Lord Devendra wanted to restrict the Bhagavata to Sanskrit language, but Lord Shiva promised Vedavyasa that it would be rendered into Telugu. In spite of Devendra's attempts to stall the work, the Bhagavata was composed in the Telugu language. Descriptions celebrating the glory of the Lord, which abound in the Bhagavata, is the result of Potana's ardent devotion.

The author's narrative technique, descriptive skill, character portrayal and delineation of sentiments are quite exemplary. There are accounts of Potana's personal life. In one such account, the ascetic Chidananda ordained Potana to pursue the path of austere celibacy for twelve years. He complied with the command, in spite of his getting married to a beautiful lady. But on a certain rainy day, as fate would have it, he had to break his vow. This incident is quite delicately handled by the poet. Here we find an echo of the story of Sugatree and Saleena of Pingali Soorana's Kala poornodayamu.

Telugu poets have usually followed the poetic convention of including the eighteen celebrated descriptions ('ashtadasa varnanalu') in their kavyas. Vanamamalai also followed the same practice, and it reveals the poet's keen power of observation and his flight of imagination. His portrayal of village, city, river, moon, sun, seasons, gardens, marriage, birth of a son, journey, separation of lovers and war are quite pleasing. The author seems to have had a special liking for pastoral life and compassion for the poor.

While Potana's relative Srinatha dedicated his works to the kings and amassed a lot of wealth, he seems to have deliberately refused to do so and instead offered them to God, inviting the displeasure of kings. Potana's spiritual faith, humility, generosity, respect for parents, affection towards brothers, detachment in life are very tenderly portrayed by the author. He has taken equal care in depicting the important characters such as Potana, Srinatha and Singa Bhoopala as well as the minor characters like Vaisyudu (merchant), Pedaralu (poor woman) and Ontari veerudu (a lone warrior). In the use of alamkaras (figures), Potana seems to have been more fond of 'shabdalankaras' only. The author followed suit and evinced the same taste by preferring 'vrityanuprasa' (recurrence) and 'antyanuprasa'(end rhyme). Figures of speech such as simile, hyperbole and metaphor are used liberally in his work. At certain places he has even made an apt use of the verses of Potana himself, incorporating them from his Bhagavatamu. The work is a fountainhead of bhakti (devotion) and vairagya (detachment).

G.P.

POTDAR, DATTO VAMAN (Marathi; b. 1890, d. 1979) was a Marathi researcher and author. He was born at Biravadi in Kolaba district in Maharashtra, and did his B.A. in History in 1910. Deeply influenced by scholars like V.K. Rajwade, whom he regarded as his Guru, he decided to lead a celibate life and devote all his time and energy to social work. He started his career as a teacher and became a life-member of the 'Shikshan Prasarak Mandali', Pune, where he worked as a Professor of Marathi and History.

He then devoted his time to research in Maratha history. He became the most active member of the Bharat Itihas Samshodhak Mandal, working as its President for several years. On behalf of the Mandal, he contributed to the establishment of the modern Indian History Congress in 1935. He played a major role in the public life of Maharashtra, espousing such causes as those of regional universities, propagation of Hindi in non-Hindi areas, and the promotion of the Marathi language and literature in general. He upheld proudly the Marathi tradition in his own person in scholarship, dress and appearance, and yet welcomed all that he thought was precious in western thought and learning. He was an impressive public speaker in Marathi, Hindi and English, and as a writer wielded a prose style which was chaste and delightful. He was President, All India Oriental Conference, Indian Historical Society (1938), and All India Marathi Literary Conference (1939). He attended the World Conference of Historical Records and toured in Europe for two months in 1956. He worked as Vice-Chancellor of Poona University from 1961 to 1964. The title of 'Mahamahopadhyaya' was conferred on him in 1946 and Padma Bhushan in 1967 by the Government of India. He was nominated member of the Indian Historical Records Commission (1922). The honorary degree of D.Litt was conferred on him by the Banaras Hindu University in 1967 and that of Sahitya Vachaspati by the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan (Prayag) in 1965. He settled down at Wai towards the end of his life.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His important work is Marathi gadyacha ingraji avatar (1922), a book dealing with modern Marathi prose during the British period. He also brought out an annotated volume, Marathi itihas ani itihas samshodhan (1935) and published a well-documented account of Maharashtra Sahitya Parishad and Sahitya Sammelan in (1943). He produced innumerable notes on historical topics and wrote introduction to nearly a hundred books. Sumansaptak (1950), Olakha (1961) and Lokamanya Tilak sangati (1975) are his collections of character-sketches and memoirs, written in an engaging style. Shrote ho (1959) and Bharatiya bhasha samasya (1962) contain his selected speeches. Inside Maharashtra (1964) was written in English for the benefit of foreign tourists. His dream of a definitive biography of Shivaji, however, remained unrealized.

M.D.H.

POTTEKKAT, S.K. (Malayalam; b. 1913, d.1982) was an eminent writer in Malayalam with a massive output of novels, short stories, poems and travelogues. Born in Calicut, he completed his Intermediate course and became a teacher, but resigned the job to attend the Tripura Congress in 1939. He was in Bombay for three years working in two spells. Thereafter he travelled extensively in India and abroad. In fact, he is the most widely travelled writer in Kerala. In 1962 he was elected to Lok Sabha from the Tellichery constituency.

Pottekkat is a multi-faceted personality. His interests are far too varied to submit to any special label in literature. He is not so much concerned with social inequalities as with the beauty of life. Essentially a poet, his novels and short stories are poetic. They are romantic in temperament, with a streak of humour. His first short story 'Rajaniti' (The royal justice) was published in Zamorin's College Magazine in 1928, and his first poem 'Makane konna madyam' (The liquor that killed the son) was published in the journal, Atma vidyakahalam, in 1929.

Vishakanyaka (The poison maid), Moodupatam (The veil), Nadan premam (Love in the countryside), Premashiksha (The punishment for love), Karampoo and Oru teruvinte katha (The story of a village) are the important novels written by Pottekkat. Each one of them is as good an illustration of his style and treatment as the other. Vishakanyaka is an unusual novel featuring man's fight against unrelenting nature. A batch of enterprising Christains from Travancore arrive at Malabar in search of new pastures. They plan for a habitation in the malaria-infested jungles of Wynad, and to that end strain their nerves and muscles. But the mosquitoes are too powerful an enemy for them to overcome. Frustrated and their number reduced, they are beaten back by the virgin earth which they had just covered with the green of cultivation. The journeys which the immigrants undertake, their collective life and communal pleasures, and their woes and anxieties are sketched with such faithfulness and understanding that one is often reminded of Pearl Buck's Good Earth. Pottekkat is more interested in the fortunes of the community than in that of the individuals, and while he is all admiration for its noble traits he is not blind to its weaknesses, like too much fondness for liquor. The portrayals are realistic enough, but they are not free from romantic interludes like the love affair between Anthony and Madhavi. The novel won a prize from the Madras Government in 1945.

Pottekkat has brought his rich travel experience to bear upon his eminently readable novels. He is too bewitched by the spirit of place and the spirit of life to enquire into ideals and objectives; he takes life as he sees it. Karampoo and Oru teruvinte katha bear testimony to this. He won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award for Oru teruvinte katha in 1962. Kurumulaku is partly an autobiographical novel. It depicts the under-currents, pushes and pulls of politics, which he experienced when he contested and failed from the Tellichery Lok Sabha constituency in 1962. Oru deshathinte katha, Pottekkat's most outstanding work, is an autobiographical novel. It tells the story of Sreedharan, born and brought up in the village Athiranippatam, intermingled with the story of innumerable persons of that generation. This novel won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award and the Sahitya Akademy Award in 1972 and also the Jnanpith Award in 1981.

An untiring traveller, he sets his short stories in the remote corners of the world and presents strange characters, all of which appear rather strange to the common man, but the themes evince emotive features common to all humanity. And what society is there which does not have its woes, cruelties and hypocrisies? A good proportion of his stories concern such human frailties, and their universality imparts to them the appeal of a heart speaking to a heart from immense distances. His treatment is poetic which, despite the realism of the tale, elevates his writings to a romantic plane. In fact, reading his stories one often gets the impression of reading a piece of romantic poetry. He is particular about his plots which, as a rule, are ample. Most of them abound in interesting situations and culminate in a note of surprise.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His romantic interests are reflected in the titles of his short-story collections Indranilam, chandrakantham, padmaragam (names of precious stones); Rajamalli, kanakambaram, nishagandhi (names of flowering plants); Pulliman, himavahini, manimalika, vanakaumudi, Ezhilampala, rangamandapam (expressive of rich emotional associations).

'Pulliman' (Dear) is the story of a young widow, Parvati. A beautiful young hunter Devayyan falls in love with her. Later he is attracted by Parvati's younger sister who comes to live with her. Parvati becomes ill and dies. The first appearance of Parvati dressed in a dotted sari resembling a deer gives the story its title. The story of a lover is told in 'Nishagandhi' (Blossoms of the night). The lover used to sit behind a Nishagandhi jungle and see his beloved. One day her father decided to cut down the jungle. The next day when the lover comes with a letter requesting her to dissuade her father, he sees the jungle cut down. He also sees a dead cobra nearby. To his astonishment he understands that the cobra lived in the jungle. In 'Pratima' (statue) the story is set in Switzerland. Richard was the lover of Perina who married later a rich man. She had a statue of Richard in her bungalow. On the first night of her marriage there was a storm. In the storm the statue fell down on Perina and she died.

In many of his short stories Pottekkat appears to be more interested in the psychology of the characters than in the realities of life. 'Sandarshanam' (Visit), 'Kashayarogi' (T.B. patient), 'Vijayam' (Victory), 'Vidhi' (Fate), etc. are examples. Bhargavi and Sunanda in 'Stree' (woman), Parvathi in 'Pulliman' and Vilasini in 'Vijayam' reveal the various moods of the feminine mind. Pottekkat's skill in moulding characters is seen in such stories as 'Antakante totti' (The hook of the God of death) 'Ottakam' (Camel), 'Mail carrier', 'Timepiecinte katha' (The story of the timepiece), 'Siddiqui', etc. 'Bhrantan naya' (The stray dog), 'Pattukari' (The singer girl), 'Veshyayute kattu' (A letter from the prostitute), 'Inspection', 'Vikhneshwaran', and 'Ozhinha kattil' (The vacant cot) are stories that conform more to the canons of socialist realism. 'Kwaheri' and 'Kathariyude katha' (The story of the dagger) bring out some scenes of cruelty and racial discrimination in South Africa.

Pottekkat, the novelist and short story writer, is by far the most important writer of travelogues. He travelled extensively in Africa, Italy, Germany, France and England in 1949, Ceylon, Malaya, Singapore and Indonesia in 1953, and Finland, Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia in 1955 and has written over a dozen books describing his journeys and the men and the things he saw. His travelogues include Kashmir, Kappirikalute nattil (In the country of the Negroes), Nile diary, Balidweep and Bohemian chitrangal (Bohemian pictures).

The poems of Pottekkat have been published under the titles Premashilpi (The architect of love) and Sanchariyude githangal (The songs of a traveller).

Pottekkat was in the forefront of cultural activities. His contributions in various capacities to the Malabar Kendrakala Samithi, Sahitya Pravarthaka Cooperative Society, Thunchan Smaraka Samithi and Kerala Sahitya Akademi deserve special mention.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.M. George, Sahitya charitram prasthanangaliloote (Kottayam, 1973); Kerala Sahitya Akademi, Malayalam Literary Survey, Vol. 1 (Jan 1977, Trichur); K.M. Tharakan, Malayalam novel sahitya charitram (Trichur, 1980); M.Achuthan, Cherukatha: innale, innu (Kottayam, 1973); P.A. Warrier (ed.), Mahachcharitamala (Kottayam, 1983); T.M. Chummar, Bhashagadya sahitya charitram (Kottayam, 1969).

T.R.R.N.

POYTTEVU (Tamil), literally 'false gods', is a novel in Tamil by K.N. Subramanyam. It depicts the story of Somu, a village boy. On the death of Karuppa Mutali, his father, Somu becomes a servant of Ranga Rao and soon wins his confidence. Ranga Rao fixes the marriage of his daughter with his nephew Champamurtti Rao. The marriage arrangements at Ranga Rao's house particularly making of jewellery attract the attention of Picchanti, the most notorious robber, who breaks into his house one night. Somu immediately gallops to Kumpakonam on horse-back and informs the Magistrate Iyer, who rushes to Chattanur with adequate police force and arrests Picchanti and his gang. When asked to name his reward, Somu says he wants to learn to read and write.

Somu picks up Arithmetic and Tamil soon. One of his boyhood dreams becomes a reality now. Later he is lured by the pleasures of sex and money. He is married to Minatei, but on his wife's death his mistress Pappatti comes to live with him. Ranga Rao buys one of the shops in the bazar street and opens a grocery shop for Somu where he thrives.

As time passes, he becomes an addict to alcohol and women; his son Natarajan too does not prove good. One day he learns that Champamurtti Rao who had gone to Pantaripuram collapsed in the sanctorium itself after worshipping the deity. Somu is profoundly shocked. He realises that he has been after false gods all his life—wealth, wine and women were his major gods. He receives one shock after another, the worst when he sees his son sharing the bed with his own mistress. He prepares his will whereby he donates all his wealth to Chattanur temple, leaving to his son the small house and the shop in the village. He goes to court and accepts imprisonment. On being released he avoids friends, walks alone in the evening towards a new village. Next morning he is found dead on the road-side.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Poyttevu is K.N. Subramanyam's most famous novel. It deals with the question of values in human life. Thematically, it shows the monstrous usurpation of base values in the human mind, and hence the title 'false gods'. The novel depicts the development of the character of Somu. From an uncared for boy of Mettu street, the protagonist rises to new heights through his own efforts to become the 'grocery Napoleon'. The division of the plot into three parts, 'udayam' (rise), 'ucchi' (zenith) and 'irul' (darkness), is symbolic of the hero's rise and fall.

Such symbolic structuring of the plot with stages in the hero's fortunes attests to the consummate skill of the novelist. In the history of the Tamil novel, Poyttevu claims a significant place in terms of theme and technique.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P.G. Sundararajan and S. Sivapathasundaram, Tamil naval : nurantu varalarum valarchchiyum (Madras, 1977); P. Tatacanamurtti, Naval ayvu (Nagarcoil, 1979).

A.A.M.

PRABANDHA (Sanskrit). The term originally means a whole composition. Just as in ancient literature both 'Kavya' and 'Sahitya' imply poetry, 'Prabandha' and 'Kavya' similarly signify a work of literary art. The change which the meanings of all these words have undergone in modern literature deserves attention. In modern literature 'sahitya' means literature as a whole of which poetry or kavya constitutes only a type. Similarly, prabandha today denotes a type of literary composition known as essay, but in Sanskrit poetics, all three terms (sahitya, kavya and prabandha) meant a work of poetic art. It is no wonder, therefore, that Shabdakalpadruma records 'a poetic structure' as the meaning of prabandha, and cites a verse from Hamsaduta, a lyric on the pattern of Meghaduta where it describes itself as an enchanting prabandha overflowing with emotion.

The first literary critic to mention prabandha is Dandin, who defines the embellishment of 'Bhavika' as an instrument of decoration belonging to the entire work. Later theoreticians, notably Anandavardhan, freely employ the term prabandha to signify the sense of the total poetic structure. In his Dhvanyaloka, Anandavardhana distinguishes between the single verse unit, known as 'Muktaka', which presents in its small compass a complete poetic edifice, and Prabandha which presents the permanent and transient moods as also the excitants and the ensuants in their richness. He also highlights the difference between the aesthetic relish caused by the appreciation of a miniature poem and that generated by the poetic import of a total structure, and finally concludes by saying that in the hands of eminent literary artists like Amaru and the like, even a miniature word-painting is able to project the moods and excitants in their fullness so much so that the experience caused by it becomes as pleasurable as that caused by a whole specimen of poetic art.

In his endeavour to enunciate the principles following which a total poetic structure or prabandha can become really suggestive of the intended emotional mood of the artist, Anandavardhana says that the plot is to be so manipulated that it becomes enchanting on account of projection of appropriate excitants, ensuants and accessories, and that even a modification can be made of the well-known plot, keeping in mind the requirements of 'rasa' and the scope of the principle of propriety. He says further that the junctures of the plot are to be organised according to the needs of rasa, and not simply out of deference to the rules of poetics and dramaturgy, that the predominant and subsidiary feelings should be projected or withdrawn in appropriate places and at proper intervals, and that though the artist is competent to create shining poetic figures, they are to be used with moderation, because the opulence of imagery usually suppresses profundity of emotion. In conclusion Anandavardhana affirms that a prabandha which is structured in conformity with these principles becomes the true symbol of the artist's poetic experience.

Referring to both the Ramayana and the Mahabharata as 'prabandha', Anandavardhana says that the depiction of one emotion as the predominant one in them leads to profound charm and bliss. In the Ramayana, thus, he asserts, the predominant emotional mood is represented by the tragic; in the Mahabharata, on the other hand, by the quietistic, which, in its turn, proves itself helpful in achieving liberation, which is the goal of poetry in the present case.

Sanskrit poetics considers the predominant emotional mood as the poetic meaning, which is to be differentiated from the meaning of the first and second dimensions, the 'Vachyartha' and the 'Lakshyartha'. The poetic meaning emerging from the Ramayana is not merely the sum-total of the meanings of all the verses contained in the epic. It is much more and something different from them. The verses of the Ramayana may present either the excitant or the ensuant or the accessory or the permanent mood, but a mere combination of these ingredients does not cause that peculiar state of blissful experience in the mind of the connoisseur—the state which goes by the name of Rasa.

In arriving at this conclusion Sanskrit poetics structures its theories on the doctrine of 'sphota' adumbrated by the system of grammar. The science of language speaks of a number of types of sphota, beginning with the small 'padasphota' and ending with the grand 'prabandhasphota'. The contention of the science of language is that the meaning signified by the total composition is something different from the sum total of the meanings conveyed by individual paragraphs incorporated in the composition. The meaning of a total composition has a special form of its own. Nagesha in his Paramalaghumanjusha gives a full treatment of the concept of sphota, along with its divisions, and in his Vaiyakaranabhushanasara, Kondabhatta introduces the concept of Prabandhasphota. It is quite natural for the science of literary criticism, which draws its inspiration from the science of language, to float the concept of the total meaning of poetry, which is a monolythic structure, and to affirm that this constitutes the poetic meaning.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

R.M.

PRABANDHA-PADMA (Hindi). This famous collection of essays by Suryakanta Tripathi 'Nirala' was published in 1934. Originally they were published in the magazine Samanvaya, under the pen-name 'Ek Darshanik'. The collection contains ten essays which constitute, on the whole, a historical document of contemporary literary criticism.

In these essays literary problems have been discussed in the framework of political, social and philosophical contexts. The essays, by and large, are well reasoned out. They are even argumentative, though the level of argument is not the same everywhere. Yet all of them have an innate consistency. The logical interpretation of myths and legends is done on the basis of dialectical reasoning. In the essay 'Pantji aur Pallav' the attempt is to understand a poet's attitude towards art and beauty rather than to indulge in making individual charges. In fact, in such essays Nirala intends to investigate the whole tradition of poetry and comes to the conclusion that the Ritivadi tradition had always met with opposition because it made people indifferent to their struggles, ideals and values. In old poetry he supports Sant sahitya (Bhakti literature). He calls it an age of Renaissance in Indian literature because in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries when Sant sahitya was being written, the languages of common people (Avadhi and Brajbhasha) emerged in full vitality. The literature written in these languages reflected the mind and heart of the common people.

Regarding the question of national language, Nirala writes sarcastically:

> The question of language being difficult is not raised in other languages as it is raised in Hindi. People who accept Hindi as national language or want to make it national language scream in distress at least thirteen times a year that the language should be easy, should be understood by all, from young children to old persons. But I have not yet heard anybody saying that the basis of education should be made more wide and comprehensive so that people are exposed to a wider range of terminology and the level of the masses is uplifted.

Nirala is of the view that criticism of Hindi comes usually from those people who neither write, nor know, nor want to know Hindi. He believes that literature can attain excellence only when its base is the feelings of common people. The language of common people gives it a dimension. Tulsidas's Ramacharitmanas is a challenge to scholars, but it is a rich treasure for common people, who draw values of life from it—and the language is no barrier for them.

What is special about these essays is that they are based on reason rather than sentiment. For example, Nirala says that Ghalib is known for writing difficult Urdu but he is the greatest poet of that language; Shelley's language is not very simple, but he is one of the greatest of English poets; and so is the case with Rabindranath, not less ill-famed for his difficult language. Nirala believes that a writer's language is commensurate with his temperament and thought. The depth of ideas gives depth to the language.

In the essay 'Rashtra aur nari' we have the whole subject of modern women's awakening in the country. In 'Hamare sahitya ka dhyeya' Nirala says that literature should aim at refining the cultural consciousness of the people. Good literature cannot be totally isolated from politics, but all the same it should try to project a universal attitude.

The essays 'Kavya mein rup aur arup' and 'Sahitya ka phul apane hi vritt par' are his famous critical essays. The point that time influences and modifies the form and content of literature has been discussed with profundity. The essay 'Pantji aur Pallav' shows the potential of the practical criticism of the chhayavadi age. A detailed discussion has been made of the sensibility and language of Pant and his flaws pointed out. In one sentence Nirala pays his tribute to Pant : if one were to describe in one word Pantji's originality, one may call it 'melody'.

To sum up, the collection is a remarkable work of literary criticism and its relevance lies in its analytical approach towards literary and cultural problems of the day.

R.R.P

PRABANDHA SAHITYA (Apb.). In Apabhramsha, a narative poem or prabandha kavya is found in the from of 'purana', 'charita' and 'kathakavya'. In purana and charita, the life of a great person or mahapurusha is narrated. Mahapurana is a term peculiar to Jaina literature and means a great narrative of ancient times. Puranas narrate the life of a single individual, a mahapurasha or a holy person, while a Mahapurana deals with the lives of persons prominent in the legends. According to the Jaina tradition, there lived sixty-three legendary persons. The Jaina poets have written kavyas about their lives. In fact, the Apabhramsha poets do not distinguish between a charita and a katha. A complete record of the life or lives of a legendary hero or heroes is given in such epics.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PRABANDHA SAHITYA (APABHRAMSHA)

Almost all the special features of the prabandha kavya or epic are found in a purana, charita and katha. These kavyas are divided into cantos or sandhis. Each sandhi contains many 'kadavakas'. Kadavaka is a special metrical form peculiar to Apabhramsha and is not found in Sanskrit and Prakrit poetry. A characteristic feature is alliteration at the end of each line. The kadavakas are composed in different metres of which 'prajjatika' is very popular. Each kadavaka ends with gita' a kind of metre in two lines introducing the next topic connected to the previous. The number of kadavakas is not decided in each sandhi. At the beginning of a sandhi, 'dhruvaka' is found in which the story of that particular sandhi is indicated briefly.

Prabandha kavyas are based on popular legendary themes. The poets like Swayambhu, Haribhadra, Pushpadanta and Kanakamara have made the Apabhramsha literature vast and varied. Swayambhu (6th c. AD) is the representative poet of this form of poetry, viz., the prabandha kavya. Two prabandha kavyas ascribed to Swayambhu are available. One is Paumachariu which describes the famous Rama story according to the Jaina tradition, and the other is Rittanemichariu which deals with the life-story of Lord Krishna. Thus Swayambhu has given us kavyas dealing with both the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. Vimalasuri's Paumachariyam was the source of Paumachariu, divided into five parts such as 'Vidyadhara kanda', 'Ayodhya kanda', 'Sundara kanda', 'Yuddha kanda' and 'Uttara kanda'. Paumachariu contains in all ninety sandhis or cantos.

Rittanemichariu is more generally known as Harivamsha purana. In accordance with the Jaina tradition, the poet gives the story of the twenty-second tirthankara, Aristhanemi, as well as the stories of the Kauravas and the Pandavas. It contains four parts, 112 sandhis with 1937 kadavakas. This kavya is mostly descriptive in nature.

Pushpadanta (9th c. AD) was a gifted poet of Apabhramsha. Mahapurana or Tisatthi-mahapurisha gunalankara is the longest of his three works. Jinasena's Mahapurana in Sanskrit is the basic source of this work. Two smaller works of Pushpadanta are Jasaharachariu and Nayakumarachariu. In Mahapurana, Pushpadanta gives the stories of twenty-four thirthankaras, twelve chakravartins, nine Vasudevas, nine Baladevas and nine Prativasudevas. The story of each great person is complete in itself. Pushpandanta considers this work a 'mahakavya'. Pushpadanta was well-versed in Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha. He was a forceful writer. The very style of the Mahapurana is a testimony to this. The vocabulary used in all his works is a clear proof of his deep knowledge of the Prakrits. The descriptions, poetic embellishments, figures of speech, proverbial expressions, long compounds employed in his works show Puspadanta as a first rate poet of his age. No Apabhramsha poet has excelled him in the art of epic composition. Though a Brahmin by birth, Pushpadanta was an ardent Jaina. This is borne out by the philosophical discussions found in his Mahapurana and other works.

There are nine sandhis in Nayakumarchariu. The poet stresses the importance of 'Sritapanchami' and narrates the story of the prince of Magadha. Jasaharachariu is a compartively smaller work, containing only four sandhis. The story of Yashodhara is narrated to show the horrible consequences of violence.

Other prabandha kavyas in Apabhramsha are Pasachariu of Padmakirti (10th c.), Ritthanemichariu of Dhavala (10th-11th c.), Bhavisayatta kaha (Bhavisyadutta katha) of Dhanaval (10th c.) and Dhamma parikkha of Harisena (10th c.).

In Pasachariu, the poet Padmakirti portrays the life of the twenty-third tirthankara, Parshvanatha. It is composed in eighteen sandhis. Ritthanemichariu is a voluminous work of Dhavala containing 122 sandhis. In Bhavisayatta kaha of Dhanaval, the significance of 'Sritapanchami' is illustrated in twenty-two sandhis. Next comes the work of Harisena, viz. Dhamma parikkha, in which there is a bitter attack on Brahmanism. It is composed in 11 sandhis. The Jaina poets have written many biographical poems in 'sandhibaddha kadavaka' style like Jambusamichariu, Sudamsanachariu, Karakandachariu, Paumasirichariu. Jambusamichariu is written by Vira (11th c.) in which the life of Jambuswami is depicted in eleven sandhis. The poet calls his work 'Shringaravira mahakavya.' In Sudamsanachariu the poet Nayanandi (11th c.) explains through the story of Sudarshana the significance of five-fold salutation (panchanamaskara). Karakandachariu is composed in ten sandhis in which Muni Kanakamara (11th c.) has illustrated the greatness of the 'panchakalyana vidhi'. Dhalil (11th c.) has described the greatness of 'panchavrata' in Paumasirichariu which concludes in four sandhis. The poet narrates the previous lives of Padmasri and shows her firmness in faith even in adversity. Most important is the fact that he has effectively used the 'paddhadia' metre. Kahakosha and Rayanakarandasatthu are written by Srichand (11th-12th c.) for the purpose of teaching religious values. From the point of view of language, style and metrical beauty, Sridhar's (12th-13th c.) works may be classed with the charita kavyas of other Jaina poets. Sukumalachariu in six sandhis, Pasanahachariu in twelve sandhis and Bhavisayattachariu are three Apabhramsha works of Sridhara. Next comes Suloyanachariu of Devasena Ganin (probably 12th-13th c.) written in 28 sandhis. In keeping with the tradition of other Jaina charita kavyas, this work also maintains the kadavaka style and the use of paddhadia metre in it. Pajjunnakaha of Kavisimha or Siddha (12th c.) is writeen on the same lines. The poet narrates the story of Pradyumna. Neminahachariu is written by Haribhadra (8th c.), part of which was later edited and published by Hermann Jacobi, entitled Sanakkumarachariu. The special feature of this work is that it is composed in

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'Radda' metre unlike other charita kavyas written in kadavaka style.

The writing of charita kavyas continued up to Raidhu (15th c.). Mention may be made of Chakkammovaesa by Amarkirti (12th c.), Jinadattachariu by Lakhu, Neminahachariu by Lakhamadeva, Bahubalichariu by Dhanaval II, Chandappahachariu by Yashakirti, and Sukosalachariu by Raidhu. Even after Raidhu, the Jaina poets continued to write sandhi-baddha kavyas in Apabhramsha. But by then the modern Indo-Aryan languages were getting more and more crystallised.

Many poets like Abdul Rahman (Addahamana) and Vidyapati are also said to have written kavyas on 'loukika' (secular) subjects in Apabhramsha. Sandesha rasaka is composed by Abdul Rahman in 223 verses. It is a literary work of high standard and deals with the separated heroine's message to her beloved husband.

Vidyapati composed Kirtilata with the intention of describing the valour of his patron Kirtisimha, king of Tirahut. The vocabulary employed in this work shows that Vidyapati was well-versed in Persian and Arabic languages also. It is a good work showing the Prakritisation of Persian and Arabic words as well.

J.S.K.G.

PRABANDHA SAHITYA (Sanskrit/Prakrit) covers semi-historical and biographical writings in simple Sanskrit/Prakrit prose and verse. They include life-stories of kings, administrators, preachers, scholars, poets and laymen, descriptions of Jaina pilgrimage centres, folk-tales and anecdotes. The aim of these works, written by Jaina authors, was to extol the greatness of religion by illustration from the lives of great persons, and to entertain the audience with secular subjects. Five of these works are listed here. Puratanaprabandha-sangraha (collection of old stories), an incorporation of semi-historical stories from five different collections, e.g. Prabandhavali and four Prabandhasangrahas as well as summaries from Prabandha chintamani along with significant dates of Muslim kings from 1206 to 1350 AD in two separate indices. This work is in popular Sanskrit prose, interspersed with 444 verses in Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha. On the whole there are 63 heads divided into 239 sub-heads. Prabandhavali was composed in 1233 by Jinabhadra, pupil of Udayaprabhasuri, at the request of Jayantasingha, a son of Vastupala. It is found incomplete. In this collection there are a few essays from Prabandhakosh and Prabandhachintamani also. Many later works are indebted to it, e.g. the seeds of Chandbardai's Prithvirajraso may be seen in its 'Prithviraja-prabandha'. Some important heads in it are Valabhi-bhanga, Jayachandra, Ajayapala, Lakhanaraula, and ministers Yashovira and Udayana.

The dates of the other four Prabandhasangrahas are not certain, but their manuscripts date from the 15th century. They are also incomplete works and some of them are of later date. Some of their important heads are Bhoja-gangeya, Prithviraja, Nahadaraya, Ladolalakhana, Magha, Varahamhira and Dharadhvamsa.

Prabhavakacharita: A work in Sanskrit verse on the life of prominent Jainas by Prabhachandra (or Chandraprabha) and revised by Pradyumnasuri in 1277. It is interspersed with a few Prakrit and Apabhramsha verses. Its other title is Purvarsicharita. It is a continuation of Hemachandra's Parishishtaparvan. There are 22 life-stories with two sub-stories of Dhanapala and Jineshvarasuri ranging from the 1st to the 13th century AD. Some important heads in it are Padaliptasuri, Siddhasena, Haribhadra, Siddharsi, Bappabhatti, Abhayadeva, Manatunga and Shantisuri. Hemachandra's biography in it is significant from the historical point of view. Ancedotes on Bana, Vakpati, Magha, Harshavardhana, Pratihara Amaraja, Bhojadeva, Bhima-I, Siddharaja and Kumarapala are also there. The book is helpful for a study of the history of Gujarat. Its style is somewhat poetic.

Prabandhachintamani by Merutungasuri, pupil of Chandraprabha, was composed at Vardhamanapura in 1304. It has five chapters with eleven essays, each with a number of sub-divisions. It is in Sanskrit prose interspersed with some Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha and vernacular verses. Important topics in it are Vikramaditya, Satavahana, Vanaraja Chavada, Mularaja, Munja Bhoja, Bhima, Siddharaja, Kumarapala, Vastupala-Tejapala, Magha, Dhanapala, Mayura, Hemachandra, Manatunga, etc. There are interesting anecdotes about Nanda, Shiladitya, Prithvichandra, Varahamihira, Bhartrihari, etc. Raja Bhoja, Vikramaditya and Shiladitya are praised as great patrons of poets and scholars. There are also vivid descriptions of life at court and literary contests.

Vividha-tirtha-kalpa, a work dealing with Jaina pilgrimage centres, also called Kalpa-pradipa, was composed, partly in Prakrit and partly in Sanskrit, in prose and verse. The work is of great historical and geographical importance and acts as a veritable guide-book. It was completed by Jinaprabhasuri in 1331 but it took him about thirty years to write it. Its author was a scholar and an influential preceptor, honoured even by Mohammad Tughlak. The Prabandhakosh of Rajashekharasuri is greatly indebted to it. Two significant events recorded in it are the destruction of Valabhi by some Arab chief in AD 788 and the attack on Gujarat by Mohammad Ghaznavi in 1204.

In all, there are sixty to sixty-one heads. Out of them, twelve deal with salutations and eulogies, seven with biographies and forty-two with places of pilgrimage. The divisional distribution of India according to it can be arranged as Gujarat, Kathiawad, Uttarapradesh, Punjab, Rajasthan, Malwa, Avadh, Bihar, Berar, Dakshina, Karnatak and Telangana.

Prabandhakosh, also called Chaturvimshati-Prabandha, was composed at Delhi in 1349 by Rajashekhara, pupil of Tilakasuri, in Sanskrit prose, interspersed with Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha verses. Its sources are earlier works of this kind. Its language and style are very simple. The persons dealt with are ten Jaina teachers—Bhadrabahu, Aryanandila, Jivadevasuri, Khapatacharya, Padalipta, Siddhasena, Mallavadisuri, Haribhadra, Bappabhatti and Hemachandra; four Sanskrit poets—Harsha, Harihara, Amarachandra and Madanakirti; seven Kings—Satavahana, Vankachula, Vikramaditya, Nagarjuna, Udayana, Lakshmanasena-Kumaradeva, Madanavarma; and three lay-votaries—Ratna, Abhada and Vastupala-Tejapala. Kings Nagarjuna and Vankachula, and layman Ratna are historically unknown persons.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Muni Jinvijayaji (ed.), Prabandhachintamani (1933), Vividha-tirtha-kalpa (1934), Prabandha-kosha (1935), Puratana Prabandha-sangraha (1936), Prabhavakacharita (1940).

K.R.C.

PRABANDHA SAHITYA (Telugu). The term 'prabandha', which came to be used as a generic name in the parlance of modern literary criticism in Telugu, was not so considered in Sanskrit poetics or by the early Telugu authors. It was used rather as a synonym of a 'nibaddha kavya', a closely-knit full-length poem as against stray verses (muktakas) and short poems (khanda kavyas). In this sense all the Telugu narrative poems from the Mahabharata to Shiva Bharatam of Gadiyaram Venkata Sesa Sastri may be treated as prabandhas. In fact, Tikkana, one of the trio who translated the Mahabharata into Telugu, referred to the fifteen parvas he had rendered as a cluster of prabandhas.

The modern literary critic, however, found a qualitative difference between the body of poetry produced prior to 1500 and that composed later. He preferred to call the earlier epoch as the Purana period and the later the Prabandha age. A major difference between the two is that while the puranas are translations from Sanskrit, the prabandhas are original poems, each having as its basis a brief story found in some purana and elaborating it into an original full-length poem. Justifying the new trend, Ramarajabhushana, a celebrated prabandha poet, says: 'A Sanskrit work, as it is, is like a diamond uncut and unpolished. A fictitious story is an artificial diamond. The elaboration of a brief story found in Sanskrit is like a well-cut and polished diamond.'

Defining prabandha, Pingali Lakshmikantam, a noted critic, enumerated the following five essential conditions for it:

(1) It should have a single hero throughout reflecting the unity of action; (2) It should be embellished by the eighteen customary descriptions; (3) It should have 'shringara' as the prime sentiment; (4) It should employ a figurative and rhetorical style; (5) It should be an original composition and not a translation. The above conditions do not always apply to all the so-called prabandhas composed since the sixteenth century, but they have been grouped as prabandhas mainly because they are original compositions and are presented in a more colourful and romantic style than the earlier works. He also concedes that the genre of prabandha did not emerge all of a sudden in the sixteenth century, but had its beginnings in the earlier works. Nirvachanottara Ramayanam of Tikkana, and the episode of Kichaka's death in the Mahabharata, Kumara sambhavam of Nannechoda, Nrisimha puranam of Errapagada, known as 'Prabandha Parameshvara' (the master of prabandha genre), Uttara Harivamsham of Nachana Somana and Shringaranaishadham of Shrinatha may be considered the fore-runners of prabandha in Telugu.

Prabandha literature reached its zenith in the reign of Krishnadevaraya, whose court was adorned by eight great poets, known as 'Ashtadiggajas' (the eight-quarter elephants). Though there is difference of opinion about the identity of those eight poets, the following are accepted as the first-rate prabandha-poets of that period: Allasani Peddana (Manucharitramu), Ayyalaraju Ramabhadra (Ramabhyudayamu), Chintalapudi Yellana (Radhamadhavamu), Dhurjati (Shri Kalahasti mahatmyamu), Kandukuri Rudrakavi (Niranjushopakhyanamu), Krishnadevaraya (Amuktamalyada), Madayagari Mallana (Rajashekhara charitramu), Nandi Timmana (Parijatapaharanamu), Pingali Surana (Kalapurnodayamu), Ramarajabhushana (Vasucharitramu), Sankusala Nrisimha Kavi (Mandhata charitramu) and Tenali Ramakrishna (Panduranga mahatmyamu). Of these, Allasani Paddana, Nadi Timmana, Ramarajabhushana and Pingali Surana are trend-setters, since their works became models for several later poems. Allasani Peddana, whose style is a perfect example of harmony between sound and sense, is hailed as 'Andhra Kavita Pitamaha' (Grandfather of Telugu poetry) and his Manucharitramu is the first of the five eminent prabandhas in Telugu.

The seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries, known as the period of Tanjore Nayak kings in the history of Telugu literature, saw a deterioration in the classical and romantic texture of poetic diction. The prabandha moved closer to the masses and their folk-tradition. The poets tended to become epicurean and their poems overflowed with the erotic sentiment. Vijayavilasamu by Chemakura Venkata Kavi, Tara shashanka vijayamu by Shesham Venkata Kavi, Radhika santvanamu by Muddupalani, a courtesan, are some of the popular prabandhas of this period.

Tirupati Venkata Kavulu, the twin-poets, and their disciples continued the tradition of writing prabandhas in the first half of the twentieth century. According to Pingali Lakshmikantam, 'Prabandha is the unique gift of the Andhras to the Indian Muse. Being of a fine blend of the three varieties of poetry, viz, drishya (visual), shravya (auditory) and madhura (sweet), it has a peculiar charm of its own.'

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.V.R. Narasimham, Telugu prabandhamu (Andhra University, Waltair); P. Lakshmikantam, Andhra sahitya charitramu (Hyderabad, 1972).

B.V.S.

PRABANDHACHINTAMANI (Prakrit/Apabhramsha) is a collection of historical tales by Merutunga, the Jaina Acharya of Nagendra Gachchha and pupil of Chandraprabha. Merutunga also wrote Mahapurushacharita. He completed Prabandhachintamani in 1304 at Vardhamanapura (Kathiawara) in Gujarat.

Prabandhachintamani consits of five books. The first deals with the deeds of Vikramaditya, Satavahana, Mularaja and Munjaraja, the second with those of king Bhoja and Bhima, the third with those of king Siddharaja, the fourth with those of Kumarapala, including the feats of his ministers, Vastupala and Tejahpala, while the fifth has miscellaneous tales.

Prabandhachintamani enjoyed immense reputation with later authors in the field, such as Rajashekharasuri, who wrote Prabandhakosha, Jayasimhasuri, the author of Kumarapalacharita, and Jinaharsha, the author of Vastupalacharita.

Though Merutunga presents a mixture of miracle tales and popular stories, he exibits a rare sense of history. He has the courage to disclose the fact, deliberately concealed by many authors, regarding the re-marriage of Kumaradevi. He even tells us that the great and powerful ministers, Vastupala and Tejahpala, who so much contributed to the history and culture of medieval Gujarat, were born of this widow-marriage. Similar are the facts revealed by Merutunga regarding the mother of Rana Viradhavala.

R.T.

PRABHABATI DEVI SARASWATI (Bengali)
see under DEVI SARASWATI, PRABHABATI

PRABHAKAR (Marathi; b. 1769, d. 1843), whose real name was P.J. Datar, was born at Gangapur in Maharashtra. Though he was never actively involved in 'Tamasha', a form of folk theatre, his songs were accepted and sung by Gangu Haibati, Mahadba Sutar and Gangadhar, the renowned Tamasha artists of the time. Lacking royal patronage, he lived in poverty. After the end of the rule of the Peshwas, he sold his poems to those who paid for them.

In all he wrote some thirteen ballads. Of these the most famous were those on the darbar of Ranga, the battle of Kharda and Sawai Madhavrao Peshwa. The ballad on the battle of Kharda is known for forceful description.

His 'lavanis' (short erotic songs) also earned him name. The love life of Bajirao II inspired him to compose as many as thirty-two lavanis, highly amorous and passionate in spirit. These songs (numbering 125) are marked by a rare dramatic power and intensity of emotion. They hold a mirror up to life in such details as contemporary customs, dresses, ornaments, etc.

He wrote songs on some mythological and devotional themes too. These poems portray gods and goddesses (Shankar, Parvati, Krishna) in human form and with human feelings, sometimes resorting to mild humour and portrayal of human instincts.

D.T.B.

PRABHAKARA (Sanskrit; 8th c. AD) is one of the two main exponents of the Purva-Mimamsa system of philosophy, the other being Kumarila Bhatta. Prabhakara is often referred to as 'guru' in some philosophical literature of the later date. He is also mentioned as 'Nibandhakara' by some writers of the system. Prabhakara is known for his strong views on many points, and they are called 'gurumatam' because they are regarded as too elaborate and complicated. However, some traditional Sanskrit scholars suggest a different meaning of gurumatam which, according to them, implies the views of the guru.

The story runs thus : One day while Kumarila was teaching Prabhakara, Mandana, Umbeka, Revana (Murari?) and others, he came across with the expression, "atratu noktam, tatrapi noktamiti dviruktam (punaruktam)", which apparently meant "this has not been mentioned here, nor has it been mentioned there, thus it has been mentioned twice (repeated)." Kumarila failed to find a satisfactory explanation of the sentence and retired to his evening rituals. Prabhakara thought about the sentence and explained its meaning thus: "It has been mentioned here by the particle 'tu' (tu na) and again by the particle 'api' (apina), thus it has been stated twice." Thereupon Prabhakara was acclaimed as a guru by his friends. The story has hardly anything to do with a real incident. Perhaps, it is invented, suggesting that though Prabhakara was a student of Kumarila (which is not a fact), he surpassed the master in ingenuity.

The Jaiminisutra, known as Purva-Mimamsa, has a long history of speculation and discussion behind it. Jaiminisutra is divided into twelve chapters of which the first chapter is more important than the rest from the philosophical point of view. It deals with the source and means of knowledge, and its validity, etc. The work is assigned to the fourth century BC. It is now available with the famous commentary of Sabara. It is evident that there were many other commentaries before Sabara-bhashya, of which the one by Varttikakara was used by Prabhakara and Kumarila.

Kumarila Bhatta wrote a commentary on Sabarabhashya, divided under three heads, Shloka varttika, Tantra varttika and Tuptika. Prabhakara wrote an elaborate commentary on Sabarabhashya, named Brihati. While there were a good number of followers of Kumarila beginning with Umbeka Bhavabhuti (8th c.) to Ganga Bhatta (17th c.), Prabhakara was not fortunate enough to find followers except the renowned Shalikanatha and, perhaps, Bhavanatha. Thus there are two schools in the Mimamsa system of philosophy—the Prabhakara school and the Bhatta school.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

"Prabhakara's Brihati is a commentary, in the strict sense of the word, upon Sabara's Bhashya; nowhere does it differ from the original, which it always tries to support; nor does it attack the views in the original; in fact, as a rule it attacks no opinion except those of the avowed Purva paksha. On the other hand Kumarila, in many places in the Tantra-varttika, rejects the interpretation of Sabara and offers an entirely different interpretation of his own."

Shalikanatha Mishra wrote a sub-commentary on the Brihati of Prabhakara, named Rijuvimala (straight and clear). He had also written a treatise, Prakarana panchika (a work on five aspects), following Prabhakara. Shalikanatha was ridiculed for his commentary Dipa-shikha on Laghvi of Prabhakara. His opponents remarked: "There was never an idiot like Shalikanatha, nor shall there be one. Writing Dipa-shikha (the lamp), a commentary, to elucidate the views of Prabhakara is like lighting a lamp to illuminate the sun." Bhavanatha is another scholar of the Prabhakara school who wrote a treatise Nyayaviveka dealing with Prabhakara's views.

Kumarila holds that the cognition of objects is independent of verbal expression. He holds that indeterminate perception is non-determined perception, i.e. a perception which cannot distinguish an individual from a class, and is comparable to the apprehension of the new-born infant. Prabhakara asserts that indeterminate perception apprehends both class character and the individual. As a corollary to his view, Kumarila states that the universal is not different from the individual, and the relation that exists between the two is identity in difference. As against this, Prabhakara holds that the universal and the individual cannot be identical, since the universal is eternal and general property, and the individual is non-eternal and specific.

Prabhakara's theory of 'anvitabhidhana' states:The meaning of words can be known only when they occur in a sentence having relevance; so words signify when they are related to others. The school of grammar usually admits 'abhihitanvaya'. A word conveys a sense first, and then is related to other words in a sentence to give the meaning of the whole sentence.

Nine substances are generally admitted in a section of Indian philosophy, such as earth and water, etc. Kumarila adds darkness, while Prabhakara rejects it and says that darkness is absence of light, and not a separate substance (dravya).

B.S.

PRABHAKARASASTRY, VETURI (Telugu; b. 1888, d.1950) was an outstanding researcher in Telugu. He began his literary career in his early teens with 'ashtavadhanas' under the aegis of his teacher Chellapilla Venkata Sastry. He was a pandit at the Kellet Mission High School first and then in the Government Oriental Manuscripts Library, Madras. Later, he shifted to Tirupati where he researched on the works of Tallapaka family with dedication. After his illness at Tirupati, he became more and more inward looking. A noted classicist, he was a staunch supporter of the movement for spoken Telugu. He is famous for his critical editions of classics like the Basavapurana and Kridabhirama Shringara. Srinatha establishes him as a critic while works like Kapotikatha earn him recognition in the field of poetry. He translated the plays of Bhasa, Bodhayana and Mahendra Vikrama into Telugu. His Chatupadya manimanjari (1913) is a famous anthology of the vers d'occasion of Telugu poets. Even eminent historians of Andhra drew inspiration from him and acknowledged their debt to him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S. Sachchidanandam, 'Veturi Prabhakara Sastry' in Telugu vaitalikulu, Vol. II (Hyderabad, 1977).

G.Sr.

PRABHJOT KAUR (Punjabi; b. 1924) graduated from Khalsa College for Women, Lahore, in 1945. She married Narenderpal Singh, a well-known novelist in Punjabi, in 1948. In the annals of Punjabi literature, the marriage of these two literary figures is quite a phenomenon in as much as the husband got the Sahitya Akademi Award on his novel Ba mulahaza hoshiar (1975) for the year 1976, while his wife had got the same award earlier in 1964 for the collection of her poems Pabbi (Plateau, 1962). She has been acclaimed as a great lyrical poetess, unfolding the fathomless psyche of Eve. She was nominated Member of the Punjab Legislative Council (1966) to represent cultural affairs, whereas in 1967 the honorific 'Padma Shri' was conferred upon her by the Government of India. She was also a member designate of the National Commission of UNESCO (1966). During the International Women's year, she was the 'Woman of the year'. The second Afro-Asian Conference, Tashkent, invited her (1958), and since then she has represented India at many national as well as international conferences of litterateurs. Fifteen countries in Europe and Asia were visited by her on a lecture-cum-study tour in 1978. For her poetic achievement, Pabbi, which was published in French, a rare honour of 'La Rose de France' was conferred upon her. The book has also been translated successfully into English, Russian, Italian, Rumanian, Bulgarian, Hindi, Oriya and Tamil. In Hindi Yudh ki jwala (Stories), Kuchh aur (Poetry), in Urdu Shahrah, Ban kapasi (Poetry, 1958), in Persian Lalai (Poetry) and in English On the Crest of

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Time (novel) have been well received in literary circles. Intellectual sophistication in her poetry has brought her recognition at home and abroad. Some of her poems are simple and chaste like folk-songs. She voices the intra-psychic turmoils of the women in agony. There is also a synthesis of philosophical strain and lyricism in her poetry. She launched Vikendrit, a Punjabi monthly of repute , and is still editing it creditably. Her prominent poetic works include Lal lat jote jage (The candle burns, 1943), Palkan ohle (Behind the eyelids, 1944), Kujh hor (Something more, 1946), Azal ton (Since eternity, 1946), Supne sadhran (Dreams and desires, 1949). Do rang (Two strains, 1951), Pankheru (The birds, 1956), Ban kapasi (Tulip, 1958), Kandhari hawa (Breeze from Kandhar, 1963), Khadi (The bay, 1967), Waddarsi shisha (Magnifying glass, 1973), Madhianter (Intermission, 1974), Chander yug (Lunar era, 1977) and Ishq shara ki nata (Love and law, 1985). Her short story collections include Kinke (Particles, 1952), Aman de nan (Dedicated to peace, 1956), Zindgi de kujh pal (Moments in time 1986). There is also to her credit a travelogue, Gharon bahir (Away from home, 1960) and an informative book Bharat de teohar (Fairs and festivals of India, 1958) in collaboration with Narenderpal Singh. She has also authored half a dozen books for children, and has creatively translated a number of great works. In her poetry, she voices doubts and denials of the modern sophisticated city life, and instead of insipid description, there is an introspection and retrospection in her creative verse. In the preface to Pabbi, S. Radhakrishnan wrote that she "has the power to feel and the patience to reflect and will give us in years to come valuable works which will not only enlarge the mind, but also enrich the heart".

S.S.So.

PRABHULINGA LEELE (Kannada), a Kannada poem by Chamarasa, is an important poetic work of the middle Kannada period. It is a biography in the mode of allegory that narrates the life and spiritual achievements of Allama Prabhu, mystic, saint, spiritual leader, teacher and poet of the twelfth century. The work is in twentyfive 'gatis' (movements) or chapters, composed in the six-line stanza form called 'bhamini shatpadi'. In all there are 1,111 stanzas.

Not much is known about Chamarasa and his life. Scholars tend to think that he lived in the fifteenth century and held a prestigious post in the court of Praudha Devaraya, the Vijayanagara king.

Allama Prabhu became a legend during his own time, and many Virashaiva poets made his life the subject of their poems. Two distinct approaches are discernible in the treatment of the Allama legend. Harihara, nearer in time to the age of Allama, treats him as a human character and Harihara's work is the narration of the 'evolution of a soul', whereas Chamarasa treats him as one endowed with divine power and as an incarnation of Lord Shiva. For Chamarasa, Allama is a 'realized' soul. He uses the story of Allama to propound the cardinal principles of Virashaivism. Later, Virashaiva poets followed the model of Chamarasa.

The narration is straightforward and there are no sub-plots. All the characters are related to the central figure of Allama Prabhu. The story develops in three stages—Allama's conquest of Mayadevi, the journey to Kalyana and his wanderings and return to Kalyana. Allama meets several people in his wanderings, like Maya, who tries to lure him, Animisha, who becomes his Guru, Muktayakka, to whom Allama propounds the nature of a guru, Siddharamma, to whom Allama preaches the futility of mere action and the importance of introspection, and Basavanna, Mahadevi, Goraksha, etc. who are at different levels of spiritual development.

The names of many of these characters represent human qualities, passions and virtues. Chamarasa succeeds in dramatizing abstract religious ideas. For example, the dance of Mayadevi is an attempt to entice Allama into worldly passions. She is compared to burning fire, but Allama is a marble pillar who just reflects the image but does not succumb to it. There is also remarkable restraint in the descriptive passages. Chamarasa does not involve himself in customary descriptions, nor does he use paradoxes and puns that are so common in the middle Kannada poetry. His felicity of language is often compared to that of Kumaravyasa. Prabhulinga leele has also been translated into Telugu and Tamil.

O.L.N.S.

PRABODHACHANDRIKA (Bengali), a didactic book of fables by Mrityunjay Vidyalamkar, is divided into four chapters. Each of the first three chapters is further subdivided into five parts while the fourth chapter is divided into six parts. A king finds his sons neglecting their studies and employs for them a teacher named Sridharacharya. The teacher was an adept in his profession and instructed his pupils with the help of stories with morals. He taught them grammar, phonetics, rhetoric and criticism besides different scriptures. These stories are mostly borrowed but some of them are Mrityunjay's own invention. John Clerk Marshman in a preface to the book says, "The work consists chiefly of narratives from the Shastras and written in the purest Bengali, of which indeed it may be considered one of the most beautiful specimens. Any person who can comprehend the present work and enter into the spirit of its beauties, may justly consider himself master of the language." This book shows three distinct styles: (i) Sanskritised Bengali, (ii) Literary Bengali and (iii) Colloquial Bengali. This classification is more significant with regard to the vocabulary it uses, the use of long compound words and the great preponderance of loan words from Sanskrit. Persian and

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Arabic words are avoided, and except in the use of verbs, 'tadbhava' words are also avoided. On the other hand, the use of a large number of 'tatsama' compound words (which are generally not more than two-worded), case inflections and post-positional words, Perso-Arabic words in the appropriate context and a large number of tadbhava words mark the literary style. The colloquial style consists in the frequent use of inflectional use of taboo words. In all three styles Mrityunjay used longer verbal and pronominal forms.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Banerji, Sahitya sadhak charitmala (Vol I, 1940); Sajanikanta Das, Bangal gadya sahityer itihas (1946); S.K.Das, Early Bengali Prose: Carey to Vidyasagar (1966)

Na.S.

PRABODHA CHANDRODAYA (Sanskrit). Krishnamishra is one of the playwrights who broke away from the conventional subject-matter prescribed for plays in Sanskrit dramaturgy. He wrote the allegorical drama, Prabodha chandrodaya (Moonrise of true knowledge), which started a new literary genre.

In the introduction, the work is stated to have been composed at the behest of Gopala on the occasion of the defeat of the Chedi king, Karna, at the hands of Gopala's friend, Kirtivarman. An inscription of AD 1042 mentions Karna, and another of 1098 mentions Kirtivarman, the Chandela king. The evidence tends to suggest that Krishnamishra belonged to the latter half of the eleventh century.

The drama, comprising six acts, deals with a conflict between two attitudes. One attitude prompts man to possess real knowledge; the other retards it. King Mind has two consorts, Pravritti (Activity) and Nivritti (Repose). The former gives birth to Moha (Delusion), the latter to Viveka (Discrimination). Moha has as his attendants Kama (Love) and his wife Rati (Pleasure), Krodha (Anger), Himsa (Injury), Ahamkara (Egoism) and his grandson Dambha (Deceit) born of Lobha (Greed) and Trishna (Desire). The retinue includes further Mithyadrishti (Heresy), described as a courtesan, and the materialist Charvaka.

Viveka has, as his followers, Mati (Reason), Dharma (Duty), Karuna (Compassion), Maitri (Friendliness), Shanti (Peace) and her mother Shradha (Faith), Kshama (Forgiveness), Santosha (Contentment), Vastuvichara (Judgment), Bhakti (Devotion), etc.

The drama brings about the eventual union of Viveka with the Upanishad which will lead to the birth of the Prabodha (True knowledge) and Vidya (Spiritual wisdom) and the overcoming of Moha.

Many incidents contribute to the progress of the main theme. Among them we have the occasionally erotic and humorous elements also which bring about the diversification of the story. In spite of didactic and philosophical treatment, the play is not a dull scholastic exercise. The psychological analysis of the states of mind clearly reveals the author's profound perception and critical judgement. His art of versification as well as his ability to write graceful prose is of a high order. Despite many merits of the drama, it must, however, be admitted that the characters lack life. The drama inspired several works which, though modelled on it, are much inferior productions. Among such dramas are the Mohaparajaya of Yashahpala (13th c.) and Chaitanyachandrodaya (1572) of Kavikarnapura.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, History of Sanskrit Literature (1920); S.K. De, History of Sanskrit Literature.

Sat. B.

PRACHIN BHARAT MEIN KALATMAK VINOD (Hindi), a collection of Hazariprasad Dwivedi's essays, published in 1940, is an attempt to understand Indian society, culture and history in their totality. The thinker and scholar in Dwivedi makes in these essays a composite study of arts and culture. He argues that for a fuller understanding of India's rich heritage, it is imperative to focus our attention on all our arts, scriptures and mythology, and make an in-depth study of our ancient literature, including Jain and Buddhist writings. A lot can be gleaned from art forms and artistic avocations and entertainments in ancient India. Dwivedi is of the opinion that luxury and artistic amusement are not identical. "Sheer luxury is desire, an appetite, but artistic amusement demands discipline, culture and discernment which people may not always possess. Its basic requirements are vigour and vitality and a capacity to enjoy as well as to relinquish." Above all, according to Dwivedi, only those people can enjoy the artistic amusement who are able to protect and preserve the beautiful and the artistic. In Indian history the Gupta period was such an age of vigour when people enjoyed artistic avocations and strove to preserve the art froms. Dwivedi makes a detailed study of the poetry, drama, painting, sculpture, legends, etc. of the Gupta age in these essays.

The essays like 'Kal sima ka auchitya','Kala: Mahamaya ka chinmay vilas','Kala ki sadhana', 'Vatsyayan ki kalayen', 'Natyashastra', 'Kalaon ki prachinata', 'Kalaon ke ashrayadata rais' are a study of the different aspects of art. The patrons of arts were themselves well conversant with the art-forms and gave liberal encouragement to artists.

Essays like 'Mukh prakshalan aur datun', 'Anulepan', 'Kesh sanskar', 'Adhar tatha nakhun rangai', 'Tambul sevan', 'Bhojanottar vinod', 'Antahpur ka suruchipurna jivan', 'Bhitti chitra', 'Chitragat chamtkar', 'Prastar lekh', 'Utsav mein veshbhusha', 'Utsav aur prekshagrih' etc. consider those art forms, particularly the light ones, which have been rather neglected by critics.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It is a unique book of its kind in Hindi which focuses on all aspects of ancient Indian society. The material is derived from a wide variety of sources, Pali, Prakrit and Apabhramsha, and unfolds in particular the myriad forms of artistic enjoyments in vogue in ancient India.

K.P.

PRACHIN PANTH PRAKASH (Punjabi) by Bhai Rattan Singh Bhangu (c. 1782-1846) is known to be the first book on the history of Khalsa Panth written in the traditional form of Punjabi poetry. Although some books pertaining to the biographical sketches of Sikh Gurus (Janam sakhis) had already been written, yet this is considered the first book in which a consolidated and detailed account of the origin and growth of Khalsa Panth has been recorded.

The details given in Mahan kosh by Bhai Kanh Singh indicate that when Captain Murray started writing a book on Khalsa Panth, he contacted Bhai Rattan Singh at Ludhiana in 1807 and obtained from him full details of events that led to the emergence of the Sikhs as a ruling force. The details disclosed to Captain Murray were later composed in a poetical form by Bhangu in 1841 under the title Prachin panth prakash. Thus, the book deals with the origin and development of Khalsa Panth up to the period of their ascendance to rulership. This period, at the same time, covers the phase of Indian history from 1675 to 1773, i.e. till the death of Ahmad Shah Durrani.

Bhai Veer Singh, who edited and published four editions of this book in 1914, was of the opinion that the literary standard of the book was not very high, as the poet had not adhered to the prosodic rules, and the language used too was also not up to the mark, but so far as its historical importance was concerned, it was the most valuable reference book on Sikh history. In the first edition of prachin panth prakash Bhai Veer Singh gave two lines in 'chaupais' (prosodical metre used in the book) on the basis of the first manuscript available to him. However, he completed four lines of chaupais in the second edition (1939) in accordance with the second version of manuscript found by him. Considering the mediocre literary standard of the book Gian Singh of Longowal wrote a new book entitled Panth prakash in which he inserted additional events. The literary standard of this book is better, but according to Bhai Kanh Singh, a sizeable part of this book is a creation of Kavi Nihal Singh of Lahore. It was last edited by Jeet Singh Sital in 1984 under the title Shri Guru panth prakash which is certainly an improved version.

O.P.A.

PRADHAN, GANESH PRABHAKAR (Marathi; b. 1922) was born and educated in Poona. He did his M.A. in 1945 in English Literature. He participated in the 'Quit India' movement in 1942, and was jailed for eleven months. He taught English at Fergusson College from 1945 to 1966. He was elected to the Maharashtra Legislative Council in 1966 and again in 1972 and 1978. He suffered eighteen months' imprisonment during the Emergency (1975-77), and was the leader of Opposition in the Maharashtra Legislative Council from 1980 to 1984. Since 1985, he has been editing a weekly Sadhana. Now retired from active politics, he writes mainly biography and travelogue. His Lokmanya Tilak : a biography was given an award by AICC in 1956. He wrote a biography of Mahatma Gandhi also. Among his Marathi works is Haji Pir (1965), a work on Indo-Pak relations which got him the State Government award and also an award from UNESCO. His other works are Sonar Bangla (1971) on Bangladesh liberation; Lokmanya Tilak—vyakti ani karya, a biography, Sata uttarachi kahani, a political novel which earned him the Maharashtra State Award in 1972. He edited Agarkar lekh sangraha and Pandit Nehru.

P.M.

PRADHAN, KUMAR (Nepali; b. 1937) is a distinguished writer, critic, historian and educationist. He received his Ph.d. degree from Calcutta University in 1982 for his thesis "The process and consequences of the unification of Nepal with particular reference to Eastern Nepal (1750-1850)."

A recipient of the prestigious Bhanubhakta Award (1983), instituted by the Nepali Academy, Darjeeling, for his literary work Pahilo pahar, Pradhan also edited the following Nepali literary magazines and publications: Kamal (1953), Hamro sansar (1962), Malingo (1963) and Vartaharu (eight critical essays).

Pradhan's historical book Pahilo pahar has three important sections: a critical study of the social and cultural life of the Nepalese in Darjeeling; Padri Ganga Prasad Pradhan, a pioneer in Nepali journalism; a few old dramas of Darjeeling and an in-depth study of the Nepali drama, Parasmani Pradhan's Buddha charitra natak.

The anthology, Vartaharu, deals with different subjects like existentialism, Jungian psychology and Ibsenism. Pradhan has also written a History of Nepali Literature, published by the Sahitya Akademi (1984). His research articles, published occasionally, on the historical study of social, cultural and political life of the hill people are very informative and thought-provoking. He was a member of the Nepali Academy, Darjeeling, from 1979 to 1986 and also a member of the Nepali Advisory Board of the Sahitya Akademi (Delhi) from 1983 to 1988.

A dedicated teacher by profession, Pradhan was attached to the Darjeeling Government College as a lecturer for a number of years. He is now Principal of Kurseong College.

R.P.L.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PRADHAN, PARASMANI (Nepali; b. 1898, d.1986) was born at Kalimpong in the district of Darjeeling in West Bengal. He taught at several schools in the district and later became a Sub-Inspector of schools.

His first articles were published in Chandra and Gorkhali, two early Nepali journals published from Banaras. Since then he never ceased to write. He edited two well-known literary journals called Chandrika (1918-1919) and Bharati (1948-1958). He was also the editor of Himalchuli, a Nepali daily newspaper published from Siliguri for some time. His major contribution to the Nepali language and its grammar includes Nepali vyakrana (1920), Nepali muhawara (Nepali idioms, 1960), A Short History of Nepali Language and Literature (1970) and English-Nepali and Nepali-English dictionaries.

His other popular works include Sundar kumar (1922), Buddha-charita (1923), Bhanubhakta granthavali (1944), Tipan-tapan (1953), Katha-bharati (a collection of stories in four parts, 1954), Biru driver (1957), Kavi ra kavita (1957), Rochak sansmaran (1966), Japamala (1967), Batul batal (1967), Panch-paurakhi purus (1969), Afno bare (1971), Kwati (1972) and Kathe-jhankri (1974).

He was equally at ease when he translated well-known works like Hiranyamai charitra, a Bengali novel. Towards the end of his chequered career he started writing short biographies of eminent Nepali writers in English. He could complete only five: Laxmiprasad Devkota, Bhanubhakta Acharya, Lekhnath Paudyal, Balkrishna Sama and Rupnarayan Sinha.

Parasmani Pradhan was associated with many social and literary organisations. He was elected Fellow of Royal Geographical Society and was a member of the Royal Asiatic Society. He was the first secretary of the Nepali Sahitya Sammelan, Darjeeling, and was also a member of the General Council of the Sahitya Akademi (New Delhi), Nepali Academy (Darjeeling), Nepali Literary Academy, North Bengal University (Darjeeling) and Hill Development Council (Darjeeling)

M.P. La.

PRAFULLA (Bengali, 1888) by Girishchandra Ghosh is a social drama which deals with the impact of a bank failure on Yogesh, the protagonist, and his family. Yogesh is the head of the family and eldest of three brothers, the other two being Ramesh and Suresh. Though he started humbly in life, when the play opens we find him at the pinnacle of prosperity achieved through his dedication to work and absolute honesty. He wants to call it a day and retire from the responsibilities of the family trade and arranges for dividing his property equally among his brothers, his wife and his son. Umasundari, Yogesh's mother, also hands over the charge of the house to Gyanada (wife of Yogesh) and prepares to leave for a pilgrimage to Brindavan. Prafulla, the wife of Ramesh, insists that she must accompany Uma so that she can look after her mother-in-law's comforts and conveniences. In short, when the play opens, we see a perfectly contented family where everybody is happy and all the members have mutual regard, love and affection for each other.

But everything changes when Pitamber, the manager, brings the news of the failure of the Reunion Bank with which Yogesh has invested all his resources. All the cheques issued to fellow-tradesmen have bounced. The news totally unsettles Yogesh and he seeks solace in wine. Nevertheless, he wants to play it fair and declare whatever resources are now left to him and pay his creditors off as his means would allow. Ramesh, who is a lawyer and the villain of the piece, tries to persuade Yogesh to transfer the property to someone else's name so that the creditors to whom Yogesh owns money are duped and the property is retained in the family.

The ultimate aim of Ramesh is to possess everything himself. But Yogesh would rather beg than take recourse to deceit. However, by influencing Uma and Gyanada, and by taking advantage of his elder brother's fondness for alcohol, Ramesh eventually brings Yogesh round to transfer the property to the name of a person of Ramesh's choice. Ramesh springs to action and gets the youngest brother Suresh involved in a jewel theft and despatched to jail. Yogesh, his wife and son are turned out of home, and a series of sufferings follow. The play ends with Yogesh's metaphoric assertion, "My fully blossomed garden has withered away.".

Though some critics regard Prafulla as a tragedy, it suffers from serious drawbacks to be called so. Maybe, it arouses pathos, but certainly not the tragic feeling. Yogesh is too weak and vulnerable for a tragic hero. The play also suffers from sentimentality and melodrama.

Mo.A.

PRAHARAJ, GOPALCHANDRA (Oriya; b. 1874, d. 1945), the great satirist and lexicographer, is an instance of what a man can achieve by sincere endeavour. His work, Odiya bhashakosha, is a unique compilation of the words of many dialects prevalent in different parts of Orissa with their proper interpretation. His satires also have a characteristic value of their own.

Gopalchandra was born in an aristocratic family in the village of Siddheswarpur in the district of Cuttack. His father, Narasingh Praharaj, was a zamindar. Gopalchandra was known among his friends for his pranks and practical jokes, but he was, all the same, a highly intelligent student endowed with a prodigious memory. His father wanted him to be an engineer but destiny decreed otherwise. He gave up his engineering course and passed B.A. and B.L. examinations from Ravenshaw College in 1900. During his early life he earned a lot as a government pleader but died poor.

His Bhashakosha is not an ordinary dictionary of

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Oriya words, as it is encyclopaedic in range and includes a comparative study of the vocabularies of Hindi, Bengali and English with all the details about word-roots.

Gopalchandra had a mastery over the language of the village folk and transmitted a lot from it to Oriya literature. His folk-tales of Orissa, re-told in the folk language in the famous book, Utkal kahani, have a unique place in Oriya literature. The novel manner of expression and diction attracted the attention of famous authors, and Sri Kshirodchandra Ray translated Utkal Kahani into Bengali. Some of his stories were translated and published in the Education Gazette of Bengal. Thus, the folk language, which had no place in Oriya literature, came to be recognised for its infinite literary charm and value. Gopalchandra was also a pioneer in children's literature and wrote a number of poems for children's text-books. What, however, made him immortal and dear to the people was his prose satire.

The first published prose satire of Gopalchandra is Bhagabat tungire sandhya (Evening in the rural club). The participants in this discussion in the club are the village Pandit, the school teacher, the local Mukhtar and the village money-lender. Through their speeches the author presents an amusing picture of the contemporary feudal tradition of theatrical shows, cultivation, general education, women's education and religious practices of different communities. His second contribution in this field was Bai Mohanti panji (Diary of Bai Mohanty) which he wrote under the pseudonym of Durmukha Sharma. The work was serialized in Utkal sahitya and is pungent, amusing and instructive. The writer, in order to bring home his point, makes use of innumerable proverbs, quotations and riddles. Another work of this nature is Ama gharara halchala (The goings-on in our family).

Mia sahebanka rojanamacha is another satire on the customs and traditions of the Muslim society. The two other works of Praharaj, viz., Duniar halchal and Nananka bastani were published serially in Utkal sahitya.

Besides good satires, Praharaj also attempted works of more serious nature, such as critical essays on Fakirmohad Senapati's Chhamana athaguntha and Ramashankar Ray's Jugadharma, a biography of Chandrasekhar Samanta, and other essays on social themes like 'Hindu samajara adhunika gati' and 'Prachina Bharatara achara vyabhahar'.

Gopalchandra Praharaj was not only a litterateur who brought to Oriya literature a new expression replete with wit, satire and humour, but also a great social reformer.

P.P.

PRAHASANA (Sanskrit) is one of the ten varieties of drama discussed in texts like Bharata's Natyashastra and Dhananjaya's Dasharupaka. Prahasana is a form of drama in which 'hasya rasa' predominates, its sole purpose being the creation of mirth in the theatre.

The dramatic category of prahasana is of popular origin and vogue. Unlike what happens in the other dramatic forms in Sanskrit, in prahasana the subject matter happens to be always the dramatist's invention and, therefore, there is considerable freedom for the writer.

Dasharupaka classifies prahasana into three types: 'shuddha' or the regular, 'vikrita' or modified and 'samkirna' or mixed. Shuddha prahasana is full of comic speeches and is performed with appropriate costume and language. It contains heretics, brahmins, or low characters like servants. The vikrita type is represented by eunuchs, ascetics and chamberlains. In samkirna, rogues dominate the scene. Prahasana deals with characters and situations of every kind, but violent actions and manners are avoided. Dasharupaka says that the laughter in prahasana is six-fold—it ranges from the gentle (smita) to uproarious laughter (atihasita).

Among the prahasanas in Sanskrit, Mahendravikramavarman's Mattavilasa and Bodhayana's Bhagavadajjukiya are the most popular. These two plays are included in the repertoire of Kutiyattam, the traditional Sanskrit theatre form of Kerala.

In Mattavilasa, the action takes place in Kanchi. It ridicules the degenerate religious practices of the time, including those of Buddhism. The Shaivite Kapalin and his wife hold the stage from the beginning to the end, and their absurd, drunken revelry constitutes the main action of the play. The Buddhist mendicant, Nagasena, on account of his greed for food, his weakness for women and desire for a voluptuous life, represents degenerate Buddhism. The language of the play is suited for humour. For example, the liquor-shop is compared to a sacrificial ground, and even minute details of the comparison are vividly brought out.

The title of the play Bhagavadajjukiya itself is suggestive of humour because of the curious juxtaposition of two characters with seemingly contradictory attributes 'bhagavan', meaning a saint, and 'ajjuka', a courtesan. The chief device employed by the dramatist is the interchange of souls between a courtesan and a saint, thereby evoking an extremely hilarious situation when the saint adopts the manners and language of the courtesan and the courtesan those of the saint. The sage's disciple named Shandilya, who has the characteristic of a typical vidushaka, is another source of humour, and these two strands are cleverly interwoven in the play. The Sutradhara announces the superiority of hasya rasa among the other rasas, and the vidushaka paradoxically announces the ignorance of the dramatic form of prahasana.

In prahasana there is a deliberate attempt to evoke laughter. The main device for producing laughter is in the juxtaposition of mutually contradictory elements so that the effect is comically startling. But though the prahasana is farcical at the superficial level, sometimes it has a deeper layer of meaning embedded in it, as may be seen from the two plays Mattavilasa and Bhagavadajjukiya. In Mattavilasa the drunken revelry of the Kapalin at a philosophical level corresponds to the self-absorbed dance of Lord Shiva, who is himself a spectator, and who dances seized of emotions and portraying the sentiments comprising the course of three worlds, by speech and dress, by action and feeling. Similarly in Bhagavadajjukiya also, through the medium of laughter, the author seems to probe into man's quests and innermost needs.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Prahasana is thus a dramatic form that appeals to all classes of people, both the highbrow and the lowbrow.

Su.G.

PRAHELIKA (Rajasthani) is a Sanskirt word, meaning a riddle, and its Rajasthani synonyms are paheli, hiyali, adi, gudh, etc., with a slight difference in the meaning of some. The basic thing about the genre is that it is so constituted as to keep the real meaning hidden, calling for patience and sharpness of intellect to unravel it. In medieval times it was a pastime with people of all age-groups to pose riddles. In some pahelies a bridegroom is tested for his presence of mind by the bride's family. The married couples also indulge themselves in this interesting game. In the compositions known as 'Guru-chela samvad' the teacher puts a string of questions, expecting his pupil to give one single answer to all of them. The 'paduttar' is also another such variety. The 'prahelikas' usually consist of a single line or a couplet, at best a full stanza running into several lines. During the thirties of the current century Ayodhyaprasad Sharma of Bikaner published 404 riddles, while Agarchand Nahata contributed some articles on the subject in Rajasthan bharati and Jain jyoti (1932). Manohar Sharma and S.S. Shekhawat also wrote articles, giving examples of pahelis. Love stories like Dhola Maru, Madhavanal, Kamkandala Sadayavatsa Savalinga also contain many interesting couplets as exercises in riddles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Agarchand Nahata, Prachin kavyon ki rup parampara.

K.S. Sh.

PRAHELIKA (Sanskrit). Etymologically the word 'Prahelika' stands for riddle, puzzle, enigma, conundrum, etc. Dandin, the famous rhetorician of the 7th century AD, dealt with it in detail in his Kavyadarsha. He sought to arrange the Prahelikas into sixteen categories which are as follows: samagata, vanchita, vyutkranta, pramushita, samanarupa, parusha, samkhyata, prakalpita, namantarita, nibhrita, samanashabda, sammudha, pariharika, ekachehhanna, ubhayachhanna and samkirna. However, according to Subhashitasamgraha, the riddles may be divided into twelve categories and twenty-three subcategories.

In Sanskrit literature, 'Prahelika' is a generic term for different varieties of riddles. Its derivative meaning is 'something that hides or covers up'. We come across other synonyms of prahelika in various authoritative treatises. The Amarakosha and Abhidhanachintamani of Hemachandra and the Kosha of Halayudha all speak of 'Pravahlika'; the latter, however, spells it in a slightly different way. Bhoja refers to it in his much-celebrated Shringaraprakasha (11th c.), though he includes it in the sub-genre of 'shravyakavyas'. He considers it to be a variety of champu and explains it with the help of a specimen of Chetaka, i.e. a mixed composition of prose and verse where prose is dominating. Thus it is a unique difinition because it stands apart from all other accepted meanings of 'Pravahlika'.

At any rate, the classical Sanskrit literary tradition referred to pravahlika only in its universally accepted sense of riddles. For instance, we may cite the Naishadhiyacharita of Sriharsha.

The commentary on Halayudha's Kosha mentions the following synonyms of prahelika: pravahlih, pravahli, prahelih and prashnaduti. We may also refer to the Trikandashesa and the Kalpadrumakosha, both of which regard 'prashnaduti' as a synonym of prahelika. We have many other synonyms of the word: pravahnih, pravahnika, gudham, gudhani, gudhaprashna, gudhavakyam, kutam, kutaprashnah, dushtakutam, antaralapa, vahiralapa, ashlatha, mohah, vyastata, vyamohah, vyakulata, vyagrata, bhatih, buddhidharmah, buddhibhrantih, shleshah, shleshoktih, sarbatobhadrah, hridyalika, vardhamanah, bhramah, bhrantih, etc.

The Vidagdhamukhamandana of Dharmadasa (10th c.) is acclaimed as the best collection of prahelikas composed mostly in Sanskrit and occasionally in different Prakrits. In this work we find seventy-one varieties of riddles. Moreover, the author gives us various theories of riddles and riddle-making along with suitable examples.

The prahelikas acquired great popularity in Sanskrit literature. Dandin discussed and categorized them elaborately, though Bhamaha made only a passing reference to the subject even though he agreed that the prahelikas possessed varied meanings and were no push-overs as literary compositions. It is noteworthy that Dandin and Rudrata considered the genre to be endowed with some intrinsic value, though they did not regard it as poetry of high order. What Rudrata says about the prahelikas, gudhas and prashnottaras has also been supported by Bhoja. They tell us that the prahelikas were useful in many ways: they helped in testing the ability of the poets; they provided entertainment at community gatherings and were used for contests among rival poets.

A similar view is expressed in the Jayamangala, the well-known commentary on the Kamasutra of Vatsyayana. The Prabandhachintamani also states that it was an important measuring scale for the poets, as they were required to prove their merit by solving prahelikas of different sorts. The Sarngadhara-paddhati too showered praise on those who were endowed with the ability of solving such riddles.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Sahitya-darpana of Vishvanatha, however, sounds a discordant note by observing that prahelikas are like humps on human body; they are worthless and ugly as well as opposed to poetic flavour (rasa). Likewise, Anandavardhana says in his Dhvanyaloka that no composition can claim to be a piece of poetry if 'rasa' is absent, and hence the prahelikas have no merit at all.

Anandavardhana and Vishvanatha cannot be blamed if they found little relevance of prahelikas in their scheme of poetics, but their distinctiveness was not entirely ignored either. They were mentioned in the treatises on rhetoric as a specific literary type. As each prahelika is composed as a detached verse, it may be regarded as constituting a sub-category of a 'muktaka' composition.

Of the various categories mentioned under the generic name of prahelika, a few deserve mention. According to Subhashitasamgraha, the first two categories are known as 'prahelikas' and 'apahnutayas', and they are the most important categories. These two connote riddles in general, puzzles and enigmas. The prahelikas abound in the Katha literature, some of which are easy to solve while others are relatively tough. In order to interpret them, one has to attain proficiency in mythology and other academic disciplines. On the other hand, the apahnutayas aim at befooling the readers by pretending to furnish them with apparently obvious answers while the actual solutions for them are different. In Kavyadarsha, such a category is known as 'nibhrita'. Many examples of apahnutayas are found in Subhashitasamgraha.

The kutanis (literally 'crooked, or 'trap') are next in importance to prahelikas and apahnutayas. The kutani riddles, as stated in Subhashitasamgraha, consist of various enigmas, conundrums, mathematical riddles, etc. They are very difficult to solve since they demand of a reader not only traditional scholarship and sound knowledge of mythology and grammar, but also wit and smartness. In Kavyadarsha, the kutani riddles are described as the 'samkirna' riddles. It may be noted here that the samkirna type is actually a composite category being a combination of three most complicated types of riddles, viz., the 'samanashabda' (which is construed from the particular usage of words furnishing another meaning), the 'prakalpita' (where the sense of words used hints at a different meaning) and the 'samanrupa' (which arises out of the metaphorical meaning of the component parts). Obviously, the solution to such samkirna or kutani type of composition is not possible without the help of a commentary. Perhaps, it was only natural for Mammata to declare such a composition as an instance of the obscure in his Kavyaprakasha.

Two other categories may also be mentioned here. Subhashitasamgraha describes them as 'gupta' and 'chyuta'; they arise out of the turn of words either by subtraction or addition of words or syllables or by changing the words owing to their different grammatical form or division of words. The gupta and chyuta types are further divided into sixteen and seven sub-categories respectively.

Here we may refer to two other simplified subdivisions of the prahelikas, e.g. 'arthi' and 'shabdi'. Two standard examples may be cited here.

(a) 'Tarunyalingitah kanthe nitambasthalam ashritah
Gurunam sannidhane' pi kah kujati muhurmuhuh

This is an example of arthi and the answer to the riddle is 'Isaduna-jalapurna-kumbhah'.

(b) 'Sadarimadhyapi na vairiyukta nitantaraktapyasitaiva nityam
Yathoktavadinyapi naiva duti ka nama kanteti nivedayashu'

The answer to this riddle is 'sarika', and it is an instance of 'shabdi'.

No literary genre blossoms in a vacuum. The prahelikas too must have originated on Indian soil as part and parcel of the oral tradition, while the new settlers were trying to come to terms with the endless puzzles of life. Both the Aryan and non-Aryan people must have invented oral riddles long before they shaped the alphabet. Their wonder and curiosity must also have inspired them to reshape the much older spoken forms to give vent to their enigmas and anxieties. As a result, at the dawn of Indian civilization, the primary forms of 'dark sayings' arose spontaneously as prahelikas along with folk-songs, proverbs, magic, rituals, etc. When this uninhibited outcome of oral tradition was sought to be recorded after a couple of centuries, the very act of writing it down could not but modify its form and content. Thereafter, many other literary riddles came into being which were deliberately crafted and woven around the written form.

The word 'pravahlika' is older than 'prahelika' of classical Sanskrit, because the former was used in the Aitareya Brahmana and the Kaushitaki Brahmana with reference to some hymns in the Atharva Veda. Besides, it can also be found in the Samkhayana shrauta sutra and the Brihaddevata. In the Atharva Veda it may be observed that pravahlika and 'Brahmodya' are identical. The pravahlikas are mostly theological or ritualistic; they constituted the essential part of various Vedic rituals, such as the Ashvamedha, Rajasuya, Vajapeya, Dasharatra, etc. Some metaphysical speculations were also embedded in those religious ceremonies and they were called brahmodyas (i.e. speculation about Supreme Knowledge). The commentators of the Atharva Veda describe these brahmodyas as pravahlikas. Such descriptions are also found in Aitareya Brahmana, Kaushitaki Brahmana, Gopatha Brahmana and Samkhayana shrauta sutra. Besides, the use of brahmodya is noticeable in the Shata- patha Brahmana, Katyayana shrauta sutra, Ashvalayana shrauta sutra, Kaushika sutra.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The 'Gathas' of the Avesta (Yasna 44) might have been the immediate predecessor of the Vedic pravahlikas where the religious content (along with cosmogonical and cosmological questions) is predominant. The aforesaid brahmodyas were usually pre-arranged by two priests, one of whom was the questioner while the other was the responder; these may be called a sort of theological quizzes. One may cite Vajasaneyi Samhita (23.2.10) as an example. Two other famous hymns, one each from the Rigveda (1,164) and the Atharva Veda (9.9), deserve special mention. It is also evident from the testimony of the Manava Dharmashastra that the religious and theosophical riddles (i.e. brahmodyas) remained a favourite recreation of the priests for a pretty long time.

In course of time the old socio-religious order changed and yielded place to new formulations. The religious overtones strongly associated with the process of riddle-making gradually faded, and ethical riddles became prominent in the epics, particularly in the Mahabharata. In the epics they were called 'vivada', 'prasha' and 'kuta', which were not far removed from the prahelikas of classical Sanskrit literature. However, they enjoyed more prominence in Buddhist literature, particularly in a number of Jatakas. There are also riddles comprising ethical and religious quests, which appear to have left an indelible mark on the later Sanskrit literature. Besides the famous Milindapanha, some portions of the Abhidharma and the Vinaya-pitaka offer excellent examples of the creative absorption of material from the little tradition into the fold of the Great Tradition.

The Jaina literature is also interspersed with different sorts of riddles; for example, Bhavadevasuri's Parshvanatha charita (13th c.) Rajashekhara's Antarakathasamgraha, Hemavijaya's Katharatnakara (17th c.).

In the realm of classical Sanskrit literature, the katha genre abounds in interesting prahelikas. We may refer to Kathasaritsagara, Vetalapanchavimshatika, Shukasaptati, Trishashti-salaka-purusha-charita, etc.

It has rightly been observed that the prahelikas, found abundantly in Sanskrit literature, undoubtedly prove the ingenuity of the Indian people and the wealth of Sanskrit folk literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dandin, Kavyadarsha; Dharmadasa, Vidagdhamukhamandana; Durga Bhagwat, The Riddle in Indian Life, Lore and Literature; Ludwik Sternback, Indian Riddles; Mark Bryant, Riddles; M.N.V. Panditaradhya, On Riddles.

Ta.B.

PRAHLAD (Nepali), a five-act play by Balkrishna Sama (1902-1981), is based on the story of Hiranyakashipu, the demon king, and his youngest son, Prahlad, described in the seventh part of the Srimadbhagavata-purana. The play was first published in 1938.

Prahlad is a tragicomedy written in imitation of the Sanskrit 'anushtup' metre. However, some characters occasionally converse in prose too. It depicts the ideological conflict between a father and his son.

Unlike his earlier play Dhruba, Prahlad has been adapted to suit the contemporary temper and made more realistic. In the preface to the first edition the dramatist tells us, "Instead of presenting it in the puranic context it has been written in the historical perspective." He clarifies the expression 'historical perspective' in the preface to its second edition (1949) in the following way: "It has been my attempt here to depict in this play the modern age of Hitler and Gandhi by presenting the old instance of the strong but merciless Hiranyakashipu and a feeble but kind Prahlad." The author projects Hiranyakashipu as a representative of the material world and Prahlad as that of the spiritual. The main thesis of this play is that science and metaphysics must be mutually complementary.

This play is written in the setting of Danabpur in Kashyapapuri Multan of Punjab. Danabpur is taken as the kingdom of Hiranyakashipu. The proud king seeks to become the all-powerful emperor of all the three worlds with the help of science. His two prominent scientists are Chakramurty and Hala. Chakramurty, the physicist, is busy inventing strange scientific instruments and Hala, the chemist, invents a potion the smoke of which can instantly eliminate life from the earth. The 'daitya' scientists ridicule the gods, who jeer at their inventions and claim that these could not be possible without the will of God. They further allege that the gods merely indulge in tall talks while the daityas are always busy in active labour. But even these daitya scientists, who have unlimited faith in science, cannot bring back to life the daitya commandant, Namuchi, who has been killed by the missile of Indra. Unlike Hiranyakashipu, who is an arrogant believer in science, Hala is aware of its limitations too. He realises that science is the knowledge of 'the nature of things' but it does not enable us to go against the same. This shatters Hiranyakashipu's dream of becoming the all-powerful emperor of the three worlds. When he realises that death is inevitable, he sets out to put an end to 'creation' itself, but Lord Brahma, the only god the daitya king respects, intervenes.

Hiranyakashipu sends his army to conquer Alakapuri, heaven, hell, and the kingdom of Varuna. After conquering them, he despatches his army to heaven. In fact, he wanted to go himself this time but stayed back to deal with Prahlad, his own son, whom he regards as 'the agent of the gods'. He first advises and then threatens his son, but when all his attempts to change Prahlad's mind fail, he declares, "For the safety of the body, I will surely cut off the finger spoilt by Vishnu's touch." Then he orders his son-in-law, Biprachitta, to take the boy away and slay him. Biprachitta is confused and consults his wife, Simhika, who rebukes him for his cowardice. But all attempts to destroy Prahlad fail. The daitya-king becomes more and more furious and orders that Prahlad be burnt alive. The order is carried out but without the desired result. Hiranayakashipu is now himself prepared to kill Prahlad who is tied to a pillar. The king draws his sword dipped in 'halahal' and orders others to go away. As he strikes, the pillar comes down crumbling on him.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The victory of Prahlad over Hiranyakashipu at the end of the play denotes the victory of faith over science. The playwright does not go on to show that the two are complementary. Even the conflict between Prahlad and Hiranyakashipu, which is the essence of the play, is essentially not a conflict between two personalities but between two opposing thoughts. And it is this which makes the play thought-oriented rather than story-oriented.

The play was translated into Hindi by Akshyoveshwari Pratap and Rameshwar 'Prem' and published by Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, in 1974.

Ga.

PRAJANANDA SWAMI (Bengali; b. 1907), a monk of the Ramakrishna Mission, was in early life a political activist working for the country's Independence. Well-versed in Sanskrit, he has a deep knowledge of the early and medieval texts on Indian music. His most famous book is A History of Indian Music for which he was awarded the Rabindra Puraskar in 1960. The book recounts the history of Indian music from the primitive period down to the twelfth century, and also deals with the growth and development of music in Bengal and in South India. In 1958 he won the Sisir Memorial Prize for his two-volume Bharatiya sangiter itihas. In 1963, he was appointed a Fellow of the Sangit Natak Akademy, New Delhi.

Pro. S.

PRAJNA-PARAMITA (Sanskrit-Prakrit) refers to those Buddhistic texts which deal with transcendental metaphysics or enlightenment. Extant in Sanskrit and Prakrit, they are available, apart from English, in a number of Central and South-east Asian languages, such as Chinese, Japanese, Tibetan, Korean, Mongolian. Written mainly in verse and later in prose as well, these philosophical texts are said to have been composed and compiled by many hands at different periods of time in the course of several centuries which saw the gradual growth of ideas and different recensions of texts due to additions, alterations and abridgements. Having originated in South or South-East India, these texts came gradually to be ensconced in West, North-West, North-East, and finally in Central and South-East Asia. The entire literature of these texts and translations is spread over a millennium or so since the beginning of the Christain era. The first Chinese translation of a prajna-paramita text is dated AD 179.

The metaphysics of the prajna-paramita texts has been explained by Nagarjuna from the Madhyamaka standpoint in the light of the Akshayamatipariprichchha of the Ratna-kuta class. The philosophy of such texts has been interpreted by Asanga, and following him his younger brother, Vasubandhu, also from the Yogachara viewpoint in the perspective of the Sandhinirmochana-sutra. But Kamalashila has embraced the Svatantrika standpoint in between the Madhyamaka and Yogachara views.

The name prajna-paramita is given to the highest of the six perfections in virtues, viz., Dana (charity), Shila (moral conduct), Kshanti (forgiveness), Virya (energy), Dhyana (meditation) and Prajna (wisdom), which have to be cultivated by a Bodhi-sattva, who is to be a saviour of all beings.

In the form of a prose dialogue of the Buddha with his disciple, Subhuti, or some Bodhi-sattva, the prajna-paramita ideal takes its stand on the Madhyamaka theory of Shunyata (ontological emptiness) and propounds Paramarthasatya (transcendental truth) as distinct from Samvriti-satya (empirical truth). The concept of the Absolute, which is known variously as Tathata (suchness), Tathagatatva and Dharma-kaya, is like that of the Mahasanghikas. This highest point is described differently as unsurpassable enlightenment, faultless Geist, constant, free from birth and death, and unpredicable (alakshana). The main aim is the re-union of the self with the Absolute in meditation. This mystic realization is extermely abstract and beyond the domains of conventional logic. In this view the external world of appearance is illusory like a dream and wihout any substance. All sorts of name and form are figments of imagination. All objects of thought in the phenomenal world are of a casually conditioned origination. Being variable subjective constructions, they cannot be called real.

Beside the concept of shunyata, there is also the concept of altruistic spirit of boundless compassion (karuna). An impartial Bodhi-sattva should not harbour any malice and hostility towards any being.

The prajna-paramita literature is composed in the typical Buddhistic Sanskrit diction. It is replete with apparently puzzling paradoxes. It is marked by a mass of monotonous repetitions of numerous synonyms, sentences and sets of stereotyped and lengthy phrases.

The literature, however, is important for the history of Buddhism in India and abroad. Containing the essence of Buddhism, it is hailed as the mother of all the Buddhas. A sacred prajna-paramita text is esteemed highly, and is studied and valued as a precious gift for the attainment of higher powers.

The original doctrine of prajna-paramita mysticism was embodied later in a mythologial figure. She was personified as a goddess for worship. There are statues of this deity in Bengal, Nepal, Tibet, China, Siam, Cambodia, Java and Sumatra. Fa-hien has referred to such images. There are also some paintings of the deity in Japan. The goddess is yellow or white in colour with one head (sometimes 11), with two or more than two arms. Her hands are in Dharma-chakra-mudra (teaching gesture), or are seen holding a lotus, and a sacred book or a rosary or a sword (for cutting ignorance) or a vajra (symbol of Shunyata) or a begging bowl.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F. Max Mueller, 'Buddhist Mahayan Sutras', Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XLIX (London, 1927); G. Tucci 'Asta-Sahasrika Prajna-paramita-pindartha', Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (London, 1947); M. Winternitz, A History of Indian Literature, Vol. II (Calcutta, 1933); N. Dutt (ed), Pancha-vimshati-sahsrika prajna-paramita (Calcutta Oriental Series, No. 288, London, 1934); P. Ghosha (ed), 'Chata Sahasrika Prajna-parimala', Bibliotheca Indica, I, 146-148 (Calcutta, 1902-1913).

B.B.

PRAKARANA (Sanskrit). The Sanskrit lexicons have recorded different meanings of the term 'prakarana', but we may take up for discussion only those which are relatively more prominent: (a) A section, chapter, or any smaller division of work, e.g., 'tasyayam prakaranadhikarana- samuddeshah' (Kautilya's Arthashastra); (b) An affair or matter or topic, e.g., 'Asminneva prakarane dhananjaya mudaradhih' (Mahabharata); (c) An introduction or prologue, e.g., 'Vayamapi prakaranamarabhamahe' (Pratijna-yaugandharayana); (d) A species of drama with invented or fictitious plot, e.g., Mrichchakatika, Malatimadhava, Pushpabhushita, etc.

Ancient Indian thinkers have explained and interpreted prakarana with consummate skill. Their penchant for subtlety, while assessing the importance of contextual factors that determine the exact meaning of an expression, sheds illuminating light on the history of Indian Semantics. It would seem that the ancient thinkers took care in considering the impact of non-verbal elements of the context of situation like socio-cultural perspective or background. The Brihaddevata, an early text belonging to the Shaunaka School, observes: 'Arthat prakaranat lingat auchityaddeshakalatah/mantreshvartha-vivekassyad itaresviti cha sthitih.' The meaning of a passage is to be determined by considering the purpose to be served (artha), the subject-matter under discussion (prakarana), indication from another place (linga), propriety (auchitya), place (desha) and time (kala). Bhartrihari quotes the same list in his Vakyapadiya with only a slight modification, that is by substituting vakya (syntactic relation) for linga: 'Vakyat prakaranat arthat auchityaddeshakalatah/shabdarthah prabibhajyante na rupadeva kevalat.' Thus Bhartrihari says that the meaning of an expression is determined not merely by its form but by the contextual factors also.

We may also refer to a relevant aphorism of the Mimamsa sutra: 'Shrutilingavakya-prakarana-sthana-samakhyanam samavaye paradaurbalyam arthabhiprakar-ashat'. It is evident that the Mimamsa school was also aware of the special significance of prakarana along with vakya, linga, artha, etc. According to the above-mentioned aphorism, the process of subordinating the details is hastened through six kinds of proof, viz., shruti (direct statement), linga (implication from another word), vakya (syntactic connection), prakarana (context of situation), sthana (position) and samakhya (etymological meaning). Of these six kinds each preceding proof is stronger than the succeeding one. Bhartrihari mentions another list of such contextual factors which determine the exact meaning of a word in case of ambiguous and equivocal expressions (Vakyapadiya). It is worthwhile to note here that this list has been taken up for detailed analysis by later grammarians like Nagesha (Laghumanjusha) and rhetoricians like Mammata (Kavyaprakasha), Vishvanatha (Sahityadarpana), Hemachandra (Kavyanushasana), Appayadikshita (Vrittivarttika) and Jagannatha (Rasagangadhara). Appayadikshita defined prakarana as 'vaktrishrotribuddhisthata' and illustrated the same with two examples, viz. (a) 'devo janati sarvam' (my lord knows everything) and (b) 'Saindhavamanaya' (Bring Saindhava). In the former instance, 'devo' may mean either god or king, while in the latter 'Saindhava' may mean either salt or horse, according to the particular context. Again, Patanjali emphasised the importance of 'artha' and 'prakarana' in determining the meaning of words (Mahabhashya). Kumarila Bhatta has also commented on the utility of prakarana.

In the realm of dramaturgy, however, the term 'prakarana' has a totally different connotation; there it is a sub-genre of drama. It has been defined and explained by various authorities of Sanskrit dramaturgy of whom Bharata, Abhinavagupta, Sharadatanaya, Trilochana, Kumbha and Vishvanatha are most prominent. Bharata says in the Natyashastra: 'Yatra kaviratmashaktya vastushariram cha nayakam chaiva/autpattikam prakurute prakaranamiti tadbudhairjneyam/ yadanarthamathaharyam kavyam prakarotyabhutagunayuktam/utpanna-bijavastu prakaranamiti tadapi vijneyam.' He goes on further to elaborate the features of the sub-genre. We are thus told that the story of the prakarana is invented by the dramatist, but it resembles the 'nataka' in other respects. The number of its acts varies from five to ten; however, it has a preference for the maximum of ten. Before we go into further details we may refer to Vishvanatha's definition in the Sahityadarpana: 'Bhavet prakarana vrittam laukikam kavikalpitam/Shringaro'ngi nayakastu vipro' matyo'-thavavanik/Sapayadharmakamarthaparo dhiraprashanta-kah.'

The story unfolded in the prakarana, being different from those evolved from tradition or history, allows enough scope and freedom to the playwright for freely displaying his imagination and skill of inventive power. The prakaranas that have come down to us through corridors of time deal with the chequered life-style of the luxurious and conceited sections of society as well as with the lives of private and lower strata of society. Thus the sub-genre of prakarana represents a contrastive dramatic profile vis-a-vis the sub-genre of 'nataka' in which the dramatis personae are practically confined to the upper stratum of society comprising the warrior princes of antiquity and other public figures. But the borderline between the sub-genres of nataka and prakarana is sometimes very thin because the definitions of a 'well-known' story and an 'invented' story tend to encroach upon each other. Moreover, it seems that a prakarana is also allowed to borrow a story from an earlier prakarana or a novel.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Natyadarpana has spoken of a scheme of seven degrees of inventiveness which would interestingly cover some natakas as well, for instance, when a well-known protagonist attains an invented objective. However, it can hardly be denied that all the dramatic plots are, in a way, invented by the creative genius of the dramatists since they are expected to fashion a new interpretation as well as add new incidents to them.

In course of time the sub-genre came to be neglected. The probable reasons for this neglect may be conjectured. When medieval India was largely concerned with meeting the challenge of the alien aggressors, writers felt the need of finding some psychological compensation; as a result, everything traditional and ancient was glorified. The sub-genre (i.e. prakarana), which did not hesitate to criticise social conventions and whose characters were less inhibited, could hardly be appreciated, therefore, by an audience largely consisting of the elite.

The prakarana, however, has enough scope for experimenting with the dramatic theories employed by a nataka. Both the sub-genres have generally the same kind of aesthetic experience, though the prakarana probably has greater infusion of the comic.

Here we may also take into account some of the relevant comments in the Natyashastra. Bharata says that there should not be a crowd of characters on the stage in the prakarana or in the nataka of a more restrained type; rather, the characters should be only four or five in number. It is noteworthy that Bharata divides dramas into two categories according to the manner of performance (prayoga), viz., the violent (aviddha) and the delicate (sukumara). In his opinion the nataka and prakarana belong to the delicate type along with the satirical monologue, street play and pathetic play. This type is more popular because of its intense human feelings. He writes further that the prakarana generates more popular apeal because it comes nearer real life and does away with the supernatural. Abhinavagupta too talks about the prakarana in his commentary: 'Prakhyatarajarshi-nishedhannatakat prakaranasya vailakshanyam/ Prakaranam prayaso lokavyavahara-drishtam divyacharitam alaukikamiti nishiddham'.

Ashvaghosha's (1st c AD) Shariputraprakarana, complete in nine acts, is the earliest known specimen of the sub-genre. Only some fragments of its manuscript have been discovered. Its close correspondence to the classical type as laid down in the Natyashastra is most remarkable. Shariputra, the Brahmin protagonist, corresponds to the requirements and is definitely of the noble and calm type. But we cannot ascertain whether the heroine was a lady or a hetaera and how far the plot was refashioned by invention. This is a point of departure from the later prakaranas. The Pratijnayaugandharayana of Bhasa (3rd c. AD) comes next; it is described in the prologue as a prakarana and has four acts. It follows the theoretical framework only partially, though its protagonist is a minister of king Udayana.

The Mrichchhakatika is decidedly the best work of the genre whose authorship is ascribed to Shudraka. Scholars sharply differ about his time, though it may be conjectured that he was a predecessor of Kalidasa.

We come across two other examples of prakarana whose authorship and date are however unknown, viz., Tarangadatta and Pushpabhushita (also known as Pushpadusitaka). Besides these, there are a few less known works, for example, Uddandanatha's Mallikamaruta (17th c.) in five acts, Ramachandra's Kaumudimitrananda (12th c.) in ten acts, Ramabhadra Muni's Prabuddharauhineya (12th c.) in six acts and Yashaschandra's Mudritakumudachandra (13th c.).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, The Sanskrit Drama (London, 1954); A.K. Warder, Indian Kavya Literature, Vol. I (Delhi, 1972); Bharata, Natyashastra (Banaras, 1929); K.K. Raja, Indian Theories of Meaning (Madras, 1975); M. Winternitz, A History of Indian Literature (Calcutta, 1927); Vishvanatha, Sahityadarpana (Delhi, 1956).

Ta.B.

PRAKARI (Sanskrit), a dramaturgical term, indicates an incidental element of the plot in a play. Derived from the root 'kr' (to do) with the prefix 'pra' (very much, well), the word etymologically means 'doing well'- and then 'an aid'. Most probably it was the name of a kind of song, but its details are not available (Yajnavalkyasmriti).

In dramaturgy, prakari means an episodical interlude inserted in a drama to explain what follows. This is one of the five 'arthaprakris', elements of plot (literally, natures of plot). The definition of prakari by Bharata (Natyashastra) is obscure. We understand from the definitions of Sagaranandin and Vishvanatha Kaviraja that prakari is an incidental (prasangika) element of plot in a play. Obviously, it does not extend up to the denouement. In this respect it differs from 'pataka', another element of the plot, since pataka goes with the main theme to a great extent. The end achieved by the element is not what was aimed at by the hero, but it serves as a means towards the fruition of his aim. A good example of prakari may be found in Act VI of Kalidasa's Abhijnanashakuntala (from the entry of the maid Chuturika up to the cry of Vidushaka in distress from 'nepathya').

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

S.M.

PRAKRITA-PAINGALA (Prakrit) is a prosodic composition. The writer is unknown. It is an important manual of Prakrit and Apabhramsha metres. It analyses mainly Prakrit metres in detail. The language of the text is Avahatta as referred to in the commentary but, in fact, it is a mixture of Apabhramshas. The verses are quoted as examples from many poetic works, though their time and period are different. According to Sunitikumar Chatterji, the book belongs to a time between AD 900 and AD 1400, while L.P. Tessitori assigns it to the 10th-12th century but probably near or about the twelfth. V.S. Agarwal considers it to be a work of the fourteenth century. The various illustrations in the book obviously show its composition at different periods. A number of commentaries were written on the text in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Pingalatika of Vishvanatha Panchanana, Pingalaprakasha of Bansidhara, and Pingalatattvaprakashika of Yadavendra give the original text also. In the commentaries the Avahatta language has been used abundantly.

Prakrita-paingala has the description and analysis of forty 'matrika' metres. The illustrations, which are quoted in the texts, have great importance since they show the dialectical forms of different periods, and are an important link between the Middle Indo-Aryan and the Modern Indo-Aryan language developments.

Further, there are many words in it which are similar to those in Khari boli in meaning and formation, e.g. jadda (cold), kichhu (some), gudia (doll), kotha (store-room), hetth (lower), koi (any), ajjau (to-day), patthara (stone), buddha (old man), chakki (flour mill), kaha (said), ikali (alone), ghau (wound), sahi (true), lakha (million), iggaraha (eleven), chaudhha (fourteen), chalish (forty), teraha (thirteen), bisa (twenty), atthaisa (twenty-eight), baraha (twelve), chaubisa (twenty-four), chhappana (fifty-six), chhaha (six), solaha (sixteen), tisa (thirty), battisa (thirty-two), bayalisa (forty-two).

Some scholars have suggested that Prakrita-paingala is a source of Sauraseni Avahatta, eastern Rajasthani, Braj and Khari boli. It represents not only eastern Hindi, but also western Hindi with reference to literary Apabhramsha. In Prakrita-paingala some old 'sup' and 'ting' formations have been preserved, and therefore, it may be said that the spoken forms used in illustrations are samples of the language as it developed between the eleventh and the fourteenth centuries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bholashankar Vyas (ed.), Prakrita-paingala (Varanasi, 1959); Chandramohan Ghosha(ed.), Prakrita-paingala (Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta, 1900-1902).

D.S.

PRANAMYA DEVATA (Maithili) is a collection of eleven short stories by Hari Mohan Jha. It appeared first in 1945 and has since been reprinted several times. In these stories the author has criticised those persons who are ironically called Pranamaya devata (The adorable gods). These characters have been described as creating awkward and ridiculous situations by their antiquated thoughts and actions. The stories reveal the conflicts and contradictions so common in those days of the changing Maithil society. The author has drawn his characters from varied walks of life, such as 'Vikat pahun', 'Gharjamay', 'Jyotishacharya', 'Panditji', and 'Kaviji'. He beats with the same stick both the obnoxous orthodoxy of the fundamentalists (pandits) and the ridiculous ultra-modernism of the English agents (Angarejia babus). The stories, thus, aim at reforming society without being didactic. The most attractive feature of this collection is the element of wit, as also humour, in which the author is unparalleled in Maithili literature. It is, perhaps, the first collection of short stories which heralded modernism in Maithili literature and society.

Mo.B.

PRASAD, JAI SHANKAR (Hindi; b. 1890, d. 1937) was an eminent Hindi poet and dramatist. Born in Varanasi in the rich family of Sunghani Sahu, known for its tobacco business, philanthropy, patronage of art and scholarship, 'Prasad' joined Queen's College, Banaras, but could not continue his studies because of the untimely death of his parents, heavy loss in business and family feuds. However, he studied at home and his unquenching thirst for knowledge, both ancient and modern, led him to a deep study of the classics, scriptures and philosophy.

Endowed with insight and genius which flowered in different creative directions, Prasad made an humble start. His first compositions in verse were in the form of 'samasya-purti'. Though a resident of Banaras, he chose Brajbhasha as a vehicle of expression and wrote under the pen-name of 'Kaladhar'. Most of his early writings were traditional in theme and craft, and were published in the monthly Indu which he himself later edited. His first work is Chitradhar, a collection of poems, short stories, plays and essays, followed by Kanan-kusam, Prem-pathik and Karunalaya (lyrical dramas). Then he turned to Khari boli and gave a new direction to Hindi poetry. The publication of Jharna (1918) augurs romantic poetry, and with it dawns the 'chhayavad-yug' in Hindi literature. These poems are marked by subjectivity, romantic imagination, intensity of emotion and lyricism. Ansu (1925) is the expression of the poet's personal grief transmuted to sublimity. Lahar (1933) is a collection of lyrics on love and nature, followed by powerful poems on historical themes in blank verse. His magnum opus, Kamayani (1935), has been conceived and planned on a grand design with a lofty theme. It depicts the psychic journey of man through time and space. The poet has given a new interpretation to the allegory. Here Manu is the primordial human mind perpetually in quest of peace. Prasad suggests that the goal can be achieved only through a synthesis of emotion (Shraddha) and intellect (Ida), faith and reality. An epic of enduring value, its theme is of universal relevance.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In his dramas we find Prasad to be a man of romantic temper with a rich cultural background. Most of the plays are historical but they present either the problems of our own society or delve deep into basic universal problems pertaining to human nature. If his Dhruvaswamini raises the problem of subjugation of woman and her right to divorce, other plays delineate the conflict between love and duty, personal ambition and larger interests of society and country. The heroes and heroines of these plays symbolize the spirit of sacrifice, valour, dedication to higher values, and patriotism. As all classics, they belong to the present age as also to all times.

Some critics have viewed Prasad's plays as 'closet dramas', having no relevance to stage. As a matter of fact Prasad rebelled against the commercial melodramas of the Parsi theatre and the vulgar language used in them. His dramas with certain alterations and adaptations can be and have been successfully staged. Of his twelve plays, Chandragupta, Skandgupta, Ajatshatru and Dhruvaswamini occupy a pride of place in the history of Hindi drama. Their language is richly poetic, laden with romantic imagery and picturesque expressions. Dhruvaswamini, however, approaches in a way the problem plays of Ibsen.

In contrast with his dramas, his two novels Kankal and Titli, and several collections of short stories are realistic in tone. His realism, however, is fundamentally different from the scientific naturalism of Zola, who studied man and woman as beings determined by the influences of their environment. Prasad, on the one hand, presents the structure of Indian society with all its weaknesses—exploitation of the weak, hypocrisy and sham, false idealism, etc. On the other, he advocates a composite outlook and a synthetic approach to the problems of man and society with positive moral postulates.

As a literary theorist too he shows a combination of romantic idealism and revolutionary reformism. A keen student of Western aesthetics, he has his own ideas about art, beauty and poetry. He looks upon poetry as an experience of the soul. Discussing the Indian approach to the problems of art, its nature, function and value, he tries to analyse both the normative and the descriptive questions. As a critic he was bold enough to refute Acharya Ramchandra Shukla's views on 'chhayavad' and 'rahayavad' in his book Kavya aur kala tatha anya bibandha. He asserted that the two streams were not an imitation of an alien and exotic movement, but had their roots in the soil. He tried to trace the stream of Indian philosophical thought and asserted that the manifestation of consciousness in the so-called inanimate world or the mystical perception of Reality in the universe is not an alien thought. It is purely Indian and can be traced to the Vedas, the Upanishads and the poetry of Siddhas and Mirabai. Another essay 'Yatharthvad aur chhayavad' also shows his profound insight and impassioned convictions.

Prasad was endowed with the rich creative genius of a trail-blazer. Disinterested in literary controversies, spurning the limelight of publicity, averse to both criticism and approbation, he devoted himself totally to the service of the muses. His contribution to Hindi literature is, indeed, monumental.

S.S.G.

PRASANNA-RAGHAVA (Sanskrit). After Bhavabhuti the quality of dramatic writing shows signs of steady decline. Drama loses its invigorating contact with both the life and the idiom of the masses, and the absence of inspiration is compensated by a thick crust of scholarship on the surface. The kavya-manner spreads on to drama. The old caution pronounced by Bharata that drama above all is a visually and plastically represented production is forgotten. It sprawls to enormous lengths, and the dramatists take pride in the bulk of their production as also in the preponderance of the lyrical element. This decadent phase of Sanskrit drama is, however, fortunate in having a number of plays based on the Ramayana story. Of such plays, the works that deserve special mention are Anargha-Raghava of Murari, Bala-Ramayana of Rajashekhara and Prasanna-Raghava of Jayadeva.

This sign of decline is obvious in Prasanna-Raghava, a drama in seven Acts, in which the logician Jayadeva of the 13th century, son of Mahadeva and Sumitra of Kundina in Berar, endeavours to tell again the story of Rama. Jayadeva makes certain changes, but the new incidents which he incorporates mar the beauty of the dramatic composition. In Act I a disciple of Yajnavalkya appears and reports certain incidents: Bana, the Asura, is to rival Ravana for the hand of Sita. Two bards appear to describe the suitors, but they are insulted by a rough character, who turns out to be Ravana with his ten heads. Bana appears, tries in vain to bend the bow, insults Ravana and retires. In Act II there is a peculiar scene in which Rama watches Sita and her friend and there is a shy whisper of love. In Act III Vishvamitra bids Rama to bend the bow of Lord Shiva. The bow is broken, there is a great rejoicing, and the marriage is celebrated. Act IV depicts the arrival of angry Parashurama and his fight with Rama. Rama wins but falls at the feet of his rival and asks for his blessings. In Act V the rivers Yamuna, Ganga, Sarayu, Godavari and Tungabhadra along with the Sagar (ocean) appear as characters and report the abduction of Sita, the death of Jatayu, the falling of Sita's jewels, the slaying of Valin by Rama and his alliance with Sugriva and Hanuman. Act VI presents Rama driven to madness by sorrow. Two Vidyadharas by their magic art show him the events in Lanka. Sita's love is tested. It is known that in spite of repeated persuasions, Sita rejects Ravana. When Ravana wants to kill her with a sword, Hanuman suddenly appears and obstructs the motion of the sword. Sita is desperate and tries to burn herself on a funeral pyre, but the coal is changed to pearl, and Hanuman consoles her with the news of Rama's fidelity. Act VII describes the invasion of the city of Lanka and the fierce fight, and the final departure of Rama, Sita, Lakshmana and others by the aerial car to Ayodhya.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The preponderance of the lyrical element in the play is clear. In the last Act, Rama, Sita and Lakshmana along with other characters assemble for a poetry contest, and each describes in turn the beauty of the setting sun, the charming places passed by during the aerial flight, and the rise of the sun at day-break. Apart from the lyrical element, the supernatural too intrudes upon the play.

Being born in an age of decadence, Jayadeva was not able to demonstrate his dramatic talents to the full, but his Prasanna-Raghava is certainly one of the best of the Rama plays that cropped up in imitation of the Ramayana story.

R.M.

PRASHANT, DHARAMCHAND (Dogri; b. 1915) was born in Jammu, and is a graduate of the Punjab University. He has been associated with the Dogri literary movement from its very inception, having been one of the founder members of the Dogri Sanstha, the representative organ of this movement, and also its President and General Secretary. He has also been associated with the Sanstha's quarterly magazine, Nami chetana. Besides Dogri, he has been active in other organisations like the Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Jammu, working for Hindi.

His contribution to Dogri literature includes two collections of short stories, some stray articles and one-act plays, and a collection of research papers published by the Dogri Research Institute, Jammu. Deva ka janam (1966) has the distinction of being the first published Dogri play. It was first published in Nami chetana in 1935 and is based on a puranic theme. The title of his second play is Gulab Singh, published in 1977. The two collections of his short stories are entitled Uchiyan dharan (1964) and Gajre (1969). The stories included in the collections are based on romantic events and suspense, woven carefully with strands drawn from legend, fancy and semi-historical data. Prashant edited a literary journal, Rekha, which was started in 1963 and had a short life. However, it played an important role in enriching Dogri prose and literary criticism. Three instalments of Prashant's novel Rukmini (1977), which first appeared in this journal, were very well received and evoked a lot of interest in its central character, a young widow. After the closure of the journal, the novel was completed and published subsequently.

Prashant was a member of the Sahitya Akademi's Advisory Board for Dogri from 1983 to 1987, and edited an anthology of Dogri short stories for the Akademi.

Ram. S.

PRASHASTAPADA (Sanskrit), variously known as Prashastadeva, Prashastacharya, Prashastamati, Prashastakara, is one of the earliest commentators of Kanadasutra, also called Vaisheshikasutra. Prashastapada's commentary is called Padartha-dharmasamgraha, also known as Prashastapada-bhashya. Though there were commentaries earlier than those by Prashastapada and a few immediately following him, Prashastapadabhashya is the earliest commentary available to us at present. The earlier commentaries like Ravana-bhashya and Bharadvaja-vritti have been lost.

This system of philosophy is called Vaisheshika-darshana because it insists on vishesha or particularity—that the imperceptible souls and atoms are the basic source of the world. It is a philosophy of realism and pluralism. In other words, the world is not conceptual but real, and the ultimate reality is not one but many which exist in the form of atom.

The system seems to be of much greater antiquity than Nyaya. It, perhaps, preceded Buddhism and Jainism. Kanada, known as Kanabhuka and Akshapada also, gave the thought a systematic exposition in about 3rd century BC. This is known as Kanadasutra which was commented upon, as mentioned above, by a few scholars before Prashastapada. We do not know their views. The commentary by Prashastapada is the only work extant which explains the fundamental doctrines of the system by introducing many new concepts.

Prashastapada's bhashya is not so much a commentary on Kanadasutra as an important independent work. As an eminent scholar has observed: "Almost all the peculiar doctrines that distinguished the later Vaisheshikas from the Naiyayikas and other schools are to be found in Prashastapada's work, and are conspicuously absent in Kanadasutra. The doctrines about 'dvitva', 'pakajotpatti', 'vibhagaja-vibhaga' and several others, which are regarded as peculiarities of Vaisheshika system are not even touched upon in Kanada's aphorism, although they are pretty fairly discussed in Prashastapada's bhashya."

Evidently Prashastapada, as a follower of the Vaisheshika system of philosophy, was obliged to put the system on an unassailable plane, secure from attacks by Buddhist logicians. He also wanted to maintain its basic doctrine distinguishable from that of other systems. There was a time-gap of nearly seven hundred years, if not more, between Kanada's exposition and Prashastapada's 'bhashya' of the doctrine. He came after the famous Buddhist logician Dinnaga (4th c. AD) and Vatsyayana, the commentator on Gautam's sutra, whose work is known as Vatsyayana-bhashya (2nd c. AD). He, however, preceded the Buddhist logicians Paramartha (AD 499-569) and Dharmapala (AD 539-70) who refuted certain views of Prashastapada. Thus Prashastapada may be placed in the late fourth century. During this intervening period many new doctrines were propounded with logic and vigour by different schools, and Prashastapada took notice of all that he refuted. Thus it was Prashastapada who put the Vaisheshika system of philosophy on a formidable ground.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Prashastapada admits six categories (padartha), such as substance (dravya), quality (guna), action (karma), the universal or generic (samanya), the particular (vishesha), and inherence (samavaya). His account of twenty-four qualities, the theory of the creation and destruction of the world, the statement of fallacies and the nature of inference are distinct addition to Kanada's work.

Prashastapada, while trying to give a coherent account of the creation and destruction of the world, says that the external world is objectively real and also ultimately real. It is real not because we conceive objects. Objects are there and they are the products of a complex structure comprising their immediate parts. And when matter is divided into parts and the process is continued, it ultimately comes to a final stop. At this stage the ultimate particle of matter, called 'paramanu' (atom), remains, which is not further divisible and cannot be pierced through. These are many in number and they vary in their intrinsic quality.

In the process of the creation of the world it is held that two atoms combine and produce a dyad (dyanuka), and when three such dyanukas combine the first grossness is produced. While the atom is imperceptible, the gross element produced by the combination of atoms is perceptible. Here Prashastapada enunciated the theory of 'avayava' (part) and 'avayavin' (whole) and their being related through the relation of inherence. The new entity produced by the combination of parts is not a conglomeration of them, but a completely new thing that has emerged out of the parts. This doctrine upheld by Prashastapada has been severely criticised by the Buddhist logicians. Prashastapada refuted all the arguments of the earlier Buddhist logicians like Dinnaga and others. However, nowhere it is stated why two atoms combine and why the next combination is of three dyads and not of two. Such questions are left unanswered.

In short, Prashastapadabhashya systematised precisely the Vaisheshika doctrines; this bhashya seems to be the first pure Vaisheshika work after the Vaisheshika-sutra. All the subsequent works on the system have been influenced by the Nyaya system, and around the tenth century the two systems were integrated into one.

109217

B.S.

PRASHNOPANISHAD (Sanskrit). Though Prashnopanishad is evidently a later Upanishad, it is, unlike other Upanishads, a preconceived systematic unit of philosophy and belongs to the Atharva Veda. Each of the six sages who go to Pippalada to seek wisdom asks him a question. The order of their questions is such that a system of philosophy is educed from it. Pippalada's is a synthetic form of philosophy developed out of the six psycho-metaphysical questions put to him by the six seers, namely Sukesha Bharadvaja, Shaibya Satyakama, Sauryayani Gargya, Kaushalya Ashvalayana, Bhargava Vaidarbhi and Kabandhi Katyayana. According to the instructions of the teacher, they lived a life of penance, celibacy and faith for one year.

Kabandhi Katyayana approached the teacher and asked: "How, revered sir, is this 'praja' produced?". The teacher answered: "The Creator cherished a desire for praja and practised penance and produced a couple of 'rayi' and 'prana' so that they could produce different varieties of praja. All the movements of the perceptible existence are under the control of the Time-wheel. But the human soul yearns to go beyond this wheel. Those who live a life of penance, celibacy and faith can go beyond the Time-wheel."

Bhargava Vaidarbhi asked the second question: "What powers sustain the human body? Which of them illumines the body, and which is the superior?" Pippalada answered, "Prana is the controller of all things in the three worlds."

Kaushalya asked the third question, "From what is the prana produced? How does it enter the body, and how does it stay there and pervade?" Pippalada answered, "Prana is produced from the Atman. As the shadow accompanies the body, prana accompanies the Atman. It enters the body because of the 'purvakarma' performed by the mind."

Sauryayani Gargya asked the fourth question: "Revered sir, which of the sense organs sleeps in the body? Which remains awake? Which god sees the dreams? Who experiences happiness?"

The teacher said: "At the time of sleep all sense organs merge in the superior organ (mind) with their objects. This state is called 'sushupti'. The five vital airs remain awake. It is the mind which sees the dreams. As the birds perch together on the sheltering tree, so do all the five gross and subtle elements and their objects merge in the Atman and rest themselves." The ordinary man cannot pass beyond the three states of 'jagrat', 'svapna' and 'sushupti'. One who goes beyond these states knows the Atman.

Shaibya Satyakama asked the fifth question: "Revered sir, what world is attained by a person who meditates on 'pranava' till death?" The teacher answered: "The Pranavabrahman is both 'para' and 'apara'. The meditator goes to the Brahman he meditates upon. One who meditates on the 'Omkara' of three syllables gets his heart stabilised, secures knowledge and goes to the Brahmaloka." What Pippalada wants to emphasise here is that 'a', 'u' and 'ma' are the three 'matras' and are symbolic of the perceptible world, the psychical world, and the 'hiranyagarbha' respectively. Those who meditate on them separately cannot achieve permanent bliss. But he who meditates on them together becomes 'Atmajna'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The last question was asked by Sukesha Bharadvaja: "Where does the 'purusha' comprising sixteen 'kalas' stay?" Pippalada answered: "This purusha stays inside the human body. The sixteen kalas tend to merge in him." It can be explained as follows: The spiritual power which causes all movements and activities in human life is also instrumental and causal to all universal dealings. One who can experience the identity of the two is Atmajnanin. One must meditate, therefore, on that 'Atmashakti' and get liberated.

The concepts of 'rayi' and 'prana' are further elucidated by Pippalada in answering the question of Kabandhi Katyayana: "Where from do these lives come into being?" The teacher says: "Aditya' is prana and 'Chandramah' is rayi. 'Shuklapaksha' is prana and 'Krishna paksha' is rayi. 'Ahar' is prana and 'Ratri' is rayi. In conclusion it can be said that 'anna' is Prajapati, and all the praja is born of him. Those who observe this 'Prajapativrata' with penance, celibacy and truth, and are free from deceit, falsehood and treachery, can achieve the 'Brahmaloka'."

In answer to the second question of Bhargava Vaidarbhi, Pippalada emphasises the importance of the 'Varishtha Prana': "As the bees fly and follow closely their flying king, the sense organs and the mind follow closely the varishtha prana."

In reply to the third question the teacher says: "As the emperor appoints the various officials to different posts, the chief prana appoints the other pranas to different posts in the body."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mahadevashastri Joshi, Bharatiya sanskriti kosha; R.D. Ranade, Constructive Survey of Upanisadic Philosophy; R.N. Dandekar, Insights into Hinduism; S.V. Ketkar, Marathi jnanakosha.

V.G.R.

PRASTAVANA (Sanskrit) is a technical term associated with Sanskrit dramaturgy. According to standard lexicons, it ordinarily means beginning, commencement, preface, introduction, exordium, praise or sounding forth (e.g. 'Prastavan iyam kapatanatakasya' or 'Arya valacharita prastavana dindimah). It is an introductory dialogue (prologue or prelude) at the beginning of a drama between the stagemanager and one of the actors. It gives an account of the dramatist, including a general assessment of his merits, and then introduces the spectators to the principal incidents of the drama. This is also known as 'Amukha'.

Vishvanatha says in Sahityadarpana: "Nati vidushako ba, pi pariparshvika eva va/Sutradharena sahitah samlapam yatra kurvate chitrairvakyaih svakaryotthaih prastutakshepibhirmithah/Amukham tattu vijneyam namna prastavana'pi sa."

Bharata's Natyashastra had earlier prescribed an elaborate series of preliminary formalities to be performed before the commencement of the actual drama (Purvaranga). After the observance of Nandi (benediction) at a pre-determined moment, the sutradhara (stage-manager) recites two verses consecutively, to be followed by a 'trigata' (discussion). Immediately afterwards, the content of the drama is announced and the sutradhara leaves the stage along with two attendants. It marks the end of a phase. According to Natyashastra, this is the ideal moment for the 'Sthapaka' or introducer to enter the stage and introduce the play to the spectators. He resembles the sutradhara in appearance and qualities, and it is expected that the nature of the drama would be indicated by his costume. Actually the sthapaka opens the prologue of the play in giving to the spectators the name of the author and the title of the play with the description of the season. Immediately before his entrance had been greeted by an appropriate song, he dances, utters praises and puts the spectators in good humour with verses alluding to the theme of the play. This process of declaration is known as prastavana or amukha or sthapana of a play. However, it may be noted that one could differentiate even between prastavana and sthapana (Rasarnavasudhakava).

The essential feature of the prologue is said to be an address by the stage manager in directly hinting at the contents of the play to an attendant actress or jester. There are five rhetorical devices by which the prologue leads on to the play itself, though Bharata and Dhananjaya speak of only three; (a) The 'Kathodghata' makes a character enter from behind the curtain and apply the words of the stage-manager (or producer or director) to himself; (b) The 'Pravarittaka' shows the stage-manager (or producer or director) mention some appropriate action in the play with reference to a character, and presently the character enters; (c) 'Prayogatishaya' is the moment when the stage-manager introduces a character announcing simply his approach. Vishvanatha, however, treats this device as an instance of 'avalagita' which leads to the play with parallelism (or continuance) of action between the stage-manager and the character.

Another device called 'Udghatyaka' has also been recognised when the words of the stage-manager are overheard and misunderstood by a character and the latter feels provoked and enters the stage at once to act accordingly. Vishvanatha calls it an abrupt dialogue and accepts it as a means leading to the play proper. For example, in Mudrarakshasa, the stage-manager alludes to the Demon of Eclipse (Rahu) as eager to vanquish Chandra (moon). Just at that moment Chanakya calls out from the greenroom, connecting Chandra to Chandragupta Maurya.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It seems that the formalism related to the prologues in the Sanskrit dramas evolved through a slow but continuous process aiming at conciseness. That is why the elaborate procedure of introducing a play was gradually felt to be irrelevant and unnecessary; hence the 'prastavana' of an earlier drama is somewhat more circumlocutive than that of the later ones. It is quite significant that Dasharupaka and Sahityadarpana do not give detailed accounts of the preliminaries immediately preceding the prelude. On the other hand, Natyashastra indicates that though there is a complete and elaborate form of purvaranga, there may also have been both abbreviated and extended forms with additional ceremonial details. One cannot but note the possibility of an obvious overlapping between the purvaranga and the remaining part of the ceremony which includes the prologue, because the last element of the purvaranga known as 'prarochana' is fashioned for informing the spectators of the content of the play which essentially belongs to the prologue proper. Bhasa's dramas mark the departure from such norms as the name of the author of the drama is not mentioned in the prologue. It may be assumed that the practice of transferring the substance of the 'prarochana' from the purvaranga started after Bhasa's time, perhaps because he knew that it was only a renewal of convention and no integral part of his play. But as Sanskrit drama got progressively conventionalised, the borderline between creativity and craftsmanship became faint and the element of the preliminaries was gradually absorbed in the dramatist's own work.

Vishvanatha tells us significantly that the preliminary details were always not properly performed in his time; besides, the stage manager performed the whole of the work theoretically assigned to him and the sthapaka. It is evident that the sthapaka was eclipsed by the sutradhara and consequently the role of the former was usurped by the latter. It is, however, difficult to say as to when the process exactly started. We can only say that the sthapaka is found in various connections in Prahladana's Parthaparakrama, and Vatsaraja's Kiratarjuniya, Rukminiharana, and Samudramanthana. But Rasarnavasudhakara ignores him, and Shivarama's commentary on Nagananda shows that great doubts existed at that time regarding both the preliminaries and the role of the sutradhara and sthapaka. However, Rajashekhara's Karpurmanjari and Madhava's Subhadraharana mention only the sutradhara. Pischel suggested that Bhasa was responsible for banishing the sthapaka, since Bana referred to the fact that his dramas were introduced by the sutradhara. Dasharupaka expressly advises the activities of the sthapaka but goes on to call him sutradhara as it has of course been agreed that he is to have the attributes of the sutradhara so that the use of the title is justified.

Thus the evolution of the conception of 'prastavana' and the elementary details related to it is quite interesting. Bhasa's art has unquestionably primitive traits as in his dramas the prologue is described as sthapana and not as prastavana. It is exceptionally simple: after a Nandi (which is not preserved) is pronounced, probably in the greenroom, the stage manager enters and delivers a benediction. Immediately after that he prepares to make an announcement but is interrupted by a sound that eventually leads to the actual drama. We have already noted that the name of the dramatist or of the title of his play does not feature in the prologue which seems to have been already included in the preliminaries performed in the greenroom beyond the eyes of the spectators. In the works of Kalidasa, however, the first verse is Nandi, and immediately afterwards the sutradhara begins the play with a dialogue. The prologue of Mrichchhakatika shows Shudraka's innovative departure from the established dramatic tradition as the stage manager switches over from Sanskrit to Prakrit. In its immediate source of inspiration, as in the Charudatta of Bhasa, however, the stagemanager speaks only in Prakrit, since he has to play the role of the Vidushaka.

Harsha wrote his dramas in the true copybook fashion, and his Ratnavali has found particular favour with the authors of dramaturgy. Mahendravikramavarman, almost his contemporary, wrote Mattavilasa, a prahasana, and followed Bhasa's dramatic technique to a considerable extent. Hence the play is introduced by the stage manager at the close of Nandi (which is not preserved), and the prologue is called sthapana and not the usual prastavana. But there is an important point of difference from Bhasa, for Mahendravikramavarman has taken great care in the prologue to elaborate the merits of the author and of the title of the play.

In the eighth century Bhavabhuti confined himself to the established dramatic legacy in composing his three dramas. Vishakhadatta's Mudrarakshasa also does not show any inclination towards novelty. The same may be said about Bhattanarayana's Venisamhara, Murari's Anargharaghava, Kshemishvara's Chandakaushika, Krishnamishra's Prabodhachandrodaya, and Jayadeva's Prasannaraghava, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, The Sanskrit Drama (Calcutta, 1954); A.K. Warder, Indian Kavya Literature, Vol. I, (Delhi, 1972); Bharata; Natyashastra; Dhananjaya, Dasharupaka.

Ta. B.

PRATAPA REDDI, SURAVARAMU (Telugu; b. 1896, d. 1955). Born in an upper middle class family in Gadwal State, formerly a princely domain of Hyderabad (De-ccan), Reddy spent his boyhood in a rural setting. He studied at Hyderabad and Madras. He also studied Sanskrit and thereby came into contact with Indian poetics, grammar and classical literature. While he was still a student, he wrote the play Uchchhala vishadam (The sorrow of Uchchhala, 1916).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Pratapa Reddi read the western tragedians in general and Bhasa, the Sanskrit dramatist, in particular and under these influences, he was inspired to write plays and develop new techniques in drama. His next play Tukaramu (1923) is in five acts. Both the plays are appealing because of their characterization, music, racy prose and simple stage techinques. They became very popular and were staged several times.

Pratapa Reddi obtained his law degree in 1924 and practised as advocate in Hyderabad for over eight years. He learnt a few more languages, including Persian. His house became a centre of cultural activity. Those were the days when winds of change swept the country. Pratapa Reddi started Golkonda patrika, a bi-weekly magazine, to give vent to people's grievances. After some time it became a daily, and Pratapa Reddi with his fearless editorials, inspired the people to rise and assert themselves. After his retirement he settled down at Itikalapadu, a hamlet, and concentrated on research.

Though he was elected in 1948 to the State Legislative Assembly, his heart was in literature and he did not evince much interest in politics. He wrote stories, literary essays, plays, poetry, research articles and fables more than three hundred in number. Andhrula sanghika charitra (The social history of Andhras, 1929-49), Hinduvula pandagalu (Hindu festivals, 1931), Haindava dharma virulu (Heroes of Hindu virtue, 1940), Ramayana visheshalu (The highlights of Ramayana, 1942), Prajadhikaramulu (Powers of people, 1947), Yuvajana vijnanamu (Knowledge for the youth, 1950) and Mogalayi kathalu (Stories of the Mughals, 1952) are worthy of special mention.

In his writing, Pratapa Reddi was objective in approach and informative in content. He wrote in his preface to Andhrula sanghika charitra that it was not difficult to write the history of kings and their kingdom, but it is very difficult to attempt writing social history, because it will have few props. In poems like 'Pranayini' (The love, 1926) his romantic imagination reached a new height. In his plays his stagecraft went closer to the masses. His character delineation is powerful owing to his penetrating study of human nature. In his essays logic dominates the narrative pattern. He was, indeed, a force in early Telengana Renaissance.

S.M.K.

PRATAPARUDRIYAMU (Telugu) is a historical play written by Vedam Venkataraya Sastry, one of the early stalwarts responsible for providing an indigenous base to modern Telugu drama. Written in 1897, the main incident of the play is based on a historical event in the life of Prataparudra II of Orugallu who was caught and imprisoned by Muslim soldiers and released, as secretively as he was caught, by his Prime Minister, Yugandhara. The play's strength is not so much in its historicity as in Vedam's exceedingly convicing portrayal of characters and his mastery of delicate humour, both situational and verbal.

The play, originally intended for a two-night performance, has a complex structure. King Prataparudra Deva of Orugallu was imprisoned by Vali Khan, the Chief Commander of the Delhi Sultanate, who, pretending to have come to this land to seek the king's help in thwarting the designs of Afghan rulers, captured the king at a time when the Prime Minister, Yugandhara, was on a pilgrimage to Rameshwaram. When the Muslim soldiers were crossing the Godavari with the captured king, Vidyanatha, an aesthetician-poet saw the ship, suspected some danger, and pretending that he was drowning, sought the help of the people in the ship. When saved, he identified the king and went away with a message to the Prime Minister. He later informed Yugandhara of the king's captivity and the way he was taken to Delhi. The rest of the play deals with Yugandhara's attempts to get the king released in the guise of a mad man. Yugandhara moved freely in the streets of Delhi, pretending to be insane, all the time trying to imprison the Sultan and release his king. Finally, the Sultan, who was fond of diamonds, was lured into a ship to buy them from businessmen. He took along with him the imprisoned king, requesting him to make the proper selection of diamonds. When all of them were aboard, the ship started with the Sultan caught unawares as captive.

Two other aspects of the play serve as minor sub-plots. One is the rivalry between Vali Khan and his subordinate army officer, Khusru, in competing with each other to come closer to the Sultan and outweigh the other in intrigue. The second episode is the amusing court scene where Perigadu, the king's washerman, who resembles the king, was tentatively put on the throne to give a facade that the king was not captured by the Muslims. Finally, the king was restored to his country and the throne by the wise moves of Yugandhara, who was properly rewarded at the end of the play.

The play follows the traditional Sanskrit rules of composition, with the 'nati' and the 'sutradhara' initiating the action after a short discussion on the merits of the author and the play. The play is a 'nataka' in the traditional meaning of the term, with the acts, each act again divided into 'sthalas' (places). The characters are drawn with great dexterity; Prataparudra's nobility and his unwavering nature even against excruciating circumstances, Yugandhara's wise counsel and firm devotion to his duty and his king, and his different guises, risking his own life in order to get the release of his king, the royal women, delicate yet firm, the foolish washerman attached to his wife, their romance and his amusing prattle when he is guised as a king—all these are described in the true native spirit and with a perfect blending of the ideal and the real.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Though critics have found fault with the author for a fanciful creation of history in the play, it rightfully brings out the spirit of a historic past and through it a sense of nationalism. An important aspect of the play is the use of the speech-rhythms which exploit almost all the variations found in Telugu dialects.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Rajeswara Sarma, 'Sri Sastry gari rupaka samalochanamu' in Sravanti (July, 1959); D.V. Avadhani, 'Vedam Venkataraya Sastry' in Andhra nataka kartalu (1957); P.S.R. Appa Rao, Telugu nataka vikasamu (Hyderabad, 1969); V.V. Sastry, Sri Vedam Venkataraya Sastry gari jivita charitramu (Madras, 1949).

M.N.S.

PRATIBHA (Sanskrit) is 'Imagination' or 'creative faculty' belonging to the artist, which lies behind the genesis of poetic art. It represents the first and foremost equipment necessary for the poet; without it poetry is not produced at all, and if produced per force makes the creation an object of ridicule. Most of the writers on Sanskrit poetics lay down that apart from pratibha, the other two factors necessary for the creation of poetry are culture (vyutpatti) and constant practice (abhyasa) under the guidance of literary artists and critics. Thus Dandin says: "Natural creative faculty, shining scholarship and hard practice, these three conjointly go to constitute the causal factor of poetic creation." (Kavyadarsha). Bhamaha maintains: "Poetry emanates from the pen of an artist, gifted with strong creative faculty; it is necessary for him to comprehend the nature of expression and content and to get himself acquainted with compositions of master artists." (Kavyalamkara). Rudrata also proclaims that the three equipments of the literary artist are represented by creative faculty, culture and repeated practice (Kavyalamkara). Mammata too holds this view and asserts that imagination and culture springing from an acquaintance with the ways of the world and the creations of master artists, and constant practice under the guidance of experts in the art of poetry constitute together the cause of poetry (Kavyaprakasha).

In the domain of Sanskrit poetics there are some critics who consider pratibha or imagination as the sole factor necessary for the creation of poetry. One such critic is the great Rajashekhara, who affirms that pratibha represents the only equipment necessary for the literary artist. Voicing the same opinion, Vagbhata in his Alamkarashastra says that pratibha is the sole cause of poetry, and that culture and constant practice go only to sharpen the creative faculty of the poet, who is required to find suitable words and meanings in his endeavour to write poetry. In his Rasagangadhara Jagannatha supports the views of Mammata in regard to the cause of poetry, and affirms that poetic art is brought into life through creative faculty belonging to the artist, and that while some, inducted by the blessings of God and great men, are born with the ceative faculty, in others it is infused through culture and constant practice.

Sanskrit poetics takes great care to dilate the nature of poetry and determine its role in the creation of poetic art. Bhattatauta in his Kavyakautuka describes pratibha as the faculty which presents ever-new coruscations of ideas and enables the poet to express them in artistic shapes and forms. Pratibha is that power whereby the poet sees the subject of his poem as steeped in beauty and gives his readers in apt language a vivid picture of the beauty he has seen. It is a power whereby the poet not only calls up in his reader's heart and mind the impressions of faded experiences, but whereby he presents also new, wonderful and charming combinations and relations of things never before experienced or conceived by ordinary men. In describing this faculty Abhinavagupta says that it enables the poet, when overpowered with emotion, to create splendidly charming paintings in the language of poetry. This faculty, it is asserted, enables him to create new images, which are in a position to retain their freshness even for the time to come.

Bhattatauta is of the opinion that the creative faculty has two gifts for the artist: it enables him first to discover new meanings in old ideas and locate ever-fresh and charming truths; secondly, it presents suitable words and meanings, diction and figures necessary for composing appropriate poems competent to give expression to the enchanting flash of truth. Jagannatha emphasises the second gift, and asserts that pratibha offers words and meanings suitable for presenting paintings in verse, competent to give expression to the intensity of his feeling. The most well-known definition of pratibha is that given by Bhattatauta: Pratibha is a faculty which enables the artist to see ideas and truths that are likely to emerge in future and to present ever-new flashes of the currents of thought (prajna navanavonmeshashalini pratibha mata).

It may be interesting to discuss in this connection the distinction between Smriti, Mati and Prajna, as drawn by Rajashekhara. Intellect, Rajashekhara asserts, is of three types: Recollection (smriti), comprehension (mati), and vision (prajna). Smriti effects knowledge of a thing cognised in the past; mati generates comprehension of a thing or idea already present; prajna causes understanding of a thing or idea which is to emerge in future (Kavyamimamsa). While discussing the role of pratibha Rajashekhara classifies this faculty into two types: Creative (or Karayatri) which belongs to the literary artist, and appreciative (or Bhavayatri) which belongs to the connoisseur of poetic art. Creative faculty, it is asserted, presents words and meanings, metres and figures, techniques and dictions suitable for composition of poetry. The appreciative, on the other hand, enables the connoisseur to share the experience of the artist. If the poetical painting is the external symbol of the artist's profundity of emotion, the creative faculty presents to the poet expressions and meanings, style and embellishments necessary to carve out that image. The appreciative faculty translates the symbol back into experience in the mind of the appreciative reader.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sanskrit poetics gives an exalted status to pratibha. Anandavardhana describes the literary artist as a creator in a world which creates endless poetry, and asserts that the universe acquires its form what he is pleased to bestow. If the artist is full of emotion, the whole world appears immersed in ambrosia; if, on the other hand, he is without attachment and sympathy, the whole world appears dry and ugly (Dhvanyaloka). Mahimabhatta employs equally sublime language to describe pratibha: This faculty, it is asserted, consists in the intellect of the poet that is absorbed in selecting words and meanings; when his vision touches for a moment the highest spirit, it blossoms forth into pratibha. Continuing this hyperbolic statement Mahimabhatta says that pratibha represents the third eye of Shiva, with which the poet perceives the shape of things, the past, present and future (Vyaktiviveka).

In regard to pratibha, P.V. Kane makes the following observation: "It is usual to translate pratibha by 'Imagination'. It is better to translate pratibha as 'inborn creative faculty'. I.A. Richards defines 'Imagination', basing his remarks on Coleridge, as follows: 'That synthetic and magic power which reveals itself in the balance or reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities, the sense of novelty and freshness with old and familiar objects, a more than usual state of emotion with more than usual order.' Coleridge made a distinction between 'Imagination' and 'Fancy'. Others do not make that distinction."

R.M.

PRATIHARENDURAJA (Sanskrit) was the commentator on Alamkarasarasamgraha of Udbhata. His commentary is called Laghuvritti. Udbhata happens to be the foremost representative of the Alamkara School, which believes that literary embellishments are essential for poetic art. Since the doctrines of Udbhata are incapable of being easily comprehended, Pratiharenduraja is held in high esteem as one of the great exponents of the Alamkara School.

In presenting the doctrines of Udbhata, Pratiharenduraja makes the following observations:

(a) Paranomasia (Shlesha) is of two kinds, 'Shabdashlesha' and 'Arthashlesha', and both are ideational figures. Paranomasia (Shlesha) is stronger than other figures. Where other figures join it, the apprehension of this figure dispels the apprehension of others, and it emerges as the principal figure.

(b) Meaning is of two kinds: the first gives knowledge when comprehended; the second, being implicit, causes charm.

(c) Rasas are capable of being expressed through the employment of expressions which have this significance like Shringara, Karuna, etc.

Though at least on one occasion Pratiharenduraja shows faithful adherence to the doctrines of Udbhata, he expresses a view which appears as the precursor of the grand doctrine of Dhvani propounded by Anandavardhana. In a verse he states that rasa constitutes the soul of poetic art. This view has been wrongly ascribed to Udbhata, leading thereby to a lot of confusion, because, according to the pronounced doctrine of Udbhata, literary embellishments, and not the rasa, constitute the salient trait of poetic art.

Pratiharenduraja, whose views are marked by new flashes of insight, is regarded obviously as one of the greatest commentators in Sanskrit poetics. He tells us that he was the pupil of Mukula, the famous author of a number of treatises on poetics. The last verse of Pratiharenduraja's commentary bestows high praise on Mukula, who is said to have been deeply versed in Mimamsa and Nyaya as also in literature and the science of language. In that verse the commentator introduces himself as Shrinduraja and as an inhabitant of Konkan. Since Mukulabhatta flourished about AD 900-925, Pratiharenduraja belonged to the tenth century.

Abhinavagupta, the grand commentator of Anandavardhana, mentions one Bhattenduraja, a great teacher under whose guidance he had the privilege of learning many subjects. This Bhattenduraja seems to have been a poet as well as a literary critic. Abhinavagupta mentions him in the same breath with Valmiki, Vyasa and Kalidasa, implying that the compositions emanating from the pen of Bhattenduraja were of high order. The question whether Pratiharenduraja is identical with Bhattenduraja constitutes the subject of an animated controversy.

In his Alamkarasarvasva Samudrabandha identifies the two and remarks that Bhattenduraja wrote the famous commentary on Udbhata. K.C. Pandey, too, holds the same view.

The grounds for identifying the two as one are, however, extremely slender. Abhinavagupta mentions his teacher Bhattenduraja as belonging to Katyayana gotra, his father was Bhutiraja, his grandfather Sauchuka, and the personal history of Pratiharenduraja is nowhere mentioned. Moreover, while Pratiharenduraja happens to be an advocate of the Alamkara School, Bhattenduraja is a propounder of the doctrine of Dhvani. They are two distinct writers, though the literary career of both of them falls somewhere between AD 925 and 980

R.M.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PRATIJNAYAUGANDHARAYANA (Sanskrit), i.e. the vows of Yaugandharayana, is a Sanskrit play in four Acts by Bhasa who probably belonged to the early years of the Christian era. In the play, Yaugandharayana, Minister of Udayana, the king of Kaushambi (Vatsa), takes two vows which are finally fulfilled.

This is the first of the two plays written by Bhasa on the legendary hero, Udayana. The other is Svapnavasavadatta.

Bhasa presents the dramatic story sometimes through action on the stage and sometimes through narration by some minor character like a soldier or a messenger. The play is action-packed. Pratijnayaugandharayana is regarded, on the whole, as a masculine play, since there are only two women characters who appear on the stage and these two are comparatively minor characters.

It is difficult to assign the play to any particular class. Keith and Winternitz have categorised it as a 'prakarana' and, indeed, the stage manager mentions the word 'prakaranam' in his introductory remarks. Others regard it as a 'natika', or as an 'inhamriga'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.H. Dhruva, Pratijnayaugandharayanam (Ahmedabad, 1922); T. Ganapati Sastri, Pratijnayaugandharayanam, with commentary (Trivandrum, 1920).

K.R.P.

PRATIMA NATAKA (Sanskrit) is one of the thirteen plays ascribed to Bhasa, who is believed to have lived during the fourth century BC. It draws its plot from the Ramayana, and covers a rather long span of Rama's life, from his exile into the forest to his coronation.

Pratima nataka offers a skilful epitome of the major incidents of the Ramayana. The episode of Sita playfully adorning herself with a birch dress in the palace sets the tone of the play and forebodes the incidents that follow. The action moves in swift progression—Rama's exile into the forest accompanied by Sita and Lakshmana, Dasharatha's grief and subsequent death, and Bharata's learning about the incidents from the statue in the gallery. Bharata's attempt to persuade Rama fails and he is forced to return to the kingdom. Act V offers another major departure from the epic story when Ravana appears before Rama himself dressed as an ascetic. He quotes the scriptures and prompts Rama to perform the memorial rite for his deceased father by killing a golden deer that dwells in the Himalayas. While Rama sets out in its pursuit, the golden deer (the disguised Maricha) appears before him and he follows its trail. It is then that Ravana reveals his true form to Sita and abducts her. Pratima does not follow the rest of the story of Rama; the scene shifts to Ayodhya where Bharata is grief-stricken on hearing the news of Sita's abduction. When he reprimands Kaikeyi, his mother, for having brought suffering to Rama, Kaikeyi reveals that when she said she wanted fourteen years of exile for Rama, it was a slip of the tongue since she had meant to say fourteen days. Bhasa thus absolves Kaikeyi of her crime, and establishes it as a mistake. The last scene presents a victorious Rama after the slaying of Ravana, and the scene of re-union of the brothers at Ayodhya, followed by Rama's coronation.

Pratima nataka (Statue play) falls into the dramatic division of 'Nataka', having a renowned plot and a 'dhiroddhata' hero. It draws its title from the incident of Bharata learning about his father's death from a statue put up in the sculpture gallery, where usually the statues of dead kings are displayed. This incident is a major departure from the story in the epic, but as usual with his plays, Bhasa has taken liberty with his source material.

Su.G.

PRATINAYAKA (Sanskrit). In drama and other poetic compositions, usually a conflict is needed to develop the plot between the protagonist and the antagonist. The hero is supposed to be virtuous and possess all desirable qualities. Hence, the pratinayaka (antagonist) is almost always depicted as possessing bad qualities and also many defects. Dhananjaya states in the Dasharupaka that the villain is avaricious, haughty, arrogant, sinful and indulgent in bad habits like gambling (II. 9). Dhanika's commentary cites Ravana and Duryodhana as illustrations of pratinayaka.

Dandin states in his Kavyadarsha that the poet may describe the greatness of a hero and his exploits; alternatively, he may describe the traits of the villain and his outstanding qualities show that even such a person is slain by the hero. This also brings out the greatness of the hero himself indirectly (1.22.). This has been accepted by Vidyanatha also (Prataparudriya 1.67).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhananjaya: Dasharupaka with Dhanika's commentary; Dandin: Kavyadarsha; Vidyanatha: Prataparudriya with the commentary Ratnapana.

H.V.N.R.

PRATIPADA (Maithili) is the first and the foremost work of Surendra Jha 'Suman' (b. 1910). It is a collection of lyrical poems, first published in 1948. Its second edition appeared in 1951 with an elaborate introduction. 'Pratipada' means the first day of the lunar fortnight whence a new aspect of the moon starts. The name thus suggests a new start, a new direction in Maithili poetry. As a fortnight including the full-moon and the new moon covers sixteen days, the collection consists of sixteen lyrics, excluding the first and the last ones which are said to be introductory and dedicatory respectively. In these lyrics the poet shows great maturity. Taking inspiration from the past, the poet voices the struggle of the present and visualizes a promising future. Most of these poems were composed before independence and as such the poet feels suffocation under the foreign rule. 'Kavitak ahvan' is the first and perhaps the best poem of this collection full of poetic inspiration and patriotic fervour. 'Shamashan' is a philosophical reflection on the cremation ground. 'Ashadhasya', 'Prathama-divase', 'Yamuna', 'Asuryampashya' and 'Sharad —the favourite topics of Sanskrit poets—are treated with imagination in a new context. Similarly, the poet exalts the 'Haladhara' of today, considering him higher than Janak and Balaram, the ploughmen of Dvapara and Treta ages respectively. In 'Taru' he has anthropomorphised a tree as a sage and admired its service and dedication. 'Yuga navina' visualizes the future and 'Ukti-pratyukti' reaches out to the heart of the downtrodden. Pratipada is, indeed, a landmark in modern Maithili poetry.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bh.J.

PRAVACHANASARA (Prakrit/Apabhramsha) or Pavayanapahandasuttam is a Saurseni Prakrit work on Jaina philosophy and monastic discipline, divided into three Books, consisting of 92, 108 and 75 verses respectively. It is written by Kundakunda (c. 1st - 4th century A.D.). Book I is devoted to the exposition of the doctrine of three upayogas (manifestations of consciousness) and the Jaina theory of omniscience. The soul makes possible the manifestation of consciousness which is in the form of knowledge or cognition and which flows in one of the three channels, inauspicious, auspicious, or pure. Pure manifestation of consciousness is not open to karmic influx. It leads to the annihilation of all miseries and is identical with the spiritual state of transcendental, self-born, supersensuous, infinite happiness and omniscience. The soul, being an embodiment of knowledge, is capable of knowing itself, objects other than itself and the combinatory products of the two. But this essential ability of the soul is obscured by the karmic matter. So when the karmic matter is completely dissociated, this inherent ability becomes fully manifested and the soul knows all individual substances with their individual modes directly and simultaneously. Omniscience is ubiquitous in its function and, therefore, the omniscient is called omnipresent. The external objectivity does not affect the omniscient soul, though it sees and knows everything completely. The development of omniscience is necessarily accompanied by perfect happiness.

Book II expounds substance, quality and mode, and their inter-relation, nature of the soul and the matter, atomism and atomic interlinking, syadvada (theory of non-absolutism), nayavada (theory of view-point), saptabhangi (theory of predication) and nature and function of the medium of motion (Dharma), medium of rest (Adharma), Space (Akasha) and Time (Kala). The primary atom is regarded as a an ultimate unit of space-measurement. And the period of time required for a primary atom to traverse one space-point is called samaya (ultimate unit of Time).

Book III describes ascetic conduct. It deals with internal and external insignia, primary virtues, necessity of vigilance, paraphernalia, study of scriptures, reverence for the meritorious, diet and touring, avoidance of the company of monks of inferior merit, observance of carefulness, vows and self-control, and cultivation of faith, knowledge and discipline.

In this work the author mainly deals with an important philosophical principle: knowledge and the object of knowledge. The whole text is based on epistemology. The main question is: what is knowledge? It is not the passivity of intellect or thought, nor is it the only form of reality. Knowledge is knowing, but we cannot understand it without the context. For an example, take 'light' to illustrate the nature of knowledge. Just as light reveals itself as well as other objects, Jnana reveals the 'tattvas'. Hence it would be quite inconsistent to interpret the relation between Jnana and Jneya (Knowledge and the object intimate to it). There can be no Jiva without Jnana for, without it, he would be achetana or non-living. There is no knowledge without Jiva. Thus Jnana and Jnanin, Knowledge and Self, are absolutely inseparable, though distinguishable by name. But the very Jnanin may also become Jneya.

The term Jneya (the object of knowledge) includes both the self and the non-self, mental facts as well as physical facts or knowledge as related to physical objects but, actually, knowledge is knowing the self. When physical objects are the objects of knowledge, the relation of knowledge to its object is not the same as the relation between the knowledge and the self as its object. The sense organs and the mind are not sufficient for knowledge to comprehend the true nature of reality. Knowledge is possible to achieve as immediate and direct experience without the use of the sense organs and the mind. This is 'pratyaksha', the supernormal experience.

Researches in extra-sensory perception show that the clairvoyant cognition may differ with different individuals in relation to intensity and durability of experience. It is said there are three types of supernormal perception:

(i) 'Samanya lakshana', in which we perceive the generality in the individual members of a class, as for instance, we perceive the universal 'potness' in the perception of individual pots; (ii) 'Jnana lakshana', in which we perceive an object which is in contact with the senses through previous knowledge; (iii) 'Yogaja pratayaksha', the intuitive apprehension of objects which are past, future and distant through some supernormal powers generated in the mind by spiritual concentration. In the words of Kundakunda, Jnana or knowledge is always direct, that is, not dependent on sense organs and physical objects. The soul in its pure form is pure consciousness and knowledge. It is omniscient. Unlimited perception and unlimited knowledge are, therefore, inseparable from the nature of Jiva. Whatever perceives its self, knows its self, knows its own subjective and objective nature, experiences its own immediate existence, and is identical with the very activity of perception, knowledge and conduct. Because the self perceives and understands all things without limit, it also enjoys infinite bliss. Perception, knowledge and conduct, when conditioned by things other than the self, may lead to bondage.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.N. Upadhye (ed.), Pravachanasara.

N.J.S.
D.S.

PRAVACHANASARODDHARA (Prakrit) is a Svetambara Jaina work on philosophy, ethics and ritual, divided into 276 sections (dvaras) and consisting of 1613 Prakrit verses, written by Nemichandra (11th c.) in the form of a compendium. The subjects are set as far as possible in the form of numerical apothegms. The main topics dealt with are: worship of and chanting to the Jina's image, avowal of past transgressions, renunciation of certain food items, postures of meditation, transgressions a layman is liable to commit, the Tirthankaras, liberated souls, paraphernalia of monks and nuns, qualities of a spiritual leader, constituents of monastic conduct, purity of food, special penance purifying the transgressor, contemplations fortifying the five great vows, ladder of karmic destruction, ladder of karmic subsidence, seven modes of partial expression of truth, twelve-year long ritual for death by fasting, ten marvels, varieties of speech, nature of universe, instincts, varieties of right faith, stages of renunciation for layman, forms of death, ascending and descending cycles of time, infernal beings, six types of beings (shadjivakaya), gods, assimilation of karmic matter (ahara), 363 heretics, divisions and sub-divisions of karmas, supernatural powers (labdhi), Arya and non-Arya countries, subtle body called aharaka and qualities of liberated souls. The lists of shravaka-gunas (good qualities of a Jaina layman), abhakshyas (items a layman should not eat) and anantakayas (vegetables which form the body of infinite living beings) are of considerable importance for the development of the shravakachara (rules of conduct for Jaina layman).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nemichandra, Pravachanasaroddhara, with Siddhasenasuri's Sanskrit commentary (Bombay); M.D. Desai, Jaina sahityano sankshipta ithihasa (Bombay, 1933).

N.J.S.

PRAVASI KE GIT (Hindi) is a collection of poems by Narendra Sharma, published in 1939. It is one of the representative volumes of short lyrical poems characteristic of Hindi poetry in late thirties. Being a direct expression of experience, the poems are free from ornamentation and have a certain spontaneity of expression. The popularity of Pravasi ke git lies in the expression of joys and sorrows of life without any wavering or ambiguity inherent in much chhayavadi poetry. The basic philosophy of these poems is individualism, which is neither spiritual nor materialistic but springs from a revolt against convention. Sometimes we see a streak of pessimism and nihilism also, but because the poems are rooted in personal experience their larger base is humanistic.

The lyrics, which are untitled, can be divided into two categories: (1) songs of secular love, and (2) songs originating from a subtler emotion of love. In the songs of the first category the separated lover lives on the strength of memories of the past. He also draws sustenance from a philosophy of love which is influenced by sufi ideology. In the songs of the second category the lover accepts separation as a fact of life and frees himself from despair. Here he regards love as an extension of life beyond time. Here we find, perhaps, an extension of the 'Riti-mukta' tradition of Ghananand of the later medieval age.

The lyrics of Pravasi ke git form a bridge between idealistic and materialistic thoughts. Setting aside social and political compulsions of the times, the poet moves towards romanticism, and his ego bruised by the denial and privations of life draws solace from the world of imagination. The language of these lyrics is unembellished and communicative in its total simplicity.

K.P.

PREM NEI (Bengali), a novel, is a significant achievement of Gourkishore Ghosh (b. 1923). It is, among other things, the most penetrating study of Bengali Muslims in a rural environment and their ethos during the early decades of this century. Originally conceived as the second part of an ambitious trilogy dealing with the social, political and cultural upheavals in Bengal during the three decades preceding India's independence, the work has a central unity of its own and stands in its own right as a work of outstanding merit. In terms of a comprehensive historical vision and personal honesty and authenticity, it occupies an important place in the corpus of Bengali literature. The other works in this genre which immediately come to mind are Tarashankar Banerjee's Gana debata, Atin Banerjee's Nilkantha pakhir khonje and Sunil Gangopadhay's Sei Samai.

Prem nei (There is no love, 1981) is divided into three parts. The first part 'Aurat-e-hasina' (The beautiful woman) deals with the background, struggles and marriage of the central character, Shafikul Molla, alias Fotik Mia. The focus in this part is also on the fate of women in a rural, largely illiterate Muslim community. Fotik hails from a traditionally conservative Muslim family of Jhi-naidaha (Jessore). His father, Sajjad Molla, is a very poor peasant. Both his parents, like the rest of the peasant families in the locality, have to slog like the beasts of burden to earn their subsistence. Fotik, solely with his personal endeavour and tenacity, educates himself and becomes a dedicated teacher. However, he gets embittered when he faces discrimination from a predominantly Hindu management who supports the promotion of a corrupt and incompetent teacher merely because he is a Hindu. Fotik goes to Calcutta and, with utmost perseverance, starts training himself for a lawyer so that he can earn his living without servility. After taking a degree in law he comes back to his village to meet his wife Bilkis whom he married three years ago but has not so far seen. Meanwhile Bilkis has grown up to a charming woman full of common sense. Right from childhood, she developes a feeling of awe for her future married life and the unknown man, whoever he happens to be, who would be her husband. But when she actually meets her husband, she finds her heart a better guide than the dogmatic scriptural injunctions which merely hinder the spontaneous communications between husband and wife. Another story, that of Dawood and Futki, runs parallel to the main story. Dawood becomes a representative of the full-blooded village youth with an instinctive response to the pain and pleasure of life unhindered by any religious or ethical considerations. Like Tom Jones, Dawood is unable to resist a woman who offers herself to him but, nevertheless, he retains some of his innocence and goodness of heart. The Christlike figure, Cherag Fakir, is the only character in the novel who has been able to harmonise in himself the best in both the Hindu and the Muslim traditions.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The second part is entitled 'Madhdhikhane char' (The shoal in between). True to the title, this part deals with alienation and disintegration at different levels. Fotik's higher education and comprehensive vision have alienated him from his parents and his community. He does not see eye to eye on many crucial issues with them and can contribute precious little to ameliorate their grievances. In his legal practice he faces keen opposition from Khondkar Bazlur Rahman, the Muslim landlord, because of his calculated policy to suppress all members of the working classes and maintain his position of supremacy in his own community. The attempt to control the disadvantages of birth and poverty and to be able to lead a life of respectability seem increasingly difficult to Fotik. His personal fate is also inextricably mixed up with the larger questions of social injustice, the inhuman exploitation of the peasants by the zamindars and the slow but inevitable process of communal polarisation of the Muslim and the Hindu communities. The country has been in great ferment following the Government of India Act of 1935. Fotik's father, along with some other peasants, becomes the focal point of the movement against exploitation by the landlords. Meanwhile Bilkis is pregnant. Fotik, psychologically unhinged by contradictory pulls, is now unable to take proper precaution for Bilkis and sends her to her parents.

The third part is 'Digante kalbaishakhi' (A tempest on the horizon). This part is linked to the central narratives, and now takes up with the forthcoming election deciding the fate of the peasants. The competition is between the Muslim candidate, Khondkar, and the Krishak Praja Party candidate, Moulvi Abu Talib. The Praja Party has a comprehensive programme for the betterment of the peasants, while the League merely harps on trivial communal issues, calculated to divert the attention of the people from the teething economic problems. Both parties close ranks and the League candidate, after a series of dubious tactics, wins the election. The power equation for the Provincial Assembly among the League, the Congress and the Praja Party is seriously debated by different parties. Fotik does not share the new-found enthusiasm for a Muslim revival. He is unable to see everything through the image of a Hindu-Muslim equation because he himself was encouraged and assisted by several of his Hindu teachers, well-wishers and friends in his educational and career endeavours. The social and political vision presented by the novel is essentially depressing inasmuch as the voice of the essential sanity has constantly been choked by parochial and communal considerations. The events clearly foreshadow the divisive tendencies which took their final and ugliest form at the time of Independence. As for the narrative, it is significant that Bilkis suffers a fatal fall and, after a prolonged and traumatic experience of child-birth, delivers a dead baby which becomes an apt metaphor for whatever the leaders have achieved after their vicious struggle.

The novelist has made competent and extensive use of the dialect spoken around Jessore which adds weight to the immediacy and authenticity of the experiences delineated in the book. The technique of narration uses the traditional third person with interspersed thoughts in the stream of consciousness and brings out brilliantly the mental crises in the lives of the central characters.

Mo. A.

PREM, PREMJI (Rajasthani; b. 1943) comes of a Jain family. He graduated with Commerce from Rajasthan University and started his career as Accounts Assistant in 1964. Later, he did his M.A. in Hindi, English, and History. His first collection of poems is Chamcho (The spoon, 1973), presenting some good satires on contemporary affairs. His second book Seli chaon khajur ki (1975) is a powerful novel on human relations and is the first novel in the Hadauti dialect of Rajasthani language. His third and fourth books, Ramachandra ki Ramakatha (Collection of stories) and Sanwalo sanch (Collection of ghazals), were published in 1976. His fifth book Sarvar suraj ar sanjyha

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(The pond, the sun and the evening, 1979) is a collection of lyrics mostly on nature, and received the Rajasthani Sahitya Academy Award for 1980-81. He edited Satarangi Chamal (The seven-coloured Chambal), a bi-lingual magazine, from 1974 to 1976. He also edited Bindhagya jyo moti (1975), a collection of stories by 12 writers; Banagi a collection of poems and prose; and Aj ri Rajasthani kahaniyan (1984), contemporary Rajasthani stories.

His work is symbolic, yet it depicts different spheres of life in south-east Rajasthan.

K.L.S.

PREM SINGH HOTI BAWA (Punjabi)
see under BAWA, PREM SINGH HOTI

PREMA-PANCHAMRITA (Oriya), an eighteenth century kavya, is a significant composition by Bhupati Pandit (17th-18th c.). The poet, who also wrote a number of 'chautisa' and 'chaupadi', originally came from Uttar Pradesh on a pilgrimage to Puri and settled in the Cuttack district under the patronage of King Dibya Singh Dev. The references to the king in his poetry leave no doubt that he wrote his celebrated work Prema-panchamrita in the reign of Kapilendra Dev, and his contemporaries were Dinakrushna Das and Upendra Bhanja.

Prema-panchamrita deals with the Krishna-Gopi theme and occupies an important place in the Krishnalila tradition of Oriya poetry. The poet was a Vaishnavite and a follower of Jagannath Das. The Vaishnav cult expounded by Chaitanya had for its base the 'Bhaktibada' of Jagannath Das and the 'Rasabada' of Ray Ramananda, coalesced in what is called 'Prema-bhaktibada' (i.e. devotional-love cult). This Prema-bhaktibada is depicted in Prema-panchamrita. The poet, Bhupati Pandit, was also a believer in Advaita philosophy, and was equally influenced by the literary style of 'Riti' poets. The primary aim in this work is the narration of the sport of love and the union of Krishna and gopis—the union of the divine and devotional love.

The history of Orissa as well as its literature and culture is related to its great deity, Lord Jagannath. In the development of Oriya cultural history the Vaishnavite movement of Chaitanya played a highly influential role, which reflected itself in the writings of this period. As a result both Lord Jagannath and the 'reganuraga bhakti' of Sri Chaitanya left their mark on the poet of Prema-panchamrita also.

Like the poet of Rasakallola, Bhupati Pandit described the supernatural and human activities of Krishna in Gokula, known as lila. The poet's description of the different moods of the gopis does not deserve specific mention, but his depiction of the different types of gopis and their desire for union with Krishna is unique. He divided the gopis into four types: Veda kanya, Deba kanya, Muni kanya and Gopi kanya, and Krishna assured them all that he would meet them again and again for their love. The work is, therefore, essentially a Vaishnava treatise in a literary form. In the description of characters the poet gives a fine philosophical and religious touch.

The Rāsa dance or group dance of the gopis with Krishna as described in Jagannath's Bhagabat, which was the central motif of the Vaishnava cult, has been impressively presented. The poet has also shown the ideal and devotional nature of lila in the Rasa dance. The love of Krishna for the gopis and vice versa is symbolic of the harmonization of the individual soul with the universal. The poet of Prema-panchamrita concentrated only on the Gopa lila. It differs from the works of the medieval poets, omitting the description of the Mathura lila and the reunion of Krishna with the gopis.

The entire kavya was written in 'nabakshari brutta' (nine-letter metre) in a simple style and in a language that comes so naturally to him. It was written at a crucial period when the Oriya language was on a decline. Most of the kings had no respect for the local language and believed that the poets should use their imagination within the limits of the Alankara shastra and follow the Sanskrit tradition. Many poets did not write in local language, and in order to meet such a challenge made their work heavily ornamented. Bhupati Pandit, however, used the language with great ease and felicity and his Prema-panchamrita has ever since been held in high esteem.

P.C.P.

PREMANANDA (Gujarati; b. 1779, d. 1845) was a follower of Swaminarayan sect and a distinguished poet. He has composed enchanting love songs addressed to Krishna as well as Sahajananda, the founder of the sect, as if they were his lovers and he their beloved, calling himself 'Prem sakhi' (a female friend). His love songs are highly emotional and K.M. Munshi rightly says about them: "If in anybody after Narsingh Mehta we see a flash of pure devotion, it is in Premananda." He is at his best in the description of the pangs of separation in Sahjananda's death and also of the plight of the miserable Gopis on Krishna's leaving for Mathura. His other notable works are Jnanmanjiri Narayan charitra, Viveksar, Shriharicharitamrut, Tulsi vivah and Gopi virah. He composed padas, akhyanas and garbis. He had a melodious voice, and when he recited his song, he kept the audience spell-bound.

C.M.

PREMCHAND (Hindi/Urdu; b. 1880, d. 1936), real name Dhanpatrai Srivastava, Hindi and Urdu novelist and short story writer, had a chequred graph of life. Receiving his early education at a village school, he had to shift from one educational institution to another till he passed his

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

B.A. examination in 1919 at the age of forty. He started his career as an asistant teacher on a meagre salary of Rs. 18/- per mensem, rose to the coveted post of a Sub-Deputy Inspector of schools but resigned at the call of Gandhi. For his livelihood he took, by fits and starts, to journalism and creative writing. He also wrote scenarios for the film companies and set up a printing press. But all his efforts did not come to much and he died a broken-hearted man.

Initially he wrote in Urdu. Besides writing short stories and novels, he contributed a popular monthly column 'Raftar-i-zamana' to a Urdu journal. It was in 1916 that on the advice of Mannan Dwivedi he concentrated on writing in Hindi. The brightest moment in his life was when he presided over the annual session of the Indian Progressive Writers Association in 1936 at Lucknow, just six months before his death.

The advent of Premchand on the literary scene marks the dawn of a new era in the history of the Hindi novel. Fiction writers before him entertained their readers either with romances or with the adventures and heroic deeds of the protagonists. The world painted by them was not real but one of make-believe. In contrast, Premchand portrayed life as he saw it, and what he saw was marked by a catholic vision. Therefore, we see a broad spectrum of life in his fiction. His treatment of various problems of socio-political, economic and community life is so complete that his novels may be called a living document of his age. Savasadan deals with the problem of moral degradation of prostitutes and the sufferings of a middle class family. Nirmala takes up the question of social inequity, dowry-system and the agonies of a young woman married to a dotard. Premasharam is a portrayal of rural India and the struggle between the peasant and the landlord. Godan exposes the hypocrisy and sham of the middle-class young men, Kayakalpa tries to explain that communalism is the result of the divide and rule policy of the foreign rulers. The two epic novels Rangabhumi and Godan present the complete social and political spectrum of Indian society in the thirities of this century. The characters drawn from all classes of society, professions, castes and creeds, with their varying habits and temperaments, and belonging to both rural and urban settings, present a wide panorama of Indian life. His themes centring round the problems of day-to-day life, his men and women and their milieu—all belong to a real and familiar world. All this makes him a realist. But when we look at the influence of the Aryasamaj and of Mahatma Gandhi on him and consider his reformist zeal, the pre-ordained structure of his plots the development in his characters and their sudden change of heart, and his faith in institutions and reform-centres, we discover an idealistic pattern in his mind. In his earlier works this idealism is superimposed and therefore too obvious, while in his later and maturer works its evolves out of the theme and is woven into the texture of the work.

The most striking aspect of his personality is his concern for society. He has unbounded sympathy for all, specially the downtrodden; the exploited and the weaker sections of society—the illiterate farmer, the labourer who has no right except compulsion to work, women suffering in man-dominated society and untouchables leading a life of pariahs. His heart bleeds for them, sometimes he sheds tears at their misfortune, sometimes exhorts them to revolt against the privileged class—a zamindar or an industrialist, a heartless beauracrat or a police officer. However, when we find him involved in their sufferings whether resulting from a defective social order or a worn-out moral code or a cruel destiny, we at once recognize a humanist in him. He is above hatred and malice, and his humanism is governed by moral values. This humanism is sometimes construed as Gandhism, at other times as Marxism. In fact, it transcends labels since he is a writer with a conscience demanding the right for all to live a purposeful life.

His two monumental works, Rangbhumi and Godan are prose epics not only in their outer dimension, but also in their spirit. They present tragic characters, higher values of life and a full play of elemental passions. With the publication of Godan, the Hindi novel attained a height which is still a challenge to a novelist.

In all, Premchand wrote 273 short stories in Hindi. They may be assigned to three periods: (i) Experimental period (up to 1918); (ii) Period of development (1920-1929); and (iii) Period of maturity (1930-1936). The stories written in the last period have neither large plots nor numerous characters. A simple psychological truth or an instense human emotion is enough to constitute the plot of the story. The stories 'Kafan', 'Pus ki raat' and 'Nasha' testify to this. In construction of plot he no longer takes resort to coincidence, or manoeuvred incidents. The dialogues are interspread at proper places and help develop the plot as well as the characters.

Notwithstanding his struggle to find his identity as a writer, Premchand made a distinct contribution to Hindi fiction and occupies a pride of place in the history of the Indian novel.

S.S.G.

(URDU). Dhanpatrai, alias Nawabrai, alias Premchand was born at Lamahi near Banaras. His father, Ajaib Lal, was a Munshi in the local post office. He was named Dhanpatrai, but his uncle affectionately called him Nawabrai, and this name steadily gained currency both in the family circle and outside. When he began his literary career in 1903, he used the second name given by his uncle.

Premchand's entire life was one of struggle—struggle at home, struggle in career, struggle in life. A school master rising to the position of a Sub-Deputy Inspector of schools, indifferent health impelling him to leave government service, involvement in the freedom struggle, a stint at the press, a job with a film company, and the final decision to stick to creative writing—this was the odyssey of one of our greatest masters of fiction.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Before Premchand, Urdu fiction consisted of only mythical legends and highly fanciful adventure stories. He liberated the genre from this strait-jacket and made it the vehicle of expression of the sorrows and sufferings, happiness and privation of the common man.

Premchand's literary life may be divided into three periods: Beginnings (1903-10): This was the period of apprenticeship. Imbued with the idealism of Arya Samaj's programme of social transformation, he wrote a novel Asrar-e-Mabid, during the years 1903-05. This novel was published serially in Awaz-e-khalq, an obscure weekly magazine published from Banaras. After sometime, he published two other novels, Kishna and Hum-khurma-o-hum-sawab (1904). In all these works, one may find the usual faults of a beginner.

When he shifted to Kanpur in 1905, he became acquainted with Munshi Dayanarayan Nigam, the editor of Zamana. This chance acquaintance soon turned into friendship that lasted till the death of Premchand. Premchand's articles, reviews and short stories began to appear regularly in Zamana.

In June, 1908, his first collection of five stories, Sooz-e-watan, was published by the Zamana press. In these stories the readers were exhorted to shear off the chain of slavery and rise in patriotism. The District Collector came to know that the writer of this collection, the so-called Nawabrai, was in fact, a teacher in a government school and none other than Dhanpatrai. He was served notice and asked to explain and defend himself. However, he was forgiven after mild admonition. The unsold copies of the book were procured and destroyed. Of course, Premchand was made to take a pledge that he would not publish any of his writings without showing them to the chief of the District beforehand.

Henceforth, he began to write under assumed names. It was at this time that he, on the suggestion of Dayanarayan Nigam, adopted the pen-name of Premchand. Slowly this name gained currency and acquired wide reputation. In the mean time, his stories began to be published in Hindi also and that ensured a wider readership.

Second period (1910-18): The novels and short stories in this phase definitely mark a step forward towards the development of his ideas and style. During his stay at Hamirpur, he had the unique opportunity of travelling through the areas that once witnessed the valour of the Rajputs. Premchand wrote quite a few stories in which he recreated that period. In these stories also, he tried to make people aware of the humiliation of foreign slavery and warned them against fighting among themselves; he asked people to love their motherland and remain united.

Third Period (1918-36): Premchand's art reached its acme during this period. Concern with contemporary political realities and a profound sense of the social inequities permeate the very fibre of his works of this period. His extraordinarily fertile imagination came to grip with a variety of subjects all of which he treated in his own individual way.

The movement for Independence under the leadership of Gandhiji influenced Premchand profoundly. He was also greatly influenced by the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 in Russia. In the novels, short stories and editorials of this period, the common leitmotif was liberation which received both intensive and extensive treatment. He wrote effectively against the exploitation of the poor and the downtrodden and was a champion of Gandhiji's ways and a believer in his philosophy of non-violence. Though he felt excited and thrilled by the Russian revolution, he believed that for India Gandhiji's political and economic thoughts had a greater relevance.

In all, twelve novels and fourteen collections of his stories were published in Urdu. (Ruthi Rani was a translation from Hindi and Asrar-e-Mabid was not published in book-form; that is why they have been excluded). The names of the important novels and collections of stories are: Short story collections: Prem pachisi (Kanpur, Vol.I, 1914, Vol. II, 1918); Prem batisi, Vol.I (Kanpur, 1920; Vol. II, Lahore, 1920); Prem chalisi, Vols. I & II (Lahore, 1930). Novels: Gosha-e-aafiat (Lahore, 1928); Chaugan-e-hasti (Lahore, 1927-28); Maidan-e-amal (New Delhi, 1935–36); Godan (New Delhi, 1939).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ghafil Ansari, Premchand ke usloob ka irtiqa (Sansarpur, 1986); Manaktala, Premchand aur tasanif-e-Premchand (New Delhi, 1985); Qamar Rais, Premchand ka tanquidi muta'la (Aligarh, 1959); Zafar Reza Premchand: fan aur ta'mir-e-fan (Allahabad, 1977).

G.K.M.

PREMCHAND GHAR MEIN (Hindi) is a collection of 88 memoirs written by Shivrani Devi, the wife of Premchand, first published in 1956. Shivrani was the motivating power behind Premchand's work and life, she had seen Premchand at work and knew his line of thinking from close quarters. Therefore, it is the most authentic record of the strength and foibles of the great writer. Shivrani Devi has clearly stated in the preface that she has published these memoirs not to eulogize her husband but to give glimpses of his domestic life and through them throw light on his character and work.

The author has recorded these reminiscences not in a strict chronological order, yet they present the life-sketch of Premchand in a systematic manner—his forefathers' ancestral home, early education, his arduous efforts to get higher education, his appointment as assistant master in a local school, his rise to the post of Sub-Deputy Inspector of schools, his resignation from the coveted government job, editing of weeklies and monthlies, his colossal failure as a publisher and proprietor of a press, his attempt to improve his financial position by going to the film industry at Bombay, his disillusionment and serious illness leading to death in 1936.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

These sketches portray Premchand as a loving husband, a duty-conscious and affectionate father, a son cherishing the memories of mother whom he had lost early in life, his care not to displease and annoy his step-mother, a master who loved and cared for his servants and subordinates and helped them in their difficulties. A few memories reveal him as a man full of spirits and buoyancy, celebrating festivals with the gusto of a young boy.

The book also gives a picture of contemporary political scene, especially the active participation of the women folk in picketing at shops of liquor and foreign cloth, their demonstrations and arrests, etc. We also learn about a few literary activities of the age—galpa-sammelans, kavi-sammelans, literary symposia, annual sessions of various literary societies and the activities of the Hindustani Academy.

The book discloses various aspects of Premchand's personality hitherto unknown—his subdued disposition in respect of both his step-mother and his wife, his human weaknesses and frailties, his sense of duty towards the budding young writers, his tender feelings for the porter (Kazaki) in childhood, and his grief at the death of the Russian writer, Maxim Gorki. Premchand gave no respite to his pen, wrote day in and day out and worked hard even on death-bed preparing a speech or writing the pages of his last incomplete novel, Mangal sutra. Honesty, simplicity and self-respect were in his blood. He never accepted presents, washed his own clothes, did not accept the title of 'Rai Saheb', and left the film industry because he would not compromise with principles. He was several times duped by sychophants but never learnt a lesson. He was tolerant of others and respected all religions. He laughed and wept like a child and felt homesick when he had to be away from his family.

The book is marked by simplicity, clarity and sincerity. Shivrani Devi had a literary bent of mind; her style becomes elevated when she writes about serious and philosophical subjects; it becomes ornamental and emotional when she is in reflective moods or talks of the greatness and magnanimity of her husband.

The book helps the reader in understanding the life, character and works of Premchand. Undoubtedly, it is a landmark in biographical literature because of its authenticity, fidelity to facts, style and sincerity of feeling.

S.S.G.

PREMGHAN (Hindi; b. 1855, d. 1922). Badrinarayan Choudhary 'Premghan' is an important writer of the Bharatendu age who contributed to various forms of Hindi literature—drama, poetry, essay, criticism and journalism. Born in a well-to-do Brahmin family of Mirzapur (U.P.), he spent most of his life in the service of literature. He also wrote poems in Urdu under the pen-name of 'Abra'.

Premghan's literary career started with poetry. He was deeply attached to Braj bhasha and the 'kavitta-savaiyya' tradition, besides 'samasyapurti'. However, he also wrote poems in folk metres, such as Kajali, Holi, Lavani, etc. The collection of his Mirzapur style kajalis is entitled Kajali kadambini.

Of the few long epical poems written in the Bharatendu age, Premghan's Jirna janapad is very important. The life of the village folk, their problems and weaknesses have been very nicely presented here. He also attempted an epic, Kansavadh, which could not be completed owing to his sudden death. His well-known poetic works are Anand arunoday, Hardika harshadharsh, Mayank mahima; Alaukik lila, Varshabindu, etc. All of them are collected in the first volume of Premghan sarvasva published by Kashi Nagari Pracharini Sabha. Like Bharatendu, he also wrote poems on topical issues, such as police, taxes, unequal marriage, foreign rule. His Bhakti poems are found in Lalitya lahari and Braja-chand panchak. His amorous poems have intensity of emotion and elegance of expression. As in Bharatendu, in Premghan also we find the two mutually opposing trends of patriotism and loyalty towards the king, though the main drift is towards national awakening, social reform and protest against imperialism. For example, when Dadabhai Naoroji was called a 'black' Indian (though he was of white-complexion) in the British Parliament, Premghan reacted strongly:

> Acharaj hot tumahu sam gore bajat kare
> Tason kare 'kare' shabdahun par hoin bare.

In spite of his great love for Braj bhasha, he wrote Anand arunoday in Khari boli and gave expression to the political and social awakening of the people. His last work Mayank mahima is also in Khariboli.

Premghan was a very competent prose writer. He never liked hastiness in prose writing and complained to Bharatendu about his hastiness. Because of his lucid prose he received a good deal of applause for his plays. In 1886 he started writing social plays Varangana rahasya and Vaishya vinod but could not complete them. His play Bharat saubhagya deals with the post-Mutiny events up to the formation of the Indian National Congress. The characters in the play come from different provinces and speak different languages. His satirical and humorous plays were published in Anand kadambini.

As an essayist, he is an average writer without the grip and organisation of Bharatendu or Balkrishna Bhatt, but his contribution in the field of literary criticism is important. Ramchandra Shukla maintains that the tradition of analysing a work and bringing to light its plus and minus points begins with Premghan. Gadadhar Singh's translation of Bang vijeta and Lala Srinivasadas's Sanyogita swayamvar were reviewed by him in Anand kadambini. Scholarly and fearless assessment was the main quality of Premghan's criticism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In Hindi journalism also Premghan's name is worth mentioning. He started the publication of Anand kadambini in 1881 from Mirzapur which caught the attention of a number of creative writers of his time. He also started the publication of a weekly, Nagari nirad, which was known for its feature articles and lucidity of language.

K.P.

PREMI, HARIKRISHNA (Hindi; b. 1908 d. 1974), an important playwright, was born in a patriotic family in Guna (Madhya Pradesh). His literary career started with journalism in Tyagbhumi with Makhanlal Chaturvedi. Later, he went to Lahore and worked as a journalist and took active part in the freedom movement. For some time he wrote for films also, but soon left and joined the All India Radio, Jalandhar.

Premi wrote poems and plays. His first work Swarnavihan (1930), full of patriotic feelings, is an opera. His first historical play, Raksha bandhan (1934), based on the theme of Hindu-Muslim unity, got immediate popularity. When Chittor was attacked by Bahadur Shah of Gujarat, Queen Karnavati of Chittor sent a 'rakhi' to Humayun, the Mughal emperor, who accepted it and vowed to go to her rescue. The mythological play Patalvijay (1936) takes up the subject of justice. His next play, Shiva sadhana (1937), is based on the story of Shiva and Aurangazeb. His third play, Pratishodh (1937), is also a historical play in which Chhatrasal Bundela opposes the tyranny of Aurangazeb. Another play, Ahuti (1940), deals with the sacrifice of Hammirdev, offering shelter to a person seeking his help and protection. Swapna bhang deals with the theme of secularism which receives a serious blow at the defeat of Dara Shikoh.

Premi's command of language and dialogue, apart from his treatment of themes, is important. His language is simple and communicative and makes his plays eminently suitable for stage production. Ramchandra Shukla considered him in this respect a more successful dramatist than Jaishankar Prasad.

Premi's plays are also noted for their modern ideas. The plays like Mitra, Navin sarjna, Shataranj ke khilari deal with the theme of friendship, while Vish-pan brings out a Mewar princess's patriotic fervour. Uddhar, Bhagna-prachir, Prakash stambha, Kirti stambha, Vida and Sanpon ki srishti are based on medieval Indian history. Among his social plays, Bandhan (1940) shows the influence of Gandhism and Chhaya (1941) is the pathetic story of the financial struggle of a writer.

Premi has also written one-act plays which reflect social and political problems. Among his important one-act plays mention may be made of 'Badalon ke paar', 'Ghar ho ya hotel', 'Vina mandir', 'Naya samaj', 'Yah bhi khel hai', 'Prem andha hai', and 'Matribhumi ka maan'.

Besides, Premi has also made an important contribution to poetic drama. 'Sohini Mahiwal', 'Sassi punnu', 'Hir Ranjha', 'Mirza Sahiba', 'Dullha Bhatti' are his experiments in this field. All of them are lyrical plays, based on the folk tales of Punjab, and were especially written for radio.

Premi's plays show the influence of the eminent Bengali playwright, Dwijendralal Roy. In spite of their communicative language and successful use of history which make them popular, they do not achieve, on the whole, any poetic or aesthetic excellence.

Premi's first collection of poems, Ankhon mein (1930), is imbued with romanticism and patriotism. Among his other works may be mentioned Anant ke path par, Agnigan, Rup darshan, Pratibha, Rup rekha, Bahan ka vivah, Jharana hai sangram, Beti ki vida, etc. His poems and plays both voice the desire for freedom and social reform.

K.P.

PRINCES, THE (English) is Manohar Malgonkar's third and most successful novel (1963). It was a Literary Guild selection in America and has been translated into a number of Indian and foreign languages. It is at once the record of the end of an epoch in Indian history and the story of a man's search for his roots in an age of upheaval and crisis. By choosing Abhayaraj, the last of the Bedar rulers, as the narrator-hero of his novel, Malgonkar succeeds in humanizing the authentic historical material and presenting it from the inside. Malgonkar's own personal involvement with the princes provided him with an insight into the human and cultural values symbolised by them, and his training as a historian enabled him to recognise, with detachment and objectivity, the anachronistic irrelevance of princely India as a political and social phenomenon. In Hiroji, the Maharaja of Begwad (an imaginary princely state located in central India), Malgonkar created an effective symbol of this duality of princely India and in Abhayaraj his son, a participant as well as a spectator, an ironic point of view which gives the novel its distance and value. There is a similar duality in the movement of the novel. As history, The Princes is a record of the disintegration of the princely state of Begwad from the early days of political unrest in 1938 to the merger in 1949. This is part of an inexorable historical movement which swept the whole of the nation and decided the fates of individuals—the heroic death of Hiroji, the surrender of the titles and privileges by Abhayraj, and the rise of Kanakchand, the cobbler boy, to political power. The other movement relates to the development of the protagonist from a state of personal and social alienation caused by emotional problems of childhood and adolescence through a maturing process which involves the experience of sex and war, to the fulfilment of personality in the realisation of authentic human relationships and the affirmation of traditional values. Malgonkar shows remarkable skill in the management of the dual movement which reaches its crisis with Abhay's decision to give up his role as ironic spectator and to stand by his father 'right or wrong'. Abhayraj is a reliable narrator, and though his perspective suffers from inevitable personal limitations as in the treatment of the Kanakchand episodes, it is generally true and clear. The story of the disintegration of the state of Begwad beginning with the cracking up of the absolute power of the Maharaja and ending in the final withering away of the state is full and factual. Similarly, Abhay's exploration of his own self is convincing and authentic. In the final sections of The Princes, however, the narrator and the novel both lose their objectivity because of Abhay's total identification with his father and full acceptance of his values.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Malgonkar's novel is the most ambitious fictional treatment of the then Indian princes, though there have been works of such outstanding merit on the same theme as J.R. Ackerley's Hindoo Holiday (1932), E.M.Forster's The Hill of Devi (1953), Mulk Raj Anand's The Private Life of an Indian Prince (1953) and Santha Rama Rau's Remember the House (1956). The magnificence of Malgonkar's conception of the vast historical and personal perspective gives The Princes a rare distinction among Indo-English novels.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.S.Amur, Manohar Malgonkar (New Delhi, 1973); James Y. Dayanand, Manohar Malgonkar (New York, 1974).

B.R.N.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Assamese) began in Assam after the arrival of the American Baptist missionaries in 1836. These missionaries established their printing press at Sibsagar in 1841 and set out to spread education amongst the people. Prior to the advent of the Baptist missionaries, the Serampore Mission Press printed in 1813 the first Assamese translation of the New Testament under the title Dharmapustak, done by William Carey in collaboration with Atmaram Sarma, an erudite Assamese scholar. The same press printed the translation of the Old Testament under the same title Dharmapustak in 1833. The first Assamese grammar, A Grammar of the Assamese Language, by William Robinson was printed at the Serampore Press in 1839. The Samachar Chandrika Press of Calcutta printed Asam buranji written in Bengali by Holiram Dhekial Phukan, a renowned Assamese scholar, in 1819. Another book Kamakhya yatra paddhati, written in Sanskrit by the same author, was posthumously printed at the same press in 1834.

The American Baptist Mission Press rendered yeoman's service to the growth and development of the Assamese language by publishing in 1846 an Assamese newspaper-cum-magazine called Arunoday. It was a monthly paper devoted to religion, science and general intelligence. Subsequently, printing was mainly associated with the publication of various magazines and journals until the end of the 19th century.

The history of publishing books reveals that the missionaries were pioneers also in the field of publishing books in Assamese. Some private publishers came forward to publish books from the beginning of this century. However until 1947 the book publishing was in low key. The private publishing houses mainly ran their business on the profit they made by publishing school text books; they sparingly published general books. The publishing house published novels, collection of short stories and a few books of verse. The University of Gauhati began to publish the multi-volume monumental Assamese translation of the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, besides a number of research-based books of importance. The Universities of Gauhati and Dibrugarh have been publishing text books in all subjects in Assamese. The Government sponsored Assam Publication Board has been doing commendable work by publishing books on literature, philosophy and science. It has also undertaken the publication of ten volumes of Asamiya Viswakosh (Encyclopaedia). The Board has published the monumental work of the great oriental scholar Anandaram Barooah, besides publishing almost 100 titles until now. The private firms like Lawyer's Book Stall, Mitra Agency, Dutta Barua & Co., Assam Book Depot have also published many titles.

Ban.S.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Bengali). The origin of the Bengali publication could be traced back to 1743 when Father Manoel da Assumpcao, a Portuguese missionary, published a precept entitled Compendio dos mysterio da fe in Lisbon. The book was in Portuguese with Bengali translation alongside. In the absence of Bengali type, the Bengali version was printed in the Roman script. The book is also known as Cathecismo da doutrina Christa Ordenado por modo de dialogo em Idioma Bengalla e Portuguez (or as it was written in the Roman script in Bengali, Crepar Xaxtrer Orthbhed, 1743). The early Roman Catholic missionaries made several attempts at translating the scriptures and other relevant books into Bengali but could not make much headway for want of Bengali types. Thus only Roman types could be used in books like Vocabulario em idioma Bengalla e Portuguez dividido em de as partes (A short list of Bengali vocabulary and an introduction to Bengali grammar, 1743) and A Book of Prayer and Catechism. The last two books were Bengali translations from Portuguese and published in London under the Bengali titles Prarthanamala and Proshnottarmala (c. 1765). The first Bengali book using Bengali movable types and Roman letters was A Grammar of the Bengali Language by Nathaniel Brassey Halhed. This was published in 1778 from Hooghly where the first printing press was established in Bengal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Halhed (b. 1751), was an erudite English scholar who came to India on the East India Company's assignment as a writer. In 1775, he joined the Supreme Court as an interpreter. Halhed, with the help and assistance of Warren Hastings, Governor General of Bengal, published A Grammar of the Bengali Language for which he used illustrations of Bengali letters and even few specimens of Bengali sentences. It is learnt that Halhed got Bengali types from Charles Wilkins, a civil servant of the company who undertook to make a set of Bengali types. The story goes that Panchanan Karmakar, a Bengali blacksmith, helped him in his project. To prepare a complete fount of Bengali type with six hundred individual letters was not an easy task. The Grammar of the Bengali language needed a full fount.

The first complete printed book in Bengali was Regulations for the Administration of Justice in the Courts of Dewannee Adaulat, popularly known as Regulation Impey Code. The book was published from the East India Company's Press.

During the last decade of the eighteenth century the Company's Press printed a number of Government publications in Bengali. They included a Bengali translation of The Regulation for the Administration of Justice in the Fouzdarry or Criminal Courts of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, a Bengali translation of The Regulations for the Guidance of the Magistrate, passed by the Governor General in Council in the Revenue Department on 18 May 1792 and a Bengali translation of Pitts Forster's Cornwallis Code in 1793.

In 1800 Serampore Mission was established with a view to propagating the Gospel among the natives. Carey, the leading luminary of the Mission and a great linguist of his time was looking for Bengali types for printing a series of books in Bengali which were mostly translations of the Gospel. By 1798 a type foundry was set up in Calcutta for preparing Bengali types under the supervision of Charles Wilkins. Bengali punches were cut by Panchanan along with his son-in-law, Manohar. Carey, after having persuaded Colebrook, another scholar, was able to hire Panchanan at Serampore for a few days. But the story goes that Carey detained Panchanan at Serampore where the latter greatly improved Bengali types as well as types in other eastern languages. The Serampore Mission and Press, established in 1800, published the first Bengali book entitled Mangal samachar motyer rachita (a 125-page book based on The Old Testament). The book was edited jointly by Thomas Carey and Ramram Bose and printed in the types prepared by Panchanan.

Next year Carey published his own work Kathopakathan (Dialogue), an illustration of simple, lucid, colloquial Bengali spoken by the common people of that time. The first unabridged translation of the Bible into Bengali was published probably the same year. The book, Dharmapustak, did not mention the date of publication. Another book, Pratapaditya charit, written by Ramram Bose, was published by the author from the Serampore Mission.

Between 1802 and 1834 the Serampore Mission published Hitopadesh (1802), translated from the original Sanskrit by Golaknath Pandit; Lipimala (1802) by Ramram Bose; Batrish sinhasan (1802) by Mrityunjay Vidyalankar; Tota itihas (1805) by Chandicharan Munshi, which was a translation from the Persian, Tutinama; Vedanta chandrika (1817); a Dictionary of Bengali Language (1818, 1825) compiled by William Carey in two volumes; the Ramayana of Krittibash in five volumes; the Mahabharata of Kashiram Das in four volumes; Maharaj Krishnachandra Rayosya charitram; Itihas mala, a collection of 150 short stories; Vidyaharaboli, a concise Bengali encyclopaedia in Bengali and Probodh chandrika of Mritunjay Tarkalankar. 1817 saw the birth of the School Book Society, an institution founded with the objective of the propagation of literacy among the natives. David Hare had taken the initiative to set up this institution with the joint efforts of both Europeans and Indians. The Society opened a bookshop in the College Street area in 1826 to make their own publications available to the reading public. This was the beginning of the College Street publication centre, which is now one of the biggest bookshop complexes in India. Many historians have mentioned the name of Gangakishore Bhattacharya, an employee of the Serampore Press as the first publisher of Bengali books in Calcutta. Gangakishore, whose name is connected with the publication of the first Bengali newspaper, established a printing press in Calcutta from where his first publication, Bharatchandra's Annadamangal was published. He built up his own marketing team, stationed in different parts of Bengal, who used to visit shops regularly and promote his publications. The Bengali book publication trade flourished when it received the patronage of Pandit Iswarchandra Vidyasagar. Vidyasagar was one of the pioneers in Bengali publication. He set up a retail shop of books published by him in the neighbourhood of the Sanskrit College. This was the first bookshop set up by a private owner.

Between 1840 and 1870 a place called Bot-tala in the Chitpur area became the centre of publication of Bengali books. The books published from this area were priced low and were written in cheap popular style. But in spite of their little literary value, they no doubt could foster reading habit among the common people. Very soon books from Bot-tala flooded the book markets in small towns. The Basumati Sahitya Mandir, one of the renowned publication houses of Bengal and publisher of a renowned daily Basumati, sprang up from Bot-tola. The publishing house set up by Upendra Mukherjee in the later part of nineteenth century was a pioneer in the publishing of paperbacks. In 1876, another famous Bengali publishing house, Gurudas Chattopadhyay and Sons, was founded. From a small bookshop, a full-fledged publishing home emerged in 1885. All Bengali authors of that time were connected with this publishing house. Dev Sahitya Kutir, another famous publishing house, was founded in 1924. Baradaprasad Mazumdar had initiated the project with a small printing press in 1860. Other important publishing houses of the early twentieth century included the Asutosh Library set up by Brindaban Dhar, the Book Company set up by Girindranath Mitra, A. Mukherjee & Co., by Amiyaranjan Mukherjee, Nani Gopal Chattopadhya & Co. by Abani Chatterjee, Central Book Agency by Jatindranath Sen, Modern Book Agency by Upendrachandra Bhattacharya and Dhiren Ghosh, and the DM Library by Gopaldas Mazumdar. The Bengali publication business is now a flourishing trade and currently 3000 titles are published every year. The total number of publishers involved in the Bengali book trade is 1400. Alongwith them there are about 3000 book-sellers in West Bengal. The total turn-over of the trade amounted to Rs. 60 crores in 1986-87.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

P.C.

BENGALI JOURNALS:

The history of Bengali journals started with the publication of Digdarshan, a monthly of the Serampore Mission Press, in April 1800. It was a socio-cultural periodical and contined till 1821. In 1818, the Serampore Mission Press published Samachar darpan, the first Bengali newspaper. It also serialised Dewan Chakraborty's Babur upakhyan (1821), Pramathnath Sharma's Nabababu bilas (1825), and Tekchand Thakur's Alaler gharer dulal (1858).

In 1821 Raja Rammohun Roy started publishing Brahman sebadhi in order to counter Serampore Mission's Samachar darpan and Digdarshan. He also published Sambad kaumudi in 1821. The Hindu Reform Movement began with the publication of these two periodicals. As a polemic to Rammohun's viewpoints, Samachar chandrika was published by Bhabanicharan Banerji to propagate the orthodox points of view.

In 1822 Pashvabali, the first illustrated Bengali scientific periodical devoted specially to ornithology, was published. Bangadut, a weekly, started printing in 1829 under the patronage of Raja Rammohun Roy and Dwijendranath Tagore. Sambad prabhakar, a weekly (daily in 1839), was published in 1831. Tattvabodhini patrika, a monthly, was pudblished in 1839 under the editorship of Devendranath Tagore. It covered a large variety of topics–literature, religion, philosophy, social reform, culture, and science. The Calcutta Vernacular Society published Bibidhartha sangraha, a monthly in 1851 dealing with archaeology, history, culture, art, literature and life-science under the editorship of Rajendralal Mitra. Somaprakash, a weekly, was published in 1857 under the patronage of Vidyasagar. It was the first organ of Indian nationalism in Bengal that raised its voice in public against British administration. Bamabodhini and the Abala bandhab were published in 1858 by the Brahmo Samaj for the propagation of the women's right in society. Keshavchandra Sen, leader of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, started publishing Sulabh samachar, a weekly, to fight against the oppression of the zamindars in Bengal. Under the leadership of Shivnath Shastri, the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj published Tattvakamudi in 1878, Samadarshi in 1874 and Sanjibani in 1883. The Amrit Bazar Patrika, a Bengali weekly, was published from a village in the Jessore District of present Bangladesh. In 1879 it became an English weekly, and from 1891 onwards it became an English daily, Bangabasi, a weekly, started publishing in 1881.

From 1872, with the publication of Bangadarshan, edited by Bankimchandra, a proper history of Bengali literary periodicals began. Basantaka, a weekly, was published in 1874. It was rich in sketches and cartoons. In 1877 Bharati was published from Jorasanko. It continued for fifty years and published writings by such writers as Dwijendranath Tagore, Rabindranath Tagore, Swarnakumari Debi, Manilal Gangopadhyay and Sourindramohan Tagore. Jnanankur was published in 1882, and Bharat varsha, a monthly, in 1885. Sahitya kalpadruma, later superseded as Sahitya, was published in 1889. The 1897 issue of Sahitya contained for the first time illustrations printed by the process of half-tone printing introduced by Upendrakishore Roychoudhury. Among its illustrious contributors were Rabindranath Tagore, Pramath Choudhury and Upendrakishore. Hitabadi, a weekly, was published in 1891. Rabindranath contributed to it. Basumati, a weekly, was published in 1896.

In 1896 the first electric rotary machine imported from England was used. In 1897 the most celebrated Bengali literary periodical, Pradip (a weekly), was published under the editorial supervision of Ramananda Chattopadhyay. For the first time a multi-colour block was printed in Bengal for this periodical. Rabindranath Tagore and Prabhatkumar Mukhopadhyay contributed to it. Ramananda also published Prabasi from Allahabad. Rabindranath and Abanindranath Tagore contributed to it. The Rabindraite periodical Sabujpatra was published in 1914. Rabindranath, Atuchandra Gupta, Dilipkumar Roy and Sudhindranath Dutta were among those who contributed to it. In the same year the anti-Rabindra forum published Narayan to which Bipinchandra Pal, Suresh Samajpati and Brajendranath Seal contributed. Uttara was published from Lucknow in 1925. Rabindranath, Mohitlal Majumdar, Kazi Nazrul Islam, Benoykumar Sarkar and Sailajananda Mukhopadhyay contributed to it. In the 1920s the celebrated Kallola era in Bengali literature was started with the publication of the Kallola.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.S. Kesavan, History of Printing and Publishing in India, Vol. I (New Delhi, 1985); Chittaranjan Bandyopadhyaya (ed.), Dui shataker Bangla mudran o prakashan (Calcutta, 1981); Sukumar Sen, Batatalar chhap o chhabi (Calcutta, 1984).

Bik.B.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Dogri). Before the advent of printing presses in the Dogri-speaking area, handwritten books were produced, using handmade indigenous paper. This paper was manufactured in Jammu in accordance with the formula known as the Sialkoti technique. Some of the books produced were illustrated with miniature paintings and drawings with locally made ink and colours. Jammu was known for its colours and indelible and bright ink. These books were in demand in places like Lahore, Sialkot, Haridwar, etc. and found patrons among rajas and maharajas of the former Punjab Hill States. The first printed book in Dogri produced by William Carey of the Serampore Mission in Bengal was Dharmapustak, a translation of the New Testament, published in 1825. The Gospel of Luke was similarly published by them in 1826.

The first printing press for printing Dogri and Hindi books was established in Jammu in 1858. It was called Sri Saraswati Prakash Press and its first published work was Valmiki Ramayana. This was during the reign of Maharaja Ranbir Singh (1856-1885), who rendered great service to the cause of the Dogri language, alphabet, and printing and publishing in Duggar. During his reign, translations of books on religion, philosophy, mathematics, ayurveda, astrology, law, etc., were printed in Dogri script. The original 'Takari' script was then in use in Duggar, which the Maharaja got reformed by providing matras from Devanagari, and enforced Dogri in this script as the official language in Jammu so that it was used in the state currency, postage-stamps, notes, stamp papers, etc. Some books were printed by the litho process. Types were cast and the most voluminous book Vyavaharagita in Dogri was printed. During Maharaja Ranbir Singh's time, several printing presses were set up in Jammu. In 1860, Vidya Vilas Press was established, followed by Sri Raghunath Press, Jangi Press, Durbar Press and Council Press among others. Outside Jammu, Bharati Prakash Press was established at Uttarbahini, a place of pilgrimage. The first Dogri book published from one of these presses was Bal bodh, the first Dogri primer. In 1873, Lilavati, a Dogri translation of a book of mathematics, done by Jyotishi Vishveshwar, was published, and in 1876, Karima, a translation from Persian done by Mirza Sadiq Ali 'Dehlavi', was printed and published. In 1884, Vyavaharagita, a text book of 1230 pages written by Jyotishi Vishveshwar was published. All these were printed at Vidya Vilas Press. In 1904, a collection of title deeds (pattas) of Bhadrawah state was published from Ranbir Prakash Press. The first extant published poster was printed in 1907 during Maharaja Pratap Singh's reign. Thereafter, one comes across Santram Shastri's Manoranjan bhajanmala and Gauri Shankar's Dogri translation of Srimad-bhagavadgita printed and published from Lahore, and Hardutt Shastri's two volumes of Dogri bhajanmala published from Jammu in the 30's.

Creative literature really started getting printed and published from Jammu in the forties with Dinubhai Pant's three poetic works, Guttulun, Vir Gulab and Mangu di chhabil and B.P. Sathe's collection of short stories Paihla phull. All these were printed in Devanagari script. The Takari script or 'Dogre Akkhar' was given up in favour of Devanagari for various reasons, one of them being the non-availability of facilities for printing. In 1957, the average was one book a year, in 1977 five and in 1987 ten to twelve books. The total number of Dogri books published so far is well below a thousand.

Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages occupies the most prominent position as publisher of Dogri books, translations and journals, followed by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu. The present state of printing and publishing in Dogri is that in the absence of commercial potential and dearth of readership, it is in doldrums.

Om.G.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Gujarati) can be divided broadly into two periods: (i) from 1812 to 1918 and (ii) from 1919 onwards, commencing with Gandhiji's influence on the social, cultural and political life of Gujarat.

Fardoonjee Marzban, a Parsi, pioneered Gujarati publishing, having started the first printing press equipped with Gujarati types in 1812. In 1814, he brought out a Hindu 'panchang' (a calendar) which was well received by the people. His next publication in 1815, Dabestan, a Gujarati translation of a Persian work, also sold very well. He published some twenty books, mostly translations from Persian works, in 35 years, i.e., up to 1850. Being conversant with the Persian language, he found it convenient to translate and publish them all by himself. One of his books, Goshitala (a book on the disease of small-pox), attracted the attention of the government which purchased its copies in bulk for free distribution among the people.

Later, three noteworthy firms entered this field. In 1870, Mahadeo Ramchandra Jagushte, started trading in Gujarati books at Ahmedabad with the sole interest in religious literature. The Gujarati Printing Press and M/s. N.M. Tripathi (Bombay) entered the publishing field in 1884 and 1888 respectively. The latter was established keeping in view the publications of great classics like Saraswatichandra, authored by the publisher's brother Govardhanram Tripathi.

Ichchharam Suryaram Desai, proprietor of Gujarati

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Printing Press, started a weekly, Gujarati, in 1880 and set up a printing press in 1884. He wrote and published his first book, Hind and Brittania (India and Great Britain), which aroused a strong feeling in the country to the extent that it had to be referred to the Viceroy for necessary legal action, but he took a lenient view. Besides being a great scholar, Desai had a flair for publishing and marketing books. He touched almost every possible subject, publishing historical and social novels, biographies, scholarly research treatises, compilation of old poetic works, translations of Sanskrit classics, Ayurvedic medical books, etc. His notable publications which continued selling for a number of years, were three parts of Chandrakant, a spiritual novel, Brihat kavya dohan in nine volumes and the translation of the Mahabharata into Gujarati. It was a great achievement that, in spite of modest economic and literary resources, he established a big publishing house. His publishing and selling insight kept this institution alive against heavy odds.

There were people who considered a book an instrument of social reform. With a view to providing books for that noble cause at a lower price, Durgaram Mehtaji of Surat started an institution called 'Pustak Prasarak Mandali' (Society for promotion of books). He sought the government's permission for setting up a press in 1830, which was not accorded; he therefore, had to start it outside the city limits.

For a similar purpose, under the inspiration of Alexander Forbes, the Gujarat Vernacular Society was established in 1848. As a part of its various activities, it published 81 books in 30 years. They were mainly on social reforms, but also included other subjects like education, literature, health, medicine, poetry, etc. It also had a plan to publish a dictionary for a larger circulation. There was no systematic market for books, especially on these subjects and hence the society had to seek funds from the people. Its aim was to make available an adequate number of books for the spread of education at a modest price. In short, the Gujarat Vernacular Society developed publishing activity solely as service to society.

The publishers around 1900 took pains to procure medieval unpublished manuscripts, mostly those of poetry. By making them available in print, they rendered a great service to society. Gujarat Vernacular Society was the first to publish a compilation of poetry Kavyadohan (Poetry digest), more than 3000 copies of which were sold out within a short period. Following the same trend, the Gujarati Printing Press brought out nine big volumes of ancient and medieval poetry. Thereafter Hargovind Kantawala and Nathashankar Shastri edited and published some 30 volumes, each by a different poet, with financial assistance from the Maharaja of Baroda. This indicates that people had a taste for poetry as well as prose.

Owing to the non-availability of original manuscripts, the publishers, barring the Gujarati Printing Press, had to depend upon adaptations from the works in English language. These publications had little literary value as they were aimed at social reform.

By the end of the 19th century, Ratanjee Framjee Shethana conceived the idea of compiling and publishing the first ever encyclopaedia in Gujarati. The Gyan Prasarak Mandali, a society for propagation of knowledge, provided financial assistance to the project. He worked on this project, namely 'Gyanchakra', for nearly fifteen years, bringing out its first volume in 1897, and the ninth, the last volume, in 1912. These works have some 9850 entries, consisting of a variety of topics such as geography, music, mathematics, astronomy, astrology and dramatics.

As the publications of the Gujarati Printing Press were commercial, they were a bit highly priced. A saint, Bhikshu Akhandanadji, was shocked at the high price of the Gita quoted to him. He started a mission which would publish books at nominal price. In the year 1907, under the aegis of the Sastu Sahitya Vardhak Karyalaya, he brought out books of utility. They were mostly on subjects like religion, Ayurvedic medicine, biographies and translations; and all expenses, including the author's remuneration, were economised upon. 'Sastu Sahitya' launched a scheme to provide books on annual subscription basis under the name of 'Vividh Granthamala' and thereby sold more than 5000 copies of books even before they were published. Even today the publications of Sastu Sahitya enjoy people's respect.

Second phase: With a view to propagating his political and social views, Gandhiji started a weekly Navajivan, at Ahmedabad in 1919. Under the influence of this great leader, the younger generation took part in various activities launched by him. Those who had a flair for literature started propagating Gandhian literature and took to publishing as a profession. The Gandhi Sahitya Mandir at Surat came into existence in 1921 to publish Gandhiji's books in Gujarati, but later it specialised in literature for children and women. The Gujar Grantha Ratna Karyalaya, Navyug Sahitya Mandir, R.R. Sheth & Co., Prasthan Karyalaya and Bharati Sahitya Sangh too started disseminating Gandhian literature, but later took to publishing as a profession. Some of these publishers are still in existence, and have established themselves commercially, in spite of the testing times. Nevertheless, their survival is dependent on government grants.

For the promotion of Gandhian views and literature, Navajivan Sahitya Mandir entered the field in 1924. Its initial publications were Gandhiji's books, Hind Swaraj (Indian self-government) and Dakshin Africa na satyagraha no itihas (History of non-violent movement in South Africa); later, it brought out books on various other subjects such as education, national movement, social reforms, etc. It has today catalogued books written by noted personalities like Kishorlal Mashruwala, Kaka Kalelkar, Mahadeo Desai, Kedarnath, Acharya Kripalani, Morarji Desai, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. The outstanding traits of Navajivan publications are simplicity, good taste and quality production. It has been working on an ambitious project of publishing the collected works of Mahatma Gandhi in Gujarati since 1967, and by now out of ninety volumes, seventy have been published.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

About this time, Gujarat Vidyapith was established to disseminate Gandhiji's views on education, and it started publishing books to fulfil its object. Its publications are much like those of Navajivan Sahitya Mandir. Many of them are on adult education, which was one of the main concerns of the Mahatma. Its other publications are on philosophy, religion and allied subjects.

Before Independence, Gujarat consisted of several states, which were later merged. The rulers of Bhavnagar, Limbdi, Baroda and Gondal were great patriots and had a flair for literature. The latter two contributed considerably to Gujarati publishing. Sayajirao Gaekwad, Maharaja of Baroda, was of the view that every village, irrespective of its location, should have a school, and in every school there should be a library. He was instrumental in the establishment of some two thousand libraries in the state; and this in turn increased the marketability of books. Over and above this, under the banner of Bayaji Sahitya Mala (a series of books for adults) and Sayaji Bal Sahitya Mala (a series of books for children), he tried to provide good reading material to the people. But this effort was not effective as it had to be implemented through the government machinery.

The most valuable and noteworthy contribution in this direction was the compilation of a monumental dictionary by Bhagawatsinhji of Gondal. Bhagwatsinhji, after the hard and sustained work of nearly thirty years, published nine big volumes of Bhagwadgomandal. The print-run was limited to only 500 copies. It was made available to the public at much below the cost-price. It was indeed, a valuable contribution to Gujarati literature and publishing. Notwithstanding some factual errors, it can be valued as an achievement—a fruit of hard labour. A similar ambitious attempt is being made by the Gujarat Vishvakosh Trust, involving a budget of over a crore of rupees.

Today two public trusts are engaged in catering to the needs of people and inculcating in them the reading habit and thirst for knowledge. Parichaya Trust has been regularly bringing out two booklets every month for the past thirty years. They are on a variety of subjects written by experts. Lokmilap Trust, again, is engaged in providing people rich literature almost at cost price.

The publishers like Gujarati Sahitya Parishad (Ahmedabad), Gujarat Sahitya Sabha (Ahmedabad), Gujarat Vidya Sabha (formerly Gujarat Vernacular Society, Ahmedabad), Forbes Gujarati Sabha (Bombay), B.J. Vidya Bhawan (Ahmedabad), Chunnilal Gandhi Vidya Bhawan (Surat) and all the five universities of Gujarat are engaged to bring out scholarly works. In the recent years the Gujarat Sahitya Academy has also started a similar activity.

The series of books, published by Sardar Vallabhbhai University, are worth mentioning. They are Jnan gangotri, running in 30 volumes, and Vigyan ane yantravidya kosh, a technical encyclopaedic dictionary in 10 volumes.

The University Grantha Nirman Board in Gujarat is also bringing out a good number of books at the university level. The Central Government is financially assisting such boards in each state to promote this activity. The project has proved quite fruitful in Gujarat.

Va. M.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Hindi). Charless Wilkins can be considered the pioneer in the art of preparing types of the Devanagari and Bengali alphabets. He taught the art to an Indian blacksmith, Panchanan Karmakar, who in turn taught it to other Indian technicians. This is how the base for printing in Hindi originated.

Wilkins was born sometime during 1749-50. He came to Bengal in 1770 as a clerk in the service of the East India Company. He was the first Englishman to learn Sanskrit. He translated the Bhagvadgita, Hitopadesha and Shakuntla into English. It is stated by C.E. Buckland that he published a grammar of Sanskrit in 1779. In this book Sanskrit words were probably printed in Roman characters. The second edition of this book was published in 1808, and he prepared a fount of types of Devanagari characters for its printing.

Charles Wilkins had prepared types of Devanagari script as early as 1795. Prior to this Carey's grammar of Marathi had been published in 1805 and his grammar of Sanskrit in 1806, in both of which Devanagari types were used. We find that even before this, in 1802 Devanagari types were used for the printing of a thesis prepared by the students of the Serampore College, a copy of which is available in the National Library, Calcutta. There is also another book in this Library, Grammar of the Hindustanee Language by John Gilchrist, printed at the Chronicle Press in Calcutta in 1796, in which the Devanagari types were used. This is probably the earliest instance of Devanagari printing in India.

In Europe, printing in Devanagari script started much earlier. In the private collection of Sunitikumar Chatterjee there exists a book printed in Europe in 1743 in which the Devanagari letters were used. In the library of Santiniketan there is a book which was printed in Rome in 1771 in which Devanagari types were used. Another copy of the same book exists in the library of the Asiatic Society of Bombay.

In the beginning of 1803, the missionaries had made considerable progress in the preparation of a fount of Devanagari types. The Devanagari is known as the parent of alphabets of various Indian languages and according to mythological tradition, the special gift of the gods. Soon after the establishment of the press at Serampore, the native blacksmith Panchanan, who had been instructed in the art of punch cutting by Charles Wilkins, came to the missionaries in search of employment. Carey was then contemplating work on a Sanskrit grammar, for which it was necessary to obtain Devanagari types and Panchanan was engaged for the work.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It is interesting to see that Nana Fadanavis of Poona, a famous figure in Indian history, first conceived the idea of printing the Bhagavadgita by getting moulds of Marathi letters in Devanagari script prepared by a coppersmith student who was trained at a school of painting and sculpture which he had started with the cooperation of Charles Mallet, the then Resident. The practice of making copies of the Bhagavadgita in beautiful handwriting and offering them to Brahmins was at that time much in vogue. Nana Fadanavis had collected a number of such beautiful written manuscripts of the Gita from centres like Jaipur, Kashi and Mathura. He, therefore, started acquiring moulds of letters prepared by skilled technicians at Poona.

The art of printing entered India for the first time on 6 September 1556. Printing in the Devanagari character in Goa started in the second half of the nineteenth century. In 1853, the government press purchased Devanagari types from Bombay, for use in printing advertisements and other notices in the Government paper, Bolentim doo Governo. The first notice printed in Marathi characters appeared in this periodical on 27 May 1853. Some of the earliest books printed in Devanagari script in this press are: (i) Codigo dos Usos e costumes dos habitantes das Novas Conquiostas (Usages and customs of the inhabitants of the Novas Conquistas, 1854), (ii) Abeccaario em Marata (a Marathi Primer in Devanagari script, 1867). (iii) Issapa-Niti-catha (Aesop's Fables, 1867). Some scholars are of the opinion that the first book entitled China Illustrated appeared in 1675 in Devanagari in Europe and another in 1771 in Rome.

Udant martand is the first newspaper in Hindi which was started on 30 May 1826 in Calcutta. This was a patriotic venture giving news and views besides reflecting Indian culture. The editor and publisher of this newspaper was Pt. Yugal Kishore Shukul. Bandoot appeared in 1829 and Samachar sudhavarshan daily in 1854 from Calcutta. Thereafter, a number of newspapers and journals in Hindi emerged form various cities. Banaras samachar, Martand, Jnandeep, Malwa samachar, Sudhakar, Buddhi prakash, Kavi vachan sudha, etc. appeared before 1868. Saraswati was published in 1900. It was a period of literary journalism. Eminent writers were the editors of these magazines. Bharatendu Harishchandra was the editor of Kavivachan sudha and Mahavirprasad Dwivedi edited Saraswati for years together.

The publication of books was simultaneously done by various presses. In India some old publishers like Venkateshwar Press (Bombay), Naval Kishor Press, Laxminarayan Press (Muradabad), Khadag Vilas Press (Patna) published a number of books in Hindi in the nineteenth century.

Hindi is a major Indian language. It is claimed that over 40 crore people speak this language. However, books published in Hindi constitute hardly 14 per cent of the total books published in India. For every 10 lakh people, the world average is 124 books; it is 48 books in Asia; so far as Hindi is concerned, it is less than 9 books.

In spite of four decades and odd years of Independence and the huge area comprising six states—Himachal Pradesh, Haryana, Rajasthan, Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Bihar and the Union Territory of Delhi—where it is the State language, the premier status accorded to Hindi as a link language and all the lavish patronage showered upon it by the Union and the state governments, Hindi publishing remains almost where it was. It can hardly claim any headway over some of the more advanced regional languages in spite of the fact that we have twice as many books published in Hindi every year as, say, in Bengali.

It is a unique feature that most of the leading Hindi writers like Premchand, Maithilisharan Gupta, Ramdhari Singh 'Dinkar', Jainendra Kumar, Yashpal and Upendranath 'Ashk' had their own publishing houses.

Hardly any publisher in Hindi can claim to have built up any author. No scouting for talent. No building of images. No commissioning of manuscripts as such. Modern publishing may claim so but not earlier times.

Hindi publishing has, however, made considerable progress in mass audience books or low priced books in pocket book series brought out by whether Hindi Pocket Books, or Star Publications, or some other publishing organisations including Publications Division, Government of India's books for millions series. Hindi does have a massive readership born out of its sheer size. Inevitably, it has low taste that the paperbacks can famously pander to. Some of the titles in Hindi paperbacks have enjoyed massive print-runs up to 5 lakh copies.

At present there are 10,000 publishers in India. The Hindi publishing is a flourishing trade and now about three thousand titles are published every year. The total number of publishers engaged in Hindi book trade is around three thousand. There are 6000 book-sellers selling Hindi books with their other publications. The total turn over of the trade amounts to Rs. 6 crore as regards sale of general books in Hindi in 1989.

Now-a-days a large number of publishers are located in the capital - Rajpal & Sons, Atma Ram & Sons, Hind Pocket Books, Gobind Ram Hasanand, Raj Kamal, Kitab Ghar, Vivek Prakashan, National Publishing House, Radha Krishna, etc. Besides, there are a number of publishing organisations in public sector which bring out books in Hindi along with other Publications, viz. Sahitya Akademi, Publications Division, NCERT, NBT, Central Hindi Directorate, Hindi Sansthan, Granth Akademies in various states.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A few leading publishers of general books in other cities are : Hindi Pracharak Sansthan, Varanasi and Allahabad; Hindi Granth Ratnakar, Bombay; Lok Bharti, Allahabad; Leader Press, Allahabad; Vaidik Yantralaya, Ajmer.

The modern printing technology has also made book publishing easy. Though the number of books is increasing it is nothing to boast of when we compare it with the international standards. The onslaught of electronic media, especially video and television, is cutting into the readership. A concerted effort is to be made to cultivate reading habit and to bring out good books at reasonable prices. Here the public sector has a vital role to play. In India both private and public sectors are playing complementary role. But in the area of book publishing the public sector has much more responsibility to shoulder.

Sh. S.S.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Kannada) has a history of more than 150 years. The first book with movable types in Kannada was printed in 1817 at Serampore near Calcutta. As a part of publishing books in regional languages, William Carey, a missionary, printed a grammar entitled A Grammar of the Curnate Language. It contains grammatical principles in English with examples in Kannada script. Though there are inaccuracies in the form and shape of the letters, this is the first known instance of casting types in Kannada. William Carey, whose aim in founding a printing press was to publish material in regional languages which helped his missionary activities, began to accept printing works from other Christian Missions also.

The next book to be printed in Kannada was again another grammar, a bigger one, by William Meckerell. A Grammar of the Karnatic Language, was printed in 1820. William Reeve of the London Mission took up a gigantic task of publishing an English-Kannada Dictionary at the Fort St. George Press, Madras (1824). It contained nearly 3000 pages of demy quarto size. Kannada words are in lithograph. That within a period of seven years of the first printing in Kannada a voluminous dictionary saw the light of the day is not a small achievement. Slate slabs of Cuddapah were popular in litho printing. In the first phase, we find Bellary and Madras becoming centres of printing and publishing. Types of different sizes and founts evolved and the most popular was the one resembling the Telugu script. Books on religion, astronomy etc, and collections of ballads, songs and folk stories were usually brought out. Pioneers in the field at this time were Shivalingam Shetty and Koneri Shetty of Bellary. They used to get books printed in Madras, and then published and sold at different places in Karnataka. Books were cartloaded and taken from place to place; weekly shanties, car festivals and other social and religious congregations were places for selling books. In fact, the Shetty brothers fostered interest in reading in the early years of printing and publishing. Books were printed with a square type of letters at the famous Saraswati Ratnakara Press of Madras.

By 1863, a printing press was installed at Bellary. Almost at the same time, the Basel Mission Press of Bangalore started printing books. James Hands printed the first part of the New Testament in Kannada in the year 1870. This is the first Kannada book, printed and published in Karnataka. This marks the second phase in Kannada printing. The Department of Education took interest in this area. Thousands of copies of text books in languages, arithmetic and geography were printed. The British administration began to suspect the motive behind the hectic publication activity that was going on in the country and an act was passed in 1867 making it compulsory for every printing house to send two copies of the publication it printed, free of cost. This was called the 'Books and Registration Act'.

In Mangalore, the Bassel Mission Press brought out a few classics of Kannada like the Jaimini Bharata, Dasara padagalu, compilation of proverbs and Hitopadesha. Kittel published the Kannada-English Dictionary, the only standard dictionary even today. He published a grammar book also. Publications like Prakkavya malike are excellently printed. The Basel Press had a variety of types in Kannada. It is really unfortunate that these founts are not at all found today. The Karnataka Book Depot of Dharwar and the Kalanidhi Book Depot of Bangalore did a marvellous job in printing and publishing in Kannada. T.N. Krishnayya Shetty, Velandadu B.Subbayya and Vajapeya Govindayya are some of the prominent names in the field. Chamarajokti vilasa Ramayana, Vanivilasa Bharata and the Bhagavata were great both in volume and in quality printing. In Mysore, there were beautiful litho printing presses like Jaganmohana Shilayantra in addition to the Wesley Press. Books then printed in fine colours have been preserved even to this day at the Oriental Research Institute, Mysore. Sri tatva nidhi is one such work. Gadugina Bharata, Lakshmisha's Jaimini Bharata, the verses of Sarvajna and cantos of Amarakosha were printed. Much work was done by Venkata Rango Katti and Gangadhara Madivaleswara Turamari in the Bombay-Karnataka area. There were translators appointed by the Department of Education to translate and publish text books written by western scholars on geometry, geography and natural sciences. Text books of this period contain fine colour pictures and line drawings to illustrate the text. The language, the style, the get-up of the book—all these are worthy of being models even to this day.

There is more private sector involvement in the third phase of printing and publishing activity in Kannada. Many book clubs were started with the aim of taking good literature to readers. Karnataka Kavya Kalanidhi, Karnataka Kavya Manjari, Manohara Granthamala, Vahini Kai

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Hottage, Minchina Balli are some of these. Manohara Granthamala has just now celebrated its Golden Jubilee. Ondane Male of Bala Sahitya Sangha, Mangalore and Antaranga of Udupi need special mention. More than 200 booklets were published on various topics in the Ondane Male series.

Publishing houses like Kavyalaya, Satya Shodhana, Vidyanidhi, Standard Book Depot, Subodha Kusumanjali, Samaja Pustakalaya were started. Fiction, poetry, drama, biography, translations, children's literature, etc., became popular. Kavyalaya of K.Chidambaram brought many new authors to light and published books of almost all major authors in Kannada. Fine taste in selection, prompt dealings with authors and meticulous care in production brought a very good name to Kavyalaya.

Another important feature of this age is the growth of book sellers along with the growth of publishers. Many of them were only book sellers and not publishers and many publishers had no sales network of their own. Hence, both could thrive well.

Universities have also contributed their mite to the progress of printing and publishing. The University of Mysore was the first to start this. Organising lecture camps in rural areas and publishing the lectures and booklets was one of the major activities undertaken by the Teachers Association of the University. This won wide recognition, and was praised as the Mysore experiment. This was an important step taken in promoting adult education and at the same time this became the nucleus ('Prasaranga') for disseminating knowledge. The booklets were sold at two annas (twelve paisa). Gradually many more series were included. Critical editions and abridgements of classics, research and criticism, special lectures, text books and other types of books were published in hundreds. Today, the Prasaranga of Mysore has more than 1500 titles on its list. Mysore University is also in charge of the fourteen-volume Kannada vishwakosha (Kannada Encyclopaedia) project, of which twelve volumes have been published. It also provided an example to other universities, viz., Karnatak University and Bangalore University. They soon followed and established their own Prasarangas. Gulbarga University also has started the publication of books recently. The Agricultural University has not lagged behind. Already it has published more than 200 titles on agriculture and animal husbandry. Every university has planned different series covering a large range of subjects.

The Kannada Sahitya Parishat, under its 'Trai Varshika Male' and 'Belli Bitta Balli', National Book Trust under its 'Adan Pradan', 'Nehru Bala Pustakalaya' and 'Taruna Bharati', Sahitya Akademi under its 'Makers of Indian Literature' and other series are publishing quite a good number of books in Kannada.

The Rashtrothana Parishat of Bangalore brought out 510 booklets in the series Bharata-Bharati Pustaka Sampada, under the editorship of Professor L.S. Sheshagiri Rao to acquaint young readers with the great and radiant personalities of Indian mythology and history from the earliest times to recent epochs.

With regard to private participation, we find hundreds of publishers involved in the activity. To mention a few leading concerns, I.B.H. Prakashana, D.V.K. Murthy, Geetha Book House, Rajalakshmi Prakashana, Sarada Mandira, etc., have achieved heights in the field. IBH has variety and quality both in its content and in its production. Kannada Nadu Mattu Kannadigara Parampare, Echo Pustaka, Amara Chitra Kathe, Chimpu Pustaka, Krishi Vichara Male, Vritti Sikshana Male, Vijanana Nodu Kali are a few popular series of this concern. Particularly, in the field of children's literature, the role played by IBH Prakashana is remarkable.

Nava Karnataka has two wings of activities. One is the distribution of Soviet books in Kannada, and the other publishing their own series of books. 'Krantikidigalu' is a new series that introduces the heroic struggle of many freedom fighters of the country. 'Viswa katha kosa' is a major landmark in the history of publishing in Kannada. Twenty-five volumes of short stories collected from different lands of the world are compiled under the chief editorship of Niranjana. Mention must be made of Jnana gangotri (ed. Niranjana) and seven-volume junior encyclopaedia brought out by the Karnataka Sahakari Prakasana, Bangalore.

Samaja Pustakalaya has been doing laudable service in North Karnataka. It has a variety of books to its credit. The encouragement they give to new writers is commendable. Several religious institutions have publication projects of their own and they have contributed considerably to the world of Kannada books.

Printing has passed various stages of wooden types, litho printing, letter press composing and printing, monolino, and offset printing, and now we find photo-composing becoming more and more popular.

While lino type is widely used for newspapers, the monotype method has been popular among book publishers. The universities of Karnataka have brought out beautiful books printed in monotypes. The main centres of Kannada printing are Bangalore, Mysore, Mangalore and Dharwar. The story of printing from Carey's attempt to photo-setting at Manipal Power Press is very interesting. All methods of printing have been developed at different times. Though experiments have been made to evolve different types of letters, the widely used types are Roman and Brindavan. There is a great scope for innovation and experiment in the field of typography. Presses like the BBD Press of Bangalore and the Manipal Power Press of Manipal have secured national awards for excellence in printing a number of times from the DAVP.

During these 150 years, printing and publishing in Kannada has found steady growth, even though there is scope for innovation of different type faces and binding of books. We may say that in general there has been a steady development. The University of Mysore is publishing a Descriptive Bibliography of Books Printed in Kannada, a huge project covering the years from 1817 to 1967. Nine volumes covering about 30000 titles have been published so far. The project is now made a permanent one and annual supplements are being published. So far five such supplements have been published covering the field up to 1980. According to this significant publication, approximately 90,000 books have been published till 1967. There is another important source which could furnish data regarding book publication activity in Kannada. It is a journal devoted to book industry in Kannada and is very aptly called Granthaloka (started in 1977). According to the data given by this monthly magazine, on an average 1300 books are being published every year in Kannada.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

R.L.A.R.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Konkani). The first printing press in moveable types in India and the whole of the East was established in Goa in 1556 in rather fortuitous circumstances, for the machinery package sent as a gift to the legendary Christian king in the East, the 'Prester John' (Emperor of Abyssinia), by the King of Portugal, landed in Goa, the opulent seat of the then Portuguese Eastern empire, and could not be taken to its destination owing to the prevailing disturbed conditions. It was decided to instal it in Goa, which was done in the same year and the first books composed by the missionaries were printed in it. As a direct consequence of this event of great importance, Konkani was endowed with the first books that came out of the press along with books in Portuguese. The foreign missionaries of various nationalities and religious orders who had followed the Portuguese military and civil authorities after the conquest of Goa in 1510, had just been mastering the Konkani language so as to write in it the first catechisms and manuals of Christian doctrine, sermons and guides on parish work, and literary compositions in prose and poetry in the language they were fascinated with. Juan Bustamante, the Spanish printer of the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits) which set up the press, is recorded as having printed the first books that it brought out, among them being a Doutrina Crista (Christian doctrinal guide) in Konkani and Conclusoes Philosophicas inPortuguese. These are the first publications of that press in 1556 itself. This first printed Konkani work is reported to be a translation done by a neo-Christian Goan convert studying for priesthood in the Seminary of the Holy Faith in the city of Goa (now Old Goa), most probably Andre Vaz of Carambolim village on the outskirts of the city, later ordained as the first Goan Christian priest. He is reported to have prepared the first draft of Konkani grammar on the descriptive model to teach the language to the foreign priests, based on which the Jesuit Thomas Stephens wrote an elaborate version. It is the conclusive opinion of scholars based on letters of the Jesuit priests of that period that this Konkani book on Christian doctrine was already printed and in circulation in 1556 itself. Thus Konkani has the honour of having the first printed books in any Indian language, among them the first printed grammar. No trace is now availabe of that book.

Among the early printed books in Konkani which have been found are : the Doutrina Crista of Thomas Stephens published in 1622, the same author's Konkani Grammar on the descriptive model, as mentioned above, ultimately published in 1640 after his death in 1617; the Acharievanta or Sant Antonichim Acharyam of Antonio Saldanha, an original prose work; and Sermons of Miguel de Almeida. The magnum opus of that period of more than a hundred years of feverish endeavour of printing and publishing activity that produced grammars, dictionaries and works of prose and poetry, aimed at disseminating Christian teachings as well as using the language as a medium of literary expression, was the Onivalleancho Mollo (Garden of shepherds), a theological, metaphysical prose-poem of sublime proportions, in five voluminous tomes, published in 1658-59, on the lines of the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas. Thomas Stephens's Krista Purana (1616), a poem of 11,018 strophes in Marathi-Konkani on his own declaration, or in hieratic Konkani, as Dr. Gerson da Cunha labels it, on the life of Christ, in the 'ovi' verse pattern, re-edited and printed and published subsequently in Rachol, Goa, Mangalore and Poona, in 1649,1654,1907 and 1956 respectively, the last printing being in Devanagari characters, is another outstanding specimen of the printed work of that golden period of copious output.

There was later a period of relative decline in the printing and publishing activity until the rise of journalism at the turn of the nineteenth century. However, the first five Konkani journals/newspapers saw the light of the day only in 1889, with Udentechem Sallok (Lotus of the east) being published from Poona, as a fortnightly, though the first newspaper in Goa, the Gazeta de Goa was in Portuguese, the language of the rulers, and was published in 1821. Many weeklies, fortnightlies and dailies followed suit, published mainly from Bombay and Poona, the areas of greatest concentration of Goan emigrants. Books too began to be published, the novel holding the pride of place, from 1889 onwards. Grammatical works and lexicograhic compilations in bilingual form were also published in Bombay and Goa.

Konkani books and periodicals have been printed in Roman, Devanagari, Kannada, Malayalam and even Perso-Arabic or Urdu characters, owing to the dispersal of the Konkani-speaking people mainly among the coastal belt, constituting the states of Maharashtra, Goa, Karnataka and Kerala, and their varied religious complexion which includes mainly Hindus, Christians and Muslims, in that order of numerical bulk. While the installation of a printing press in Roman types ushered in that script into Konkani in 1556, dislodging the old Kandevi script which was akin to old Kannada and in which most of the old Goan village commune records are found written, though no printed work has been found in it so far, Kannada script that was adopted by the Goan emigrants to Karnataka in the seventeenth century onwards came to be printed. The Kodiabail Press of the Jesuits in Mangalore established at the end of the nineteenth century gave a fillip to literary work in Konkani that was published after being printed in that press in Kannada characters. Flourishing literary work gets printed and published in that script in Mangalore and other towns of Karnataka and in Bombay too where there is a nucleus of emigrants from Mangalore, especially in the realm of the short-story and the novel, and in literary periodicals in profusion. Drama too gets printed and published as well as collections of poems but in much less quantity than the other two genres.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In Goa the printing activity in the latest phase has been overwhelmingly in the Roman script, consisting of books and periodicals, the former being mainly in the domain of the movel, with a sprinkling of biography, short-stories, poetry, drama, while the latter consists of the whole range from dailies, weeklies, fortnightlies to monthlies and even annuals of quarterlies. The two dailies at present in Roman script and Devanagari script are respectively Goencho Avaz and Sunaparant. There has also been a lot of fitful activity in this field, with many a periodical seeing the light of the day and being snuffed out soon. Printing activity in the Devanagari script also has picked up enough momentum to publish a number of books, occupying almost the central place in Konkani in recent years, in the realm of the short-story, poetry and drama, the other genres not meriting enough attention and all this is mainly done in Goa.

The printing work in Malayalam script centred in pockets like Cochin and Alleppey in Kerala in Konkani, to cater to the needs of that tiny minority in that State. There is a virtual wholesale switchover now to the Devanagari script among the Konkani writers there, and the latest books being printed and published are in that script. Very little of the Perso-Arabic script work has been printed and published, which was due to the contribution of Muslim Konkani-speaking people of the coastal areas of Bhatkal, Honnavar, etc. of the North Kanara (Uttar Kannada) district of Karnataka. A few periodicals get published in these scripts in Konkani.

There has been very little organised publishing in Konkani on a commercial scale. Reliance is placed on assistance in the form of purchase of books by Government, which is hard to come by easily. Publishing houses have been few and far between to take up publication on a regular basis. Whatever publishing activity takes place in the Konkani region, mainly in and around Goa and Mangalore, is propelled by individual initiative or at the instance of a daring individual publisher of small-time status, or at the author's own expense, or subsidised by friends, or sponsored by some benefactor. The publishers hardly compensate the writer for his labour of love in monetary terms.

Desk-top publishing systems have recently been introduced into the Konkani world of printing and publishing and its impact is expected to be quite impressive, given the nature of the quick work it can turn out. Offset printing completes the process of publication of a book in a much better shape than the normal printer. The effect on prices of books will have to be watched for these systems to come to fruition and success.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Antonio Garcia, 'A imprensa em Goa-O, IV Centenario da imprensa em Goa 1556-1956' in Boletim do Instituto Vasco da Gama (BIVG), No. 73, Goa (1956); Jaime Rangal, 'A imprensa in Goa' in BIVG, No. 73, Goa (1956); Jose Pereira, Konkani—A Language (Dharwar, 1971); Mariano Saldanha, 'A Primeira imprensa em Goa' in BIVG, No. 73, Goa (1956); Olivinho Gomes, Konkani Sorospoticho Itihas—ek supul' lo niall' in Konkani (Goa, 1989).

O.G.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Maithili). Mithila has its own script known as 'Tirhuta' or 'Mithilakshar'. When the British Government introduced modern education in this region, they adopted the Persian or the Nagari script. Consequently, no type was cast in the 'Tirhuta' script for a long time. Some local pandits, however, resorted to the lithographic duplication of their popular works in it. In about 1936, Acharya Ramlochan Sharan, the proprietor of the Vidyapati Press, Laheriasarai, got some books printed in the Tirhuta script. Again, the Maithili Sahitya Sammelan at Allahabad got some books, including the prestigious Comprehensive Maithili-English Dictionary, published in this script. These private efforts, however, could not revive the Maithili script and the Nagari letters were adopted. The first Maithili work in print appeared in 1885, namely Krishna-janma of Manabodh, edited by Grierson, but the script was Nagari. In spite of all odds, the effort to bring back Tirhuta continued. Almost all Maithili publications have their titles in Tirhuta. Recently the Maithili Sahitya Parishad, Darbhanga, has published a book in Tirhuta by offset process. Tantranath Jha too published two books of folk tales in Tirhuta through lithographic process.

Publishing has been a great problem for Maithili. Most of the books are published either by literary or by cultural organizations. Among them the Maithili Academy (Patna) is perhaps the most prestigious, having the largest number of publications to its credit.

Others deserving mention are Maithili Sahitya Samiti (Allahabad), Chetana Samiti (Patna), Maithili Prakashan

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Samiti (Calcutta), Akhil Bharatiya Mithila Sangha (Calcutta) and Maithili Sahitya Parishad (Darbhanga). Individual authors usually publish their books under the constraints of some publishing houses. Genuine commercial publishers are rare in Maithili as they find publication business not very lucrative. Yet some business conscious publishers do bring out Maithili books, the most notable among them being Raghubar Singh Book Sellers (Madhubani) and Bhavani Prakashan (Patna).

Go.J.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Malayalam). Growth in literacy, advance in education, improvement in the technique of production, distribution of books and spread of libraries accelerated the development of print medium in Kerala. According to the Malayalam granthasuchi (Bibliography of Malayalam books) published by the Kerala Sahitya Akademi, 30243 titles have been published from the beginning of printing in Malayalam till 1975. Of these, 17832 titles are literary works. More than 1500 printing presses and about thirty publishing firms exist in the State and on an average 800 titles come out annually. The role of printing presses and publishers in the growth of Malayalam language and literature is very significant.

The first Malayalam script ever used and printed was in the book Hortus Malabaricus, published in Amsterdam in 1678. The first book printed in Malayalam script was, however, Samkshepa vedartham published in Rome in 1772. The first Malayalam book published in India was the Bible printed at Courier Press, Bombay, in 1811.

The C.M.S. Press established in 1921 at Kottayam by the Rev. Benjamin Bailey, a Protestant missionary, is the first printing press in Kerala. Puthiya niyamam (The New Testament, 1929), A Dictionary of High and Colloquial Malayalam and English (1846) and A Concise Dictionary of English and Malayalam (1848) were printed and published by this press. It also made remarkable contribution by printing and publishing the grammatical works of the Rev. George Mathan and some science books and the early Malayalam journals Jnana nikshepam and Vidyasangraham.

Swathi Tirunal Maharaja of Travancore established the Government Press at Trivandrum in 1834. The St. Joseph's Press at Munnanam was established in 1846 by the Catholic missionaries. The Government Press at Ernakulam was founded in 1847. The Basel Mission Society Press at Illikkunnu and the Minerva Press at Calicut also came up during the period. Ashtangahridayam–Bhaskaram vyakhyanam, a translation of the Sanskrit work by Uppottu Kannan, was published by the Minerva Press.

In 1853, Eswara Pilla Vicharippukar, who was a great lover of Kathakali, established the Kerala Vilasam Press at Trivandrum, with the express idea of publishing good literary works. Numerous 'attakathas' were published from here. It took the initiative in publishing the works of Thunchathu Ezhuttacchan, Kunchan Nambiar, Unnayi Warriar, Swathi Tirunal and Irayimman Thampi. Bhasha charitram (History of Malayalam language) of P. Govinda Pillai and Shakuntalam of Kerala Varma Valiakoyil Tampuran were serialised in the monthly, Vidya vilasini, which was run by this Press.

The Vidyavilasam Press started by Kalahasthiyappa Mudaliar in 1861 at Calicut, the St. Thomas Press established at Cochin in 1864, the Vidya Ratna Prabha Press started in 1879 at Kunnamkulam were among the prominent ones in the field of publication at that time. All of them depended mainly on the works of Ezhuttacchan, Nambiar and Unnayi Warriar for printing matter.

The second phase of book publishing in Malayalam was inaugurated by Kunhu Vareeth and S.T.Reddiar in 1866. The Keralakalpadrumam Press at Trichur was established at Cochin in 1864, and the Vidya Ratna Prabha became the manager and he ventured to take up the printing and publishing of some works of the poets like Kodungallur Kunhikuttan Tampuran, Chathukutty Mannadiar, Chathoth Krishna Menon, Kaviyoor Raman Nambiar and Ulloor S.Parameswara Iyer. Later, the press was purchased by the Yogakshemam Company and afterwards became the Mangalodayam Press. Kunhu Vareeth, who left Kerala Kalpadrumam, established his own press at Trichur in 1904 under the name Bharathavilasam and published several outstanding works such as Amaram Parameswari, Kantharatharakam Nalacharitam vyakhyanam and Varaganitha prakashika.

S.T. Reddiar, who started as a street book-seller, established the Vidyabhivardhini Press at Quilon in 1886. He managed to publish 57 divasathe tullal kathakal and 72 divasathe attakathakal. It is said that Reddiar got the manuscript of the Tullal kathakal with the help of tullal dancers who recited the poems for him to copy. He published many works of K.C. Kesava Pillai. It is to be remembered that Reddiar had introduced cheap editions of books years ago even before the idea was conceived by the western publishers. Classics like the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata were sold by him at so low a price that copies of them were available in every household.

The Malayala Manorama Company founded by Kandathil Varghese Mappila in 1889 at Kottayam contributed much to the development of printing and publishing. It published several collections of essays, poems and novels. The Vidyavilasam Press at Trivandrum owned by Thomas Paul also published some good books. Kerala bhasha pranayikal (Lovers of Malayalam language—8 parts) and Sahitya pranayikal (Lovers of literature—5 parts) are important among them. Most of the books written by Kerala Varma, A.R. Rajaraja Varma, C.V. Raman Pillai and C.S. Subramanian Potti were published by B.V. Book Depot established at Trivandrum in 1902 by Kulakunnathu Raman Menon. Vidya Vinodini Press at Trichur, Sree Ramavilasam Press at Quilon, Mathrubhumi Printing and Publishing Company, K.R. Brothers, P.K. Brothers, etc., at Calicut, Samastha Kerala Sahitya Parishad at Ernakulam, Vallathol Granthalayam at Cheruthuruthy, Mangalodayam at Trichur, Ulloor Publishers at Trivandrum, Balan Publication at Trivandrum and Sarada Book Depot at Thonnakkal also took publishing seriously during this period.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The founding of the Sahitya Pravarthaka Co-operative Society at Kottayam in 1945 marks the third phase of development in the publishing industry in Kerala. A cooperative of the writers, by the writers and for the writers, it has stood the test of time and now holds the first rank among publishers, producing one book a day. So far about 7000 titles have been published by this society. Among them are the Vishwa vijnana kosham (Malayalam Encyclopaedia) consisting of 10000 pages in ten volumes, the complete translation of Vyasa Bharatam and various kinds of dictionaries, classics and translations of masterpieces of world literature. India Press (the Printing Department) enables the Society to bring out publications, cheap and attractive and the several branches of the National Book Stall (the Sales Department) help to sell them profitably and in time. Prabhath Book House, Desabhimani Book House, Current Books, D.C. Books, etc., in the private sector and Kerala Sahitya Akademi, State Institute of Languages, State Institute of Encyclopaedic Publications, University of Kerala, etc., in the public sector have also made valuable contributions to the growth and development of the Malayalam language and literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.D. Harisarma, Vimsathi Souvenir (Kottayam, 1965); Kerala Sahitya Akademi, Malayalam granthasuchi, Malayalathile achchatiyum pusthaka prasadhanavum; T.R. Raman Nambudiripad, Granthalaya shastram (State Institute of Languages, Trivandrum, 1981).

T.R.R.N.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Oriya). The first printed Oriya book was 'New Testament' (First part). It was printed in 1807 and the translation was done with the help of Pandit Mrityunjaya Vidyalankar who belonged to Medinipur in West Bengal. The Oriya types were prepared by one Panchanan Karmakar who did his job under the supervision of William Carey, the then Principal of Fort William College, Calcutta. The book was printed outside Orissa, at Serampore near Calcutta, where the first press in eastern India was established by the missionaries in 1800. Till the first printing press, called the Orissa Mission Press, was established at Cuttack in 1836-37 under the supervision of Sutton, Oriya books continued to be printed from Serampore. These were mostly religious books (including the Bible) in translation though there were a few other books too, such as an Oriya to English dictionary (Vernacular Oriya and English) by Mohan Prasad Thakoor, and a book on Oriya grammar by M.S. Sutton, as well as a few school-text books. On a rough estimate, 21 books, most of which translations, were published during 1807-1837, under the sole patronage of the missionaries.

The Orissa Mission Press, in spite of its major motivation towards the propagation of Christianity, was yet an important incentive in the direction of Oriya printing and publishing, particularly in the area of school text-books, ranging from history and geography to arithmetic and language learning. Orissa's second printing press and the first secular press, called the Cuttack Printing Company, was established in 1866, the year of the Great Famine (Na-anka), with the efforts of Gaurisankar Ray and Bichitrananda Das, under funding from some benevolent feudatory kings of Orissa. The greatest contribution of the press was Utkal dipika, the first Oriya weekly, under the editorship of Gaurisankar Ray, that fearlesssly exposed the contemporary social distress and rose to defend the Oriya language from its detractors. The third printing press, called the Utkal Printing Company, was established at Baleswar by Fakir Mohan Senapati in 1868. Then in quick succession, presses came up all over Orissa, and by 1910 there were about 20 printing presses in places like Cuttack, Puri, Berhampur, Baleswar, Baripada, Bamanda, Parlakhemundi, Bauda, etc, including such well known presses as Orissa Patriot Press (1873), Mayurbhanja Press (1879), Jagannath Ballav Press (1885), Arunodaya Press (1893), Utkal Sahitya Press (1897), Mukura Press (1910), etc.

Between 1838 and 1866 were printed an estimated 70 books, most of which at one press, the Orissa Mission Press. But after 1866, the number of books published rapidly increased, so that by the end of the century it almost reached 1000, and they included mostly general books, that is books of literature related to both ancient and modern times.

By 1958 Orissa had 210 printing presses, out of which Cuttack district had 86, Ganjam district 36, Puri district 16, Baleswar district 12, Sambalpur district 18, and others 42. By 1984 the presses had increased to 700, a big increase when compared to seven presses in 1884. The press technology also improved. From the small hand press and manually operated treadle-machines the technology moved to automatic big rotary machines and offset presses.

The publication of Oriya books on a commercial level began more or less from the third decade of the present century. Prior to that books were published by the presses mentioned earlier by their own funding or at times with the help of rich men and feudatory kings. Thus the first important press of Orissa, that is the Cuttack Printing Company, was the first publisher. It published a number of Oriya books, mostly of ancient Oriya literature including kavya by Upendra Bhanja, Krishna Singh's translation of the Mahabharata, and probably the first antholgoy of ancient Oriya songs entitled Sangita sagar (The sea of songs) edited by Damodar Patnaik. Another important press which also published a number of books, particularly by modern authors, was Utkal Sahitya Press. It was founded by the famous litterateur Biswanath Kar, who along with publishing Utkal sahitya, the most important literary journal of the time, published novels of Fakirmohan Senapati and belles lettres of Gopal Chandra Praharaj. An enthusiastic individual publisher was Gobinda Rath (1848-1919), writer and social reformer, who on his own published about 200 books, including a large number of books by ancient Oriya poets. Today most of the publishing is done by full-time publishers on a commercial basis, and by a rough estimate, taking the last 70 years into consideration, their number has been about 120. These include a few publishers who have gone out of business, and a few more institutional publishers, such as National Book Trust, Sahitya Akademi and Orissa Sahitya Akademi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

If about 1000 Oriya books were published by 1900, another about 4000 books were published between 1900 and 1950. But since 1959, there has been a phenomenal rise in book publishing, and during the last 40 years (1950-1990) the total number of books published would be easily more than 20,000, at the rate of about 500 books annually. These include literature books like fiction, poetry, drama etc, as well as books that belong to other areas of knowledge and profession, excluding specifically text-books for schools and colleges which alone would be much more than 20,000. It is needless to point out that the Oriya printing and publishing scene today is substantially different from what it was 100 years ago—a much richer and much larger entity. It is expected to expand further with increase in literacy and education in the coming years.

Jo.M.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Punjabi). The printing press in India came with the arrival of the Christian missionaries in 1550. With the establishment of Christian Mission at Serampore in 1799 began the printing in Indian languages. In the beginning of the nineteenth century, the type of scripts of about forty languages and dialects was prepared and many books were printed and published. The credit for this goes to William Carey, who wanted to present the Bible to the people of India in their own languages. For the publication of the Punjabi translation, the type of Gurmukhi script was prepared for the first time.

In 1834, when Lowrie took charge of the Mission School at Ludhiana, he felt the need for establishment of a printing press. Newton and Wilson brought a wooden printing press from Calcutta, which was the first press in Punjab. Gradually the Mission developed a press at Ludhiana, which published a good number of books in Punjabi. With this innovation, other religious missions considered the establishment of their own printing presses. The presses thus multiplied for propagation of religion as well as for commercial activity. Lithography remained prevalent for some time before the modern types for the press were developed. Newspapers, weeklies and monthlies were started and the publication of tracts, pamphlets and books of all types began in full swing. Several publishing houses were started at Lahore and Amritsar. With the expansion of education and widening of intellectual horizon, there were numerous publications of all kinds. Munshi Gulab Singh & Sons, Uttar Chand Kapur & sons, Lala Devi Das Janki Das, Lahore Book Shop (Lahore), Sikh Publishing House (Amritsar), Singh Brothers and several other publishing concerns held the field before Independence, some of which continue even today. With the attainment of Independence, more attention was focussed on the mother tongue of the child and on the promotion of the cause of the regional languages. The Universities in Punjab have established their publication bureaus and a large number of scholarly works including lexicons and encyclopaedias are being produced there. The Punjab Government created a Department of Languages, which has contributed much to publications. With the assistance of the Union Government, the Punjab Government has established at Chandigarh the Punjab State University Text-Book Board, which is publishing college and university books in all arts and science subjets. Punjabi Sahitya Academy (Ludhiana), Sahitya Akademi (New Delhi), National Book Trust (New Delhi), Navyug Publishers (Delhi), etc. have also several publications to their credit.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Parminder Singh, Characteristics and Tendencies of Punjabi Literature during Later 19th Century (1975); Punjabi prakashan di suchi (Punjabi Government Language Bureau).

S.S.K.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Sindhi). There is hardly any evidence to prove that any printing of books was done in Sindh prior to the advent of the British rule in the region. No doubt, books in some languages, especially Arabic, Persian, Sindhi, Hindi, Urdu and Sanskrit were produced in manuscript form. It was only after the establishment of the British rule in 1843 that printing of books, literary periodicals and newspapers started in Sindh.

According to the information available, the first lithograph printing press was established in 1844 by Charles Napier in Karachi. After establishing the press, he started the same year a bi-weekly journal in English, entitled Kurrachi Advertiser. When Charles Napier left Sindh in 1847, Ardeshir Rustomjee, a Parsi civilian of

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Karachi, became proprietor of the press and the paper.

In 1854, Puchaji and Darabji, two Parsis of the same town, established another lithograph printing press in Karachi. They started the same year another bi-weekly newspaper in English entitled Scindian. After some time, its name was changed, first to Beacon, and then to Sind Times.

In 1855, Mirza Mukhlis Ali, at the instance of Bartle Frere, the then Commissioner in Sindh, established a lithograph printing press in Karachi, and started a weekly in Persian, entitled Mofurrahul Kolub (A delighter of hearts), the same year. It was during the same decade that Sindh Commissioner's printing press was established in Karachi, which published in lithograph most of the text books prepared by the Education Department and a bilingual literary weekly in Persian and Sindhi, Fawaidul Akhbar (Advantageous news). This was started in 1858. It is the first journal containing Sindhi section. After two years, Mirza Mukhlis Ali established another lithograph printing press at Sukkur and started Mutala Khorsheed, another literary bilingual journal containing Persian and Sindhi columns on each page. The first weekly entirely in the Sindhi language is Sindh Sudhar (Reforms of Sindh), which was started by the Education Department in 1866. Thus started the printing in Sindh, which was at first meant for bringing out journals and school textbooks.

By the end of the nineteenth century, a good number of lithograph printing presses were established in different towns of Sindh. They generally printed literary journals and newspapers. In course of time the publication of general literature in Sindhi was also started by these presses. The printing of Sindhi in the composed type started very late in Sindh, mostly during the last two decades of the 19th century. Of course, Sindhi books in the composed type (in Devanagari and Arabic Sindhi characters) were printed outside Sindh much earlier. For example, Sindhi Grammar (1849), English-Sindhi Dictionary (1849) and Sindhi-English Dictionary (1855), all compiled by George Stack, were published in Devanagari-Sindhi characters from Bombay. Sindhi Reading Book in Arabic and Devanagari characters, compiled by Ernest Trumpp, was printed in London in 1858. Similarly, Trumpp brought out Shah jo Risalo (1866) and Grammar of Sindhi (1872) from Germany in composed Arabic type, specially got prepared by him.

As there were very few lithograph printing presses in Sindh during the last century to meet the requirements of commercial publishers and writers of general Sindhi books, the bulk of such work was done by some printers in Bombay and Lahore. For instance, Hari Singh Dingomal of Sukkur and Pokardas Thanwardas of Shikarpur (both well-known publishers of general Sindhi literature who had started publications in 1885 and 1886 respectively), got their Sindhi books printed generally from Lahore. Similarly, Chhapkhana Muhammadi, Karimi Mutaba, Fateh-al-Karim, Mutaba Haidari and Mutaba Safdari were important lithograph presses of Bombay, where a good number of Sindhi books were printed during the last century.

Some of the major printing presses established in Sindh during the last century (except those mentioned already) are Mercantile Steam Press (Karachi), Sind Gazette and Commercial Printing Press (Karachi), Victoria Press (Karachi), Phoenix Press (Karachi), Vidya Vinod Chhapkhana (Karachi), Saraswati Press (Hyderabad), Kaisaria Press (Hyderabad), Premier Press (Hyderabad), Mutaba Mazharal-Ajaib (Larkana). Although a large number of Sindhi books was brought out in Arabic-Sindhi characters, the usage of which was recommended and encouraged by the government, there were a good number of Sindhi books (mostly pertaining to Hindu and Sikh religions) printed in Gurumukhi and Devanagari scripts. The number of Sindhi books printed in Hindu-Sindhi or Hataai characters (an indigenous ancient script of Sindh, akin to Devanagari but without a headline on letters) was very limited.

Since the beginning of the present century, due to various socio-cultural movements and national awakening throughout the Indian sub-continent, there was rapid growth in Sindhi journalism and production of general Sindhi literature. Till Independence, more than two hundred periodicals and newspapers in Sindhi were in existence. The publication of Sindhi books can be counted in thousands. This naturally gave impetus to the establishment of printing presses. The change in this field worth noting was gradual replacement of litho printing by composed type printing.

Along with Independence came the partition of the country which made Sindhi speakers the worst sufferers. This badly affected the production of Sindhi literature for a few years. But printing and literary activities started again with new force and enthusiasm in the Sindhi language in India as well as in Sindh. No doubt, the printing technology in Sindhi, nowadays, is far more advanced in Pakistan. The recent development in this field is an arrangement by phototype computerised setting system for Sindhi composing in the press of Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad (Sindh) and Noble Printers Pvt. Ltd., Pune (India).

M.K.J.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Tamil). Gutenberg, a German, invented the printing press in 1450. Within a hundred years, Christian prayers designed in Malabar were printed in Tamil in Goa. The printing was done on Chinese paper manufactured in Germany.

The missionaries of Tranquebar in Thanjavur district translated the Bible into Tamil, and importing Tamil (carved-on-metal) letters from Germany, printed a whole edition of the translation by 1713-1715. It is claimed that this is the earliest attempt at printing and publishing in India. Towards the end of the century, the Serampore Mission in Bengal tried experiments in printing and publishing.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

An enlightened ruler of Thanjavur and a considerable renaissance figure on the Indian scene, Raja Serfoji carved letters on stone and laboriouly printed off primers in Chemistry, Physics, Botany, Zoology, etc., in an attempt to provide textbooks in the new sciences to various schools under his management. He thus led the way in publishing books. The Thanjavur Saraswathi Mahal catalogue also mentions various books printed at the Navavidyakalasala Press, one of which entitled Kumarasambava champu is still available. Pages from various primers were available in the twenties. Parts of the dismantled and now useless press as well as the letters carved in wood in reverse were in evidence till recently. This was perhaps the first planned attempt at educational publishing in India.

Most of the early published works in Tamil were Christian theological works, mostly prayer books, liturgy, and sermons in Tamil. By about the thirties of the nineteenth century, the publishing of books as well as periodicals was a known fact and a reading class, though small in number, had come up.

By the fifties, quite a few publishers in Tamil were in competition with one another, ushering in the literary renaissance in Tamil. Books were carried by itinerant sellers who participated in various festivals associated with various places. Srirangam, Kumbakonam, Chidambaram, Tiruvarur are among the well-known places of pilgrimage at festival times which attracted large crowds. Some of the people who attended these festivals could read. Folk ballads, historical tales in verse, prime favourites retelling stories from the Mahabharata and the Ramayana were sold in large numbers. One curious fact is that these books were not sold in numbers, but by weight.

The last years of the fifties were the years when various organised wholesale publishing houses began operating in Tamil. Of them, perhaps, B. Ratnanayakar and Sons was the premier one. Another was named Pumahal Vilasam. Both publishing houses continue to this day into the fifth generation of proprietorship, publishing their old favourites again and again, year after year. Their popularity has not decreased with the years.

Among the most favoured matter offered by these two publishing houses can be mentioned the ballads of history like Desingu Rajan, ballads made up of the Mahabharata episodes, Draupadi kuram, Eniyetram, Pavalokkodi, Abimannan sundari and others. Among the early prose tales that captured the imagination of the Tamils were stories like the Vikramaditya tales by a Muslim called Ibrahim Shah Rowther, Madanakamarajan kathai (author unknown), and sundry tales from the Arabian Nights. Of these the tales of Vikramaditya were among the most popular. Between 1858, when it first appeared, and 1958, more than sixty thousand maunds of books had been sold. Calculating at twenty copies a maund, it works out to something like twelve hundred thousand copies. The book is still a great favourite with its piquant Muslim colloquial prose style and the adventurous stories displaying often a sort of folk cleverness that delights generation after generation of people.

The Madras Education Society in the thirties of the last century encouraged the written records of oral traditions about the rulers of the south, which were later collected by Col. Mackenzie. These oral traditions have now been reduced to print. And for educational purposes, Tamil prose had to be created and Thandavaraya Mudaliar offered an adaptation of the Panchatantra tales from a Marathi original in graded prose which is ingenious, and a model, even now. Ashtavadganam Veerasamy Chettiar collected current tales about old poets and great men of the past and put them together into what he called Vinodarasa manjari. This appeared in print late in the century and was popular as were other literary attempts, some of them of importance. There was a considerable activity in the theatre but plays were not reduced into print till the last decades of the century. Another publishing event deserves mention. It stands out like the popularity of Ibrahmin Shah Rowther's Vikramaditya. This was the publication of Gopalakrishna Bharathiar's musical opera Nandan charitram in an edition of a hundred thousand copies by the Administrator of Karaikkal who was a French man. This edition at one anna (six paise) was sold out in three months and another edition of a hundred thousand copies was called for and printed.

By the end of the century, the number of published books was considerable and was augmented by daily, weekly, monthly and other periodical publishing. Novels appeared in serial form in magazines by 1890 and continue to do so. Now in the current decade novels appear in editions of sixty to seventy thousand reaching out in monthly completeness to a large circle of avid readers. Swaminatha Iyer's outstanding editions of literary works were published by scholarly subscriptions.

Subramania Bharati, the great poet, had ideas of publishing in great numbers and pricing his books at various rates, expensive for the affluent and cheap for the poor, but his plans came to nothing owing to financial pressures. He was also publisher and editor of various periodicals, mostly with a political and social slant. He was sub-editor during two periods in the first Tamil daily Swadeshamitran.

Nearly a hundred novels, if not more, mostly adapted from English minor writers, were published in the early decades of the present century. With monthly and periodical publications coming up in the twenties, the demand for published fiction in serial form and as books was increasing and several publishers took up the challenge.

Alliance Company, founded by V. Kuppuswamy Iyer

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

in 1901 is still flourishing in its third generation of proprietorship; it was interested in publishing literary material as well as cultural. The South Indian Shaiva Siddhanta Publishing and Printing Works Limited came into existence for publishing texts for study in the second decade of the century and is known for its meticulous errorless publications. They have over two thousand books and editions to their credit. A third pioneer in Tamil publishing was Vai Govindan who tried to give quality books of information and knowledge, not concentrating on fiction; he was not able to survive.

Since the first wave of renaissance struck Tamil, there have been competition of an even kind between publishers of literary quality books and of books without any literary quality. The latter have been more successful in the current period, taking their cue on publishing from the popular periodicals. A host of publishers thrive on material reprinted from the pages of pulp magazines like Kumudam, a weekly with over six lakh copies sold a week to a somewhat lowbrow readership. Other weeklies might not be so popular, but they dictate to the publishers and readers of Tamilnadu.

There are also university publishers who keep the torch of scholarship burning. They are not commercially viable because of a tendency to be pedantic and being mostly scholarly without great insight. The university publishing is increasing in quantum, if not in quality.

Publications of dictionaries, lexicons and reference works including an adult as well as children's Encyclopaedia have been funded by government trusts or sponsored academically, and some of it is, indeed, pioneering work.

Seven or eight popular weeklies, a dozen dailies appealing to various tastes, and quite a lot of cine publishing are among the publishing activities of Tamilnadu. Quite a few publishers have thriven on publications, but few authors only have profited by all this publication activity. Most of them are not among the most worthwhile.

The government provides funds for the preparation and publishing of textbooks, especially for the school classes; they fund also the publication of translation of textbooks in the sciences but neither can be considered worthwhile publishing activity, though they serve immediate purposes.

K.N.S.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Telugu). The earliest effort in printing started in Telugu when the Christian missionaries established a printing press at Serampore (near Calcutta) in 1800 and brought out books relating to their religion. In 1813, they printed a book of grammar in Telugu, and in 1816 came the New Testament, again in Telugu. A Grammar of Telugu Language by A.D. Campbell was printed in 1820 at the press of the College of Fort St. George, Madras.

Vaavilla Ramaswami Sastri established in 1854 the Audisaraswati Nilayam Press at Madras and brought out the first book in Telugu. Subsequently, he developed it into a great publishing house. His son, Vaavilla Venkateswara Sastry, named the Audisaraswati Nilayam Press as Vavilla Press and continued the great work started by his father. Unfortunately, the printing section was closed down about a decade ago.

The S.P.C.K. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge), the press of Madras, printed in 1885 the Shabdaratnakaram (A dictionary of the Telugu language) by Bahujanapalli Sitaramacharyulu. The Premier Press (Hoe & Co) was started in 1886 at Madras, and is still active. Thus the foundation for printing in Telugu was laid in the composite State of Madras. After the formation of Andhra Pradesh in 1956, books began to be printed from Andhra also.

The beginnings of book publishing in Telugu have to be traced from the earlier part of the nineteenth century when the Telugu speaking areas were in the composite Madras Province. More than a hundred years prior to that, in what were called 'Gujili' books, the story of the Mahabharata was brought out on rough (proof) paper in demy quarto size. Vikramarka kathalu (1819), Panchatantra kathalu (1834) and some other small books by Ravipati Gurumurty Sastry were published. Mannava Butchayya Pantulu wrote word-to-word meanings for the Vedas and the Upanishads, which were published by Rao Bahadur K. Veeresalingam Pantulu. Round about that period, Gattupalli Seshacharyulu wrote and published a commentary on Valmiki Ramayana.

During the early part of the twentieth century, R.Venkateswar & Co. (Ananda Press) of Madras brought out all the three great epics, the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata, in Telugu prose. The Hindu Jana Samskaram Press was established in 1885 at Madras. Besides publishing a religious journal, they brought out in 1891 the lectures of Max Mueller in book-form and also sixteen volumes of religious books of intrinsic value.

The Andhra Pracharini Granthamala of Rajahmundry published a series of novels translated from Bengali by Venkataparvateeswara Kavulu. Tapi Dharma Rao published some valuable books from Berhampore (now in Orissa State) under the banner of Veguchukka Granthamala. Vijnana Chandrika Granthamala of Madras were the pioneers in bringing out in Telugu books on technical subjects like physiology, physics, chemistry, etc. The six volumes of Arthashastra by C.R. Reddy were also published. Komarraju Lakshmana Rao, the founder of this institution, took the lead in publishing books on technical subjects in Telugu.

Among the publishers of books in Telugu, the place of honour goes to the Vaavillas. The services rendered by the famous publishing house, Vaavilla Ramaswami Sastrulu and Sons, to the cause of Indian literature in general, and Telugu and Sanskrit literature in particular, is unique in many respects. The Vaavillas not only discovered a number of valuable manuscripts in Sanskrit and brought them to light, but they also published hundreds of books in Telugu, Tamil and English on different subjects. They were the pioneers in fixing up suitable sizes for books. The Vaavillas were the first to realise the value of getting introductions to their publications written by eminent scholars who were considered authorities on their respective subjects. These scholarly introductions really enhanced the value of the books.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The primary motto of the Vaavillas was to uphold and promote Hindu religion. They were the first to bring out in Telugu script many religious books already published in Devanagari script. It is a valuable service to the reader. They brought out in eighteen volumes the Sanskrit Mahabharata in Devanagari script. They published in Telugu script the Valmiki Ramayana and the famous kavyas of Kalidasa, Bharavi and Sriharsha, with the commentary of Mallinathasuri. They also took the lead in publishing anthologies and brought out neat volumes of shatakas, stotras and short stories. Their handy publication, Ashtottarashatopanishadah (1926), containing all the 108 Upanishads, is a valuable book.

Bal Gangadhar Tilak wrote Gita rahasya, a masterly commentary on the Bhagavadgita. The Vaavillas had it translated into Telugu by Nori Subrahmanya Sastry of the Sanskrit College, Tenali, and published it in 1918. The Vaavillas publications covered all subjects—the epics, puranas, kavyas, dictionaries, biographies, books on religion, philosophy, astrology, astronomy, ayurveda, literature, culture and books for children—not only in Sanskrit and Telugu but also in Tamil and English, though few in number.

After the Vaavillas there was a marked gap in publishing in Andhra Pradesh. Mention may, however, be made here of the Triveni Publishers of Machilipatnam. They have been publishing, since 1950, Triveni, a cultural journal in English, founded in 1928 by K. Ramakotiswara Rau at Madras. They also published many works in Telugu which are of high literary value. Some significant titles are Valmiki Ramayana in Telugu prose by Srinivasa Siromani in eight volumes, the Bhagavata, also in Telugu prose, by Y. Padmanabhaswami in three volumes and the commentary on the Bhagavadgita by Sant Jnaneshwar rendered into Telugu by D. Seshagiri Rao. They brought out three different editions (unabridged one by Veluri Sivarama Sastri, and two abridged ones by Katuri Venkateswara Rao) of Gandhiji's autobiography in Telugu.

Another eminent publishing company was the Andhra Pracharini Granthamala of Kakinada, which published the translations of famous novels from Bengali and other languages. They also published some outstanding poems like 'Ekanta seva' and 'Brindavanam'.

Saraswati Granthamala of Rajamundry brought out translations of Bengali novels rendered into Telugu by the gifted scholar Sivasankara Swami. Yuva Pracharanalu (Madras) and Desi publishers (Vijayawada) popularised the novels of Saratchandra Chattopadhyaya through translations. Aarsha Granthamala and Kavality publishers brought out translations of Hindi novels by Premchand, Ila Chandra Joshi and Jainendra Kumar. At present the publication of original fiction in Telugu is proving a source of good income to many publishing houses.

Since the first decade of this century there has functioned at Machilipatnam a one-man-firm of publishers under the name of Saraswati Niketanam. It was started by Kowta Sri Rama Sastri, a scholar in Telugu and Sanskrit and also in Bengali. Handicapped by scant resources, he published more than two dozen books, many his own, some of them translations from Bengali by illustrious authors. The subjects covered showed his wide range of knowledge. He started in 1922 a cultural monthly in Telugu name[illegible] published the early works of poets like Pingali Lakshmikantam, Viswanadha Satyanarayana and others. A year or two later Kasinadhuni Nageswara Rao Pantulu started Bharati, which because of its richer resources, drove the struggling Sharada out of existence.

The Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi did remarkable work with the publication of about 400 books covering various subjects—prabandhas, literary criticism, anthologies of poetry, drama and short story, reference books, dictionaries, etc. It reprinted in five volumes the Suryaraya Andhra nighantuvu, which was first brought out under the aegis of the Maharaja of Pithapuram, a patron of Telugu literature. It rendered financial assistance to more than a thousand authors for publishing their own writings. Similar is the case with the Telugu Akademi which was started as an autonomous body with a grant of one crore of rupees from the Government of India. Its main aim is to bring out text books and reference books in Telugu for college and university courses. Particular mention should be made of the English-Telugu Dictionary under the supervision of able scholars and an Advisory Committee.

Authors who happen to be publishers of their own works are a rare success. Viswanatha Satyanarayana published on his own about 150 volumes of his writings in Telugu, Sanskrit and English, including Srimadramayana kalpavrikshamu which won him the prestigious Jnanpith Award. Similarly M. Venkatarangaiya, the renowned educationist, published on his own some of his works, notable among them being Kuntilyuni arthashastramu in Telugu and Bharata swatantryodyama charita in three volumes. Kalaprapurna Marupuru Kondandarama Reddi of Nellore also published nearly twenty of his own works including Vachana Kamba Ramayanam, Vemana Yogi jivitacharita and Saraswatamurti Tikkana, books of high literary merit.

Among publishers from Vijayawada, the Visalandhara Publishing House may be mentioned as the leading

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

one, which has brought out many books of intrinsic literary value. There are publishing houses at Vijayawada like the Quality Publishers, Jayanti Publications, Navodaya Publishers and others which are doing fairly good business.

Mention has to be made of Emesco of Hyderabad who introduced for the first time the popular 'Pocket Book Series' in Telugu under the Home Library Scheme with the guidance and assistance of the Southern Languages Book Trust, founded by the Ford Foundation of America. They published quite a large number of novels and a few classics under the scheme. In the field of children's books, the Balala Akademi, sponsored by the Government of Andhra Pradesh, is doing distinguished service by publishing books for children and also by running a very good monthly, intended for children. The Andhra, Venkateswara and Osmania Universities have their own publication departments, which have brought out some valuable books.

Bh.N.R.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING (Urdu). In Madras, a printing press was established in the early seventies of the 18th century, with moveable types of English and Tamil. In 1812, St. George College constituted an Advisory Board on the lines of Fort William College to impart education in local languages to the officers of the Company, and lawyers practising in local courts. For this purpose, the Board established in 1815 a printing press along with a sales depot for oriental publications. This press prepared and printed books in Telugu, Kannada and Tamil, and later on included Urdu in its programme. Encouraged by the Madras press, the Christian missionaries established printing presses at Mangalore, Bangalore, etc. to which Anant Acharya, a blacksmith of Mangalore, regularly provided moveable Kannada type, on demand. After the restrictions on the press were withdrawn by Charles Metcalf, a good number of cradle presses were set up at Madras by Indian traders. The first hand-pressed printing press was founded at Broadway by the American missionaries. But there is no trace of Urdu type in this press.

The first Urdu or Persian letter press is traceable at Hugli, where an employee of the East India Company, N.B. Halhed, translated and published a book of Kannada Laws in Persian script. By the end of 18th century, many presses were established at Calcutta, including the famous Honourable Company Press (1792) and Chronicle Press (1796). All these presses had Urdu/Persian moveable types which were moulded by Panchanan Karmakar, a Marathi migrant.

The Serampore Printing Press, established by William Carey in 1799, was responsible for creating a revolution in the sphere of printing in north India. The press not only had moveable types of all the northern languages including Urdu, but had also established its own foundry headed by a young native Manohar, who worked in this press for forty years. The Serampore Press was also responsible for manufacturing printing paper in India for the first time, which was imported earlier from China and Europe.

In the year 1816, the American Missionary Press was established at Bombay by two American missionaries, who alongwith their three other companions, were refused permission to stay at Calcutta in the year 1812. Consequently three missionaries left for Europe, while the other two landed at Bombay and established their press. This press was responsible for a revolutionary change in printing activities in India. Before the American Press, the presses established in South-Western regions were either monolingual or bi-lingual, or at the most tri-lingual. The American Press was the first multi-lingual printing press in this part of the sub-continent, and had arrangements for Marathi, English, Gujarati, Sanskrit and Persian (Urdu) printing. This press had its own foundry to mould moveable types of various languages. These missionaries had been to Europe before coming to India and were familiar with litho-printing, a new technological process of printing, which was not only cheaper, but also simpler than the process of letter press. They were understood to have arranged a few pieces of stone required for litho-printing. So they were able to start the first litho press. In 1824, a stone having physio-chemical properties similar to those of the European stone, was discovered at Kurnool; and with that sprang up the litho printing industry, and a considerable number of litho-presses were established in almost all the major cities of India; and by the end of the 19th century, litho press had established itself solidly at Bombay, Bangalore, Pune, Ahmedabad, Hyderabad, Madras, Bhopal, Varanasi, Allahabad, Kanpur, Lucknow, Patna, Calcutta, Meerut, Deoband, Delhi, Karachi, Ambala, Jalandhar, Lahore, etc. As litho-printing process was invented to print delicate strings of music and Urdu too had similar delicacy and refinement on account of its Nastaliq script of calligraphy, Urdu printing and litho-printing became almost synonymous. The reason for the success of litho-printing process and failure of letter-press process for Urdu printing may be attributed to the fact that Urdu letter press could not claim the attention of Indian masses on three major counts. First, the moulds of Persian language, which were used for Urdu also, were in Naskh and did not satisfy the sharp aesthetic sense of the general public used to Nastaliq style. Secondly, the moveable Urdu type, in point-wise measure, was much smaller than the calligraphed measure. Further, the joints of moveable Urdu type were ugly looking. Thirdly, the moveable types, used for printing of Urdu, were either of Arabic alphabet or Persian alphabet. And thus, the aspirated Indian sounds of Kha, Gha, Chha, Jha, Tha, Dha, Rdha, Bha, Pha and retroflex sounds of Tey, Dal and Rdhey were not available for the printing of Urdu. So the available moveable type was not adequate for Urdu and consequently for the Urdu printing. But as soon as lithography came in vogue, these deficiencies were removed and the Urdu printing presses sprang up. Another useful aspect of lithography was that the Urdu printing, which had been in the hands of either the missionaries or the Government, de-monopolised itself and became a profession of the people; and with that a good number of daily newspapers and a considerable number of periodicals came into being. All these newspapers, periodicals and books continued to be published on flat-bed litho machine till 1912, the year in which the Rotary offset was invented. Anyhow, the main features of Urdu printing, i.e. the art of calligraphy, remained intact and is so even today.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Calligraphy, appropriately termed khus-naweesi in Urdu, which means beautiful engraving, writing, designing, comes from two elements, 'kalos' and 'grapho'. The former means beautiful or 'khus', and the latter means to engrave, to write or to design. The art of calligraphy, which the human mind derived from the fine lines drawn upon the stones by the hands of nature, is a precious treasure of our civilisation over the last 20,000 years.

The progress of Urdu printing and consequently Urdu publishing received a heavy set-back with the partition of India in 1947. Most of the Urdu calligraphists, litho-printers and Urdu publishers migrated to Pakistan. The litho-machines which were then imported from Europe, gathered rust. As by that time, through a printing innovation, offset had established itself as a source of printing for periodicals, books and newspapers in many Indian languages, so even the Urdu newspaper industry, which migrated to Jalandhar and Delhi from Lahore, too, adopted the same process and that continues till date.

Publishing is a commercial profession and it commenced with the invention of the cradle printing press. Urdu publishing commences with the publication of Benjamin Scheltiz's Urdu translation of the Bible printed in London in 1748 for free distribution. In the real sense, Urdu publishing profession starts with the printing of N.B. Hallhead's Urdu translation of Kannad Laws in 1791, the first priced book in the language. Honourable Company Press (1792), Chronicle Press (1796) and Serampore Printing Press (1799) also published Urdu books in the last decade of the 18th century. But the regular Urdu publication profession on scientific lines is traceable from 4 May 1800 with the opening of Fort William College, Calcutta, which is credited with the preparation and publishing of Urdu books including Baagho bahar (1801). Gulshan-e-Hind (1801), Tota kahani (1804), Dastan-e-Ameer Hamza (1804), Gul bakaoli (1804), Aarish-e-mehfil (1805), Betaal pacheesi (1805), Shakuntala natak (1805), Singharshan bateesi (1812). Besides these books, the college published a considerable number of Urdu books written and translated by eminent Urdu writers. The college also published books written by European scholars, e.g. Taylor, William Hunter, Gladewen, Gilchrist, etc.

Though outside the realm of Fort William College, there were scores of eminent Urdu writers and poets like Syed Insha, Mirza Qateel, etc. and books on various subjects like science, medicine, history and religious philosophy were written or translated, but seldom published due to non-availability of printing facilities in the region. Delhi College, established by the British for imbibing western education to the Indians, did a splendid job in the preparation and publishing of Urdu books in different faculties. Besides the European, the Indian teachers engaged for teaching were luminaries of their time. They did yeoman's service to Urdu by writing in the language or by translating books from other languages.

The Vernacular Translation Society, formed in this college in 1842, solely devoted itself to translation work and produced 125 publications on subjects like agriculture, astronomy, administration, algebra, chemistry, physics, mathematics, mineralogy, geography, silk, steam engine, cultivation of tea, etc.

Scientific Society founded by Syed Ahmad, translated and published 15 books of western scientists and mathematicians, translated 457 books into Urdu, out of which 395 books comprising humanities, economics, engineering, law, geology, medicine, etc. were published by 1947.

With the advent of litho printing at Bombay in 1816 and the discovery of Kurnool stone in 1824, the litho printing presses and Urdu publishing industry spread to every nook and corner of the sub-continent. But the major publication centres were Calcutta, Patna, Lucknow, Agra, Bhopal, Hyderabad, Bombay, Deoband, Azamgarh, Delhi and Lahore. Munshi Naval Kishore published hundreds of Urdu books per annum till 1947. In 1969, the Government of India established a Bureau for promotion of Urdu at Delhi. Now it is the biggest publishing house of Urdu in the country and has published more than six hundred titles covering almost all the faculties pertaining to humanities and sciences. Other publishers of relevance are National Book Trust, New Delhi, Publications Divisions, New Delhi, Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi. The National Council of Educational Research and Training, New Delhi, is the major publisher of model text books. State Urdu Academies of Delhi, Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh also publish a good number of Urdu books. In the private sector Maktaba Jamia, New Delhi, and Educational Publishing House, Aligarh, are the leading Urdu publishers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Baljit Singh Mateer, Fun-e-tabbat (1977, 1988); 'Calligraphy' in the Times of India (New Delhi, 3 Dec 1988); Hamid Hasan Qadiri, Dastan-e-tareekh-e-Urdu (1938); 'Litho tabbat—tab aur ub' in Yojna (Urdu) (February, 1989).

B.S.M.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PRITAM (Gujarati; b. 1720, d. 1798) was a monk and a 'Vedantin', who through his poems explained the doctrine of non-dualism in a forceful manner. In his philosophical poems he used the prevalent form of 'Mahina' (Months) and depicted the evolution of soul to godhood month by month. In his long poem, Jnangita he explained in detail the various theories of the relationship of the individual soul (Atma) with the Universal soul (Brahman) and with illusion (Maya). The poem is in the form of a dialogue between the teacher and the pupil. He gives ample illustrations to explain such complex concepts to a layman.

In his lyrics, he has depicted the early life of Krishna and his love for the 'gopis'. He has in his Sarasgita described the plight of Radha and gopis after Krishna had left for Mathura, and has shown how Uddhava, an emissary of Krishna who went to them was humbled by the superiority of devotion of the gopis. Though a Vedantin, he was not cut off from his surroundings, and in his poem, Prempatra (a letter to God) he requests Him to rid the people of the miseries of drought (1791). His lyric 'The path of God is for the brave, not for the coward' is very popular.

C.M.

PRITAM, AMRITA (Punjabi; b. 1919) is an eminent Punjabi poet. Trained to write verse under the watchful and scholarly eye of a deeply religious father, the young Amrita realised early in life the nature of the dialectical link between her life and her muse. However, it is not surprising that the first two volumes, Thandian kiranan (The cold rays, 1935) and Amrit lahran (The ambrosial waves, 1936), written in her teens, were homiletic in theme and tone, revealing a conformist ethics and traditional metrics. Even the next few volumes such as Jeonda jiwan (The life exultant, 1939), Trel dhote phul (The dew-washed flowers, 1941), O gitan waliya (O, master of songs, 1942), Badlan de palle wich (In the lap of the clouds, 1943), Sanjh di lali (The twilight, 1943), Nikki jehi sugat (A small gift, 1944) and Lok peer (The people's anguish, 1944), though progressively more authentic in feeling and sentiment and rooted in social consciousness, somehow lacked a compulsive quality. The contemporary Marxian thought and idiom affected the tenor of her verse and altered her sensibility in a radical manner, but Marxism as a complete and unified philosophy of life did not quite possess her poetic imagination. Nevertheless, its humanist appeal got subsumed into her feminist politics and poetics during this period. With Patthar gite (Gravel stones, 1946), we begin to hear those sharp accents of self-pity and protest which were to give Amrita's poetry her distinctive voice, her 'signature tune', so to speak. In her subsequent volumes, Lamian vatan (The long journeys, 1948), Main twarikh han Hind di (I am India's history, 1949), Sarghi vela (The hour of dawn, 1952), Sunehure (Messages, 1955) for which she was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1956, Ashoka-cheti (1957), Kasturi (The musk, 1959), Nagmani (The snakestone, 1964) and Kagaz te kanvas (The paper and the canvas, 1973), it is the woman's lyric cry against her existential fate and societal abuse which, in one form or the other, breaks out in poems of rare charm and vitality. The story of her own spousal despair and of her smothered, fractured and achieved loves lends a deeply personal note to her poetry. The tragedy of Partition which, among other indignities and humiliations, involved a traumatic violation of womankind on a horrendous scale, furnished the objective correlative for her feminine concerns in these poems. Waris Shah, a small lyric, brought to focus the misery of a woman since her creation. As Amrita grows rich in pain, the inconsolable imperatives of the heart and social compulsions begin to weave a most skilful web of verse. The themes of baulked love, separation and agonising wait are now rendered in folk-motifs and metrics. A new intensity is born. Fables of romantic love ending in harrowing tragedies often underpin the developing imagery of emptiness and grief. With Sunehure, in particular, a certain complexity of thought and expression is achieved. A certain kind of density is effected. In her later poetry, nature assumes a phenomenological significance; it is progressively integrated with her interior or psychic landscape. Also, a new major theme, the solicitations of the imagination qua imagination, appears on the scene as something of an aesthetic imperative to meet the assault of reality. Alongside, Amrita Pritam develops a kind of dramatic lyric, and learns to employ dexterously the snatches of verse from Farid and Guru Nanak, from Waris, Bulleh Shah and Shah Hussain, among others, to authenticate the archetypal nature of human reality. However, she has no real sense of history; nor is she a philosophical poet interested in the dynamics of ideas. Her use of the past is chiefly a poetic ploy. This is evident from the fact that she now builds up a warm nest of personal memories to soften the blows and terrors of advancing age. It is her 'winter of discontent', and the verse takes on the quality of a wistful dirge. She becomes ever more daring and confessional. She is able to fashion complex metaphors to orchestrate the multiple agonies of a woman, a wife and a lover. In a later poem called 'Amrita Pritam', she brings out the dynamics of her verse thus:

> The pain that possessed me
> Was the cigarette I drew > in silent rage;
> And the gathered ashes > were the poems I flicked off > one by one!

In addition to eighteen volumes of verse, Amrita Pritam has to her credit twenty-four novels, fifteen collections of short stories and twenty-three volumes of prose. This is an unmatched record in the annals of Punjabi literature. Her autobiography, Rasidi ticket (Revenue stamp, 1976) was an instant success because of her candour and intellectual integrity. Her works have been widely translated, and she is one of the best-known Indian writers in East European Socialist countries. She has won many a national and international award during her distinguished career. Her other distinctions include the award of 'Padma Shri' in 1969, and the conferment of the D.Litt. degree (honoris causa) by the University of Delhi in 1973. She received the Jnanpith Award in 1982 for her Kagaz te kanvas.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

D.S.M.

PRITHVICHANDRACHARITRA (Gujarati) is a religious tale, full of miraculous happenings and wonderful episodes, dealing with the exploits of a fabulous character, King Prithvichandra. It was composed by Manikyasundarsuri, a disciple of Merutungsuri of Anchalgadh in 142[illegible]. The tale exemplifies the exquisite form of the medieval Gujarati prose. Among the outstanding characteristic[illegible] this prose composition, are beautiful descriptions, [illegible]nious prose passages, apt figures of speech a[illegible] dynamic story element, as a consequence of which [illegible] tale is called 'Vagvilas'.

The story of this compositi[illegible] is divided into five parts. In the first part, King P[illegible]vichandra of Paithanpur city dreams of a 'Swayam[illegible]' (ceremony of marriage by choice) in which he is [illegible]arlanded by a beautiful princess, thereby selecting him as her husband. In the morning when he goes [illegible] attend the royal court he finds tha[illegible] a courier has [illegible]rrived from the city of Ayodhya, carrying invitation from King Somdeva to attend the swa[illegible] his daughter, princess Ratnamanjari. In [illegible] father the courier narrates a miraculous [illegible]nths, the king, taken place in Ayodhya. [illegible] daughter, goes to the

It so happened tha[illegible] from it To his surprise, he who had gone f[illegible] from the flower. Filled with im[illegible]nse during [illegible]ges [illegible]mvar. [illegible]ight, the king makes arrangements for her sw[illegible] tend the King Prithvichandra sets out with his army t[illegible] a stranger swayamvar. As they pass through a fo[illegible] Prithvichan- comes running, seeking protection. H[illegible] by the people of dra about the danger of his being arr[illegible] him to come to his the nearby town, and fervently im[illegible]rithvichandra does not rescue. Responding to his app[illegible]arketu, the ruler of the hand over the stranger t[illegible] into a war. Facing defeat in nearby town, and this [illegible]vichandra is on the point of the war, the army [illegible] a mighty warrior descends from retreat, when su[illegible] the army of Samarketu. In the third heavens, and [illegible]arrates his life-history in the form of a part, the str[illegible]vokes a feeling of aversion to worldly story, w[illegible]rithvichandra empowers his minister, pleas[illegible] Paramhans, to take care of administration while he himself proceeds to attend the swayamvar at Ayodhya, where Ratnamanjari selects him as her bridegroom. In the fourth part, a king named Dhumketu, who had come to attend the swayamvar, kidnaps Ratnamanjari [illegible] spreading a magic cloud of darkness in the court. [illegible]re is yet another miracle, when a woman sitting [illegible] a throne emerges from the earth and restores [illegible] princess. The whole episode thus happily culm[illegible]s in the marriage of [illegible]. One day Somdeva and Prithvichandra and Ratnam[illegible] of the arrival of Dharmanath Prithvichandra hear the[illegible] part, both the kings go to attend Tirthankar. In the [illegible] Dharmanath Tirthankar, where[illegible] the 'Samvasar[illegible]em the story of their forme[illegible]e. Pri[illegible] Tirthanka[illegible]y of their doubts. Then, the[illegible] answe[illegible]ents which [illegible] to take [illegible] to Paithanpur and [illegible]ndra and Ratnamanjari co[illegible] Mahidhar.

[illegible]e blessed with a son, name[illegible]inhketu of Kannada [illegible]esh

After a long time, Kin[illegible]a who prepares his a[illegible] and comes to fight Prithvicha[illegible]dversary. On the way [illegible]owever, marches on to meet h[illegible]rt and realises the futil[illegible] of worldly he has a change of [illegible]gnizes the necessity to overcome [illegible] life. He also r[illegible]emy inside rather than [illegible] the [illegible]ahidhar, destroy the [illegible]ally leads him to [illegible] wanderings. This ev[illegible]ally leads him to [illegible]meration of man[illegible]ough obei[illegible]ce to the king [illegible] obeis[illegible]ce to the [illegible]vided into five [illegible] [illegible]ding over the [illegible] the pace of the original tale. It is [illegible]rithvich[illegible] observe that the episode of war is located [illegible]hy so as to invoke in the king the spirit of renunciation and aversion to temporal pleasures.

Manikyasundarsuri selected a fable from traditional sources like Prakrit or at best from a source like Kathasaritsagar, and then transformed it to suit his own purpose in lucid prose embellished with apt figures of speech and delightful descriptions. For all these reasons Prithvichandracharitra has been considered a landmark in medieval prose literature.

B.J.

PRITHVIRAJ RASO (Hindi) is regarded as an epic of growth in Hindi. Its author Chandbardai was a court poet of Prithviraj Chauhan. Some scholars are of the opinion that 'Chand' was the poet's title and not the name of a particular individual and that Prithviraj raso was the work of a number of charans. Because of his valour and defiance of foreign invaders, Prithviraj became a national warrior of his times and the poem written in his praise became the property of all charans who sang it in various courts to earn their living. They kept on adding new episodes to it to make it more interesting. Consequently, the original work underwent a number of changes in plot and language. By the seventeenth century it was a voluminous epic. In the early seventeenth century Rana [illegible]arsingh got it organised in the form of a book. Today we ha[illegible] number of versions which suggest that it is a work of va[illegible] hands.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

According [illegible] Chand, when Muhammad Ghori arrested Prithviraj and him to Ghazani, he too went with him, handing over the [illegible]uscript to his son Jalhan: "Putthak Jalhan hatth dei, [illegible] Gajjan nrip kaj."

[illegible]fore, it is said that the po[illegible] was continued by raso, is later by other bards. [illegible]ersy, which still centre[illegible] twelfth-centu[illegible] Prithviraj-[illegible]eventeenth-centu[illegible] or a [illegible]historicity and regard [illegible]. Most of the scholar[illegible] doubt [illegible] [illegible]ortant from the lite[illegible] vents as imaginary. But [illegible] point of view is that it is [illegible] epic of growth like the Ra[illegible] Iliad [illegible] the Odyssey. Fou[illegible] ana, the Mahabharata, the available. The first has 64 to[illegible]ecensions of Raso are seventeen thousand verses. The seco[illegible] cantos with about some twelve thousand verses. The third [illegible] has 47 cantos with 3500 verses. The fourth is not divided into [illegible] 19 cantos with fre[illegible]1300 verses. [illegible]tos and has started [illegible] been usually regarded as Prit[illegible]iraj's [illegible] it was [illegible] adviser. Since the work of a c[illegible] authentic than [illegible] the Royal Asiatic Society undertaken along this line [illegible]ssumption. Some part literary study of Raso was neg[illegible] many versions, is a good piece of litera[illegible] fragment of of 'charita kavya'. As an epic it is impressive[illegible]ly more valiant hero of great stature and an absorbing plot[illegible] dexterous use of creative imagination in the treatment o[illegible] plots and descriptions. The plot has a number of motifs and thematic conventions in the Indian tradition. The poem is worked out as a dialogue between Shuk and Shuki (male and female parrots) in various metres with the predominance of 'chhappay'. The overwhelming 'rasa' is the heroic sentiment, though the erotic element is no less important.

Prithviraj raso is genuine heroic poetry against the backdrop of a feudal age of war and chivalry. The main plot centres on Prithviraj, but the poem, as a whole, reflects the socio-political life of the twelfth and thirteenth century northern India. In its vast canvas it is often compared with the Mahabharata which was the main influence on the poem, though it was also influenced by the tradition of charita kavyas in Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha.

Prithviraj raso is an epic of growth. There is naturalness in its poetry and no artifice. The narrative has intensity and its language is a mixture of so many compounds—Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha, Dingal and Pingal. Its creative use of language, the liveliness of its narrative skill, the use of metres in harmony with situations, the use of figures according to varying emotions—all these qualities make it a work of great literary value.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hazariprasad Dwivedi (ed.), Sankshipta Prithviraj raso; Shambunath Singh, Hindi mahakavya ka swarup aur vikas.

K.P.

PRIYA PRAVAS (Hindi) is the first epic in Khariboli, Hindi. Its author Ayodhyasingh Upadhyaya 'Hariaudh' has given a fresh interpretation to the story of Radha-Krishna, told times without number since the fifteenth century. Though listed among the story-based epics of the Dwivedi age, its story element is scanty. Some critics even [illegible] it too flimsy to sustain the weight of an epic. The poet [illegible]im, however, is not to narrate a story but to delve deep in[illegible] the human psyche and portray the depth and intensity o[illegible]otions. For this purpose he has concentrated only on s[illegible] selected episodes from Krishna's life.

Influenced by th[illegible]ew and rational ideas of his age, the poet concentrates o[illegible]he treatment of basic social problems and preaches ide[illegible] of social service and universal brotherhood. He eschew[illegible]he supernatural from the story or transforms it so that it [illegible]onvinces even a sceptic. With the help of an idiom he gives a plausible turn to Krishna's superhuman feat of lifting the Goverdhan hill on the tip of his shortest finger.

In the epic, Radha and Krishna are neither celestial va[illegible] incarnations of divinity nor ordinary lovers, but [illegible]dancing w[illegible]ired by noble ideals of social service and in[illegible]lligent, sharp-w[illegible] not self-centred. Their love for anx[illegible]s to save people from tyra[illegible] but enlightened by moral poor a[illegible] the victims of injustice, Radha [illegible] flute playing and called th[illegible] is an the Lamp[illegible]odern Florence Nightingale or the 'Lady wi[illegible]

As the t[illegible] separation suff[illegible] the book suggests, its theme is pangs of gopis of Braja, o[illegible]y Radha and others, particularly the unlike other poets, [illegible]hna's departure for Mathura. But attention on the pang[illegible]audh does not focus all his maidens, but he suggest[illegible]paration suffered by young sufferings of a mother for he[illegible] the first time, that the [illegible] are too deep for tears. Though written in Khariboli[illegible] diction lends classical melody to th[illegible] highly Sanskritized discreet enough to adjust his language [illegible] Yet the poet is context, the emotions and the metre. It [illegible]le to suit the narrative to the pictorial as the occasion de[illegible] from the [illegible] though the use of Sanskrit compounds makes the task difficult.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Another special feature of the epic is the use of Sanskrit metres. This gives a remarkable novelty of form to the work.

The spirit of nationalism is not confined to a treatment of contemporary social, political and economic problems; it is essentially concerned with the realisation of the aspirations of the nation. It inspires poets to examine the old values and norms in the context of the new conditions of life. Hariaudh achieves this objective in his magnum opus Priya pravas and therefore occupies a place of honour in the poetry of our cultural renaissance. He has invested this class of poetry with epic grandeur. For chiselling a new diamond drawn out of the recesses of the Srimadbhagavat, he was honoured with the Mangalaprasad award of Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Prayag.

S.S.G.

PRIYADARSHIKA (Sanskrit) is a drama, in four acts, of the 'natika' type, by Harshavardhana, king of Thaneshwar and Kanauj, also known as Shriharsha (7th c. AD). The source of the theme of the drama must have been Gunadhya's Brihatkatha (1st c. AD). Priyadarshika is clearly modelled on Kalidasa's Malavikagnimitra, a court comedy ending in a cheerful note. The theme of the play is a love affair of King Udayana of Vatsa with Priyadarshika, daughter of King Dridhavarman. The king fell in love with a pretty maiden whose antecedents were not known till the very end of the play. The chief queen, Vasavadatta, sensed the king's amorous inclination towards Priyadarshika and tried her level best to prevent the lovers from meeting, but all her efforts failed since friends of both the king and the heroine cleverly bring about their union. Finally it transpires that the heroine is a princess whose parents had sent her as a bride to this king and owing to a battle she had been separated from her escort. She lived in the harem as a female attendant of the chief queen Vasavadatta incognito under the assumed name, Aranyika, and fell in love with the king, and when her identity was known the queen gave her in marriage to her husband.

Shriharsha must be credited for effectively devising the plot. He adopts the theme of love intrigue on the same line as his great predecessor had done and embellishes it further by harmonizing the parts of the plot. The action of the drama moves smoothly and there is noticeable ingenuity. The double comedy in the play is a happy thought and the intrigue in Act IV is neatly conducted. The chief emotion (rasa) in the play is love (shringara) and the hero is noble and cheerful (dhiralalita).

Priyadarshika as a natika is not first-rate when compared with Malavikagnimitra of Kalidasa but must be regarded as one of the important second rank dramas in Sanskrit. However, the author has shown in Priyadarshika his abilities as a poet (Shriharshonipunah kavih) by using a charmingly lucid language, sonorous long metres and suitable figures of speech.

S.M.

PRIYAMBADA DEVI (Bengali)
see under DEVI, PRIYAMBADA

PRIYOLAKAR, ANANT KAKABA (Marathi; b. 1895, d. 1973) was an eminent research scholar, literary historian and linguist. He took his B.A. from Bombay University in 1923. Early in life he wrote many poems under the pseudonym 'Arunodaya B.A.', but this urge for creative writing gradually subsided and he directed his energies to academic and scholarly pursuits. The most significant outcome of it was the publication of the critical edition of Damayanti svayamvaram by Raghunatha Pandit, which was awarded the Tarkhadkar Prize. It was followed by several other publications, including Dadoba Panduranga: atmacharitra ani charitra (Autobiography and biography of Dadoba Panduranga, 1947). A Goan by origin, he was well aware of the impact of the Portuguese dominance in the eastern coastal region. This made him turn his attention to the collection of rare printed editions and manuscripts of texts in Marathi and Konkani written by the missionaries. He unearthed the hitherto unknown works of the missionaries and brought out well-documented critical editions. He was closely associated with the Marathi Samshodhan Mandal (Marathi Research Centre), first as Reader, and then as Director. In 1951, he became President of Maharashtra Sahitya Sammelan held at Karwar. His other works include The Printing Press in India (1958), The Goa Inquisition (1961), Goa-Fact Versus Fiction (1962), Goa Rediscovered (1967). Autobiography: Priya ani apriya (Desirable and undesirable, 1965).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.K. Priyolakar smritigrantha (Bombay).

J.B.P.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Assamese).The Progressive Movement in Assamese literature was launched in the forties of this century in the pages of Jayanti when the editorship of this monthly magazine was taken over from Ragunath Chaudhary by two young writers, Kamal Narayan Dev and Chakreswar Bhattacharya. Bhabananda Dutta, a brilliant young intellectual, joined them and, by contributing regularly to the magazine, helped shape the movement. Writings showing progressive characteristics had, however, started appearing in Assamese literature from the nineteen-thirties, and they were mostly from the pen of Lakshmidhar Sarma, a short story writer of talent.

In Lakshmidhar Sarma's stories like 'Chiraj' and 'Bidrohini' (The rebel woman) included in his collection Byarthatar dan (Gift of frustration, 1930), sympathy for the exploited and the oppressed does not remain merely at the emotional level as it does in the case of many fiction writers of the decade. He hints in a subtle way the cause at the root of exploitation and oppression. While giving expression to the false pride of the upper caste Hindus and attacking their narrow conservatism, Sarma highlights the broad-mindedness of the peasantry. His 'Parajay' (Defeat), a story published in Awahon (1933), is a critique of capitalism. Lakshmidhar Sarma was thus the precursor of progressivism in Assamese literature.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

About a decade later when the Progressive Movement was launched in an organized manner, many other writers joined the three young intellectuals mentioned above. Kamal Narayan Dev's article, 'Pragativadi kavitar technique' (The technique of progressive poetry), which was treated by many as the manifesto of the Progressive Movement in Assamese literature, was published in Jayanti (1944). It has its value even today as an essay on the nature and art of progressive literature. Bhabananda Dutta's critique, Assamiya kavitar kahini (The story of Assamese poetry), first serialized in Awahon during 1954-1955, was another critical work of significance. It evaluates Assamese romantic poetry with a progressive outlook, placing it against the background of society, economics and politics. It was later published as a book under the same title in 1969.

As for poetry, Bhabananda Dutta's poem, Rajpath, written under the pseudonym 'Nachiketa', published in the first issue of Jayanti under the joint editorship of the two young progressivists, must first be mentioned. The street (Rajpath) here is looked upon as a witness to indolence and wasteful luxury of the rich in palatial multi-storeyed buildings when beggars, reduced to skeletons, beg about on the pavement. Amulya Barua's 'Kukur' (Dogs) published in a different issue of the same magazine is another important poem in which street dogs by the garbage heaps in the city keep biting at bones and, deprived even of the left-overs of cereal food, become a metaphor for the deprived classes. Consciousness of class-difference is very strong in these poems. Hem Barua was another poet writing progressive poetry in the same vein for this magazine as well as for Pachowa, edited by himself, and other magazines such as Ramdhenu. Poems by these poets became models later for a host of young poets who made this school of Assamese poetry richer. Subsequently, Amulya Barua's poems came out in a collection called Achina (The stranger, 1964), edited by Nanda Talukdar, while Hem Barua's poems appeared in two collections, Balichanda (Sand mica, 1962) and Manmayuri (The peahen of the mind, 1967). Jyotiprasad Agarwalla was another writer who wrote not only poems and songs but also plays. His drama, Karengar ligiri (The palace maid, 1930) is one of the best plays in Assamese, and is rich both in art and in progressive ideas. In many of Jyotiprasad's reflective prose writings, too, we find his sympathy for the downtrodden and an urge for social equality. Bishnu Prasad Rava was another progressive writer. He wrote some very good progressive poems and songs which have a deep appeal. His prose works also reveal the urge towards revolution for a better, classless society. Hemanga Biswas was another writer belonging to the same school. Chakreswar Bhattacharyya, besides his editorial writings in Jayanti, wrote many poems in sympathy with the downtrodden and quite a few essays in which he evaluated with a progressive outlook the writers and thinkers of Assam and beyond. He generally wrote creative pieces like poems and short stories under the pseudonyms, 'Devanam priya', 'Jnanada Chaudhury' and 'Utpal Chaudhury'. His short stories were later collected under the title Riksahwalla, while his prose-poems were collected after his death under the title, Rajpathar sil (Stones of the street, 1971),

Of the later generation of progressive writers who established themselves in the fifties, mention must be made of Amalendu Guha, Keshav Mahanta and Ram Gogoi. Amalendu Guha, in the main a social scientist, writes both in English and in Assamese. He is also a poet in Assamese. As a social scientist, he has interpreted certain periods and movements in Assamese history in the light of the Marxist ideology. Keshav Mahanta who is a lyricist, has a special gift of giving expression to feelings in a very simple, yet succinct language. In his poems he shows a special sympathy with the simple folk of the lower rung. Ram Gogoi's poems register a protest against injustice society does to peasants and workers.

In the case of the progressive writers who established themselves in the sixties, Hiren Gohain's name must come first. He is mainly a literary and social critic but has also written some good poems and short stories. As a critic his major contributions are to be found in his Sahityar satya (Truth of literature, 1970), Samaj aru samalochana (Society and criticism, 1971), Sahitya aru chetana (Literature and consciousness, 1976). Gohain occupies a high position as a critic not only among the progressive writers but also among the whole group of Assamese authors.

Shivanath Barman established himself as a reflective prose writer of special importance in the early seventies. He studied human civilizations of the past, rites and rituals of various races in the world, and the works of philosophers and religious preachers of the world from a Marxist standpoint. His essays are collected under the titles Na manusyat (None greater than man, 1982), Loka kristir utsa (Source of folk culture, 1982) and Anvesa (Quest, 1984).

Coming to poetry, we see in this period poets with social awareness, such as Rabindra Sarkar and Bijan Lal Chaudhury. Sarkar wants a new era in history when there would be no social disparity and injustice, while Chaudhury expresses his sympathy for the lowly and the downtrodden. Amongst the still younger poets who protest against social injustice, mention may be made of

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sananta Tati. Then there is Ranjit Dev Goswami, a young critic, with socio-economic awareness.

In the field of novels and short stories written during the seventies and eighties, Shilabhadra comes first. In his Sainik (Soldier) he portrays through the life of a semi-urban dweller the transformation of a forest to an arable land and then to an industrial belt, discussing the changes from a Marxist point of view. His other novel, Bir (Hero), portrays the poverty of the peasantry in an interior village. Anil Raychoudhary is another successful novelist with Marxist ideas. In his Kandari (Helmsman, 1979), he takes the actual event of the All India Railway Workers strike (1974) as the subject of his novelette. His novelette Satru (Enemy, 1980) also shows how the policies and actions of a bourgeois government can create hell in the life of an individual. This book is set against the India-China armed conflict of the early sixties. Both Shilabhadra and Raychaudhary have written some very good short stories too. Mukut Bhattacharyya is another novelist of this group who has written quite a few short stories and novelettes with the Marxist ideology. A novelist and short story writer of the fifties, Nirupama Borgohain began to write with a progressive bias in the seventies. Her best novel with this trend is Iparar ghar, Siparar ghar (House this side and house that side, 1979). Amongst the young who deserve mention is Bipul Khataniar who writes with a Marxist ideal.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gobinda Prasad Sarma, 'Pragativadi galpa upanyasar dah bachar' in Natun prithivi (Dec. 1981; July 1982); Hiren Gohain, Sahityar satya (Gauhati, 1970), and Sahitya aru chetana (Gauhati, 1976); Rabindra Bora, 'Joa pachis bachharar Asamiya kavita' in Prakas (Dec. 1984, Gauhati); Upendranath Sarma, 'Joa pachis bacharar Asamiya chuti galpa' in Prakas (Dec. 1984, Gauhati).

Go.S.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Bengali). The concept of progressive literature in India was first defined in the manifesto of the Progressive Writers' Association: 'We believe that the new literature of India must deal with the basic problems of our existence to-day, the problems of hunger and poverty, social backwardness and political subjection. All that drags us down to passivity, inaction and unreason we reject as reactionary. All that arouses in us the critical spirit, which examines institutions and customs in the light of reason, which helps us to act, to organise ourselves, to transform, we accept as progressive.' Though inspired by the International Association of Writers for the Defence of Culture against Fascism, PWA in India, thus, formulated literary principles suitable for a backward subject-people vis-a-vis the global threat of fascism. As Ahmed Ali once pointed out, the word 'progressive' in Indian context, then, meant 'banishment of mysticism' and 'acceptance of realism', something that Western literature had long since achieved. The word acquired an increasingly Marxist overtone in the '40s, and is now almost synonymous with the left or the revolutionary according to the specific political contexts.

As elsewhere in India, progressive literature in Bengal owes its origin to PWA, and its steady growth to a number of organisations such as Youth Cultural Institute (1940), Anti-Fascist Writers and Artists Union (1942) and finally to the Indian People's Theatre Association (1943). Y.C.I., essentially a student organisation, led by Jyoti Basu, Nikhil Chakrabarti, Jolly Mohan Kaul, Chinmohan Sehanabis, made a bold attempt to explore the possibilities of a radical theatre through such plays as Kerani (The clerks) by Sunil Chatterjee, and an adaptation of the short story 'Fossil' by Subodh Ghose, called Anjangar. The major breakthrough in Bengali theatre occurred, however, with Nabanna (The new harvest) written by Bijan Bhattacharya, and produced by I.P.T.A. (1944). More than any other play, e.g. Laboratory by Benoy Ghose (1943), Homeopathy by Manoranjan Bhattacharya (1944), Agun and Jabanbandi by Bijon Bhattacharya himself (1943-44), Nabanna succeeded in establishing a new idiom that would dominate the Bengali progressive theatre for a very long time. Though the success of Nabanna was due more to the new technique of production than to the play, it proved that Bengali dramatists could catch up with the novelists in dealing with contemporary issues realistically. In fact, social realism with a message became more and more strident in the numerous plays that followed Nabanna, and lacked the creative touch of Digindra Chandra Banerjee or Bijan Bhattacharya. One of the factors leading to the split in the I.P.T.A. was the urge felt by some like Shambhu Mitra to escape the constricting style of propagandist left-wing theatre. But the Nabanatya (New drama) inspired by him did not produce a dramatist of comparable stature. The dramatist who would hold the stage for the longest period of time is Utpal Dutta who claims to have extended the range and appeal of peoples' theatre, as evidenced by his prolific career as a dramatist (Angar, Kollol, Ferari Fouj, Manusher adhikare, Barricade, Tiner Taroal, etc.). Since the '50s, particularly in mid '60s and '70s, a freer spirit of experimentation was noticeable in the theatre of social commitment in the works of Mohit Chatterjee, Badal Sarkar and Monoj Mitra. The Brecht fever in the '70s introduced a new technique of production, but could not lead to any corresponding creative upsurge in drama as literature. The most remarkable play in this period was Jagannath by Arun Mukherjee, the story of a coward who courts death to defeat his rival in heroism. It should be emphasized that I.P.T.A., despite the failure of its attempt to take the theatre to the people, at least succeeded in giving the moribund traditional drama a new lease of life in terms of both content and form. The same claim cannot be made in the field of poetry and fiction where there had already been a very rich living tradition of both artistic creativity and social consciousness. Leftist poets and novelists of the late '30s and '40s can at best claim to have added to it a new socio-political outlook and consequent radicalization of language. Probably because of the comparatively high level of artistic consciousness in the poetry of Tagore and Kollol group (Premendra Mitra, Buddhadev Bose and others) and a spontaneous overflow of nationalist feelings in the works of Nazrul, poets like Bishnu De, Samar Sen, Subhas Mukherjee, unlike the so-called progressive dramatists, felt an inner compulsion to evolve their own modes of expression and imagery which would be of far-reaching consequence in the committed poetry of the following generations (Gopal Bhowmick, Mongola Charan Chatterjee, Ram Basu, etc.). But the most popular poet to date is Sukanta Bhattacharya because of his charming simplicity. Biren Chatterjee who started writing in the '40s moved towards a simpler, more concentrated utterance in the '70s, a decade that witnessed something like a revival of the spirit of the '40s in literature under the impact of the Naxalite movement. The Communist Party of India, which played a pivotal role in the dissemination of progressive ideas and culture in India, brought about a radical transformation of many Bengali writers, but the most remarkable example is Manik Banerjee, a major novelist of the '30s who moved from his earlier critical realism to a Marxist aesthetics which, according to some like Buddhadeva Bose, killed the artist in him, and according to the Marxist apologists, can be compared only with Gorky's transformation. But it is not difficult to see that the impact of Marxism has proved more creative in short stories than in the novels, e.g., short stories by Manik Banerjee, Samaresh Bose, Narayan Ganguly and others.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Perhaps, the most enduring achievement of the progressive writers in Bengali lies in the field of polemical essays about the relation between literature and ideology, writer and society, tradition and individual talent. Initiated by D.P. Mukherjee in the '30s, the Marxist approach to the problems of literature and society became increasingly popular in the '40s, thanks to the works of Bhupen Dutta, Hiren Mukherjee, Saroj Acharya, Swarna Kamal Bhattacharya, Gopal Haldar, Hiran Sanyal, Binay Ghose, Saroj Dutta and others. From the very inception of the Progressive Writers' Movement in Bengal, battle lines were drawn for the moderates and the extremists within the Marxist school, and the battle, as everywhere in the world, still continues. But it is interesting to watch a hard-liner mellow over the years or a moderate growing more and more extremist with the passage of time.

The changing policy of the C.P.I., its split and internal conflict, have been responsible for the changing pattern of literary criticism or a sudden shift in the attitude of the critic or the social historian. For example, Rabindranath Tagore who was dubbed a reactionary in the '40s would be rehabilitated later, but would suffer a similar stricture in the '70s, when Naxalites dismissed the whole tradition of the middle class Bengali literature. To the S.U.C. supporters Nazrul and Saratchandra are more important than Sukanta Bhattacharya and Manik Banerjee. There is, however, a group of critics who still strive to be less partisan and dogmatic and more conscious of the dialectics of the historical change of Marxist evaluation itself. Such an attitude is encouraged by Little magazines, not by party papers. As a matter of fact, it is in the Little magazines that the spirit of debate has been kept alive, while the party papers repeat only the predictable judgments on writers. It is a continuation of the tradition of the intellectual dissent established in the '40s when Agrani, Arani, Parichay, Sahityapatra and Marxbadi were all for the fray. Naxalite movement may have by now petered out politically in West Bengal, but its impact can still be felt in the Little magazines that challenge the present left establishment (e.g., Anik and Anustup). A significant role was played by Samar Sen in fostering intellectual resistance against the decadence of leftism through his English weekly Frontier.

Today the word 'progressive' has lost its earlier meaning to a knowledgeable Bengali reader. A fight for liberal democratic values is now considered a relic of the past. The word 'progressive' is now almost synonymous with 'Marxist' in West Bengal. With the increasing political power of all leftist parties there has paradoxically been a more populist and a less doctrinal approach to literature. Even Gour Kishore Ghose and Sunil Ganguly, writers of the Ananda Bazar group of papers, have been honoured by the Left Front Government in spite of their well-known anti-Marxist leanings. But the Marxist jargon still dominates literary reviews in the left magazines and party papers where the word 'progressive' appears shorn of its erstwhile inclusiveness. The growing gap between the theory and practice of the Marxist litterateurs has again brought to the fore the old debate centring round the question of art and ideology. I.P.T.A. is still castigated for its petty-bourgeois lapses, but no alternative has yet emerged to bridge the cultural gap between the village and the city. Meanwhile, people in general are as usual innocent of the 'progressive literature' or its polemics.

D.C.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Dogri). Dogri literature has had no such thing as a distinct progressive movement, nor is any Dogri writer progressive in the strict sense of the term. There is, however, a streak of progressivism running like a red thread throughout the literary activity in Dogri which started in mid-forties with the birth of 'Dogri Sanstha'. Many of the leading Dogri writers like Dinu Bhai 'Pant' and Vedpal 'Deep' were familiar with the progressive movement in Urdu and Hindi literatures and its preoccupation with a particular type of writing which was critical of everything old and traditional and put emphasis on a certain leftist-socialistic ideology, giving expression to protest against poverty, exploitation and social disparities. All these found their expression in some fiery poems of protest and short stories. This type of progressive writing in Dogri can be distinguished from the conventional, traditional and romantic writings. All these trends are being followed simultaneously and, strangely enough, sometimes by the same authors. Many examples of this type of writing can be found in Dogri poetry, short story and play.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Dinu Bhai 'Pant' and Vedpal 'Deep' are, perhaps, the most prominent progressive poets in Dogri; the bulk of their work denotes a protest against social injustice, poverty and exploitation, and pleads for the creation of a social awakening and a new age. At the same time, Dinu Bhai has also written Vir Gulab, a ballad eulogising the martial prowess of Maharaja Gulab Singh, and Vedpal has written some fine poems and ghazals of romantic fervour. Yash Sharma, a purely romantic singer, wrote about the farmers and the plight of the workers.

Padma Sachdev struck a progressive note in her Raje diyan mandiyan, in which she voiced the feelings of rebellion of a poor, old woman against exploitation by the privileged. Shambhunath Sharma, the author of Dogri Ramayana, wrote about the grinding poverty of clerks and poor villagers. Even Kehari Singh 'Madhukar' wrote about man's exploitation and the need for social change and rewriting of history. But in these and other poets of the forties and fifties, who wrote about farmers and workers, social inequities, poverty and exploitation, the element of progressivism is insignificant. Not so in Dinu Bhai 'Pant' and Vedpal 'Deep', who are committed to a political philosophy and insist upon bringing about a change.

Dinu Bhai stokes socialist fires in poems like 'Kam kara te rutti deb' (Give me work and give me bread) and 'Uttha majura! Uttha Kasannao! Tera bela aya ol' (Rise, O worker! Rise farmer! your time has arrived!). In poem after poem, he hammers for social change and unity of workers so that a new Duggar, Dogra land of the common man, becomes possible. His longish narrative poem 'Mangu di chhabil' is also the story of exploitation in rural Duggar and revolt against it.

Vedpal 'Deep', perhaps the only card-holding Dogri delicate [illegible] imaginative and sophisticated in weaving colours, he calls upon the [illegible] and leftist philosophy into the fine, to shower colours, and cajoles Holi to [illegible] poem 'Holi', the festival of laughter to the common man. [illegible] and sunlight

In another earlier poem on 'New freedom', he calls upon freedom to move in the fields of humble farmers, in the dark lanes of hungry workers, and light lamps in the hovels of the poor. In his later poems, he talks of a new He visualises the coming [illegible] to change the social order. labourers and farmers rising with sickles, [illegible] ploughs in thier hands, razing the pillars of capitalism to ground.

Bawa Jitto is a progressive play in the sense that it celebrates the right of a tiller to his produce and revolt against the feudal system. In other plays like Name gran barobari, Dehri and Dharati de atthrun and in the first three Dogri novels, Shano by Narendra Khajuria, Dharan te dhuran by Madan Mohan and Har beri pattan by Ved Rahi, the progressive ideology gets mixed up with reformist sentimental zeal. Some Dogri stories of R.K. Abrol, Narendra Khajuria, Madan Mohan, Ramnath Shastri, Om Goswami, O.P. Sharma 'Sarathi', Shrivatsa 'Vikal', Kavi Ratna and Chhatrapal have progressive slant in the sense that they focus attention on the class and caste-ridden feudal Dogra society with its exploitative system, poverty, social disparties and injustice and imply a protest against the system and suggest the need for social change. But the progressive pose is not so pronounced and the tone not so strident as in Dinu Bhai's poetry of protest.

With the maturing of Dogri literature in subsequent years, the progressive trend has tapered, and the writings having overt social realism with its exuberance and slogan-mongering, are considered old fashioned, and are, therefore, no more in vogue. Social purpose and progressive views in the Dogri literature of 1970s are subdued and subordinated to artistic purpose.

Sh.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Gujarati). The concept of progressivism is closely linked with Marxism. Though not labelled as such, progressive thoughts find an expression in Gujarati literature during the last years of the third decade. Jhaverchand Meghani (1897-1947), in his poem, 'Karal kal jage' (The deadly time is awake), speaks about the oppressed labourers, the toilers and the miners, and the rich parasites who live on the poor man's blood and honour.

Similarly, Sundaram (b.1908), in his collection of poems Koyabhagatni kadvi vani (Bitter utterances of Koya Bhagat, 1933), shows his concern for the exploited poor and the irrational and unjust distinctions. The contents of the poem speak of the radical thoughts and ideology of the thirties.

Both these writers have written short stories also depicting the evils of class distinction and merciless exploitation of the poor. The trend set by them was picked up by other writers also. Umashankar Joshi, in his poem 'Jatharagni' (Fire of hunger), says: 'When the fire of hunger of the poor will raise its flames, not a particle of the ashes of the mansion burnt down will remain.' Snehrashmi has written poems denouncing the exploitation of child-labour. In the genre of drama, Jayanti Dalal (1900-1970) in his plays like Soyanun nakun has exposed [illegible] and evil design of capitalists. These writers were, however, not committed writers. There were committed writers like Swapnastha (1903-1970), 'Bakulesh' Jitubhai Mehta, Chandrabhai Bhatt, who were in the thick of the Progressive Writers' Movement and their writings depicted pure and simple social realism. The Progressive Writers' Association was established in Gujarat in 1940 and under its aegis two volumes of progressive literature containing poems, short stories, one-act plays and essays were brought out. Many prominent young writers found a place in these volumes. In the first volume, Umashankar Joshi, writing about the relation of progressivism with poetry, says : 'A poet is also a human being. His works, his poetical writings are his social acts. In order to attain true poetic merit, the poem has to be faithful to life. True poetry is always in tune with life.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

During World War II, the force of the progressive movement, however, subsided and in reaction to the devastation that the war brought, new trends in Gujarati literature began to show up.

C.M.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Hindi). Progress means moving forward, moulding new paths, shedding the slough of dead conventions, and thinking in new directions. But the word 'progressive', as it is understood today, came into vogue in the thirties of this century. It is closely related to the philosophy of Karl Marx and Fredrich Engels. Literature based on the theoretical concepts of dialectical materialism is called progressive literature. Marx believed in the primacy of matter and held that it is not the consciousness of men that determines their being but it is their social being that determines their consciousness. All literary works have an economic basis and they grow under the dominating influence of economic factors.

The Marxist writer believes that literature is not an isolated work of art. It is a social product and an agent of social revolution. It reflects social processes and can effectively shape the course of political events. It should faithfully depict the struggle of the popular masses and aim at putting an end to all exploitation, starvation, disease and repression. Literary values are not independent and absolute, they are related to the milieu and the moment.

The situation at home as well as the revolutionary changes that took place in Russia prepared the ground for progressive literature to germinate, take shape and flourish in India. The frequent famines and epidemics resulting in starvation and deaths and the political and economic exploitation of the country by alien rulers created disillusionment and resentment among the young writers. They were, however, stirred by the Bolshevik Revolution of 1918 in Russia and the rapid progress it made in a short time. There arose a galaxy of writers like Subramania Bharati, Kazi Nazrul Islam, Sajjad Zahir, Faiz Ahmad Faiz, Premchand and Nirala who pioneered the cause of progressive literature in India. The first meeting of the Progressive Writers' Conference held in Lucknow in 1936 under the presidentship of Premchand was a landmark in the history of Indian literature and gave impetus to the progressive movement.

The Hindi poets, including some of the pioneers of the romantic stream began to re-define their attitude towards art. Sumitranandan Pant in his editorial of Rupabh wrote: 'Poetry cannot flourish in dreams. It has to deal with the hard and ugly problems of the sons of the soil.' Instead of glorifying Shahjahan for building the splendid Taj Mahal, he censured him for his extravagance while countless people in his kingdom starved and died. In his Yugvani and Gramya he asked the poets to come to terms with the earth and her children. Nirala in his famous poems 'Bhikshuk', 'Torti patthar' and 'Kukurmutta' described the pitiable condition of the poor labourers and their exploitation by the capitalists. Dinkar focused on the social and economic disparity in the country. Other poets like Navin, Narendra Sharma, Nagarjun, Muktibodh, Kedarnath Agrawal, Dhumil, stirred by the poverty and exploitation of the teeming masses, expressed a keen sense of anguish for the downtrodden. Some of them think that the remedy for this malady lies only in revolutiion. Navin writes: 'O poet, strike a strain that creates the spirit of revolt among the masses, and the world will witness an unprecedented upheaval.' The poets ask the people to cast off old and dead conventions and orthodox views on religion and destiny, heaven and hell. To them man is the supreme creation, and all should aim at his welfare. Though these poems are suffused with emotion, they are not addressed to an individual but they concern the whole society. Contemporary problems and issues like the famine of Bengal, the devastation caused by the atom bomb on Hiroshima, the partition of the country, the Suez canal turmoil, the Korean war, the pursuit of self-interest and corruption in post-independent India are the subjects of their poems.

In the list of the priorities of a progressive writer utility precedes beauty. He is more concerned with content than with form. He is prepared to sacrifice [illegible] for the sake of idea. Consequently, his [illegible] metres and lucid and direct. He makes exp[illegible] empancipating poetry fro[illegible] figures of speech [illegible]ism influenced the Hindi fiction-writers [illegible]. The progressive Hindi novelists in their works dealt with social realities. Their depiction of social situations is based on class-structure and class struggle. The most significant exponents of this trend are Yashpal, Rahul Sankratyayan, Rangeya Raghav, Amrit Rai and Nagarjun who present a committed approach to reality. Even in their historical novels, Divya, Murdon[illegible] between yodheya. Singh [illegible] the bourgeois and the proletariat. The plots of many of these novels, particularly those belonging to the earlier phase, are loosely structured and the characters fall in set patterns of ideology.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The later novels, however, are free from these blemishes; they are even free from a doctrinaire bias and try to depict life in its true colours. Bhishma Sahni, Mannu Bhandari, Naresh Mehta and Shrilal Shukla are stalwarts in the field.

Hindi criticism too did not remain unaffected by Marxist philosophy. Among those who discussed literature from the Marxist point of view, the prominent critics are Prakash Chandra Gupta, Ramvilas Sharma, Shivdan Singh Chauhan, Muktibodh and Amrit Rai. In his works Naya Hindi sahitya, Hindi sahitya ki janvadi parampara and Sahitya dhara, P.C. Gupta severely censured those critics who confined themselves to an aesthetic category of experience and ignored its social implications. He eulogized the saint poets because they gave expression to the general mood of the masses and exhorted them to revolt against orthodoxy and rituals. He rejected the poetry of Ritikal because he considered it decadent and primarily an expression of repressed complexes and feudal mentality.

Ramvilas Sharma, another vigorous proponent of Marxist philosophy, in his works Premchand aur unka yuga, Nirala, Bharatendu Harishchandra, Pragatishil sahitya ki samasyaen, etc., has interpreted literary works as social documents and has emphasised that writers should participate in the revolutionary battle against exploitation and injustice perpetrated by the capitalist society. He called the mystic and romantic poetry of Hindi reactionary and escapist. He accused the new experimentalists of neglecting their social responsibility. Shivdan Singh Chauhan, in his works Sahitya ki parakh and Pragativad and Hindi ka gadya sahitya, endeavours to explain that literary works should be judged with reference to social context. He is against propaganda and asserts that whenever writers have resorted to propaganda their works have become banal.

Progressive literature aroused great hopes because of its humanitarian approach and realistic overtones, but because of its overemphasis on social and economic problems, it did not allow the writers to look beyond the day-to-day problems of the world. Their poetic works, on the whole, lacked depth of emotion and subtle nuances of art. Many of them fell into the trap of mechanistic over-simplification of their fundamental thesis, i.e. stress on class propaganda and revolutionary didacticism. A rigid and doctrinaire approach blurs their aesthetic sensibility. The novelists, while weaving romantic love scenes in the texture of their plots, often tend to become obscene. In spite of these defects progressive literature, however, has its historical value. For the first time it drew the attention of the authors to relate their works to the common man and his problems and to show his potential greatness in the midst of all his weaknesses and handicaps.

S.S.G.
Raj.S.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Kannada), designated as 'pragatisheela sahitya' in Kannada, was the contribution of a group of writers who sought in the 1940's to create a literary movement to sharpen the social edge of writing. The movement was an offshoot of the All India Progressive Movement.

The pragatisheela writers formed the first literary school with a distinct ideology and manifesto. The first phase of modern Kannada literature is referred to as the 'Navodaya period', but the writers themselves did not use any such label. In the early forties came a fiery leader who believed that Kannada literature had abdicated its social responsibility. This was A.N. Krishna Rao, a gifted writer and a most persuasive speaker. He was in touch with the leaders of the All India Progressive Movement.

In his early years Krishna Rao was a rebel. His very first novel, Jeevana yathre (1934), was a challenge both to the accepted notions of respectability and to the notions of taboos in writing. He questioned the bases of social morality and also dealt with the theme of sexual morality frankly. In lengthy prefaces to his works as well as from platforms he argued that the writer was to be a devotee of truth, however unpleasant it may be (one of his novels is called Nagnasatya, the naked truth), and that he should be in the vanguard of social revolution. The influence of social reformers like Vivekananda and Gandhiji and of Marxist thinkers was favourable to the growth of these views in the years preceding the dawn of freedom. Several young writers like T.R. Subba Rao and Archik Venkatesh joined Krishna Rao. Others like Kulakunda Shiva Rao or Niranjana (as he was popularly known) and Basavaraja Kattimani wrote with the same ideals, though outside Krishna Rao's fold. Among others who belonged to this movement at some time or the other were S. Ananthanarayana, M.N. Chowdappa, Subramanyaraj Urs (or Chaduranga) and Kumara Venkanna.

The pragatisheelas argued that literature could not be written or read in a vacuum and that the writer had a responsibility towards the society to which he belonged. This was to reveal fearlessly the truths about the social life and to inspire and guide social revolution. So for the first time in Kannada literature, committed writing came to be advocated. These writers held that the roots of good literature lay in the people and that, unless their life was improved, literature itself would suffer. The writer was to recognise no taboos imposed by respectability; he was to identify himself with the people, to be their eye and voice and inspiration.

The pragatisheelas explicitly attacked Masti Venkatesha Iyengar and those who, like C.K. Venkatar-

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

amayya, wrote under his influence; they explicitly praised D.R. Bendre and K.V. Puttappa, and occasionally, Shivarama Karanth. The second half of the fifth decade was a period of fierce controversies. In the early fifties the challenge to pragatisheelas came from the 'navya' school, and the pragatisheela movement faded away.

The progressives brought out a considerable number of publications to promote these objectives. However, they made major contributions only in the realms of the novel and the short story. Apart from the controversial Nagna satya, the pragatisheela movement gave such novels as Ta Ra Su's Bidugadeya bedi, Kattimani's Jwalamukhiya mele, Niranjana's Vimochane and Archik Venkatesha's Asthi panjara.

Titans of the navodaya phase like Shivarama Karanth, K.V. Puttappa, Kailasam, Bendre and Sriranga had in practice anticipated the pragatisheelas. But they were not bound by a manifesto. This movement suffered for various reasons. The literature it gave had severe limitations. Yet its impact and contribution were by no means negligible.

Navodaya literary criticism had been based on the poetics of classical literature and the practice of Sanskrit and Kannada classics. But pragatisheela critical approach compelled a re-examination of the very basic tenets of the theoreticians and the poets. It emphasized the importance of the social and economic structure in the study of contemporary life. Reacting to contemporary needs progressive literature created a new type of 'hero', the martyr in the cause of social progress. It brought into literature new areas of experience and new themes like the relationship between the individual and society and the play of economic and social forces. Freedom struggle came into Kannada fiction in a big way as did rural life. These writers were avid students of European writers like Flaubert, Balzac, Zola and the Marxist writers. They attempted uncompromising realism. Their experiments in technique like Subba Rao's novel Bidugadeya bedi, his story 'O-O-O' and Niranjana's novel Rangammana vathara showed that they were creative writers very much concerned about the nature of their medium and art. Prose became more lively, flexible and picturesque.

The greatest limitation of this literature, which was committed, unlike the writings of the navodaya writers, was that it did not have a sound enough intellectually perceptive basis. The progressive writers sought to portray reality uncompromisingly, but were not perhaps very clear about the realism behind the reality, beyond the recapturing of the situation and the physical environment. The consequence was that situations and characters tended to repeat themselves. Characters also became somewhat stereotyped and superficial in much of progressive writing. Sentimentality and rhetoric often blurred the issues and came in the way of sensitive perceptions. While the progressive writer showed an awareness of the importance of technique, he did not display the same awareness of the nature and the demands of his medium-language. The more sophisticated navya school could convincingly list the lapses of the pragatisheela writer.

Most of the pragatisheela writers retained their progressive outlook but went beyond this school in later years. They wrote novels recreating the golden ages of Indian history and culture or portraying the mighty rulers, saints and seers. They used the historical novel for this purpose. Progressive literature has left its mark on Kannada fiction. Both Bandaya and Dalita works of recent years show the influence of the progressive writers. Attempts to revive the Karnataka Progressive Writers' Association or the movement have, however, not succeeded.

L.S.S.R.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Kashmiri). Art for life's sake was an international literary creed after the October Revolution of Soviet Russia in 1917. In a way the Russian revolution gave lead to a movement all over the world when social realism and class consciousness formed the basis of literature as an instrument for achieving freedom, equality and social justice for all, irrespective of caste, colour and creed.

The first meeting of the Progressive writers' Association was held at Lucknow in 1936 under the chairmanship of Premchand. In the meantime, freedom movement in the Indian sub-continent gained a massive momentum under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi.

In Kashmir, the formation of the progressive literary movement took place under the chairmanship of the Urdu and Kashmiri writer, Premnath 'Pardesi' (d.1955), while the mass upsurge had taken a concrete shape in July 1931, when the martyrs sacrificed their lives at the altar of freedom struggle. The writers in Kashmir later formed a Cultural Front (1947) under the leadership of Ghulam Muhammad Sadiq (d.1971). It was a political as well as literary influence of the sub-continent that linked the Jammu and Kashmir State with the national mainstream. It was during the later 40's and early 50's when Maxim Gorky's short stories were translated into Kashmiri alongwith those of other Soviet writers.

Soon after Independence, Mahjoor poured scorn in his satirical poems like 'Azadi' and 'Lalo, lalo, ha a guli lalo', etc., when the people got frustrated and disillusioned.

Mahjoor is the only poet who was buried with full state honours in recognition of his services to awaken his suffering countrymen. He was basically a romantic poet in contrast to Abdul Ahad 'Azad' (1903-1948), his contemporary who, as a radical socialist, introduced class consciousness, social commitment and new awakening in Kashmiri poetry. He tried to rise above traditional thinking and conventions of expression, diction and style.

'Daryav' (The river) is an allegorical poem explaining

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Azad's philosophy of life which he believed was an 'ever changing reality and a revolution'. Modern Kashmiri poetry owes much to Azad, both in form and in content; Ghulam Hassan Beg 'Arif' (b.1910) wrote poems on social themes and the awakening of the working class. He scornfully writes against the capitalist exploitation in his compositions. For example, the following passage will suffice to indicate his approach to social issues: 'Tomorrow, I have heard it said, you would punish the usurer, the capitalist and the tyrant bureaucrat. Meanwhile, today the poor must suffer the agonies of hell. How does one profit from your justice of judgement day?'

Ghulam Ahmad 'Fazil' (b.1914), though not a poet of definite social commitment, has written on various social aspects.

Nur Muhammad 'Roshan' wrote verse successfully alongwith Dinanath 'Nadim' (1916-1988). Elements of sarcasm and satire on feudal set-up are dominant in his poems.

Leading among the progressive poets was Dinanath 'Nadim'. His imagery, his spontaneity and diction are still unsurpassed. Most of his poems of the pre or post-Independence era speak of social and class consciousness. He has also written many operas on social themes. These include Bombir Yambirzal (1953), Vitasta (1980), etc. Nadim is among the first rank poets of modern Kashmiri verse. In spite of his symbolic and abstract experiments in poetry, he still said that he was a staunch follower of social realism in literature.

Abdul Rehman Rahi's (b.1925) Nauroz-i-saba, which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1961), is a clear example of class consciousness and social commitment of the poet.

Amin Kamil (b.1924), a poet of eminence in Kashmiri lyrics, does not seem to be much behind in the field. 'Masmalur', 'Lava ta prava,' 'Biyu sun pann', and 'padis pod tshai' mirror the contemporary social life in a subtle and artistic way even with no social commitment.

Shambhunath Bhatt 'Halim' (b.1921), Ghulam Nabi 'Firaq' (b.1922), A.D. Majbur (b.1923), Makhanlal 'Mahav' (b.1926), Muzaffar 'Azim' (b.1934), Motilal 'Saqi' (b.1936), Chamanlal 'Chaman' (b.1939), Makhanlal 'Bekas' (b.1939), Syed Rasul Pompur (b.1940) and almost all other poets have been influenced by the Marxian ideology in one way or the other.

Abdul Satar 'Rajur' (b.1917) is a progressive poet-turned communist leader of Kashmir. He has many books to his credit both in Kashmiri and in Urdu, which include Bang-e-inquilab (Call for revolution). He is presently associated with the Communist Party of India and has been editing an Urdu weekly Hamara Kashmir for many years. He has sacrificed the creative art of poetry for leftist politics which he believes can provide social justice to people.

Prominent among the prose writers with social commitment in mid and late 40s are Nur Muhammad 'Roshan' (b. 1919), Amin Kamil (b. 1924) and Ali Muhammad Lone (b. 1927), who wrote Kuny kath (One voice), Viz che saany (Time is with us), Son samsar (Our world) and Pagah chu gashdar (Tomorrow will be bright), all written to unite the people in the countryside to face the devastation wrought by flood as well as the intrigues of feudal vested interests. Prior to that the Cultural Front (1947) and Cultural Congress (1949) had involved people in the accomplishment of the task of achieving complete freedom by producing short plays such as Chor bazar (Black market), Tre bai tsor (Three over four—the landlord's exhorbitant share) and Dollar Sahib. Somnath Zutshi also contributed to the movement.

Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din (b.1928), Motilal Kemmu (b.1933), Pushkar Bhan (b. 1925), Somnath Sadhu (d.1982), Bansi 'Nirdosh' (b. 1939), A.K. Rehbar (b.1933) and many others did not lag behind in introducing the new social awakening in Kashmiri literature through their plays, short stories, novels, etc.

Though the entire community of writers, after being disillusioned in mid 50s, has adopted new, abstract and modern techniques, their creative endeavours have not totally abandoned the social objectivity in literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jayalal Kaul, Studies in Kashmiri (1968); T.N. Raina, An Anthology of Kashmiri Verse.

S.R.P.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Maithili). During the present century prior to Independence, Mithila meant an aggregate of toiling peasantry and exploiting feudal classes. The situation was ripe enough for the growth of progressive literature, but as the pen was in the hands of the exploiters, the poor masses could not even whisper aganist their patrons.

Nevertheless, some fine pieces of progressive writing are to be found as early as the third and fourth decades of this century. 'Bihari' (1924) by Kumar Ganganand Singh (1898-1970) is said to be the first progressive short story where the exploited and the oppressed have-nots revolt against their lords. 'Panch-parameshvar', 'Manushyakmol' and 'Jivansangharsha' by the same author are no less progressive in their themes. 'Shunya' by Bhuvaneshvar Singh 'Bhuvan' (1908-1944) depicts the silent suffering of a pauper peasant. 'Dharmaratnakar' by Kanchinath Jha 'Kiran' (b.1907) is another example of progressive writing. But it is Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' (b. 1910), popular as 'Nagarjun' in Hindi, who spear-headed the progressive school in Maithili. He studied Marxism deeply, dedicated himself to the cause of socialism, and established himself as a committed writer of Maithili as well as Hindi. His Chitra (1949), a collection of poems, is the high water-mark of progressive values. 'Param satya' (Lofty truth) is an honest manifesto of the philosophy of the poet based on the canons of dialectical materialism. His second collection Patrahin nagna gachh (The leafless naked tree, 1967), winner of the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968, has also the same high tone, punctuated with some satirical and romantic elements. His novel Balchanma, first brought out in Hindi, was a landmark among the contemporary progressive novels in India.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Most of his contemporary poets too voiced the progressive idea, now and then, as the ruling passion of the day. Haladhara (The ploughman) by Ishanatha Jha (1907-1965), Ghasal athanni (The defaced coin) by Kashinath Mishra 'Madhup'(b. 1907), Kavitak ahvan (Invocation to poetry) by Surendra Jha 'Suman', Krishak (Cultivator) by Jivanath Jha, and Yuga purusha (Great man of the age) by Govinda Jha are some of the examples of progressivism. Kanchinath Jha 'Kiran' is as genuine a progressive writer as 'Yatri'. He is at his best in his poem 'Matik Mahadeva' (The clay idol of Shiva).

Since the abolition of the zamindari system, Maithili poets, besieged with new problems, entered a new arena of poetry. Fiction, however, continued to be dominated by progressive themes. Among the novels, Prithvi-putra by Lalit, Bhorukaba and Kado-aora-koila by Dhirendra, Dudh-phul by Ramanand 'Renu', Visuvius by Pradip Bihari, and Panipat by Jivakant deserve mention. A number of short stories by Lalit, Jivakant, Ramdeo Jha, Ramanand 'Renu' and the like are no doubt progressive, but mostly they project pathetic scenes from the lower classes and are devoid of dynamic vigour and vitality.

Go. J.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Malayalam) appeared initially under the name Jivalsahityam or living literature in 1937 in which year a conference was held in Trichur. The central idea behind the conference was that literature must leave classicism behind and move ahead with a new revolutionary spirit. A change of themes from the traditional to the realistic and contemporary was envisaged. Correspondingly a change in style and form was also called for. Social and political revolution was highlighted as the objective of literature and at least a few of the protagonists of the movement thought along communist lines of thinking.

In 1944 at a conference held at Shornoor the movement got a new name. It came to be known as Purogamana Sahitya Prasthanam or Progressive Literature Movement. It was a movement which sheltered different progressive views and by 1949-1950 the differences surfaced. Critics who held the Marxist view of literature ranged on one side and others who were progressive, but non-Marxist, ranged on the other. Thus E.M.S. Nambuthiripad, leading the Marxist group of critics, wrote that (1) the literary man is a product of society, (2) literature has to be on the one or the other side in the class struggle, and (3) there are no permanent values in literature. The other school of thought tended to consider literature as an autonomous activity obeying its own rules and aiming at aesthetic excellence. According to them good literature has perennial value. Targets of communist criticism were leading literary critics like Joseph Mundassery, P. Kesavadev, A. Balakrishna Pillai and others.

In the meanwhile much good literature intended as progressive and certainly deserving the title was being written. The novels and short stories of Takazhi Sivasankara Pillai (b. 1911), P. Kesava Dev (b. 1904), Vaikkom Muhammed Basheer (b. 1910) and S.K. Pottekkat (b.1913) covered fresh ground exploring the life of ordinary men and the human relations that economic and social inequalities fostered. Besides these writers Ponkunnam Varki (b. 1908) wrote short stories on these very themes. Notable among playwrights who wrote progressive plays were Ponkunnam Varki and Toppil Bhasi (b. 1924), both members of the Communist Party. Among poets who wrote progressive poetry were Vayalar Rama Varma (1928-1975), P. Bhaskaran (b.1924), O.N.V. Kurup (b.1931), Tirunallur Karunakaran (b.1924) and Putusseri Ramachandran (b.1928). Among critics, the progressives with different emphases, were E.M.S. Nambuthirippad (b. 1909), M.S. Devadas (b.1912), A. Balakrishna Pillai (1889-1960), M.P. Paul (1904-1952) and Joseph Mundasseri (1903-1977).

Cherukad (C. Govinda Pisharodi, 1916-1976) was another playwright who contributed several plays with a leftist bias; Atima (A slave), Nammalonnu (We are one) are among his plays. Kesava Dev has also contributed plays in the progressive field.

A schism, however, had appeared in the progressive movement as early as 1949-1950. Consequently, some of the critics in the camp became less progressive in the eyes of their more 'progressive' colleagues, namely those with a communist persuasion. It was natural that this persuasion derived its inspiration not merely from orthodox communist doctrine, but also from the topical politics of the party, such as its participation in the war on the side of the Allies. Among those who contributed much to progressive writing in Malayalam, and who nevertheless came in for criticism from the extreme left, was A. Balakrishna Pillai, known widely as 'Kesari' from the name of a paper he had once edited.

Mention has been made of E.M.S. Nambuthirippad as a Marxist literary critic. The articles he wrote were collected together later into a book, entitled Marxisavum Malayalasahityavum (Marxism and Malayalam literature), in 1974. Another work by the same author in literary criticism is Asanum Malayalasahityavum (Asan and Malayalam literature, 1981). M.S. Devadas (b.1912) is another author who contributed a great deal to Marxist literary criticism.

There is no progressive movement as such in Malayalam now. The literary norms which the movement advocated are now part and parcel of Malayalam. A proletarian theme is normal, and so is a liberal view of sex. Taboos belong to history. Marxist groups and publications, however, keep the literary doctrines of dialectical materialism alive. There are, at present, two streams of thought critical of the Marxist position. One is the extremist thought of the ultra-left political groups like the Naxalites. The other is the stream of modernists who laugh at the idea of any social commitment.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.M. George, A Survey of Malayalam Literature (Bombay, 1968); M. Leelavathy, Malayala kavita sahitya charitram (Trichur, 1960); N. Krishna Pillai, Kairaliyute katha (Trivandrum, 1956); P.K. Parameswaran Nair, A History of Malayalam Literature (New Delhi, 1958).

K.R.P.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Marathi). In Marathi literary and critical tradition, the term progressive literature is generally used to denote Marxist literature. However, this does not imply that progressive literature emerged only after a conscious acceptance of the Marxist philosophy. Lalji Pendse, G.B. Sardar, D.K. Bedekar have done some pioneering work in this direction. However, no authentic history of Marathi literature has yet been written which succeeds in identifying or evaluating progressive literature.

Progressive literature in Marathi, in fact, began with Mahatma Jyotirao Phule. Agarkar and his followers, such as Haribhau Apte, upheld the progressive views in literature; yet they could not transcend their class/caste limits. Keshavasut proved himself to be an exception, for he could see the exploitation of workers. However, the efforts of Phule and Keshavasut to create a new literary tradition have been recognised only recently.

The influence of Marxism on Indian literature was felt roughly during the third decade of this century. Thereafter in Marathi literature one can notice two more trends as far as its ideological base is concerned. They are 'Gandhivada' and 'Hindutvavada'. Most of the poets belonging to Ravikiran Mandal represent the romantic tradition. Dalit Sahitya, Gramin Sahitya and Janavadi Sahitya are recent movements. The Little Magazine Movement also played a significant role in promoting Marxist literature in Marathi. Poets like B.S. Mardhekar and Narayan Surve, infused with social idealism, have also in their own way contributed to the growth of Marxist movement in poetry. The three trends mentioned above not only existed side by side but also took cognizance of, and occasionally reacted against, each other. This phenomenon is well-reflected in literature.

It is also interesting to note that the earlier generation of Marxists (starting with S.A. Dange) was deeply influenced by Lokamanya Tilak and was anti-colonial. However, as they recognised colonialism as simply an outcome of capitalism, they preferred communism to nationalism. Thus the 1942 Movement and the Second World War provided a significant background to the emergence of a new sensibility in modern Marathi literature, making people sceptical about political ideologies. This affected the growth of the Marxist movement in Maharashtra.

The Marxist tendencies are discernible when we look at progress both as 'fact' and as 'value'. Progress is a fact as far as it encompasses the social reality at the base of which lies economic factor and the forces of production. Progress is also a value as far as a creative writer is expected to depict the social reality as it is, rather than as it appears to be. The distinguishing characteristic of progressive writing consists in its being in tune with or complementary to the material base, although being literature it forms a part of ideological superstructure. Besides being realistic, progressive literature helps revolutionary praxis by arousing certain emotions among the exploited masses. It is not, to put it in other words, simply a mechanical mirroring of social reality. It is also an ideal shaping of it. It is a protest and an expression of hope, and has an emancipating and humanising capacity. It is therefore not just propagandist in nature—a serious charge that is levelled against Marxist literature.

Looking at it from this point of view, the class conflicts that exist in our society do get reflected in literature. An attempt is to realize the injustice of the capitalistic society and to protest against the shackles of capitalism. Thus an attempt is made towards the evolution of society into a classless society. We have already pointed out that Marxism as a movement started in the third decade of this century and that it co-existed with other movements. Whether they were committed to Marxist thought or not, creative writers had to take cognizance of it. S.A. Dange and others founded the Progressive Writers Association. Some of the Marathi novelists and their works deserve special mention in the context of Marxist philosophy and Marxist references. Sushilecha dev is a well-known novel by Waman Malhar Joshi. The novel is an experiment in interpreting the idealism, the philosophic beliefs and the social revolution of a generation. Similarly, S.V. Ketkar's novel Brahmankanya contains a good deal of Marxist bearing. However, as Joshi was a romantic sceptic and Ketkar could never outgrow his own version of Hindutvavada, it was hardly possible for them to accept Marxist thought whole-heartedly. In fact, in his Vichakshana, Ketkar ridicules trade union leadership. It was Bhargavaram alias Mama Varerkar who can be said to have done justice to the Marxist movement. His novel Dhavata dhota is really a landmark. (He also wrote a drama Sonyacha kalasa on the same theme). Dhavata dhota is the first Marathi novel in which a union leader figures as a hero. However, as he was more attracted to the Gandhian philosophy and the Congress movement, Varerkar's leftist leanings slowly waned.

One cannot forget G.T. Madkholkar in the present

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

context. His novels Muktatma and Chandanavadi clearly reveal the Marxist impact, but in his later novel Arundhati the influence of Marxism gets subdued by Hindu spiritualism. Sharadchandra Muktibodh was a balanced writer. His well-known novels Kshipra, Jana he volatu yethe and Sarahadda deserve a serious look. His Kahi nibandh and Jivan ani sahitya echo his commitment to Marxism.

The other writers who set their distinctive stamp upon the novel are V.V. Hadap, Shriram Attarade and Annabhau Sathe. Sathe was also a shahir, a bard. Sathe alongwith Amar Shekh and Gavankar exploited the Marathi folk literature and literary styles to express Marxist thought in the language of the masses.

Marathi poetry was more influenced by Marxism than the novel or the play. Poets such as 'Anil' A.R. Deshpande, 'Kusumagraj' V.V. Shirwadkar have achieved a purposeful newness in their poems. In his Vishakha (1942) Kusumagraj in a lyrical vein writes about class conflict and revolution. In fact, Kusumagraj's poetry is multidimensional.

The name of Sharadchandra Muktibodh has already been mentioned in the context of the novel. In poetry also his contribution is quite significant. His important poems are 'Navi Malavata' and 'Yatrika'. Vinda Karandikar also has a good number of poems to his credit, such as 'Svedaganga', 'Mridgandha', 'Dhrupad' and 'Jataka'.

The most important Marxist poet, Narayan Surve, in his poems like 'Aisa mee ga brahma', 'Maze vidyapitha' and 'Jahiranama', not only continued the Marxist tradition but also succeeded in breaking the stagnant and gloomy literary atmosphere of the time. It is said and perhaps with little exaggeration that Surve opened a new vista in poetry writing.

In the field of short story mention may be made of Anant Kanekar, Shashikant Punarvasu and Annabhau Sathe. Kanekar and V.S. Khandekar wrote a few essays and articles in support of Art for life's sake. It is, in fact, Baburao Bagul who, through his attempted synthesis between Marxism and the Dalit movement, makes an impact.

Coming to Marxist play-writing, Warerkar's Sonyacha kalasa has already been mentioned. N.N. Joshi, Ganeshashastri Phatak, Desai Guruji, etc, present rather a simplistic picture of social reality. Nana Jogalekar also proved to be an eminent dramatist of the modern Marathi stage. Bards such as Amar Shekh, Sathe and Gavankar must be appreciated for their successful use of folk theatre as a medium for presenting Marxist thought. Anil Barve and G.P. Deshapande must be recognised as playwrights who gave some impetus to Marxist theatre.

Godavari Parulekar's Sahtiya Akademi Award winning Jevha manus jaga hoto (1972) is the most remarkable account of the struggle of a Marxist activist. Haravalele diwas, selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1989, is Prabhakar Urdhwareshe's autobiography candidly highlighting his experiences in the Communist Party of India, with which he had a long association. The work is marked by incisive analysis, perceptive insights and balanced objectivity which make it much more than a historical account.

V.S. Joag's Marxwad ani Marathi sahitya (1981) is a scholarly study of the influence of Marxism on different genres of Marathi literature. He evaluates Marxist writing in Marathi vis-a-vis historical materialism, class consciousness, social inequality and socialist optimism, elaborating on Manavendranath Roy's philosophy and Mardhekar's theory of aesthetics. Progressive literature in Marathi is rich in translations of Marxist classics. Works of Communist writers such as Lenin, Stalin, Engels, Gorky (Mother) and Pasternak (Dr Zivago) have been repeatedly translated.

Sa.Mo.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Nepali) is a term used to devote Marxist literary writing. This is one of the major literary trends in post-Independence India and the post-Rana regime in Nepal. Ganeshlal Subba and Badrinarayan Pradhan are regarded as its pioneers among Nepali writers in India, while in Nepal there emerged a host of writers like Balkrishna Pokhrel, Taranath Sharma, D.R. Adhikari, Sarita Dhakal, Anandadev Bhatta, Govindaprasad Lahari, Churamani Bandhu and Krishnachandrasingh Pradhan. Even before the fall of Ranarchy there were writers like Hridayachandrasingh Pradhan, Bijoybahadur Malla, and Bhupendraman Sherchan 'Sarvahara' alias Bhupi Sherchan who wrote for the common people and tried to use literature as a means of making people aware of the socio-economic and political ills afflicted upon them by those enjoying higher positions in political and social hierarchies. But most of their writings lacked not only sophistication but also the knowledge of the Marxist principles. Hridayachandrasingh Pradhan has given a very crude presentation of class-struggle in his novels Swasnimanchhey (1954) and Ek chihan (1960). His criticism of Bhanubhakta's poetry in his Bhanubhakta : ek samiksha (1956) is equally superficial. Vijayabahadur Malla's plays like Pattharko katha (1971) and Baulaha kaziko sapana (1971) and Bhupi Sherchan's poems in Naya jhyaurey (1954) appear more as the works of political propagandists and slogan-mongers than of literary artists. However, Malla and Sherchan in their later works appear as two of the successful Marxist writers in Nepal.

Ganeshlal Subba and Badrinarayan Pradhan in their sporadically published articles show a greater depth of knowledge of Marxism. Ganeshlal Subha in his book 'Muna Madan : ek adhyayan' (1972) has attempted a Marxist reading of Lakshmiprasad Devkota's long narrative poem Muna-Madan. Badrinarayan Pradhan has published several articles on the commitment of a Marxist writer. Besides, he has also translated Maxim Gorky's

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Mother into Nepali. From Nepal Krishnachandrasingh Pradhan has emerged as a writer of good critical acumen. He has presented a Marxist reading of several major Nepali novels in his Nepali upanyas ra upanyaskar (1980). He has also published some volumes of critical and persuasive essays.

In 1959 some writers from Nepal founded an organisation called Pragatisheel Lekhak Sangh (The Progressive Writers' Association) under the chairmanship of the popular poet Dharmaraj Thapa who is widely known for his songs and folk writings. The Association was flocked by the leftists like Shyam Prasad, Pushpalal Shrestha, D.P. Adhikari, Taranath Sharma, and Sarita Dhakal as well as by the so-called centrists like Basudeo Luintel and Kamalmani Dixit. But for want of a common code of conduct as well as a well-defined concept of progressive writing that could be acceptable to all members, the Association could not last long. On the one hand, there were writers like D.P. Adhikari, Sarita Dhakal and Pushpalal Shrestha who believed in running the Association as a literary wing of the Communist Party and wanted to establish direct political affiliations. On the other, there were writers like Taranath Sharma, Krishnachandrasingh Pradhan and Dharmaraj Thapa to whom the term 'Progressive writing' meant any kind of literature that was written in a common man's speech and was easily comprehensible and spoke of the plight of the poor, the downtrodden, and the deprived. So a direct political affiliation and domination of the Communist Party was not acceptable to them. As a result, there was a split in the Association and the writers fell into two opposing camps and were engaged in mud-slinging against one another.

In India, the trend was picked up by younger writers like Bhim Yonzone, Asit Rai, Sharad Chhetri, Nordon Rumba, Jeevan Theengh, and Suvas Deepak. Bhim Yonzone edited Agradut, a news weekly, backed by the communist party in West Bengal, which published sporadic poems. Asit Rai is known both as a poet and as a novelist. He was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1981 for his novel Naya kshitij ko khoj (1980). Sharad Chhetri, another Sahitya Akademi Award winning writer (for the year 1986) is popular for his poems, novels and short stories. Nordon Rumba and Jeewan Theengh have published several long and short poems and short stories. Suvas Deepak writes both in Hindi and in Nepali with equal competence. He has published a number of poems, short stories and essays on Marxism in different journals and magazines. Bishnu Kumari Waiba alias Parijat from Kurseong, who later went to Kathmandu and settled there, is one of the best-known writers belonging to this trend. There are a few poets like Nawa Sapkota and Bhavilal Lamichhanoy from Assam in whose writings this trend is easily traced.

With the domination of Marxists in the socio-political life of West Bengal the number of young progressive writers like Norzang Syangden, Manprasad Jubba, Rajendra Bhandari, Bikash Gotamey and Birkha Khouka 'Dooassaeh' is ever increasing. Norzang Syangden (Murchhana, 1986); Manprasad Jubba (Bunkhyachaharuko deshna, 1986); Rajendra Bhandari (Hiundey yee chisa ratka pandaharuma, 1979, Yee shabdaharu: yee harafharu, 1986) appear more cretive. The works of poets like Bikash Gotamey possess limited aesthetic value, and appear more as fragments of some political lectures and slogans. His poems collected in his Anastha paharka geetharu and Lara Birbahadurharu lara (1988) are a clear evidence of this. With the increasing inclination of Nepalis towards the new trends in Europe and America, progressivism as a movement has lost much of its force today. However, the movement has, to a great extent, been successful in knocking off many traditional concepts of literature and making writers aware of their role in society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anandadev Bhatta, Samalochanako batolira (Kathmandu, 1962); D.P.Adhikari, Yatharthavadi alochana (Kathmandu,1960) ; Sahitiya ra alochana (1975) ; Krishnachandrasingh Pradhan, Nepali upanyas ra upanyaskar (Kathmandu,1980), Sirjanako serophero (Kathmandu, 1982), Sajha samalochana; Kumar Pradhan, History of Nepali Literature (New Delhi,1984); Taranath Sharma, Ghotlyainlaru (Kathmandu, 1964).

Ga.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Oriya). Literature that aims at the eradication of exploitation in society and inspires the formation of a classless society may be called progressive. In Oriya literature such a trend originated through Nabajuga Sahitya Samsad with the patronage of Nabakrushna Choudhury, Bhagabati Charan Panigrahi, Prananath Patnaik, Ram Prasad Singh, Sachi Routray, etc. Bhagabati Panigrahi had written a series of articles on socialistic ideals in magazines like Pragati, Krushak, Mukti yuddha and Adhunik, etc. He was a believer in dialectical materialism and a spokesman for the proletariat. One of his poems 'Lenin' bears his admiration for the great Marxist leader. The poet Anand Patnaik has proclaimed that one day the labourers would be free from exploitation and would get the wages as per their labour. In his poems one finds an optimistic outlook for the upliftment of the proletariat. His poems are intended to educate the people in socialistic consciousness. He was unhappy with a social structure where the ordinary man suffered and the bourgeoisie led a life of luxury at the cost of labourers, farmers and industrial workers. His poetic excellence, with a sharp satire on the social system, is very much alive in his poem 'Kalisi lagila mote'. He wanted to destroy a creation he called 'unjust' and re-create it on the values of 'satya', 'shiva' and 'sundara'.

The poet Raghunath Das (1920-84) was a proponent of Marxist ideals. In his poem 'Mrutyu go tume sete bele kian asani' he has portrayed the pathetic condition of the farmers. Similarly, his poem 'August 15, 1947' warns the comrades that it is not the final stage of revolution and says that their struggle is not yet over. One year after Independence he wrote 'Alpayusha' where he expresses his frustration over the administrative set-up of free India. He was the editor of a fortnightly magazine Sarbahara and was a source of inspiration to people with a revolutionary consciousness.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The voice that trumpeted against exploitation and suffering was that of poet Sachi Routray. In his poems and short stories he raises his voice against social injustice and exploitation. In his works Pandulipi, Pallishri and Konark he expressed his sympathy for the downtrodden.

Ram Prasad Singh in an essay asked the common man to liberate himself from social exploitation, and pleaded for literature that was free of gods and religions and understood and expressed human problems. In other words he proposed a humanistic literature.

The poet Kalindicharan Panigrahi has described with concern the exploitation of the people of Dhenkanal (Orissa) by a cruel king. The revolutionary poet Man Mohan Mishra in his 'Mukti sangita' expresses his great hope that one day the exploiters will be annihilated and the proletariat will have a say in farms and factories. In the post-Independence period some poets were disappointed that the class struggle had not been resolved, although the evils of exploitation were well publicised. The poet Godavarish Mahapatra warned the rulers of independent India about the dangerous consequences of continued exploitation in his poem 'Chati'. Likewise in 'Biplab pathe' he asked the people to wake up and oppose with full force exploitation in every form. The poet Jnanindra Verma was also worried about the state of society in post-Independent India in his poem 'Bamapath'. Poets Krushna Charana Behera and Chintamani Behera heralded in 1957 the dawn of a classless society in their poems. There was the emergence of two fire-brand Marxist poets, Rabindranath Singh, popularly known as Rabi Singh and Brajanath Rath. Rabi Singh's 'Patha prantar kabita' described the exploitation of the proletariat. In most of his poems he attempted to demolish all social institutions and tread the path to a classless society. He thinks like Mayakovsky that for a poet there must be a social command. In his 'Charam patra' (1961) he wants to fight face to face the Satan in man. In 'Sithila balga' he admits the defeat of revolution and desires his own destruction. In 'Mu o mora kabita', he says, 'My action and religion intend to speak the bare truth'. His other important works are Bhrukuti, Padatika, Kshata and Bisvavani. Everywhere he glorifies labour and revolution. For him truth is the essence of poetry. Imagination can be built upon falsehood but man, in order to live and progress, has to destroy falsehood in its totality. Brajanath Rath is a poet of humanism. He has a strong conviction in socialism and is very much aware of exploitation in society. His collection Maru golapa o anyanya kabita shows his firm hope that one day there will be complete cessation of suffering for the proletariat. He asks the people to be realistic and not be swayed away by dreams. As a revolutionary he sings, 'I am the creator of the creation'. The revolutionary poets who want to establish a healthy social system are Prasanna Patsani and Sadasiva Dash. Patsani has a definite goal to achieve in his poems. His works Nian ra bindu o raktabruttara, pariudhi, Sakala, Kabita eka darpan bear the impress of pessimism and suffering of humanity and point the way out of them. A vivid description of anger, struggle and conflict is found in his 'Baghan bhitare picnic'. As a reaction to the Naxalite revolution, Oriya literature produced a revolutionary poet Sadasiva Dash. His 'Rakta megha' 'Sambhavana', 'Bharata Barsha', 'Koraput' and 'Mlechha samhar' show the suffering and oppression of the people. He finds hope in revolution and says that a revolutionary never wants to apologise or give in but is adventurous and wants to achieve a greater truth not for himself but for the downtrodden.

A.P.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Punjabi) arose under the aegis of Pragativad (progressivism) during the thirties as an analogue to such a literature in Europe. In European literature progressivism responded positively to the social, political and rational tendencies initiated in the 19th century as a result of industrialisation, political economy and scientific inventions. At the same time, it had the apprehension that the institutions of capitalism and imperialism, culminating into that of fascism in the 20th century, posed a great danger to democratic and liberal way of thinking and living. No wonder then that anti-capitalism, anti-imperialism and anti-fascism became the primary themes of progressive literature in India as well as elsewhere.

Rather than being homologous, progressivism in Punjabi was analogous to it. As in Indian literature as a whole, it came to hold that poverty, inequality and obscurantism generated by feudalism, casteism and religion respectively, posed the greatest danger to human progress, particularly in the life of the poverty-stricken mankind of the countryside. Naturally anti-feudalism, anti-casteism and anti-obscurantism became the primary subjects of progressivism in Punjabi literature. As a counterpoint to the social, political and religious regression of the vast multitude of the people, their deep-rooted sexual starvation attracted much attention of progressive writers, tending to become, as it were, a second-line motif of this literature. Crystallising themselves into Marxist and Freudian perspectives, these two types of motifs have swayed the balance in the chief proponents of progressivism in Punjabi literature. In the writings of Sant Singh Sekhon and Mohan Singh, they have tended to accentuate the progressive stance, but have tended to destroy it in the writings of Balwant Gargi and Kartar Singh Duggal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (RAJASTHANI)

The progressive phase extended from the late thirties to the early fifties. As the most creative phase, it flourished in all the genres of literature. First it flourished in short-story and poetry, and subsequently in drama and novel. Critical norms were also established by Sant Singh Sekhon, the pioneer of this phase, in his work entitled Sahityarth (Meaning of literature, 1957), in which he lucidly expounds these critical norms.

Sant Singh Sekhon, Sujan Singh and Kartar Singh Duggal have been the most distinguished short-story writers of this phase. With Sekhon's early collections, Samachar (Tidings, 1943) and Kame te yodhe (Toilers and warriors, 1950), he became the founder of this genre, no matter though in Adhivat (Midway, 1954) and Tija pehar (The third phase, 1958) the utilitarian aspect tended to eclipse the aesthetic aspect. Such, in fact, has been the rupture between the two that only at rare moments has there been achieved a resolution to denote that a progressive work is most profoundly determined by its time and simultaneously goes beyond into timelessness. That this was problematic with progressive literature is evident from the short-stories of Sujan Singh, who, in Dukh sukh (Pain and joy, 1941) and Dukh sukh ton pichhon (After pain and joy, 1946), failed to observe the proper aesthetic distance from transmuting the subject matter of life into the truth-content of literature. The urge to depict deep-rooted sexual oppression so overpowered Kartar Singh Duggal in Agg khan vaale (The fire-eaters, 1948) and Nawan ghar (The new abode, 1951) that he subjected himself completely to the Freudian perspective. In his effort to locate a permanent nucleus beyond the social and the historical nuclei of life, he ignored the fact that physical birth was not identical with social birth at all. Duggal had started in 1940 with Saver sar (Morning) as a balanced progressive in the sense in which the term has been used above.

With the solitary exception of Mohan Singh, the progressive poets of this phase were caught in the dichotomy between the aesthetic and the utilitarian aspects of literature. In Kasumbra (Thistled flower, 1939), Adhvate (Midway, 1944), Kach sach (Illusion and reality, 1950) and Awazan (Calls, 1954), he was able to communicate human experience, dialectically related to the antinomies of time and space, culture and nature, society and self, and beauty and utility. Employing the folklore in Pathar gite (Pebbles as playthings, 1946), Lamian vatan (Long journeys, 1949) and Sunehure (Messages 1955), Amrita Pritam tried to articulate the deep-rooted oppression of womankind. Since woman is space as man is time, she, unlike Mohan Singh, failed to integrate her feelings and emotions into an ideological perspective. Moreover, folklore is not a unique conception identical in time and space. So its employment tended to give fragmentary and incoherent identity to her poetry. A similiar identity seems to accrue to the poetry of Bawa Balwant, who, in Mahanach (The great dance, 1941) and Bandargah (Harbour, 1951), employed pedantic and flamboyant rhetoric as a substitute for the genuine language of poetry.

What was characteristic of poetry with Amrita Pritam and Bawa Balwant in the first phase, became compulsive for Santokh Singh Dhir, Gurcharan Rampuri, and Surjit Rampuri in the neo-progressive phase that extended from the beginning of the fifties to the beginning of the sixties. With their failure emerged such cerebral movement as Prayogvad (Experimentalism).

Jaswant Singh Kanwal and Surinder Singh Narula were the most important novelists of this phase. In Rat baki hai (The night yet remains, 1955), Rup dhara (Flow of beauty, 1956) and Hani (Mates, 1961), Jaswant Singh Kanwal imposed doctrinal simplicity on the complexity of life. As a result his novels employed hagiographical language unfit for variegated narration, description and discourse. Surinder Singh Narula, instead, achieved much more in Peo puttar (Father and son, 1946), Rang mahal (The pleasure palace, 1950), Lok dushman (Enemy of the people, 1952), Aluni sil (Saltless rock, 1952) and Gallan din rat dian (Talks of day and night, 1966). As a critical realist, he evoked the totality of life faltering in texture but unfaltering in structure.

During both these phases, playwriting remained largely the prerogative of Sant Singh Sekhon and Balwant Gargi. Whereas in the plays of the early phase, like Kalakar (The artist, 1946) and Naraki (Denizens of hell), Sant Singh Sekhon dramatised conflicts latent in contemporary society, he gave a historical-materialist interpretation to history and mythology in the plays of the second phase, namely Moian sar na kai (The dead lack awareness, 1955), Waris (The inheritors, 1955) and Damyanti (1959). Similarly, Balwant Gargi evinced social awareness of the progressive sort in the plays of the first phase, like Loha-kut (Iron-beater, 1944), Sail pathar (Cold stone, 1945), Nawan mudh (New beginning, 1949) and Kesro (1952).

Starting from the seventies, progressive literature in Punjabi has passed into a new phase, and progressive literature with a distinct ideological stance has ceased to become a living force.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Attar Singh, Indian Literature since Independence (Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, 1974); I. Serebyakov, Punjabi Literature (Moscow, 1968); M.P. Kohli, The Influence of the West on Punjabi Literature (Ludhiana, 1969); Sant Singh Sekhon, 'Literary Criticism in Punjabi' in Literary Criticism in India, ed. Nagendra (Meerut, 1976); Surjit Singh Dulai, Pragativad in Punjabi Literature.

Te.S.G.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Rajasthani). If progressivism implies in the broadest sense sympathy with the poor, we find its expression as far back as the 17th century when a poet like Durasa Adha depicted the sad plight of the poor classes in his Kartar bawani, or when Umardan Lalas of Jodhpur wrote about the famine-stricken people who migrated to adjoining areas with their families and exposed themselves and their women to the greed of money-lenders and bad characters.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

But a real start in progressive literature is made only when certain revolutionaries oppose foreign aggression and try to uproot it, and when agrarian and social-reform movements are launched to fight the atrocities of the ruling classes. Vijaisingh 'Pathik' takes up the cause of the rural folks exploited by the capitalists whose palatial buildings stand on the sweat and blood of the toiling masses. And Bhairavlal 'Kala Badal' asks the dark clouds to shower fire on the cruel and inhuman feudal lords.

The most poignant of the poetic utterances against the British, perhaps, come from Arjunlal Sethi who called the British rule a blood-thirsty reign. The pre-Independence era witnessed some more progressive writers like Ganeshlal Ustad, Jainarayan Vyas, Hiralal Shastri and Udairaj Ujal. Ustad served as a trade unionist while working with mill workers. When he jumped into politics he recited his own songs for mass-awakening. He despises all parasites and speaks of the victory of labour. Hiralal Shastri was another visionary who dreamt of the storm of change. Jainarayan Vyas too talked of social and political changes. In the post-Independence period, a new spirit of nationalism swept the entire country. Anti-feudal and anti-capitalist waves surged forward. Equality of opportunities for all, rights of women, emancipation from exploitation, dignity of labour–these were the main trends in which progressivism revealed itself.

Dialectical materialism, preached by Marx, was the mainstay of progressives, but many of them negated all traditions and developed a sort of aversion to the entire heritage of Indian thought. Despite some such shortcomings, progressivism was a welcome development. Revatdan Charan of Jodhpur depicted the landlords as ploughing their own fields and their wives carrying food for them. Kanhaiyalal Sethia, Premchand Rawal and Narsingh Rajpurohit artistically align themselves with the poor and the suffering people. The cruelties of the moneylending class have been depicted by Muralidhar Vyas in his book Varasganth, and by Annaram Sudamá in his Mewai ra runkh. Sudama's stories, novels and dramas are full of outbursts against the capitalists.

Some poets have raised their voice against rampant corruption and deteriorating standards in public life and government circles. Narsingh Rajpurohit in his stories like 'Bharat bhagya vidhata', R.D. Shrimali in 'Salavatan', Sanwar Daiya in his Ek duniya mari, and Sudama in his novel Mevai ra runkh have exposed this sorry state of affairs.

Social evils, besides political corruption and economic exploitation, have engaged the attention of many writers, e.g. S.N. Joshi (Shabadka), Baijnath Panwar (Ladesar and Nainan khutyo nir), Govindlal Mathur (Shatrangini), Sanwar Daiya (Dharati kad tain ghumaili), Mulchand Pranesh (Wakalat antara sila sans and Chasmadith gawah). Thus, progressivism brought about a general change in the outlook of writers and poets in all walks of life. The firm believers and protagonists, however, went a step further, asking for a radical change. On the adverse side, all traditions, good or bad, were run down. This led to a gross neglect of the rich heritage of the country.

When the so-called new poets came, their approach was more poignant against the social order and all evils. In their newly-coined expressions and techniques they voiced their attitude in no uncertain terms. The progressives, preceding them, perhaps, did not believe in such an outburst. Poets like Ganeshlal Ustad gave a call to ring out the old and the unhealthy order. He stressed the importance of hard labour to bring about a real and lasting change. All this was definitely a welcome change.

Raw. S.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Sindhi). The Russian Revolution, and later, the Second World War and freedom movement had their impact on Sindhi literature. The mind of the Sindhi writer now shook off romanticism and was informed of a new politico-socio-economic awareness brought about by the events. Intellect and logic forced their way in the Sindhi writing through the progressive trend.

Hyder Bux Jatoi could have been a great poet, indeed, but for his political involvement that changed the pattern of his creative urge and vigour. Jatoi's poems compiled in Tuhfa-e-Sindh (Gift of Sindh, 1931) are progressive in content. There was yet another poet, Kishinchand 'Bevas', who, in his thought and sentiment, showed progressiveness. Many poems in his compilation Shrin Shair (The sweet poetry, 1929) give sufficient evidence of the progressive trend. Jatoi and Bevas were the first two poets who broke the shackles of romanticism in Sindhi poetry.

It was again the translations from Urdu and Hindi during the forties that provided the required impetus for the development of the progressive trend in Sindhi literature. The Sindhi progressive writer leaned heavily on these works to seek new techniques and forms for portraying the social reality. Authors like Khwaja Ahmed Abbas, Munshi Premchand, Krishinchander and other progressive writers were translated into Sindhi. It was, indeed, during the forties that the progressive trend took root in Sindhi literature. Sindhi writers for a time rid themselves of the out-moded romances for inspiration and guidance, and embarked upon creating fiction based on social realism.

Registani Phula (The Flowers of the desert, 1941) is a collection of really good short stories that follow the progressive trend. The authors included were Bhagwan Lalwani, Sheikh Abdul Satar, Anand Golani, Narain

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Devani, Jivat Naryani, Sobho Gianchandani, Gobind Malhi, etc. The stories truly analyse the various aspects of social and economic life in a plausible manner and echo the rights of the labour class.

The second collection of short stories reflecting progressivism, Sard ahun (The cold sighs, 1942), was authored by Gobind Panjabi. The author does not deviate from his ordered conception of social realism in the stories included in the collection, and at times fumbles in narration which is marred by weak and uncontrolled language. During the period, yet another collection of progressive short stories Praha phuti (The dawn, 1945) saw the light of the day. Among others, the story of Krishin Khatwani, 'Kute jo maut' (Death of a dog), was included in the collection. During the same year a collection of short stories, Pharak (The flapping, 1945), was brought out. In the stories compiled, Anand Golani probes deep into the social and political problems of the time, but strangely enough, his stories end with a note of pessimism.

A.J. Uttam, the staunch devotee of progressivism, made his debut as a short story writer in Phuleli magazine with his story 'Shikasta' (The defeat, 1944). Another story by him depicting progressivism, entitled 'Akir kesitain' (How long, after all ?), was published in Jivan Kala magazine in 1945. Kirat Babani was another progressive writer of the time and his short story Hua (She) based on social realism, included in the collection of short stories brought out by Zindagi publications (1947), brought him in the forefront of progressives.

Strangely, the concern of the progressive short story during the period covered up to 1947 keeps away from bringing out the chicanery of the capitalistic society and the writers direct their attention to the common man, adopting no different approach from that of the famous Hindi writer Premchand, who was much translated into Sindhi. The characters of the short stories never rebel. They quietly submit to destiny without raising an eyebrow as to why their very existence is being erased by the bourgeois society. To sum up, they do not evince enough social awareness.

The progressive literature, however, developed during the major part of the fifties. It grew and thrived, carrying with it the tradition of the forties and, at the same time, was different in a way. The progressive literature of this period depicted social realism to its core, but was not effective inasmuch as almost all the short stories ended with only slogan-mongering; and this attitude of the writers made much ado about nothing and sacrificed the art at the altar of ideology. There is yet another aspect of this movement which was condemned later by the rebels. The literary press at this time was literally in the hands of the progressives who persecuted young writers by moulding their writings to suit their ideology. Ultimately, this inimical slogan-mongering attitude of the progressives landed them in trouble and proved to be one of the reasons for their decline. Much later, the progressives conceded that what they had produced during the forties and the fifties was bereft of art, an essential ingredient of creative work. Surely, the dominant emotion of progressive literature, as brought out during this period, especially immediately after the partition of the country, when its inherent possibilities are compared with those it achieved, must strike the honest heart as the emotion of failure—a failure in the radical sense that they could not consciously react to more than a fraction of life that was full of agony and mortification at that period of turmoil—the life we knew and endured with the wounds raw, open and bleeding.

Gobind Malhi, one of the most committed progressive writers, has given Sindhi literature nearly two dozen novels, apart from a score of short stories and plays. Considering the bulk of his writings, it seems that he has not been able to give us anything significant that should go down in the history of literature, except for his two novels Desi sena kajani (1959) and Pyara ji pyasa (The thirst of love, 1972).

A.J. Uttam's early essays on progressive literature and his short stories during the fifties established him as the most passionate propagandist of progressivism. His short stories compiled much later in Kashmakash (The struggle, 1971) smack of blatant slogan-mongering. These stories were published in the magazines during 1953-68. Uttam's essays on literature, as compiled in Sindhi sahit (Sindhi literature), Sahit ain sahitkar (Literature and litterateur) and Sindhi kahani (Sindhi short story) are idiosyncratic, at times cranky. Yet in these essays the tone is appropriate. However, enthusiasm within one's credo is the surest way to attract the attention of the young. He is often wrong in his assessment, but the tone of his writing suggests he is never in doubt.

Another stalwart in the progressive trend is Inder Bhojwani, a truly committed poet. He is sure of his ground in his poems in Praha bakhun kadhiyun (The streaks of dawn, 1963).

Sundri Uttamchandani is the only progressive fiction writer who has her own place in this trend. Her gift is the ability to create characters so vital that they seem to spring from the pages. She has to her credit a number of collections of short stories and novels. Her titles Kirandara divarun (The dilapidated walls, 1953), Achha var, g'arha gula (The grey hair, red roses, 1965) and Bhuri (The doll, 1979) are worth mentioning. She would have been a marvel of a creative writer—there is nothing that can escape her lynx-like eyes—but for her forced commitment to ideology which sets her writing pot-boilers whimpering with slogans. Her confidence, her courage and determination come from the artist in her, but she keeps killing the artist at the altar of the ideology to which she never seems spontaneously committed.

Later, in the sixties and seventies, the progressives did change the texture of their writings by simply avoiding overtones and, instead, weaving undertones of ideology in their works, but at the same time making sure that the writings conveyed the desired message. It is also true that in their later works, the characters submitted to some extent to the superficial subjectivity dosed in by the authors, just as in the novel of Gobind Malhi, Pyar Ji pyas, mentioned earlier. But, in totality, with near zero psychological curiosity and acumen, the progressives failed to bring us anywhere near the work of art.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Whatever the standard of writing of the progressives be, however low their capacity for the creation of work of art be, there is no doubt that, but for their efforts, whether dreary or drab, Sindhi literature would not have developed to the extent it has. The progressives provided the infra-structure and the means, and the contemporary writers happily used them in order to build up the formidable Sindhi literature of today. It will, therefore, not be a matter of shame for the contemporary writers to accept the progressives as the harbingers of a new wave in the Sindhi literature of today.

P.A.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Tamil). If the connotation given to progressive literature could be taken in a larger sense, i.e. writings that concern themselves with the poor and exploited segments of humanity and focussing attention on them in order to awaken the consciousness of the rest to such realities, then one can see this trend right from the earliest times in Tamil literature. A significant part of the Sangam works deals with the lives of common people, their dashed hopes and persisting frustrations. This thread may run through the works of the Siddhas who rebelled against all authority and cant. Radical traits may be discerned in the lives of saints who endured persecution, like Nandanar, or Gopalakrishna Bharati, down to Subramania Bharati who saw the Russian Revolution as the advent of Krita yuga and sang of freedom for Thiyas, Pulayars, Maravas for whom he proclaimed, 'If one mouth should go hungry, let us destroy this world.' Equally significant is the work of Shankar Ram, Mannasai (Love of the soil, 1938) which unfolds the travails of a farmer's love for his land, or that of Puḍumaippittan (30's-40's), who consistently attacks the ugliness and cruelty perpetrated on the hapless and the underprivileged sections of society.

Progressive school in Tamil may be said to have begun with Chidampara Raghunathan's novel Panchum pasiyum (Cotton and hunger, 1949-50) which ostensibly deals with the hard times to which the weavers' community had fallen. The trend set by this novelist was later followed by several others like Ponneelan, D.Selvaraj, K. Chinnapa Bharati, P. Jaya Prakasam, etc. Of these, only in the first half of Chinnappa Bharati's novel Daham do we find a convincing and genuine grappling with the hard realities of life; the rest are romantic fantasies of revolutionary ideology that pass for realism. Rajendra Cholan in half of his short story output somehow manages to combine both the literary and the progressive elements.

There are other shades of progressivism in Jayakantan's early writings though they seem to be a bit loud. Sandana Ramaswami is a very talented progressive writer but as he himself gave up his earlier credo, he has become a nonentity to the progressive group. Another important progressive writer is Indira Parthasarathi. Besides, there are some good writers like Charvahan, K. Rajanarayanan, Poonami and Nanjil Nadan who have in their writings elements which are acceptable to the progressives. However, they do not proclaim themselves to be progressives and their writings do not wholly conform to the rigid requirements of progressivism, so they are not labelled as progressive writers.

There were two outstanding writers hailing from the Eelam part of Sri Lanka. One was M. Thalaya Singam, who died in his thirties. Though he developed serious differences with the progressives, he never gave up his Marxist faith. The other writer, K.Daniel, wrote five or six novels of great evocative power. His writing was confined to the portrayal of the world he knew, i.e. the miseries of the untouchables of whom he was one.

The influence of progressivism is seen on the critical writings of T.M.C. Ragunathan, K. Kesavan, N. Vanamamalai, K. Kailasapathy, K.Sivathambi (the last two are Sri Lankans) and some others.

Ve.S.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Telugu) in Telugu is the direct outcome of the desire of the writers to articulate their awareness of and involvement in the contemporary reality and indirectly of their exposure to similar tendencies in the other Indian and European literatures. Attracted by the success of Marxian theory in the Russian revolution, writers the world over were trying to modify their perspectives and organise themselves into progressive groups. A decision to found the Progressive Writers' Association was taken in 1934 by writers like Mulk Raj Anand and Sajjad Zaheer. Through a curious coincidence in Telugu too the first significant progressive poem 'Maro prapancham' was composed by Sri Sri in 1934.

In Telugu the progressive movement started as a revolt against the romantic concept of literature as a body of mere aesthetic writing; the aesthetics of delight is sought to be replaced by the dynamics of action. Expressing itself against ineffectiveness and escapism, the new literature emphasised the content instead of the form, the message instead of the medium, and the social experience instead of the individual libido. From the early stages the movement was linked with the socio- political ideology of Marxism, to which, according to Puripanda Appalaswamy, most progressives found no alternative 'for bringing about universal well-being'. Most of these writers were also associated with a political party. The burden of their song was the class-struggle, with their sympathies on the side of the exploited majority, 'the betrayed brother'. Critics like Sampathkumara think that the progressive poetry in Telugu includes the poetry with a Marxist bias and of experimental form as in Sri Sri's surrealist poetry. Although poets like Dasarathi, Tilak and Arudra do not strictly belong to this group, for the historical survey, the progressive element in these writers also is considered, without confining to the boundaries of Sishtla and Tilak as laid down by a recent critic.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Emerging from his brief indulgence in romanticism, Sri Sri gave an indication of his progressive thinking in comparing the crescent moon with 'the forked dagger' in 'Khanda sasi' (1932). In 'Jaya bheri' (1932), he announced the triumph of the modern over the traditional, the progressive over the romantic, and said that he would 'rise like the flag of the mansion of the world'. The first significant progressive poem in Telugu, 'Maro prapancham', was composed on 12 April 1934, inspired partly by Nazrul Islam's 'Chal, chal, chal' for the content, though the poem depended on the Communist Manifesto which also gave a clarion call to the workers of the world to unite. Between 1934 and 1940, he composed several poems forcefully articulating his proletarian propensity. Sri Sri still towers over the other poets as an eloquent and vigorous champion of the under-privileged in society.

One of the early rebels against romanticism was Patthabhi. In his collection of twelve idiosyncratic poems in Didel regala dozen (1938), he declared that he would 'break the backbone of prosodic poetry with the clubs of prose-poems.' But as a progressive poet, he did not seem to have exhibited a positive dimension, except an openess, actually crudeness, in dealing with sex, as opposed to the romantics who showed a refinement of taste and delicateness of perception. A close associate of Sri Sri, Srirangam Narayana Babu, participated actively on the side of the more well-known poet in their long-drawn onslaught against romanticism. In his collection of poems, Rudhira jyoti, he presented the pathetic portraits of miserble people thirsting for a gulp of water and craving for a morsel of food. Inspired by Nazrul Islam's 'Bidrohi', the poet called himself 'Viplavarishi' (Prophet of revolution). Like Sri Sri, he too interpreted, in 'Raktapatakam', 'the banner of blood/ the tongue of Shakti, the crown of fire/calling out from the sky' as the Trinity of Progressive revolution. Another comrade of Sri Sri, Puripanda Appalaswamy, in his poem 'Daivam' (1937), ridiculed 'the flags of authority flying over the altars of dead human bodies'. Echoing the marching song, 'Maro prapancham' of Sri Sri, he wrote 'Anala patakam' with similar cadence, though much less successful.

The influence of Sri Sri on a generation of poets is no less significant as his own poetic putput. The founding of Abhyudaya Rachayitala Sangham (Progessive Writers' Association) in 1943 gave an added impetus to the movement. In 1944 came out Niagara, a collection of forceful verses depicting the pathos in the lives of the downtrodden and urging them to the path of revolution. The three poets, Bellamkonda Ramadasu, Kundurti Anjaneyulu and Elcheru Subrahmanyam, believed that 'the best poetry was contained in the Communist Manifesto' and wrote spirited poems on revolt. Aligning himself with the exploited anywhere, Dasarathi wrote severe indictments against the Nizam, who symbolized both political and economic exploitation, in his two volumes of poetry, Agni dhara (1949) and Rudra veena (1950). Then came a series of progressive poetic compositions like Arudra's 'Twamevaham' (1949), Somasundar's 'Vajrayudham'. Anisetti's 'Agni veena', Rentala's 'Samgharshana' (1949), Gogineni's 'Udayini', Narapa Reddy's 'Ashrumala' 1950), Somasundar's 'Kahali' (1953), Ramana Reddy's 'Bhuvanaghosha', Kundurti's 'Telangana' (1956) and Rentala's 'Sarpayagam' (1957). Progressive poetry came to be written by poets without any party affiliation. Randhi Somaraju, for example, in 'Burjuva pelli kuturu' (1972) exposed the misery of the downtrodden women in society. Even poets who are temperamentally romantic, like C. Narayana Reddy in Mantalu manavudu (1973) and Seshendra Sharma in Mande suryudu (1974), wrote poems presenting the pathos in the lives of the underprivleged sections of society. A poet like Siva Reddy in Raktam suryudu (1976) suggests the way of bloody struggle for obtaining justice for the unfortunate. An extreme destructive approach to the existing establishment, described as 'leper institution', is suggested by the Digambara poets, who organised themselves into a movement in 1965. Nagnamuni, Nikhileswar and Jwalamukhi seemed to give an impetus to the movement. The urge of this poetry was towards pulling down the establishment without suggesting an alternative. Negative though they are, the three volumes published in 1965, 1966 and 1968 are a record of their powerful and anguished feelings against social and economic injustice. After the sixtieth birthday celebrations of Sri Sri in 1970, a revolutionary writers association was started and a collection of poems was brought out in Jhamjha (1976). Sri Sri himself brought out a volume of proletarian poems in Maro prasthanam (1979).

The tendency towards progressivism, though more vocal in poetry, spread to the other genres of literature as well. Social awareness was powerfully expressed in the Telugu novel as early as 1921 in Unnava Lakshminarayana's Malapalli. But the novel took up the proletarian problems for a close examination in the post-Sri Sri period only. Rachakonda Viswanatha Sastry in Alpa jeevi (1961) has artistically presented the aspirations of the common man from a progressive, humanistic perspective. Among the other social novels championing the cause of the proletariat, sometimes in an aggressive manner, mention may be made of Mahidhara Ramamohana Rao's

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rathachakralu (1959), Onamalu (1960) and Kattula vantena (1961) and Vattikota Alwaruswamy's Prajala manish (1963). The short story writer also turned his attention to the problems of the proletariat; the stories of Rachamallu Ramachandra Reddy in Alasina gundelu, of Rachakonda Viswanatha Sastry in Aru sara kathalu (1963) and of Kalipatnam Ramarao in Yajnam (1971) are some examples. A few dramatists too wrote a few spirited progressivist plays, like Mandadugu (1962) by Sunkara. The spirit of progressivism thus spread practically to all forms of literature in Telugu.

After 1940, some writers tried to adopt a progressive stance for the sake of popularity, sometimes much against their natural propensities. Such artificial attempts have often led to inconsistencies. But in an overall assessment of the contribution of this movement to Telugu literature, especially poetry, it must be admitted that the excessive truculence of progressivist tendencies has sometimes diluted literary quality, and poetic suggestivity has been vulgarised to brazen declamations and panegyrics. A recovery of aesthetic beauty in expression, along with a sensitiveness to social problems, may yet contribute to excellence in Telugu literature.

S.S.P.R.

PROGRESSIVE LITERATURE (Urdu). The progressive writers' movement in Urdu literature came into being after the first Progressive Writers' Conference was held at Lucknow in 1936 under the Presidentship of Premchand. The Manifesto adopted at this Conference gave an impetus to progressive writing in Urdu as well as in other Indian languages. But before drafting the Manifesto at London, Sajjad Zaheer, in collaboration with Rashid Jahan, Mahmooduzzafar and Ahmad Ali, had published a collection of short stories called Angare (The live coal) in 1933. Sajjad Zaheer's novel, London ki ek raat (A night in London), was also written during the publication of Angare. The artistic level of the short stories was not high, but they created a stir in the Urdu world, and the book was proscribed by the British Government. In a way, its appearance was the declaration of a new movement in literature. It attacked the old and decadent institutions and ideas, and invited the new writers to use their pen fearlessly. It also revealed a new approach to the problems of sex in the middle class society.

Two sentences from Premchand's presidential address gave a new aesthetic direction to progressive writing: 'We have to change the criteria of beauty.' It heralded a new approach different from that of the classics where beauty was an aristocratic princess of the ivory tower. The second sentence determined the relationship of literature and politics: 'Literature is not the camp follower of politics; it is the torch of light that shows the path to politics.' Here the word 'politics' does not stand for the programme of any political party. It means the understanding of all the social and economic factors which create history and change society, effecting a change in human thought and emotion, and thus giving a new direction to literature and art. In its turn literature becomes an instrument of understanding and change.

The first Progressive Writers' Conference was held at Lucknow along with the historic session of the Indian National Congress where Jawaharlal Nehru, in his presidential address, declared socialism as the goal of the national movement. Thus, progressive literature became a part of the freedom struggle of India with revolutionary consciousness. It drew the attention of the British Government, and the Home Secretary, Government of India, M.G. Hallet, issued a circular to all local governments to watch the movement 'with some suspicion' as, in his opinion, it was in accordance with the current policy of the Communist International.

We had received humanism, rationalism, patriotism and anti-imperialism as gifts from our literary heritage, but they were embellished with religion. The parallel movements of Hindu and Muslim revivalism had influenced them powerfully. the progressive writers tried to link the face of literature with the fate of the people, the workers, the peasants and the middle class, and thus gave a new direction to literature. Tagore, in his message to the Allahabad conference (1930) of young progressive writers of Hindi and Urdu, emphasised the fact that for creating good literature it was necessary to be in direct touch with the people with a conscious effort to understand them. In the same letter he warned the young writers against the danger of obscurantism. They have to come out of their egoistic shell if they are really in search of truth and beauty: 'Learn to blossom forth like a bud out of the wooden stem and see how pure is the air, pleasing the light and how clear the water.'

The progressive writers gave a new concept of Man which is not so very clear in their Manifesto as in their writings. This is the Man who has broken the chains of superstition and class operation, and has succeeded in resolving the contradiction between physical and mental labour, and thus, becoming the complete master of all his creative powers. This Man is yet to be born for whom a revolutionary change in the social relationship is necessary, and the progressive writers have to strive to bring about the change through their writings. The writer does not change reality directly. He only changes the mental and emotional attitudes, not with the rational argument, but with the delicate sword of aesthetics where the argument becomes ecstasy. It is here that the real worth of a writer is tested.

This was a great responsibility. The objective conditions were created by the freedom struggle, international happenings and the intellectual movements of the world. Fascism was raising its head in Europe, books were consigned to flames on the streets of Berlin and the world was resounding with the barbaric Nazi slogans. This menace had to be fought, and culture, literature and humanity had to be saved. Gorky, Romain Rolland, Thomas Mann, Henri Barbusse and other writers came together on the platform of an international conference at Paris in 1935. Sajjad Zaheer and Mulk Raj Anand, young Indian students in England, participated as observers. Precisely at this time Tagore and Jawaharlal Nehru in India raised their powerful voice against fascism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It was after a few months of the Paris conference that Sajjad Zaheer and Mulk Raj Anand alongwith some other Indian students in London drafted the first Manifesto of the Progressive Writers. The Manifesto gave a new turn to the literature of Urdu and other Indian languages, and for the first time in the history of India, a powerful All India literary movement embracing almost all the major languages was born. It became a part of the world movement heralding the new awakening of man, a movement that had been drawing in its fold intellectual gaints like Albert Einstein, Bernard Shaw, Anatole France and Martin Anderson Nexo since 1919.

The progressive writers movement attracted the attention of eminent living writers of Urdu like Premchand, who presided over the first conference, Hasrat Mohani, Maulavi Abdul Haq, Iqbal and Josh Malihabadi, who blessed the movement. Most significant names from other languages are those of Vallattol (Malayalam), Tarashankar Bannerji (Bengali), Umashankar Joshi (Gujarati), and Sumitranandan Pant and Nirala (Hindi). Tagore inaugurated the second all India conference in Calcutta in December 1938 with an inaugural address. He could not come to Calcutta personally. Mulk Raj Anand and Ali Sardar Jafri went to Santiniketan to receive his blessings. Jawaharlal Nehru addressed the Allahabad conference in 1938 and Sarojini Naidu inaugurated the Hyderabad conference in 1945 with a sentence, 'I inaugurate the conference', because she was not permitted by the Nizam Government to make public speeches. Most of these luminaries were never the regular members of the movement.

The young Urdu writers, mostly students at that time, who associated themselves with this movement are today the most respected names in Urdu literature, like Krishan Chander, Rajender Singh Bedi, Saddat Hasan Manto, Ismat Chughtai, Hayatullah Ansari, K.A.Abbas (fiction writers); Faiz Ahmad Faiz, Asrarul Haq Majaz, Makhdum Mohiuddin, Ali Sardar Jafri, Moin Ahsan Jazbi, Ali Jawad Zaidi (poets); Ehtisham Husain and Aley Ahmad Suroor (critics). Firaq Gorakhpuri, the doyen of Urdu ghazal and the recipient of Jnanpith Award, also associated himself with the movement. His genius blossomed between 1945-55, although he belonged to the generation of Josh and Jigar Muradabadi. The elder critic Majnu Gorakhpuri was also, like Firaq, a lecturer in English literature who completely identified himself with the movement. Ahmad Ali, Akhtar Raipuri, Tasir and Hasan Askari are also important names of the early days, but many of them later drifted away, and some even opposed the movement. The first group came from various parts of the country, especially Lahore, Lucknow, Delhi, Hyderabad and Aligarh. The level of their consciousness was different, making the movement a spectrum. At one end were writers like Hayatullah Ansari and Suhail Azimabadi, disciples of Gandhi, having faith in non-violence; in the middle were writers like K.A.Abbas, who believed in socialism with Nehru as their guide and leader and at the other end were Marxists like Sajjad Zaheer, Makhdum and A.S.Jafri. The common factor that governed their attitude was that they were all indignant and in revolt against the existing social system and morality. They were ashamed of the slavery of their country and were in search of a goal.

In the forties, another talented generation of writers emerged which included Upendranath Ashk, Jani Nisar Akhtar, Sahir Ludhianvi, Kaifi Azmi, Majrooh Sultanpuri, Ahmad Nadeem Qasmi, Wamiq Jaunpuri, Balwant Singh and Mahendra Nath. Ghulam Rabbani Taban, who belongs to this period, made his mark as a ghazal writer only recently. They further enriched progressive literature. Majrooh Sultanpuri's contribution to progressive ghazal is outstanding. Kaifi blazed the trail of revolutionary poetry.

Yet another group of writers entered the progressive scene after fifties and still continues. Razia Sajjad Zaheer, Prakash Pandit, Mohammad Hasan, Qamar Rais, Shaukat Siddiqui, Suleman Areeb, Waheed Akhtar, Habib Jalib, Qazi Abdussattar, Jilani Bano, Fehmida Riaz, Shaz Tamkinat, Mumtaz Mirza, Zahida Zaidi, Sajida Zaidi are some of the outstanding names. There are about a dozen major novels in Urdu, most of them dealing with the partition of India and the disintegration of feudal society. They have not been able to grasp the new life. Technically the novel has gone beyond Premchand, but from the point of view of social content, Premchand's Godan is still unsurpassed. The short story has become richer in progressive movement. Equally rich or perhaps richer is the harvest of poetry. The movement has added something fresh and novel to the treasure house of poetic diction, besides a new and powerful imagery taken from every day life along with the classical imagery which at times turned from motif to cliche. There is a great variety of form from symbolism to direct descriptive and agitational poetry. The progressive poets inherited a highly evolved symbolism from the tradition of classical ghazal.

In the field of criticism, a healthy tradition was inherited from Hali of the 19th century. It was further enriched by the achievements of modern western criticism. Some Marxist criticism has also been attempted, but no serious study of Marxism and Marxist criticism has been made and, therefore none of the Marxist critics comes anywhere near Caudwell and Lukacs.

Since it was a leftist movement, it was naturally dominated by the leftist writers. But it was not and could not have been a Marxist movement. It was vitally connected with the freedom struggle. And when freedom was achieved in 1947, the situation changed. An assessment of the new problems facing the writers was necessary. It was precisely at this time that the movement became sectarian. This damaged the movement and many writers severed their connections with it. The organisation was banned in India and Pakistan, and many progressive writers were thrown into prison.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

But, paradoxically, in this very period in which the movement was weakened, some of the finest progressive literature was created. After a few years, Faiz, a very popular poet of the sub-continent, was awarded the Lenin Peace Prize; Krishan Chander, the collossus of progressive literature, acquired the stature of a national writer and was translated into major languages of India. The fame of poets Josh, Firaq, Makhdum, Majaz, Jafri, Kaifi, Sahir, Majrooh, and writers Ismat Chughtai, Bedi, Abbas, etc. crossed the barriers of language in India and were translated into many foreign languages.

The communal riots in the wake of partition disillusioned many writers, some of whom found refuge in cynicism and some became shamelessly communal. But the progressive writers retained their humanism and wrote with great courage. This was the hour of truth and triumph. Even Rashid Ahmad Siddiqui of Aligarh, who had called progressives the 'third class agents of a foreign power', acknowledged the importance of progressive literature in his presidential address at the Bihar Urdu Conference (Patna) in May 1951.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Ali Sardar Jafri (ed.), Guftugu: Taraqi pasand adab number; Aziz Ahmed, Taraqi pasand adab; Khalilurrehman Azmi, Taraqi pasand adabi tehreek; Sajjad Zaheer, Roshnai (Reminiscences); Sudhi Pradhan (ed.), Marxist Cultural Movement in India.

A.S.J.

PROSE (Apabhramsha). There is no tradition of prose-writing in Apabhramsha. In fact, the prose form is a creation of classical and medieval Sanskrit. Like the story and the play in Prakrit, the Apabhramsha fiction is quite rich, but it is hardly in prose. There are some references to a tale, now lost, of Suddaya, Suddayachariya (Sadayavatsa kaha), which was possibly in prose like Tarangavati and Kuvalayamala in Prakrit. There is a rich tradition of the poetic narrative as well of various cycles of popular tales and one may, therefore, assume that there were also tales in prose which are no longer extant.

Some prose passages are interspersed in plays. Take for instance, Mrichchhakatika of Shudraka, a sanskrit play (3rd-4th c. AD). Mahur is a character in the play, a keeper of a gambling den using spoken language Apabhramsha. Mahur also uses eastern Apabhramsha for a civilised identity: "Bhatta, tue dasasuvannu kallavattu. Maha esu vihavu". (Sir, ten gold pieces may be a trifle to you; to me they are a fortune).

"Ale Bhatta dasasuvannaha ludhu judakaru papalinu papalinu Ta genha genha. Chittha chittha." (O Bhattaraka! This gambler here, bound to us by gold pieces, is making off. Catch him, oh, catch him; stop, stop him).

Prithvidhara, the commentator of Mrichchhakatika, tells us that there are in the play three characters who use different dialects of Apabhramsha. Usually prose is used first and poetry next. Apabhramsha prose is simple and lucid. It contains abundant present participles and is mostly free from case-formation. Kuvalayamala of Uddyotanasuri gives a clear idea of the spoken Apabhramsha.

First of all, we have some Apabhramsha passages in prose, as these occur as dialogues in different dialects. Here is one from Kuvalayamalakaha:"Hun Hun kahiyo buttanto tena jampiyellau. Kashin Kodham Kahin Vanarasi, Mulathanu bhadarau Kodhaim je di uddalaijje loyahun. Annena bhaniyam 'Re re jai Mulatthanu deijeuddalaijje Kodhim to punu kain kajju appanu Kodhi that Yallau achchai. Annena bhaniyam."

The words in italic give a clear idea of the language used by uneducated people. These words also help us differentiate the language from Prakrit. The tendency to end nouns and pronouns in 'U' is typical of Apabhramsha, or to be more precise, of the spoken language in the Midlands of the country at that time.

It is a peculiarity of Indian literature, specially of Prakrit tales and Sanskrit plays, that a single work contains several dialects spoken by different characters. It is also a fact that the use of Prakrit dialects in classical Sanskrit play is quite frequent. In Karpuramanjari and other Sanskrit plays some Apabhramsha words have been used frequently. In the Malwi dialects the use of 'bhaya and bahni' is continued even today.

The commentaries on various canonical and other Jaina works are available in Apabhramsha prose. Many of them, however, are manuscripts and have not yet been published.

D.S.

PROSE (Assamese). Assamese prose can be divided into old and modern Assamese prose. The old prose has two categories: (i) religious and ethical prose, and (ii) historical and secular prose. The former represents the Sattra style which is laden with Sanskrit vocables, while the latter reflects the Buranji style of prose. Prose in Assamese as an accepted form of literature made its beginning in the Ankiyanats of Shankaradeva. Having earned fame as a celebrated poet, Shankaradeva made a departure from the established tradition of composing in metrical form and employed prose first as a medium of dialogue in his Ankiyanats. This prose which he employed in his dramas is made of an artificial diction; it is mixed with Maithili and is popularly known as Brajabuli or Brajabhasha. Why did Shankaradeva choose such an artificial language as a medium for his dramas? A definite reply to this question can hardly be given. The very purpose of his dramas was to inspire the people with spiritual thoughts and feelings so that they might develop a spirit of devotion. Meanwhile, Maithili had become the language of a definite literature during the time of the great Vaishnava saint, Vidyapti, who made Maithili pre-eminently suitable and an exclusive vehicle of expression of Vaishnava sentiments. A host of scholars, poets and preachers from different parts of India thronged around him. Many scholars from Kamrupa too visited Mithila and learned the language. These scholars from different parts of India after their return from Mithila began to compose songs in imitation of Vidyapati and in their mother tongue, but it was profusely mixed with Maithili vacabulary. This process led to the growth of a new dialect, namely, Brajabuli or Brajabali or Bhajabhasha which was popularly used by the Vaishnava poets of Assam and Bengal. Shankaradeva perhaps came in touch with these poets and most probably witnessed dramatic performances of the plays written by the Maithili poets and dramatists, particularly the Parijataharana of Umapati, in the course of his second pilgrimage.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Madhavadeva (1489-1596), following in the footsteps of his preceptor Shankaradeva, composed a number of dramas but he integrated indigenous Assamese words into the Brajabali pattern of prose. The new mode came to be followed by many subsequent Vaishnava playwrights. Thus the foundation of early Assamese prose was laid by Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva.

The father of Assamese prose is, however, Bhattadeva (1558-1638), who at the behest of his preceptor Damodaradeva, translated the entire Srimadbhagavadgita and Srimadbhagavata into Assamese under the titles Kathagita and Kathabhagavat. The works were executed in a very concise manner and are faithful to the essence of the originals. Besides the two, he is credited with the authorship of Katha Ratnavali. The three, monumental in kind, bear the stamp of originality and genius of Bhattadeva who boldly departed from the earlier practice of Shankaradeva, Madhavadeva and others in their use of Brajabuli. Bhattadeva's prose is distinctive in style. To bring the fundamentals of the Vaishnava ethics and religion nearer home to the common people he had to adopt a balanced style. To achieve this he depended primarily on Sanskrit vocables with common words and was able to present the abstruse and metaphysical ideas of the text in a lucid and coherent style replete with sweetness and simplicity. It was a finished prose style mostly consisting of short sentences. The conversational and argumentative prose style of Kathagita served as a model and pattern for the later Vaishnava prose writers dealing with philosophical matters. The simpler and freer style of Kathabhagavata greatly influenced the writers of the 'charitaputhis'.

Following Bhattadeva, religio-ethical prose in Assamese gained a momentum and several prose writers like Parasuram and Raghunath Mahanta appeared. A class of biographical literature known as 'charitaputhi', dealing with the lives and teachings of the great Vaishnava saints like Shankaradeva, had its beginning in the early part of the seventeenth century. The 'charitaputhis' were written in either verse or prose and those in prose were known as 'katha-gurucharita'. They aimed at generating in the minds of the devotees a sense of reverence for, and devotion to, the saints by means of recitals of incidents from their lives. Hence the prose of such biographies and the manner of their compilation differed widely from those of Bhattadeva, as they were written to inspire the masses in the simple, emotional, homely and informal speech of the people. In the 'charitaputhis' dialogues are happily woven into descriptive passages comprising short and long sentences having indicative, interrogative and other patterns without strict adherence to grammatical rules. The practice is not generally followed in our everyday speech or sentence constructions. The use of the proper word in the proper place and particularly metaphors, similes and alliterations constitute the beauty of such works.

Historical and other secular prose-types flourished in the later part of the seventeenth century. The Ahom rulers popularised a new type of literature known as 'buranjis' or history written both in prose and in verse. The prose of the 'buranjis' is racy, it uses spoken language and is always straightforward and direct. The 'buranjis' present chronological accounts of the court life, the royal routine and the proceedings of the royal court. The language of the 'buranjis', therefore, has a courtly polish and the richness and clarity of expression suitable for historical narration. The narratives are replete with thought, emotion and worldly wisdom and the writers use pithy sentences and simple and homely phrases. The prose of the 'buranjis' contributed greatly to the development of Assamese vocabulary in its various ramifications in diverse fields. It was after the pattern of this prose that the easy and simple prose of the Arunodoi (1846), the first periodical in Assamese, was developed in the early years of the nineteenth century.

Assamese prose was used in diplomatic epistles and exchanges by different rulers. Prose was employed also in land grant documents, petitions and prayers, census papers and other court documents. In them prose attained further precision and clarity.

Besides them, the first instance of scientific prose is found in two significant books, Hastividyarnava and Ghoranidan. Both belong to a rich prose tradition, as the buranjis do, and employ the same vocabulary of the buranjis, and the style is also of an identical flavour. Shrihastamuktavali is a kind of commentary dealing with dance and dramaturgy with Sanskrit shlokas rendered into Assamese prose, and Bhasvati by Kaviraja Chakravarti a prose work on astronomy. The old Assamese prose flourished thus in various branches of literature.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The modern age in Assamese literature starts from the beginning of the nineteenth century. Strictly speaking, it was after 1813, the year of publication of the New Testament from the Baptist Mission Press at Serampore (Bengal) that modern Assamese prose began to develop gradually in its various forms. Since then prose in Assamese has grown in rapid strides both in form and in style. Non-fictional prose in personal essays, and philosophical and critical writings has shown signs of maturity. Among the writers who have used prose with a kind of literary flavour the prominent are Bhabananda Datta, Trailokya Goswami, Nabakanta Barua, Homen Burgohain, Hiren Gohain, Bhaben Barua, etc. By and large modern Assamese prose is now capable of dealing with even abstruse ideas and concepts in an effective manner.

Ban. S.

PROSE (Bengali). During the middle ages when there was no printing press and Bengali poetry was primarily based on religious themes, evidence of prose could be seen only in letters, official documents or administrative orders. Traces of these could be found between the sixteenth and the eighteenth centuries but they have little literary value.

It was the foreign missionaries and officials who played a major role in popularising Bengali prose among the common people. Brahman-Roman Catholic sambad (1743) by Dom Antonio, or Crepar Xaxtrer Orthbhed (1743) by Manoel da Assumpsam are unique examples of this type of prose. The foreign rulers had to learn and cultivate the Bengali language for the purpose of administration and mass communication. It was this purpose which inspired Nathaniel Brassey Halhed to compile a Bengali grammar in 1778. And it was also primarily for this purpose that the printing press was introduced. Bengali types were made, the Bible and the laws of the company were translated and circulated among the common people. For the propagation of Bengali a group of foreign missionaries formed an organisation at Serampore in the Hooghly district. Fort William College was established (1800) and its teachers were entrusted with the task of teaching civilians Bengali. So the teachers of that College began to use Bengali prose in text-books. As a result, between 1801 and 1825 quite a number of such text-books were written by William Carey (1761-1834), Mrityunjay Vidyalamkar, Rajiblochan Mukherjee, Tarinicharan Mitra, Chandicharan Munshi, Ramram Basu and other teachers. Although their books were not widely popular, their endeavours were invaluable as they gave the language a shape which could be conveniently used for day-to-day material purpose.

Significantly this was the period which witnessed the growth of Calcutta as the capital of the British Indian Empire, and saw a renaissance among the natives who were influenced by the western heritage, the liquidation of the feudal values, the genesis of the reform movements, and a continuous confrontation between liberalism and traditionalism. All this gave rise to what may be called polemical literature, and Bengali prose came to be used outside the precincts of academic institutions. No wonder that between 1825 and 1850, there was a spate of journals and periodicals, books and booklets, controversial leaflets, theistic discourses etc. Apart from this, the proliferation of schools and colleges increased the demand for Bengali text books. This contributed to the formation of a language that was now beginning to be more disciplined, structurally more well-defined and a vehicle for mass-communication. During this period the most prominent among those who experimented with prose and propagated a distinct style and made it a free medium of expression was Rammohun Roy (1774-1833) who himself wrote a number of books on religion and social reform.

In the mid-nineteenth century Iswarchandra Vidyasagar polished the language further. It now became a homespun language which could be understood and written by the people in general. Vidyasagar was not only an educationist, a great scholar and a social reformer, but also the forerunner of modern Bengali and the first creator of style. The unparalleled felicity and the classical richness of his prose broadened the readership base and reached the populace. Among the prose-writers of this period the following found a permanent place in the history of Bengali prose: Debendranath Tagore, Rajnarayan Basu, Akshaykumar Datta, Keshabchandra Sen, Sibnath Sastri, all of whom were closely associated with the Brahmo reformist movement; Ramgati Nyayratna, Tarashankar Tarkaratna, and Krishnakamal Bhattacharya who earned fame by writing story-based prose, and Bhudeb Mukherjee, the essayist, who became famous for his educational writings.

It should be noted in this connexion that the contribution of the School Books Society (1817) and the Vernacular Literature Society (1851), the two official institutions, towards the popularization of Bengali prose can never be exaggerated. Many other journals and periodicals also contributed to the same end. These journals and periodicals discovered many writers who later earned well-deserved fame. Prominent among those journals were Sambad prabhakar, Tattvabodhini patrika, a mouthpiece of the Brahmo Samaj, Bividartha samgraha of Rajendralal Mitra, published to popularise highly scholastic subjects, Bangadarshan edited by Bakimchandra Chatterjee, and Bandhab and Bangabasi, which catered to sundry tastes.

During the last half of the nineteenth century, Bengali prose was essentially based on the classical Sanskrit prose style. It was at this time that an experiment with Bengali as it was spoken by the common folk of

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Calcutta was attempted by Pyarichand Mitra and Kaliprasanna Sinha. Their two works Alaler gharer dulal (1857) and Hutom pyanchar naksha (1862) opened up a new horizon in the scenario of Bengali colloquial prose. What was more, these two works heralded the portrayal of social realism in Bengali fiction.

Then came Bankimchandra Chatterjee, whose novels, dissertations and unique personal essays marked a glorious phase in Bengali prose since in his works were reflected his personality, lyrical charm, classical sobriety, grandeur of expression, profusion of different sentiments and artistic style. Bangadarshan, the journal edited by him, played a conspicuous role in fashioning Bengali prose style. Till the turn of the nineteenth century Bengali prose-writers were profoundly influenced by Bankimchandra. However, during this period there were a few writers who carved out their own niches by their own style. The foremost among them were Rameshchandra Datta, the novelist; Indranath Banerjee, a master of satirical journalism; Kaliprasanna Ghosh, a writer of thought-provoking essays; Rajanikanta Gupta, a historigrapher; and Chandranath Basu, a critic; Haraprasad Sastri, a scholar; and Swami Vivekananda, a socio-religious reformer.

After Bankimchandra and Vidyasagar, Rabindranath Tagore appeared on the scene with his versatile genius. He gave Bengali prose a dimension which transcended the national boundaries. He was a master of all forms, but the major portion of his work was lyrical and everything he wrote, even his prose, has an abundunce of lyricism. He revolutionized Bengali prose by imparting it a new texture and a new vitality. He wrote cirtical and philosophical essays, journalistic prose, narrative prose, dissertations, travelogues, letters, biographies, autobiographies, humorous sketches, and socio-political essays. He gave as much finesse and delicacy to his prose as to his poetry. Indeed, in his hand Bengali prose received final polish and sophistication. For more than six decades this deft artist introduced a variety of prose styles, both classical and colloquial. His prose was rich in humour and irony, wit and pathos. He was unparalleled in coining new words, expressions and phrases, and in giving new connotation to old words. After Word War I he accepted, like Chekhov and Balzac, the colloquial style as his medium of expression. Notable among his non-fictional prose works, are Sahitya (1907), Prachin sahitya (1907) Bichitra prabandha (1907), Jiban smriti (1912), Chhinnapatra (1912), Lipika (1922), Russiar chithi (1931), Manusher dharma (1933), Bishwa-parichay (1937), Chhelebela (1940), Sabhyatar samkat (1941).

Another important master of prose was Saratchandra Chatterjee (1876-1938) whose novels were rich in lucidity of style and as such earned the admiration of almost all sections of readers. Most novelists after him followed in his footsteps and not in Rabindranath's so far as the prose style was concerned. Pramatha Chaudhury (1868-1946), who wrote under the pseudonym of Birbal, invented his own style which reminds one of the intellectual sharpness, sophistication and aristocracy of the French tradition. Sabuj patra (1915), a literary journal edited by him, became the mouthpiece of a new generation of prose writers, viz., Atulchandra Gupta, Annadasankar Ray, Dhurjatiprasad Mukherjee, Sureshchandra Chakravarti and others. Balendranath Tagore and Abanindranath Tagore (1871-1951), two nephews of Rabindranath, distinguished themselves by their individual prose styles. After Sabuj patra, journals like Kallol, Kali kalam and Parichay became the organs of a new generation of bright young writers who made experiments with prose style in their essays, novels and short stories. The most notable among them were Buddhadeb Basu, Achintyakumar Sengupta and Sudhindranath Datta. Among the contemporary prose writers mention may be made of Srikumar Banerjee (1892-1970), Tarasankar Banerjee (1898-1971) and Narayan Ganguli (1918-1970), besides many others who have been making new experiments with prose style for a few decades now.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Arunkumar Basu (ed), Bangla gadya jijnasa (1981); Asitkumar Banerjee, Bangla sahityer sampurna itibritta (1968); Pramathanath Bisi and Bijitkumar Datta, Bangla gadyer padanka (1960); Sisirkumar Das, Early Bengali prose (1966); Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahitye gadya (1935).

Ar.B.

PROSE (Dogri). The history of Dogri prose is brief. Maharaja Ranbir Singh made sustained efforts to lay the foundation of Dogri prose in printed form more than a century ago. Before that we had folklore in which Dogri prose could be heard through narration of folktales, but not in written form. Though the courts recognised Dogri and its script in the form of pattas and royal orders, there is no evidence of the elegance of the Dogri prose in them.

The entire credit, however, goes to Maharaja Ranbir Singh for improving the Dogra script and, thus, giving it a scientific shape like the Devanagari script. He got prepared translations of Sanskrit books Lilavati and Amarkosh. The Vyavahargita, published by him, also reflects his eagerness to develop Dogri prose for the common use of the people.

In the year 1793, the Serampore missionaries published a part of the Bible in Dogri; but its script was Devanagari. This shows that Dogri prose was in use even in the eighteenth century. The prose of the Dogri Bible is flawless and its style is natural. From this it appears that the translation of the book was done by an experienced hand. It also indicates that Dogri prose had already been put to use in the closing years of the eighteenth century.

The Rajavale, or Rajauli, is another milestone in the steady development of Dogri. The language is Kangri Dogri, but we cannot set it aside from the Dogri of Jammu, because it relies much on the Dogri vocabulary. The discovery of this historical book has been of great significance to the literary circles of Dogri. The Rajauli was introduced to us by Gauri Shankar, who had done commendable work on the research side of the Dogri language.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The book was discovered from the museum of the ruling family of Guler. It provides a brief sketch of the rulers who reigned over the country after the war of the Mahabharata. It is not an original work in Dogri, but it is a translation of the Persian work completed during the period of Dara Shikoh, the eldest son of Shah Jahan. Dara Shikoh was a great scholar of Arabic and Persian, and was an admirer of Sanskrit literature and Hindu scriptures. Tehldas rendered its Dogri translation, which is in verse. The prose contents, partly given in the book, are of great help to researchers.

Frederic Drew, scholar-traveller, who lived in the State from 1862 to 1872, gives an account in his work of the Maharaja's royal durbar in which applications and letters from the public to the Maharaja as well as royal orders thereon were in Dogri. The Maharaja advised the public and the officials in general to read Dogri and its new script and a penalty was imposed on those who disobeyed the royal orders.

Drew has also given a long description of Dogri and its grammar. Maharaja Ranbir Singh can be called a great exponent of the Dogri language. He ordered the publication of local law books in Dogri prose. These include Zabita Dewani (Civil Procedure Code), Zabita Faujdari (Criminal Procedure Code), Hidayat Wazir Wazarat (Instructions to Administrative Heads of Districts) and Hidayat Patwarian (Instructions to Patwaris). Dogri was the court language. The court stamps, petitions and judgements were in Dogri or Persian. Several families of Dogras have preserved the Dogri court summons, petitions and court documents and deeds.

After the death of Maharaja Ranbir Singh in 1885, Dogri was replaced by Urdu as court language, but in rural areas its use continued up to 1935 and even later. Thereafter, Urdu completely eclipsed it. The Dogri prose in the court deeds and documents is evident from its common use.

During Maharaja Pratap Singh's reign, the official use of Dogri came to an end. However, its use by the common man continued. Besides official pattas and sannads, we have letters written by various persons from time to time. The most interesting among them are letters written to different officers which are also in the Dogri language and in the same script. We have also letters written by Maharaja Pratap Singh to his two brothers, Raja Ram Singh and Raja Amar Singh, in which problems pertaining to various issues are mentioned. The Maharaja, at one stage, said that Dogri was his mother tongue and his knowledge of language was confined to it only. The style of Dogri prose in the letters is apparently conventional, but the letters do not have any punctuation. The letters in Dogri written from Basohli bear the mark of local vocabulary and so are those from Reasi and Akhnur. The Dogri letters or offical documents from Bhadarwah have words from the Pahari dialects.

Though there are enough documents, royal orders and letters in Dogri prose, there is inadequate prose literature to show the constant development of this genre. The reason has been that there was no official encouragement to the writers to publish books. Writers in the forties were inclined towards Hindi, but in several parts of the country there was a new wave to develop local dialects. The wave had an influence on the writers of Jammu also who switched over to Dogri in 1945 when the Dogri Sanstha was established to develop the Dogri language.

Triveni of Shakti Sharma and Shyam Lal Sharma, in the form of essays, is an outstanding prose work. Besides, essays on various subjects by Vishwanath Khajuria, Jagdish Sathe, Champa Sharma, N.D. Sharma, R.N. Shastri, Ved Ghai, Veena, Pandhotra and Shivanath played a commendable role in the development of Dogri prose. Dogri prose was confined to a few translations and a few essays in Nami chetana till 1961 when the first collection of original Dogri essays by Shakti Sharma and her husband Shyam Lal Sharma was published. Since then, Dogri prose has flowered and flourished and come into its own with all its lexical richness.

There are about 3 dozen books of essays including six on literary criticism, a biography and an autobiography in Dogri prose. Among the prose essayists, Vishwanath Khajuria, Lakshminarayan Sharma, Shakti Sharma, Sansarchandra, Atmaram have a personal style of their own. Three collections of essays that give a fairly good idea of the richness and variety of Dogri prose, are Rajat jayantigranth brought out by the Dogri Sanstha, Jammu, on the occasion of its 25th anniversary, Din din jot soai and Duggar da sanskritik jivan published by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages in 1980 and 1985 respectively.

D.C.P.

PROSE (English). The art of poetry always comes to be cultivated earlier than the art of prose, but actually prose is contemporaneous with the first fumblings of human speech and it is the literary prose that originates later. For Indians, however, English was a deliberately acquired linguistic skill and for necessity prose came to be practised first. The generation first exposed to English mastered it sufficiently to use it initially for the purposes of translation, petitioning, and soon for journalism, propaganda, controversy, exposition and literary creation. Hicky's Bengal Gazette, India's earliest newspaper, came out in 1780, and the printing presses had been established even earlier. Cavaally Venkata Boriah's dissertation on the Jains appeared in 1801, and his brother Venkata Ramaswami's English translation of Venktadhvari's Visvaguna Darsana in 1825. However, the first of the master prose writers in English was Rammohun Roy (1774-1833). His tract on 'Sati' (1818) was in the form of a debate between a critic and a defender of the odious custom of a widow's self-immolation on her husband's funeral pyre. In 1823, along with Dwarkanath Tagore and four other Calcutta citizens, Rammohun presented a dignified but strongly worded memorandum to Justice Macnaughten of the Supreme Court protesting against the curtailment of the freedom of the press, and warning the government that keeping the people in the dark would be 'a short-sighted policy'. In the same year, Rammohun addressed Lord Amherst pleading for a system of education through English embracing 'mathematics, natural philosophy, chemistry, anatomy, with other useful sciences'. Rammohun was indeed the 'morning star' of the modern Indian renaissance, and although he learnt it rather late, he could use English with ease alike for argument, exposition, exhortation or even for self-portraiture, and always as a potent tool for advancing the causes dear to him.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rammohun's contemporaries and immediate successors, whether they were reformers like him or traditionalists like Radhakanta Dev, found English convenient and helpful, and the Calcutta Hindu College, founded in 1817, gave a fillip to English education which also meant writing English. Young Henry Derozio (1809-1831) taught English literature, and turned his wards into rebels against tradition and against religion itself. The offensive and inevitable backlash was reflected in the prose of the time. In the 1840 serious Bengalis read papers on 'The Study of History' (K.M. Bandhyopadhya), 'Condition of Hindu Women' (Mahesh Chandra Dev) and 'On Knowledge' (Gourmohan Das) for discussion among fellow-inquirers. The Bethune Society, founded in 1851, was a means for the ferment of new ideas, and papers on 'The Aryan Vernaculars of India' (Rajendra Lal Mitra) and 'The Physical Varieties of Man' (Nobin Kristo Bose) were read and discussed. The coming up of such learned association was a feature of the developing intellectual life of Calcutta, and of other cities like Poona, Bombay and Madras. It all meant reading and thinking, writing in clear and cogent English prose, and subsequently using it in the debate and discussion. The Derozians and the anti-Derozians kept the intellectual climate in Calcutta alert and alive, and a new synthesis was to emerge in the course of time. The old as well as the new was to be accepted, not blindly, but only after proper appraisal of its continued vitality or relevance to India. Men like Akshay Kumar Dutt and Iswarchandra Vidyasagar were committed to reform, and the latter, although a seasoned Sanskritist himself, became an Anglophile, and introduced the teaching of English at his Sanskrit College. The interplay between Sanskrit, Bengali and English proved auspicious for both Bengali and English writing by Bengalis (and Indians).

After Rammohun, the most pioneering of the Indo-Anglian writers was Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824-1873). He became a convert to Christianity, married an English woman at Madras, and settled there to a career in English journalism and poetic composition. His discourse on 'The Anglo-Saxon and the Hindu', given in Madras in 1854, is a sample of his psyche at the time and also of his mastery of the English prose medium. Romantic and Victorian in its exuberance, its weight of historical, literary and classical allusions, and its many brilliant turns of phrases, the discourse has the mark of distinction and has force and charm. The Anglo-Saxon had come to Bharat to confront the Hindu: 'it is a sublime, a solemn, a grand, a wondrous drama they are destined to act.' Alas, 'the Hindu is an aged, a decayed race'; hence the need for the Anglo-Saxon kayakalpa or regeneration and Christianisation. Yet it was this same Anglophile who, on his return to Calcutta, composed Meghanadbadh kavya, the great modern Bengali epic. Although a Christian, he confessed that he loved 'the grand mythology of our ancestors'. He was a friend of Rajnarain Bose ('the Grandfather of Indian Nationalism'), and they exchanged numerous letters in English, and Michael once wrote that there was nothing like 'cultivating and enriching our mother tongue.'

English education meant, not alone a turn towards Western models in literature, but also a shift towards science, engineering and medicine. Enterprising minds wrote about geography and surveying, and Madhusudan Gupta published his London Pharmacopoeia in 1849. The steady growth of urbanisation facilitated the movement towards Anglicisation and Westernisation in all aspects of life. The lure of money and of urban mores was rather irresistible, and it needed the stupendous spiritual phenomenon of Ramakrishna Paramahamsa to arrest this trend and compel a revaluation of values. Keshub's Chunder Sen (1838-1884) was drawn rather late in life to Ramakrsihna, the living embodiment of spirituality. Keshub's disciple and cousin, Pratap Chunder Majumdar, wrote of Ramakrishna: 'A living evidence of the depth and sweetness of Hindu religion is this good and holy man.' Although Keshub felt attracted to the Cross, he didn't become a Christian; on the other hand, he preferred to lead his own breakaway Brahmo Samaj. He visited England in 1870, and Max Müller thought that Keshub was a latter-day Martin Luther. Keshub declared: 'Let, then, India learn from England practical righteousness; let England learn from India devotion, faith and prayer.'

In his sermon at Leeds, Keshub feelingly hoped that a spiritual intercourse and fellowship would be established between Britain and India. And in one of his last speeches ('Am I an inspired prophet?'), he spelt out his own Apologia pro vita sua in tones of deep sincerity. He spoke of John the Baptist, Jesus and Paul, and of the need for spirituality or religion—pure and simple. As an orator, Keshub seems to have been a conspicuous success uniting 'a sonorous voice, a noble diction and a commanding presence.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PROSE (ENGLISH)

The idealism and superb oratory of Keshub influenced many of the younger generation. There was, for example, Surendranath Banerjea (1848-1925) who could handle the English language with an impetuous and compelling force. It was the Victorian style, of course, but not without a power of its own. His speech in 1877 in Calcutta on 'England and India' was a notable piece of pleading; he walked warily as it were, and yet he didn't really mince words. Yes, the British were in India, with their 'mission', but it was for the Indians themselves to work out their salvation as Japan was doing! His Speeches and Writings (1927) and A Nation in the Making, recalling half a century of public life, fairly indicate the range of his interests and the quality of his prose.

In a speech given in 1919, Banerjea paid a glowing tribute to Dadabhai Naoroji (1825-1917) as 'a veritable Rishi'. Dadabhai's Poverty and Un-British Rule in India (1901), Mahadev Govind Ranade's Indian Economics (1898) and R.C.Dutt's Economic History of British India (1902) set the standard for this branch of literature of knowledge. The birth of the Indian National Congress in 1885, and the spread of its activities and annual sessions called for serious thinking, writing, oratory and public debate, and threw up a galaxy of publicists and journalists who wielded the English language with commendable self-assurance and a high level of competence. Many of them combined law, journalism and public affairs, and evinced an interest in education as well. It is a resounding roll-call: Dadabhai, W.C.Bannerji and D.E.Wacha; M.G. Ranade, N.G. Chandavarkar and K.T.Telang; Karunakara Menon, G.Subramania Aiyar and Sankaran Nair; Lal Mohan Ghose, Harishchandra Mukherji and Motilal Ghose; Ananda Charlu, Badruddin Tyabji and Rahimtullah Sayani; Sisir Kumar Ghose, Shambunath Mukherji and Satis Mukherji; Rash Behari Ghosh, B.N.Dhar and C.Vijayaraghavachariar; Bal Gangadhar Tilak, G.K.Gokhale and Pherozeshah Mehta–a galaxy indeed; and during the 'Bande Mataram', 'Home Rule' and 'Non-cooperation' movements, there were political evangelists like Aurobindo, Bipin Chandra Pal, Lajpat Rai, Ambikacharan Majumdar, Kasturiranga Aiyangar, Mahatma Gandhi, Sardar Patel, Rajagopalachari, Rajendra Prasad, Muhammad Ali, C.R.Das, Motilal Nehru; nationalists like M.A. Jinnah, V.S. Srinivasa Sastri, C.R. Reddy; journalists like Sant Nihal Singh, Nagendranath Gupta, C.Y. Chintamani, Ramananda Chatterjee, S.A. Brelvi: they were evangelists, patriots, moulders of opinion, instructors, tribunes of the people. When a K.M.Munshi or a Satchidananda Sinha or an M.N. Roy or a Subhas Bose or a T.Prakasam turned to journalism, it was no trade, no profession, but a vocation, almost sacerdotal. Indian organs of public opinion like Indu Prakash, Dawn, Bande Mataram, Karmayogin, Hindu, Amrita Bazar Patrika, New India, Young India, Indian Social Reformer, Harijan, Independent India, Swarajya, Forward, Modern Review, Hindustan Review, Social Welfare and Janmabhumi—many of them now defunct—were destined to play a necessary educative role in the context of the struggle for the country's emancipation from alien rule. No doubt, as we move from the old petitionary to the new agitational politics, there is a change in the tempo of the writing, circumlocutory good manners giving way to straight talk and pointed and pungent criticism, and the weapons of wit and humour and ridicule, of sarcasm and irony and invective being more and more brought into play. Tilak's 'Swaraj is my birthright' became the sutra of the nationalist creed, and he was the generalissimo of the 'extremist' elements in the Congress. In his speeches he usually concentrated on the subject and the argument, though on occasions, or when he was roused, his vehemence could sweep the field 'like a wild hurricane or slashing sleet'. The Bande Mataram, under Aurobindo's editorship during 1906-8, set the pace and elevated political journalism to the level of literature. His was indeed a tongue of flame, and when he later edited the Karmayogin (1909-10) and the Arya (1914-21), he took all knowledge—philosophy, Vedic, Upanishadic and Gita exegesis, sociology, politics and literary criticism for his province. And while his prose style was pithy and pregnant with his aphorisms, conversationally persuasive in his letters or talks, for his weightier treatises he deployed a 'global' style containing spans of thought and sweeps of rhythm and the burden of multiple qualifications with an infallible tightness of logical organisation.

Of a very diiferent kind was Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi who wore his heart upon his sleeve, and wrote with Biblical simplicity, austerity and force. But he too could rise to great poetic heights, as in his essay The Great Sentinel (1921), his classic reply to Gurudev Tagore and his critique of the Non-cooperation movement. There were Liberal statesmen like Tej Bahadur Sapru, M.R.Jayakar, P.S.Sivaswami Aiyar and Chimanlal Setalvad, who mainly relied on the weight of facts, inner dialectical coherence and force of advocacy.

There was the lone eminence, V.S. Srinivasa Sastri, 'honey-tongued, the very embodiment of sweet reasonableness from whose lips richly modulated words flow in rounded periods' (Amaranatha Jha). Madan Mohan Malaviya was called the silver-tongued orator, and often spoke at considerable length, and Sarojini Naidu's speeches were a flood of splendid improvisation, wave upon wave rising, subsiding, rising again. And Motilal and Jawaharlal Nehru, father and son, were both accomplished speakers, the latter being the more sensitive and temperamental, and at his best a master of nervous prose. As a speaker he was apt to be wobbling and long-winded though, as with the 'Tryst with Destiny' speech on 15 August 1947, but he could also rise to the heights. A colleague who later clashed with Motilal Nehru, S. Srinivasa Iyengar was 'a political ideas factory', a tempestuous campaigner for the Congress like his friend S. Satyamurti, and an intrepid debater in the legislatures.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Srinivasa Iyengar's contributions to the Hindu Law Reform have also received high praise. His younger contemporary, Rajaji (C. Rajagopalachari), was a Gandhian thinker, a nimble controversialist, and a writer who invested whatever he wrote or spoke about with a philosophical or religious significance. He interlaced his speeches and writings with telling—and sometimes devastating—parables. With his unfaltering sense of ends and means and his profound concern for humanity's future, Rajaji always communicated to his writing a truly bracing quality.

'In the age of Ranade', said B.R. Ambedkar, a constitutional lawyer and the spokesman of the Harijans (and later the brain behind India's republican Constitution), 'there was not the same divorce between a politician and a student which one sees in the Gandhi age.' But what was often lost in solidity and intellectual content was usually made up for in urgency, emotional fervour and personal commitment. After Independence (1947), there has been a sharp decline in the quality of our public life. By becoming more and more competitive and combative, politics, political oratory and political journalism have become grossly devalued commodities. Understandably enough, Parliamentary and Assembly debates are but spasmodically in English, and this elitist language is of little use for mass rallies. The stalwarts of yesterday—a C.P. Ramaswami Aiyar, a Radhakrishnan, a Lakshmanaswami Mudaliar—are no more, but a Minoo Masani, a Nani Palkhiwala, a Piloo Mody can still sway English-knowing audiences big or small. The national newspapers in English have wide circulations, and some of the journalists and columnists—the late Frank Moraes, Pothan Joseph and Iswara Dutt, as well as the happily alive: S. Mulgaokar, M. Chalapathi Rau, V.K.Narasimhan, B.G. Verghese, Ajit Bhattacharjee, K.R.Sundar Rajan, Arun Shourie—are professionally competent and stylistically articulate. Two ex-civilians, A.D.Gorwala and B.G. Rao, have turned to political knight-errantry, the former as editor of the avant garde Opinion and the latter (in collaboration with his wife, Amiya Rao) as critic and chronicler of the Emergency.

To turn from politics and journalism to collateral and other fields, there are first the makers of 'instant' history, and many a journalist (Kuldip Nayar, for example) or politician (L.K. Advani, for example) have taken a hand in this recent industry. If an earlier generation of savants (a J.C. Bose, a C.V. Raman, a P.C. Ray) made notable contributions to science literature in English, now a wide dissemination of science information is being made possible by journals like Science Today. In law and jurisprudence, India threw up over a period of many decades a distinguished band of lawyers and jurists, and this tradition survives still. Nani Palkhiwala's marathon performances in the Supreme Court, the sparks and fumes during some of the court proceedings, the seasoned findings and pronouncements of Justices K. Subba Rao, H.R. Khanna and J.C. Shah (to mention but three names), all testify to the reign of law and the reign of the English language in our higher courts of judicature. And the judgements and other utterances of V.R. Krishna Aiyar are prepared with scintillating turns of phrases and coruscating epigrams. In philosophy, since the time of Keshub, Vivekananda and B.R.Rajam Iyer, exponents of Indian thought through the English medium have not been lacking and they have always found receptive audiences in India and abroad. Vivekananda's sensational debut in Chicago on 11 September 1893 was but the beginning of his splendid ministry during the next ten years. In his wake, other monks too—for example, Yogananda, Mahesh Yogi, Bhakti Vedanta, Chinmayananda and Ranganathananda—have taken the message of India's perennial philosophy to the end of the world. Radhakrishnan was our roving ambassador, and his speeches carried invariably the charge of the Indian spirit in content and articulation. And he too was among the builders of the spiritual bridge between India and the world.

History—political, social, economic, cultural—and biography and autobiography; economics, sociology, anthropology, all the social sciences: much of the serious writing in these fields is done in English, and while most of it (as elsewhere too) is pedestrain, it is the exceptions that are important. Nirad C. Chaudhuri's books are a class apart, but there can be no question regarding his phenomenal learning and the quality of his prose and his biographical studies of Clive and Max Müller are fairly solid contributions. And the birth centenaries of the heroes of yesterday– Vivekananda, Tilak, Gandhiji, Aurobindo, Gokhale, Ananda Coomaraswamy—have inspired fresh studies or biographies of these formative spirits. More and more serious research journals in English covering particular disciplines are coming out, and the cultural magazines—Marg, Triveni, Aryan Path, Prabuddha Bharata, Indian P.E.N.—have managed gallantly to survive into the present.

During the last fifty years, prose fiction has taken impressive strides. The novels of an earlier era were content to tell interesting or exciting stories, often with a moralistic or propagandist slant. It was during the 1930's that Mulk Raj Anand, R.K. Narayan and Raja Rao, each a master of a different kind, published their first novels. Anand attempted an effective 'pigeon-English' not hesitating to traffic with native idioms and imagery; Narayan made plain prose go a long way with his disarming nuances of humour and suggestion; and Raja Rao experimented in his Kanthapura with an individual style reproducing the quiddities and rhythms of native speech. The extreme experimenter of course was G.V. Desani, whose All About H. Hatterr (1948) is almost a Joycean feat. In the post-1947 period, the Anand-Narayan-Raja Rao triumvirate has triumphantly held its ground, while Bhabani

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bhattacharya and Manohar Malgonkar, Chaman Nahal and Arun Joshi, the women novelists (Kamala Markandaya, Prawer Jhabvala, Attia Hosain, Shanta Rama Rau, Nayantara Sahgal, Anita Desai, Rama Mehta) and others like Sudhin Ghosh, Ruskin Bond, K.B. Vaid, Khushwant Singh and Dilip Hero reveal varying degrees of sophisticated control over the resources of the English language. As for the light essay, there have been a few successful practitioners in the past (S.V.V. Bangaruswami, Iswara Dutt, Joseph John), and the 'middles' in our daily papers are often extremely enjoyable. But of course it doesn't seem to be easy for our writers to relax, and to laugh at themselves.

Indian prose in English is almost two centuries old, and has had a chequered history of its own. Until 1947, English prose in India ran more or less parallel to the changes in fashion in England, often with a little time-lag as is inevitable with a derivative culture. But the great masters—Vivekananda, Aurobindo, Gandhi—had their own sustaining vision and authentic voice. The culture, sobriety and integrity of a Gokhale, a Srinivasa Sastri, a Rajaji, a Jawaharlal, a Jayaprakash Narayan; the distinctive weight of learning and power of articulation of a Radhakrishnan, a Nirad Chaudhuri, a Raghunathan ('Vighneswara'); there was nothing phoney, second-hand or feeble in all this. After independence, the influence flows no more from England alone, for the American impact is equally strong. Hundreds of our young men and women oscillate between India and the affluent Western countries, and they have learned to use the English language with an ease, verve and sophistication that was rather rare a generation earlier. There is a proliferation of English-medium schools—a few good, and many bad and indifferent—all over the country, and a new despicable snobbery is abroad. On the other hand, an aggressive thesis is being bruited about—that English should be learnt in India, not as the language that houses a great literature, but only as a necessary tool. But on a total view, and judging by the best that is being written and published, contemporary Indian prose in English seems to be a lively phenomenon, Indian in its sensibility, mildly experimental and increasingly capable of 'delivering the goods' for functional, professional or vocational purposes as also for creative writing, be it poetry or prose, the other harmony.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Arabinda Poddar, Renaissance in Bengal: Quests and Confrontations (Indian Institute of Advanced Study, Simla, 1970); G.A. Natesan (ed), Congress Presidential Addresses, 1885-1934, 2 volumes (G. A. Natesan, Madras); K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, Indian Writing in English, 2nd ed., (Asia, Bombay, 1973); M.M. Bhattacherje (ed.), Speeches and Writings of Eminent Indians, (Macmillan, Calcutta, 1954); R.K. Prabhu (ed.), An Anthology of Modern Indian Eloquence (Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, Bombay, 1960).

K.R.S.I.

PROSE (Gujarati). In medieval Gujarati literature, though not well-developed yet, we have some fine specimens of prose. Prithvichandracharit (15th c.) by Manikyachandra Suri, a Jain monk, is a descriptive tale of Prithvichandra, king of Paithan, who fell in love with princess Ratnamanjari of Ayodhya and ultimately married her. The story is narrated in short rhythmic sentences in a poetic style. Topic-wise divisions of paragraphs, apt figures, images, and lucidity—all these qualities make it a fine specimen of medieval prose. Discourses of Swami Sahajananda, founder of the Swaminarayan sect, which were published in the first quarter of the nineteenth century under the title Vachanamiruto, are adjudged by critics as a flawless piece of prose. The preacher wanted to communicate his message to the lowest of the low, and so his language is simple with suitable illustrations. His second book is Shikshapatri in which he elaborately explains the religious practices to be followed by his disciples. The language of this work is forceful and full of the vitality of a spoken language.

In the later half of the nineteenth century, English educational institutions were founded by the British rulers, and those who studied there came in contact with English literature and tried to introduce its prose genres in Gujarati. Narmad (1833-1886), who studied at Elphinstone College, wrote descriptive and reflective essays, short biographies, a book on prosody, a dictionary of Gujarati, literary criticism and a book on fundamentals of religion. Thus, he strove to bring into Gujarati everything that fascinated him in English literature. He was a zealous social reformer, and through his essays, he tried to propagate social reforms. He wrote about women's education, widow remarriage, evils of child and unequal marriages, patriotism etc. He also started a journal, Dandiyo, which happened to be the first magazine in Gujarati. His style was forceful, and whenever he found that there were no proper equivalents for English words, he coined them, thus enriching the language. He was a progressive, and vehement in his criticism of social evils. His contemporary, Dalpatram (1828-1898), also wrote essays, denouncing social evils such as child marriage, superstitions, caste system, etc. His language was simple, and unlike Narmad, his emotions were controlled. Navalram (1836-1888) laid the foundation of literary criticism by his articles on different aspects of criticism, such as book-reviews, essentials of novel, autobiography, essay, travelogue and other prose genres.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, the best essayist was Manilal Dwivedi (1858-1898). His work Sudarshan gadyavali (1909) contains essays embracing many subjects like religion, education, sociology, economics, politics, literature, music, etc. The essays show Manilal's versatile genius and his mastery of Gujarati prose. Besides, Anandshanker Dhruv's (1869-1942) essays on miscellaneous subjects such as religion, philosophy, poetry, applied criticism, education and history are the finest specimens of reflective essays. He is logical and examines the subject from various angles in an unbiased way.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The essays show Manilal's versatile genius and his mastery of Gujarati prose. Anandshanker Dhruv's (1869-1942) essays on miscellaneous subjects such as religion, philosophy, poetry, applied criticism, education and history are the finest specimens of reflective essays. He is logical and examines the subject from various angles in an unbiased way.

Balvantrai Thakore, Uttamlal Trivedi and other writers have enriched Gujarati prose in their own way. Mahatma Gandhi (1869-1948) returned to India in 1915 and started his weeklies Navjivan and Harijan bandhu, and through his articles on various subjects he revolutionised the Indian society. His essays are a model of simple, lucid, and concise prose style, devoid of artificiality and verbosity. He effectively made use of proverbs and idioms, and could thus attract the common reader. He inspired a host of essayists like Kaka Kalelkar (1888-1981), Kishorlal Mashruwala (1890-1952), Swami Anand (1887-1982), Narhari Parikh, Ramnarayan Pathak (1887-1955) and Ravishanker Maharaj (1882-1982). Kaka Kalelkar has dealt with a wide range of subjects, especially beauty of nature and art. Mashruwala was a thinker and examined in a rational way different aspects of life. Sundaram (b. 1908) is a prominent writer with a picturesque style. Ease of expression and lucidity are the striking characteristics of his prose.

Umashankar Joshi (1911-1988) was another prominent essayist of the Gandhian and post-Gandhian period. He wrote essays on various subjects in which he presented a fresh point of view in a convincing manner. His were the essays of an artist, reflecting both range and depth. K.M. Munshi (1867-1971) gave a touch of romanticism to the essay and argued the case with the zest of a lawyer. Father Wallace (b. 1925), a Spanish missionary, emerged as an important essayist in Gujarati, who wrote on day-to-day problems, touching every field of life. His writings are unbiased and he has a command of language that is rare in a non-Gujarati. Suresh Joshi (b. 1926) is another eminent prose writer of the post-Independence period.

Light essays were first written by Narsinhrao Divetia (1859-1937), which were collected in a book form in Vivartlila. He has in these essays discussed some aspects of aesthetics and philosophy also in a light and rambling style. His contemporary, Ramanbhai Nilkanth's contribution to the humorous essay is noteworthy. To bring an element of humour in his essays, he sometimes creates unrealistic situations. Yet his humour is poignant, able to create the desired effect. Ramnarayan Pathak (1887-1955) wrote light essays under the pseudonym 'Swair vihari'. He has in his essays exposed the inconsistencies of human nature as seen in the contemporary socio-political conditions. His wit and satire show that he has a fine sense of humour. Jyotindra Dave's (1901-1975) contribution to the humorous essay is also extremely rich both in quality and in quantity. Though his humour is conspicuously coarse, it is, nonetheless, intellectual. For instance, he argues for falsehood and theft, and proves that they have legitimate place in human life. His humorous essays are models of wit and refined taste. Following Jyotindra, Bakul Tripathi has to some extent tried to maintain the standard of humorous essays. Vinod Bhatt is yet another essayist who gives a humorous twist to contemporary events. Gujarati prose has, thus, in the last century and a half taken many strides.

C.M.

PROSE (Hindi). The modern age of Hindi literature may also be called the 'age of prose'. It is in this age that we see various forms of prose writing emerging and developing. Till the medieval age, poetry was the main form of literary expression. The interaction of the east and the west gave birth to new ideas and prose came to the centre of creative writing. Before the advent of the modern age the predominant language of Hindi literature was Brajboli and prose was also written in it, but with the beginning of the modern age there was a shift from Brajbhasha to Khariboli. Looking back to the beginning of prose writings in 'Adikal', we find very few prose works such as Raulvel, Ukti-vyakti-prakaran and Varna ratnakar. The earliest of them, Raulvel belongs to the 10th century AD roughly, in which prose and poetry both have been used. The earlier part, depicting the beauty of the heroine Raul, is in poetry. The rest of the work is in prose. Words and phrases have been taken from the various dialects of Hindi. Ukti-vyakti-prakaran is a book of grammar written by Damodar Sharma in the 12th century. Varna ratnakar is written in Maithili-Hindi and is considered the work of Thakur Jyoti Shekhar of the 14th century.

In the medieval age we see a definite and varied tradition of prose writings which may be classified in four categories: (1) Original writings, (2) Annotations and commentaries on various works, (3) Translations, and (4) Notes and explanations in the body of the poetic works. Among the original works, we have the literature of the Vallabha School—Vachanamrita, Varta granth, theoretical and philosophical writings, books on astrology, tales and letters, etc. Among annotations and commentaries we have the Hindi versions of Sanskrit commentaries on Sanskrit works such as Priyadasa's Sulochana-tika on Srimadbhagavat. In the same way translations and shadow translations have some neat prose. Prose notes on the poetic writings are found under such titles as 'Charcha', 'Varta', 'Tilak', 'Vachanika', etc. The works on religion, philosophy, astrology, medicine are also in prose. Thus prose was used for theoretical discussions, philosophical and religious dialogues and biographical writings.

In the Brajbhasha prose tradition, first of all we see the works of Gorakhapanthis, such as Gorakhasar, Shish-

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

ta purana, Gorakshopanishad, Mahadev Gorakh gushti. Some of them are Hindi translations of Gorkhnath's Sanskrit works or Hindi versions of Sanskrit commentaries. Besides them, we have the works of Vaishnava bhaktas. Vallabhacharya's son, Vitthalnath, wrote Shringar rasa-mandan in Brajbhasha prose which is neither refined nor lucid in its style. So is the prose of Krishna bhaktas, Chaurasi vaishnavan ki varta and Do sau bavan Vaishnavan ki varta, The first of these is regarded as the work of Gokulnath, son of Vitthalnath, written during the 17th century, and the other one seems to be written during Aurangazeb's time. The language of both these 'Vartas' has a colloquial touch, e.g. 'So Shri Nandgaon mein rahato hato. So Khandan Brahman shastra parhyo hato. So jitane prithivi par mat hain sab ko khandan karato. Aiso bako nem hato'. The other famous prose works in Brajbhasha are Dhruvadasa's Sidhdanta vichar (1595), Nabhadasa's Ashtayama (1603), Vaikunthamani Shukla's Vaishakh mahatam and Agahan mahatam (1623), and anonymous works like Vachanamrita, Singar sutuk, and Nasiketopakhyan. Works on the principles of Jainism by Banarasi Das Jain, namely Paramarthavachanika and Mithvatva nishedhan, are also significant. In addition to them we find some letters also. Among them two letters of Hitaharivansha (founder of Radhavallabha sampraday) addressed to the Diwan of Junagarh are very famous. These letters render the message of Radha-Krishna bhakti.

During the later medieval age (Ritikal) we have Vaital-pachisi (1714) by Surati Mishra and Ain-e-Akbari ki bhasha vachanika (1799) by Lala Hiralal. The latter shows conversational ease along with the influence of the Arabic and the Persian: 'Ab Sheikh Abul Fazal granth ko karata prabhunko nimaskar karike Akbar Badashah ki tarif likhane ko kasat kare hai yaki barari aur cheshta aur chimatkar kahan tak likhun.'

For the prose notes in poetic works mention may be made of Rasik-priya and Kavi-priya by Keshavdas. These notes, in fact, indicate the emergence of prose in Ritikal. However, prose did not make any appreciable development since poetry was the main mode of literary expression. What is important to note is that the prose of this period was receptive to the influence of Arabic and Persian languages which in a way led them nearer to Khariboli.

While discussing the development of Khariboli, Acharya Ramchandra Shukla rightly said that with the spread of Muslims in various parts of the country and the vogue of the Delhi court etiquette, the Khariboli of Delhi became the medium of communication among the educated classes of society. As early as in the 14th century Amir Khusrau composed some poems and riddles in Khariboli. During Aurangazeb's time shayari (poetry) began to be written in 'Rekhtan' (Khariboli blended with Persian).

It is an interesting fact of history that the traders coming from outside practised the colloquial form of Khariboli prevalent amongst the common people of Delhi and Agra. With the decline of the Mughal empire Khariboli got the opportunity of spreading beyond its locale. As business centres and wholesale markets declined in this region, the business classes shifted to Lucknow, Banaras, Patna and Murshidabad. With them Khariboli also spread far and wide. Becoming the functional language of the markets and towns it came to be used in the day-to-day life of the people. Thus it developed fast, replaced Brajbhasha and became the main language of literary expression.

The earliest form of Khariboli is seen in the ancient Apabhramsha literature. Later, the saint poets of the Nirgun school of Bhakti movement used it in their mixed dialect. During Akbar's time Gangkavi wrote Chandchhand baranan ki mahima in Khariboli prose. A few lines from it are quoted here:

> Sidhdi Shri 108 Shri Shri Patsahiji Shri Dalapati Akbarsahji āmkhas main takhat upar virajaman ho rahe. Aur āmkhas bharane lagā.

These lines show that as early as the reign of Akbar and Jahangir Khariboli had become the language of communication in different parts of the country. This is proved by the fact that we have a number of books belonging to this period written in Dakkhini Khariboli, Marwari mixed Khariboli, Marathi and Gujarati mixed Khariboli.

In 1725 Ramprasad Niranjani wrote Bhasha yog-vashishtha in Khariboli. The lucidity of expression is seen here for the first time. For example, take these lines:

> Itana sun kar Agasta muni bole ki he Brahman kewal karma mein moksha nahi hota aur na kewal jnan se moksha hota hai, moksha dono se prapta hota hai. Karma se antahakaran shudhda hota hain, moksha nehin hota, aur antahakaran ki shudhdi ke bina kewal jnan se mukti nahin hoti.

Then we have Daulatram's free translation of Harisenacharya's Padmapurana in 1761. His language does not have the elegance of Yog-vashishtha, but it retains the natural form of Khariboli used by the Jain businessmen and shows that Khariboli developed itself as the language of the common people. Acharya Shukla's statement is worth remembering that there is no validity in the argument that Khariboli developed under the inspiration of the British. By the time the British Raj came to stay, Khariboli had already come into vogue in the whole of Northern India as the language of the educated people. Later, the Sanskrit-knowing people made it more Sanskritised while the Arabic-Persian knowing Urdu scholars gave it a heavy dose of Arabic-Persian words. When the British came, they found two types of languages commonly used—Khariboli (Hindi) and Urdu. In essence both of them were branches of a single tree.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

During the Company's regime and later, it was necessary that the ruling classes knew the language of the country. They needed books in Indian languages. Fort William College was established in Calcutta in 1800. A department of Hindustani was established there and arrangements made for preparing books in Hindi and Urdu under the direction of John Gilchrist. It was at this college that Lalluji Lal wrote Prem-sagar and Sadal Mishra Nasiketopakhyan in Khariboli. A little earlier Munshi Sadasukhlal 'Niyaz' and Insha Alla Khan had already written Jnaupadesh and Rani Ketaki ki kahani respectively. Thus these four writers emerged as the makers of modern Khariboli prose.

Munshi Sadasukhlal Niyaz (1740-1824) belonged to Delhi and worked in the Company's service at Mirzapur. His book is based on Vishnupurana, and its prose is lucid and clear. For example, 'Isase jana gaya ki sanskar ka bhi praman nahin, aropita upadhi hai. Jo kriya uttam huyi to san varsh mein chandal se brahman huye aur jo kriya bhrashta huyi to vah turant hi brahman se chandal hota hai.' Munshiji's work shows the form of Khariboli used by kathavachakas, pandits and saints and has plenty of words drawn from Sanskrit. It was this form of language which was given the name of 'Bhasha' or 'Bhakha'. Munshiji himself wrote: 'Rasmo-rivaj bhakha ka duniyan se uth gaya.'

Insha Alla Khan's Udaybhan-charit or Rani Ketaki ki kahani was written about 1798. He aimed to write in pure Hindi ('theth Hindi'): 'Ek din baithe-baithe yah bat dhyan main chaddi ki koyi kahani esi kahiye ki jisame Hindavi ki chhut aur kisi bhi boli ka put na mile, tab jake mera man phul ki kali ke rup mein khile.' It is worth noting that those whose language was Urdu or Persian used to describe Sanskrit-mixed Hindi as 'Bhakha'.

Lalluji Lal (1763-1825) was a Gujarati Brahmin and belonged to Agra. His Premsagar (1803) is based on the story of Shrimadbhagavat (Canto X). His language is Brajbhasha-mixed Khari boli. For example, 'Itana kah Mahadevi Girija ko sath le Ganga tir par jay, nir main nahaya nahilaya, ati lad-pyar se lage Parvati ji ko vastrabhushan pahirane.' Lalluji Lal wrote books in Urdu and Brajbhasha also. His main Hindi-Urdu works are Singhsan-batisi, Vaital-pachisi, Shakuntala natak and Madhonal. In addition to this, he wrote Hitopadesh stories (Rajniti) in Brajbhasha prose and a commentary on Bihari-satasai, called Lalchandrika.

Sadal Mishra belonged to Bihar and was employed at Fort Willam College along with Lalluji Lall. His Nasiketopakhyan was written in Khariboli colloquial idiom.

John Gilchrist intentionally separated Urdu and Hindi and instructed that the use of Arabic and Persian words be avoided in Hindi texts and that of Sanskrit words in Urdu texts. As he wrote: 'Hindavi ko mein ne shudh Hinduon ki chij mana hai. Hindu swabhavatah Hindavi ki or jhukenge aur Musalman Arabi-Persian ke prati asakti dikhavenge.' From this remark Grierson developed the idea of Hindu prose and Muslim prose. The increasing spread of Hindi prose led William Carey to publish a Hindi translation of the Bible which had for its model the prose of Sadasukhlal and Lalluji Lal.

Christain missionaries played an important role in the spread and development of Hindi prose. Text-books were initially prepared by them. As against them, the Hindi version of the 'Bhashya' of Vedant-sutra was published by Raja Rammohun Roy. He also started a newspaper Bangadut in Hindi. Its Hindi had Bengali influence. In the mean time Jugal Kishore started the first Hindi newspaper Udant martand from Kanpur in 1826. When Raja Shiv Prasad 'Sitare Hind' came to the Education Department he realised the need for the development and spread of Hindi. He started the publication of Banaras akhabar and wrote text-books in Hindi. His Bhugol hastamalak was written in a language similar to that of Vaital-pachisi. His other books are Raja Bhoj ka sapana, Virsingh vritant, Vidyankur, Itihas timir nashak, Manav dharma sar, Gutaka, etc. But being an employee of the British Raj, Raja Saheb's sensibility was, perhaps, a little compromised.

The man who really made a significant contribution to Hindi language was Raja Lakshman Singh. In 1861 he published Praja-hitaishi from Agra and translated Kalidasa's Raghuvansha in simple and readable prose. About this time Hindi prose was given a lead by such divergent men as Fredrick Pincott and Navin Chandra Rai. Rai started a magazine, Janan-pradayani, in 1867 to propogate the principles of Brahmo Samaj. In addition, he wrote a number of books. Swami Dayanand Saraswati, the founder of Arya Samaj published his Satyartha-prakash in Hindi and stressed that Hindi was necessary for the emotional integration of the country. His efforts made Hindi quite popular in Punjab and Western India. Shradhdaram Phullauri's stories and novel Bhagyawati became very popular among the masses of Punjab. All these writers were pioneers in one way or the other, but the greatest of them was Bharatendu Harishchandra, who gave a new dimension to Hindi prose. While bringing literature closer to contemporary society, he introduced new contents suitable to the needs of time. Thus Khariboli became the medium of expression for all forms of literature in an idiom which was natural and communicative as well as lucid and elegant. Under the influence of Bharatendu a number of his contemporaries took up the cause of Hindi. Thus came into being what is called 'Bharatendu mandal' (Bharatendu school of writers) which included Pratapnarayan Mishra, Balkrishna Bhatt, Upadhyay Badrinarayan Chaudhari 'Premghan', Thakur Jagmohan Singh, etc. Various forms of prose writings were taken up. Drama, essay, short story, novel, literary criticism, biography, translations and journalism opened the way for varied prose styles. Bharatendu's inspiration gave a momentum to Hindi journalism and a number of newspapers and magazines appeared in different parts of Northern India. Bharatendu published Kavivachan-sudha and Harischandra magazine. Balkrishna Bhatt started Hindi-pradip, Pratapnarayan Mishra Brahman, Premghan Anand-Kadambini, and Radhacharan Goswami Bharatendu. In addition to these many other magazines were started. All of them played a very important role in developing Hindi and making its prose popular.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The tradition of a mature and creative prose started by Bharatendu continued after him, and with the coming of Mahavirprasad Dwivedi and his magazine Saraswati it associated itself with the national freedom movement and opened the gates of uninterrupted progress.

As editor of Saraswati, Dwivedi encouraged the writers to write in Hindi and adopt a simple and lucid style. He standardised the language, correcting laxity of usage and flaws of grammar. It is Saraswati that gave us competent authors like Acharya Ramachandra Shukla, Padumlal Punnalal Bakshi, Madhavprasad Mishra and Kashiprasad Jayaswal. Premchand too rendered valuable service to Hindi prose through his magazines, Hansa and Madhuri. Another powerful writer was Balmukund Gupta, editor of Bharat mitra, who enriched Hindi prose with his wit, humour and satire. The political satire of his essays in Shiva Shambhu ka chithha has a flavour of its own. Other writers who contributed to prose were Govindanarayan Mishra, Jagannath Prasad Chaturvedi and Chandradhar Sharma Guleri, editor of Samalochak. Guleri's style had a unique combination of profundity and innuendo. The best example of this can be seen in his essays Kachhua dharma and Maresi mohi kuthaon.

Puran Singh, Gulab Rai and Vishvambharnath Sharma 'Kaushik' are other important prose writers. But the maturity and subtlety found in Ramchandra Shukla's works is rarely seen anywhere else. His essays compiled in Chintamani, deal with human sentiments as well as theoretical criticism. The essays like 'Utsah', 'Shraddha aur bhakti', 'Krodh' belong to the first category, while Kavya main lok mangal ki sadhanavastha, Kavita kya hai, Sadharanikaran aur vyakti-vaichitryavad fall in the second category. On the one hand these essays are an example of fine, analytical and reflective prose, on the other they are a landmark in the development of Hindi criticism.

Padumlal Punnalal Bakshi belonged to the Dwivedi era but his sensibility was more akin to the Chhayavad era. His prose is serious, non-satirical and artistic. Another writer Siyaramsharan Gupta, a poet by temperament, took his readers by surpise as a master of simple and lucid prose on social themes, while Maharajkumar Raghuvir Singh brought Hindi essay close to poetic-prose in his Shesh smritiyan. Makhanlal Chaturvedi, editor of Karmavir, wrote impassioned prose. His 'Sahitya devata' is a masterpiece of ornate prose, charged with emotion and national fervour. In addition to jouralistic writings, Ramvriksha Benipuri's essays Gehun aur gulab and Vande vani vinayaki need special mention, since the sketches compiled therein set a new trend in Hindi prose. Banarasidas Chaturvedi also contributed richly to prose writing in the form of essays, sketches and memoirs.

Chhayavad poets brought new ideas and style to prose. Jaishankar Prasad's Kavya aur kala tatha anya nibandha and Sumitranandan Pant's Paryalochana and preface to Pallav added to the reflective power of Hindi prose, and Suryakant Tripathi Nirala enriched it with the originality of ideas and creativity of expression. His prose writings are published under the titles Prabandh padma, Prabandh pratima, Chabuka and Chayan. Mahadevi Varma, a poet of fine sensitivity, linked her creativity to social contexts in her prose writings. Her prefaces to Yama, Dipashikha and Adhunik kavi, together with her sketches and memoirs Atit ke chalchitra, Shrinkhala ki kariyan, Path ke sathi and Smriti ki rekhayen established her unique identity among Hindi prose writers.

The critics of the Chhayavad age—Nand Dulare Vajapeyi, Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Shantipriya Dwivedi and Nagendra—have contributed to Hindi prose in different ways, and made the language a rich medium of expression.

Vajapeyi's Adhunika sahitya, Hindi sahitya: bisavin shatabdi, Naya sahitya: naye prashna and Jaishankar Prasad gave a new ideological base to Hindi prose. Hazari prasad Dwivedi's Hindi sahitya ki bhoomika, Sur-sahitya, Kabir and Madhya kalin dharma sadhana bring depth and scholarship together with ease and spontaneity of expression to critical prose. Besides, his essays in Kutaj and Ashok ke phool etc. are examples of elegance in prose. Nagendra's prose style is the extension of Ramchandra Shukla's style, adding fine literary sensibility to scholarly depth. His essays compiled in Astha ke charan are as well-patterned in their sentence structure as in their capacity for analysis and elaboration of subject-matter.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Premchand contributed to Hindi prose through his novels, short stories and journalism. His Hansa played a significant role in the development of Hindi prose, freeing it from theoretical dogmatism and linking it to progressive thought. He became a model for many a writer, including Rahul Sankrityayan, Rangeya Raghav, Prakashchandra Gupta, Shivadansingh Chauhan, Gajanan Madhav Muktibodh and Ramvilas Sharma. Their essays, sketches, biographies, memoirs, reportage, fiction and critical writings widened and enriched varied areas of Hindi prose. Rangeya Raghav's Toofanon ke beech, and Amrit Rai's Kalam ka sipahi are significant achievements in this category. Ramvilas Sharma is yet another example who gave new creativity to Hindi prose which reflected his ideological radicalism.

The rich expressiveness of Hindi prose can be seen in Seth Govind Das's Atma nirikshan, Haribabu Upadhyay's Patrakar ki atmakatha, Viyogi Hari's Mera jiwan pravah, Banarasidas Chaturvedi's Sansamaran, Srinarain Chaturvedi's humorous essays, Kaka Saheb Kalelkar's travelogues, Sampurnanand's socio-political essays, and the articles and diaries of Ram Manohar Lohia, Acharya Narendra Dev and Jayaprakash Narayan. In the post-Independence era two great masters, Jainendra and Agyeya, took Hindi prose to new heights of reflection and creativity in their novels and essays alike. Jainendra's novels Sunita and Tyagapatra and Agyeya's Shekhar ek jiwani and Nadi ke dwip are modern classics, so are their essays—Jainendra's Samay aur hum and Samaya, samasya aur siddhanta, and Agyeya's Trishanku. In drama the poetic prose of Prasad found practical dimensions in the plays of Mohan Rakesh. His Ashadh ka ek din and Laharon ke rajhans exploit the resources of imagery, symbols and myths as a powerful means of theatrical communication. The area of fiction saw new innovations in the work of Bhagawati Charan Verma, Yashpal, Upendranath 'Ashk' and Amritlal Nagar. Besides, there are writers who utilize the narrative form for more than mere description of events and situations. Nirmal Verma's Ve din, Kavve aur kalapani, Devaraj's Ajay ki diary Prabhakar Machwe's Dwabha, Nagarjuna's Ratinath ki chachi, Shrilal Shukla's Rag darbari, Shivaprasad Singh's Alag alag vaitarani, Rahi Masoom Raza's Adhagaon, Phanishvarnath Renu's Maila anchal, Krishna Sobati's Dar se bichhuri, Manohar Shyam Joshi's Netaji kahin, Naresh Mehta's Yah path bandha tha, Dharmavir Bharati's Suraj ka satvan ghoda, Lakshmikant Varma's Khali kursi ki atma, Shailesh Matiyani's Baraf ki chattane are some of the novels which reflect the maturity and vividness of Hindi prose. In short stories Nirmal Verma's 'Parinde', Rangeya Raghav's 'Gadal', Mohan Rakesh's 'Malabe ka malik', Rajendra Yadava's 'Jahan Lakshmi kaid hai, Kamleshwar's 'Raja Nirabansia', Dharmavir Bharati's 'Gul ki banoo', Bhisham Sahni's 'Chief ki davat' made Hindi prose capable of expressing subtle feelings with the suggestiveness of images and symbols. In satirical writing Amrit Lal Nagar, Shrilal Shukla, Hari Shankar Parasai, etc. have played an important role.

In the field of essay the tradition of Hazariprasad Dwivedi has found a new pioneer in Vidya Niwas Mishra. Both of them start with the same base of Sanskrit scholarship, coupled with an understanding of the common man's life. Vidya Niwas Mishra, like Agyeya, is also well acquainted with western thought. The collections of his essays Parampara bandhan nahin hai, Lagau rang Hari, Angad ki niyati, Kaun too phulava binanhari are worth mentioning for elegance of style and genuineness of local colour, blended with depth of learning. The irony and satire put forth in a straight-forward language can be seen in Kubernath Rai's Priya nilkanth and Vishad yog, Vivek Rai's Behaya ka jangal, Vishnu Kant Shastri's Kuchha chandan ki kuchha kapoor ki, and Prabhakar Machwe's Kharagosh ke sing.

While Vijay Dev Narayan Sahi's essays provided Hindi prose unique reflective expression mingled with colloquial intimacy, Bachchan in his Kya bhooloon kya yad karoon and Need ka nirman phir and Jagadish Chandra Mathur in his Das tasveeren took Hindi prose to some untouched areas of expression. Modern sensibility and thought have thus found their expression in almost all the genres of Hindi prose—essay, play, short story, novel, criticism, biography, sketches, memoirs, reportage, interview, diary, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ramchandra Shukla, Hindi sahitya ka itihas; Krishna Shankar Shukla, Adhunik Hindi sahitya ka itihas; Ramvilas Sharma, Bharatendu yug aur Hindi bhasha ki vikas parampara.

K.P.

PROSE (Kannada). Kavirajamarga, dating back to the ninth century, mentions a literary form called 'gadyakatha' (a narrative in prose) which presumably was a type of composition mostly in prose with an occasional sprinkling of verses. Although these narratives have not come down to us, the reference in Kavirajamarga bears testimony to the fact that Kannada prose was effectively used for literary expression much earlier than the ninth century.

The only evidence of writings in Kannada prior to the ninth century is what the inscriptions offer. Many of them are exclusively in prose though a few of them are in verse also. These inscriptions are mostly commemorations of heroic battles, martyrdom of valiant warriors, or records of royal gift of land or cattle, or some such memorable act or event. They are simple, brief, factual records unadorned by any literary embellishment. Despite the influence of Sanskrit on these writings, the prose used in them almost heralds the stylistic maturity we discover in the first major prose work of the tenth century, Voddaradhane. The most outstanding of these inscriptions are the Halmidi inscription of AD 450, the Badami inscription of AD 700 and the Shravanabelagula inscription of AD 650-700. The first one is the earliest specimen of written Kannada in its ancient form, with all its grammatical and linguistic peculiarities. The Badami, Shravanabelagula, and Mavali (AD 800) inscriptions reveal not only literary features but also great strength and flexibility, thereby proving that the language had been put to increasing use.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Shivakotyacharya's Voddaradhane (AD 920) is a collection of nineteen exquisite stories told ostensibly as illustrations of certain tenets of Jainism, such as a man's spiritual realization through austere penance and self-mortification. Although the stories are meant to preach and edify, they are of enduring interest to the modern reader because of their prose style. It is written in old Kannada, which is very different from modern Kannada in vocabulary, syntax and inflections. But its natural smoothness and lucidity have enabled it to become an effective literary medium.

Trishashti lakshana mahapurana (also known as Chayundaraya purana) is the only other prose work of importance of the century. It is a religious work meant to unfold the tenets of Jainism and to recount the lives of the sixty-three Jaina saints, including the twenty-four Tirthankaras. The author Chavundaraya is a master of concise narration and he achieves both clarity and succinctness in his prose style. The merit of this work consists in its achievement of a balance between narrative and exegesis.

For nearly five centuries after the tenth, champu poetry dominated. When it decayed, other forms followed and prose had to wait for another 200 years before it could assert itself as a separate genre.

The champu tradition was languishing even as the tenth and eleventh centuries marked the stirrings of social and political upheavals. The Virashaiva reformers spoke through 'vachanas' or 'sayings', a spoken literary form. They were addressed to the simple, unlettered folk. The writers of vachanas used language so effectively that the message went home straight. The vachana was a special form of composition which combined the rhythm of prose with the imagery and emotional intensity of poetry. Its freedom from any rigid metrical scheme invested it with the directness of prose, capable of expressing a vast range of ideas. There were several vachana composers in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, among whom are included Allama, Basaveshwara, Mahadevi Akka, Siddharama, who produced several thousands of these bejewelled sayings, propagating devotion to Shiva, and love, compassion and brotherhood to all mankind.

For nearly 600 years after the eleventh century, prose made its rare appearance in non-literary works like Nijagunashivayogi's encyclopaedic Vivekachintamani in the Jaina Nompi stories and in the interesting accounts of the mahatmyas.

After the fall of the Vijayanagar Empire, the Kannada region disintegrated and there was a kind of lull at the literary front. There was a revival of prose during the seventeenth century under the patronage of the kings of Mysore. Tirumalarya's Apratimaveera charite was a work on poetics and Chikkadeva vamshavali a dissertation on the tenets of Shrivaishnava religion and an account of King Chikkadevaraja's ancestors. These writings are famous for their limpid prose style and narrative power. Chikkadevaraja's Chikkadevaraja binnapam is an important landmark in the history of Kannada prose. Although principally a religious work, the author revealed in it his sense of humour, sensitivity and geniality. These classics acted as a great influence on the development of prose.

The prose writings mentioned earlier were intended to reach a wider circle of readers and they aimed at instructing and enlightening the uninitiated. However, the appeal of these writings remained restricted in effect owing to limited audience and meagre facilities for circulation. But the efflorescence of modern Kannada prose had its roots in the nineteenth century, the period of the great transition, when extraordinary changes took place in the life of the country. With the gradual decay of the feudal form of society, prose became more popular and found acceptance with a more extensive section of society.

The Christian missionaries translated the Bible into Kannada, and also took to a thorough study of the Kannada language. Simple texts were prepared, glossaries and dictionaries were compiled, and ancient classics were edited, printed and published. They even made forays into journalism. This activity enlarged the circle of the reading public and widened their horizon. The translation of the Bible and the frequent revisions of the translations emphasized the need to recognize and adapt the change that was coming over the use of the language. Regional variations were recognized and accepted, and in the choice of vocabulary Kannada words and Sanskrit variants were preferred to Sanskrit originals. The entire process helped to develop and evolve an acceptable, standard, prose style.

The missionaries set about their task by opening

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

schools for spreading education and preparing interesting material for reading. Classics like Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress and stories from the Christian scriptures were translated. The work of pioneers like Garret Reeve and Sanderson led the way for Rev. Kittel's monumental Kannada English Dictionary. Lewis Rice and Claudius Buchanan did remarkable work in collecting historical material and thereby contributing to the diverse growth of prose. Their work in the field of journalism helped further the cause of popularising prose. Basel Mission's Mangalur samachar (1843) was the first newspaper in Kannada. Periodicals like Karnataka kavyamanjari and Kavyakalanidhi edited by M.A.Ramnuja Iyengar and S.G. Narasimhachar brought into vogue the serialisation of stories and romances. Parallel to these new trends, works written in the traditional mode also held their sway. Among such works, Kempunarayana's Mudramanjusha, Devachandra's Rajavali kathe (1840) and several prose works attributed to Mummadi Krishnaraja Wodeyar, the Mysore ruler, are prominent. Muddana Nandalika Lakshminarayanappa (1870-1901) composed Ramashvamedha in a consciously traditional prose style. But his genial humour and gentle satire revealed a temperament and sensibility which were astonishingly modern.

Prose estabilished itself as a literary medium with infinite potentialities at the beginning of the present century. M.S. Puttanna, C. Vasudevayya, Kerur Vasudevachar and Alur Venkatarao wrote with deep fervour and with a conviction that the Kannada language had enormous potential for development. History, biography, the essay, the novel and the short story assumed positive shape during this time. When in the twenties Kannada entered its heyday, modern Kannada prose was ready to forge ahead in new directions.

With the growing awareness that the new knowledge needed to be disseminated through the people's language, new demands were made on Kannada prose. R.Narasimhachar's (Kavicharite,3 volumes) continues to be the only source book on literary history. R.S. Mugali's History of Kannada Literature (1953) and the monumental works brought out by the Mysore and Bangalore Universities present an exhaustive and authentic history of Kannada literature. P.G. Halakatti's collection of vachanas and the publication of Shunyasampadane by Karnataka University have provided ample material for scholarly analysis and research. Joshi has presented unorthodox interpretations of scriptural concepts. These writings, together with Adya Rangacharya's Gitagambhirya and Gitadarpana have enriched our sense of the practical and the positive. D.V. Gundappa's (1884-1975) Jivanadharmayoga (1966) is a colossal work on the Gita.

Technological advances, increasing literacy and general education have encouraged scientific writing in Kannada. Scientific writing demands a purely referential language free from all ambiguity and stylistic opacity. A good deal of pioneering work was done by R.L. Narasimhiah in this field and his Jagattugala huttu savu (1954) contains prose of sustained clarity and elegance. Shivarama Karanth's Vijnana prapancha (4 vols, 1959-64) is an encyclopaedia of science and technology for the common reader. Some of the science journals published by Universities and Academies have served as useful medium for the propagation of scientific knowledge. Among them Vijnana Karnataka (of Mysore University), Janapriya vijnana (of Bangalore University) and Bala vijnana published by the Karnataka Vijnana Parishat deserve special mention.

There was very little art criticism in Kannada until recently. A.N. Krishna Rao wrote the monograph on the painter king, Ravi Varma. Shivaram Karanth's Bharatheeya shilpa, Karnatakadalli chitrakale, and other writings have provided eminently readable surveys of the history of Indian art. Rallapalli Ananthakrishnasharma's Ganakale (1952) and Mysore Vasudevachar's reminiscences of his contemporary musicians and composers are masterpieces of exquisite prose. Mysore University's Vishvakosha (of which twelve volumes are already published) has greatly helped to solve the problems of the standardization of technical terms and the forging of a referential language.

Prose is seen to advantage in purely literary forms like travelogue, biography and the personal essay. V.Sitaramiah's Pampa yatre (1925), one of the earliest travel accounts, Karanth's Abuvininda baramakke, V.K. Gokak's Samudradacheyinda and A.N. Moorthy Rao's Aparavayaskana America yatre are some of the most memorable travelogues in Kannada.

The finest achievement of Kannada prose is in the field of the personal essay. It has assumed infinite variety of forms in the hands of masters of prose like Karanth, Gorur Ramaswami Iyengar, V.Sitaramiah, T.N.Srikantaiah, P.T. Narasimhachar, K.V. Puttappa, and a host of others. Perhaps, the finest master of the personal essay is A.N. Moorthy Rao whose essays reveal a balance and clarity born of serene and mature reflection, and an irrepressible zest for life.

Journalism has played a significant part in popularizing Kannada prose. The great masters of prose like D.V. Gundappa, Masti Venkatesha Iyengar, T.T. Sharma, Siddavanahalli Krishna Sharma and Niranjana had something to do with journalism at some stage in their career. In recent days, the popular columns of newspapers like Prajavani, Kannada prabha, Udayavani, and periodicals like Sudha, have helped evolve a prose style at once swift, elegant and sinewy. Scholarly journals like Jayakarnataka and Prabuddhakarnataka have discovered not only new talents but helped in structuring the Kannada prose style.

A survey of prose during the past eight decades

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

reveals admirable progress. Its contact with Sanskrit, English and other Indian languages has enriched and vitalised it by gifting it new turns and forms of expression, and new modes of structure and syntax. While the old masters like D.V. Gundappa, A.R. Krishna Sastri, Masti, V. Sitaramiah, A.N. Moorthy Rao nurtured and nourished the language of prose, the new generation comprising such versatile writers as Tarasu, Inamdar, Anantamurthy and Lankesh have used prose in a variety of ways to suit their modes of writing.

H.K.R.M

PROSE (Kashmiri). It was only after the poetic tradition had been very well-established in Kashmiri that the tradition of prose writing began. The development process in all its genres is only recent, the reason being that for a long time Kashmiri was not assigned any functional role. It was always a non-native language, Sanskrit in ancient times, Persian in medieval times, and later Urdu and English were assigned all prestigious roles in Kashmir. Kashmiri was not used in education, mass media or administration in any serious sense. This retarded the development of prose in Kashmiri to a large extent. Even after 1947, when Kashmiri was recognised as one of the languages of India in Schedule VIII of the Constitution, it was denied its proper role in education and administration by the State Government, and Urdu, a non-native language, was adopted as the state language. Despite these forceful constraints, different genres of prose have developed in Kashmiri.

The earliest available prose texts in Kashmiri are in the form of translations of Biblical texts by Christian missionaries. It was around 1821 when a translation of the New Testament appeared in Kashmiri. This translation was followed by two different versions of Pentateuch in 1827, and of Joshua Kings in 1832. All these translations were made available in the Sharada script. The Bible Society published a Kashmiri version of the New Testament in the Perso-Arabic script in 1884. T. Russel Wade, a missionary grammarian, compiled a combined edition of the Old and The New Testaments in 1899. In this venture he was assisted by Yar Muhammad Khan.

As the Biblical texts demand, the Kashmiri translations used mostly the literal, culture-bound vocabulary in the religious register of Christianity. Though these translations do not represent the colloquial or free prose of Kashmiri, they were valuable for the development of a prose style using new vocabulary and expressions for a religious discourse. Compared with the original English texts, these translations are simple and can be easily undertood by common people whose mother tongue is Kashmiri. These prose texts had a limited use and hardly remained in circulation as pieces of literature.

There are also some Kashmiri texts based on Islamic traditions, e.g. Maulvi Yahya Khan's Tafsir-i-Quran and Nur-ud-Din Qazi's Misal. The Kashmiri prose in these works is loaded with Persian diction and does not represent the colloquial idiom of Kashmiri. The main contribution of these texts is to provide religious register-bound vocabulary in Kashmiri and they are useful for oral discourse on Islamic traditions.

Ishwar Kaul made use of formal prose in his Kashmiri shabdamrita (A grammar of Kashmiri written in Sanskrit) in 1879. It was edited by George Abraham Grierson and published in 1898. The text used in this treatise on Kashmiri grammar reveals the use of various linguistic forms of the language which have become obsolete or are rarely used in colloquial speech. This was the first systematic description of the Kashmiri language and the examples as well as the texts included in it are quite important.

It is believed that Pandit Mahadevji Gigoo printed the first book in Kashmiri. It was the translation of the first part of Euclid on hand-made Kashmiri paper and was published under the name of Pandit Ramju Dhar in 1876. This work is out of print now. J. Hilton Knowles' Dictionary of Kashmiri Proverbs and Sayings also preserves the witty sayings and proverbs of Kashmiri.

There was a long oral tradition of Kashmiri folk-tales of unknown authorship which had remained popular for long. Aurel Steing heard some of these tales from Hatim Tilwony, a professional story-teller of Penzil in the local Sindh valley, in 1896. These tales were of various origins and were subsequently edited by George Abraham Grierson as Hatim's Tales with a translation, linguistic analysis, vocabulary indices, etc.

All these works made a beginning in Kashmiri prose but serious attempts towards its fuller development were made only in the early thirties of the present century. In order to popularise Kashmiri, S.K. Toshakhani prepared several text-books in Kashmiri for the use of women welfare schools in Srinagar. He used the Devanagari script with diacritical marks for Kashmiri. A Kashmiri section in Perso-Arabic script with slight changes was introduced in the Pratap magazine of S.P. College by Jayalal Kaul in 1936. This encouraged the students and teachers to contribute their articles in Kashmiri. Muhammad Amin (Ibn-i-Mahjoor) brought out the first weekly journal in Kashmiri, entitled Gaash. The journal though short-lived, contained news and other regular columns in Kashmiri.

The establishment of a branch of Indian People's Theatre Association in Kashmir in 1945, the establishment of Radio Kashmir in 1949 and the publication of journal Kangposh (1949-52) in Kashmiri, and later, the establishment of Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages in 1958, and recently the Department of Kashmiri at the University of Kashmir and the publication of Kashmiri sections in college magazines and other regular journals in Kashmiri like Shiraza, Anhar, etc., have contributed a lot to the development of Kashmiri prose.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PROSE (KONKANI)

The genre of literary criticism and essays started developing in the early fifties of the present century. This genre includes literary essays, personal essays, travelogues, and studies in art, culture and language. These works have appeared in the form of independent essays and books, introductions to some creative works and independent critical studies. Among the earlier works are Mohi-ud-Din Hajini's Kashiri nasrich kitab (a book of Kashmiri prose) published in 1961 and Maqalat (Essays) published in 1967. Autar Krishna Rahbar and Ghulam Nabi Khayal have edited an anthology entitled Kashur nasr (Kashmiri prose) in 1967. Amin Kamil has written a detailed introduction to the anthology of the sufi poets, entitled Sufi shayir, in Kashmiri. Autar Krishna Rahbar has also written Kashiri adbuk tarikh (a History of Kashmiri literature, Vol. I) which presents a critical survey of early Kashmiri literature. Surveys of Kashmiri literature have been attempted in several forms by different Kashmiri writers. Ghulam Nabi Nazir has presented a critical survey of Kashmiri poetry in his book Kashir shairi (1974). Motilal 'Saqi' has written Kashir (1974) on the same theme.

Recently, after the University of Kashmir had set up a postgraduate department of Kashmiri at Srinagar, some serious attempts were made by the department to prepare and publish different works on Kashmiri prose. The journal of the department Anhar has played a key role in bringing out special issues on various forms of Kashmiri literature. The special issues of this journal on prose are Kashiri adbuk phikiri pot manzar (1980), Kashiri zaban hinz banavath (Structure of Kashmiri Language, 1985), Kashur luki adab (Kashmiri folk-literature, 1986).

Besides the above special issues of the journal, the Department of Kashmiri has published a number of works on differnet aspects of Kashmiri literature. Some of the prominent works are Tahzibuk tarikh (History of civilization, 1978) by Naji Munawar and Shafi Shauq, Kashur Shivmat (1978) by B.N. Kalla, Reshut ti saan resh (1979) by Rashid Nazki, Avhalnami Vols. I & II (1980), Nafsiyat (1980) by Abdul Ghani 'Madhosh', Kashur luki thitar (1981) by Muhammad Subhan Bhagat, Kashiri nasrich tamirkar (1982) by Mashal Sultanpuri, Rupabhavani (1983) and Kashiren batan hind rasim ti rivaj (1983) by Somnath Pandit, Kashiren Musalmanan hind rasim ti rivaj (1983) by Ghulam Muhammad Khan, Nasrich kitab (1981) by Rattanlal 'Shant' and Tasawwuf akh tariph by Ghulam Muhammad 'Shad'.

Abdul Rahman Rahi has published a collection of his critical literary essays on different aspects of Kashmiri literature under the title Kahvat (The touchstone, 1979).This is a serious attempt towards the development of the genre of literary criticism in Kashmiri. A brief history of Kashmiri elegy is presented in Shahid Badgami's Kashiri marsi hinz tarikh (1979). Ghulam Nabi Nazir has published a collection of his essays under the title Kitab (1981).

A collection of essays on scientific and technical subjects under the title Vutshiprang (1966) has been written by S. L. Sadhu. These essays are written for neo-literates and children. Shafi Shauq has also published Pharshi path arshas taam on similar themes.

Only a limited number of personal essays have been written in Kashmiri so far. Muhammad Zaman Azarda has written and published two collections of such essays under the titles Phikiri hinz takir (1980) and Essay (1984). Rasul Pompur has published a collection of essays under the title Yath aadim vanas manz (1985).

This brief survey of Kashmiri prose indicates that the pace of development of prose in Kashmiri has been very slow. There are various reasons for it. Unless Kashmiri is assigned to play some serious functional role in administration, mass media and education, the development of prose will continue to be slow.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Braj B. Kachru, Kashmiri Literature (Wiesbaden, 1981); Jayalal Kaul, Studies in Kashmiri (Srinagar, 1968); Naji Munawar and Shafi Shauq, Kashiri adbuk tarikh (History of Kashmiri literature, 1978).

O.N.K.

PROSE (Konkani). Konkani had grown full-fledged in the 11th century, though its more powerful neighbour, Kannada, reigned in its homeland. The earliest writing in Konkani prose has been found in the Kannada characters of Vijayanagar.

Whatever Konkani literature existed at the time of the Portuguese conquest of Goa (1510) perished in the holocaust. Works salvaged from it found their way into European libraries transliterated into Roman script by studious missionaries. Discovered, inter alia, in the Public Library at Braga (Portugal) are massive manuscripts on the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, by Krishnadas Sharma, in a rich, sophisticated Konkani prose, suggesting earlier stages of development.

With a printing press installed in Goa in 1556, the first books to be printed in any Indian language were in Konkani. They are, however, thought to be only a fraction of the analytical and creative endeavour of nearly two centuries. Instructed in Konkani schools set up for them and building on existing prose patterns injected with classical Latin structure and adorned with baroque imagery, zealous clerics produced rich Christian Konkani literature, evolving in the 16th century a Konkani prose rendered consummately supple and elegant in expression.

Konkani prose in its refurbished Christian garb began with catechisms. Many translations and adaptations of religious classics from Europe followed. Friar Amador de Sant'Anna turned Ribadaneyra's Flos Sanctorum into Konkani prose (1612). Thomas Stephen's Doutrina Christa (1622) is an elaborate prose version of Marcos Jorge's catechism. Diogo Ribeiro wrote in well-chiselled prose An Exposition of Christian Doctrine (1632) based on Cardinal Bellarmine's and other authors' dissertations on it. So did Francisco Joao de San Mathias who wrote on the life of Christ. Joao de Pendrosa authored a superb rendition of Bernarino de Villegas' Soliloquios Divinos as Devachim yecangra bollnnim (1660). Ignazio Arcamone's Sagglea varussache vangel (1667), the Konkani Gospels for the Whole Year is the first prose version in an Indian tongue of any portion of the Bible.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

These and other similar works aimed at disseminating knowledge of Christianity among the new converts in Goa. Understandably they centred round saints' lives, meditations and catechisms. The latter were more popular, other authors in that genre being Friars Manuel Baptista and Manuel de Lado. Other literary prose types were polemical tracts refuting 'gentile' errors, Friar Manuel de San Mathias being noteworthy among its writers. Goa-born Portuguese Franciscan Friar Gaspar de San Minguel handled all literary forms, besides treatises on grammar and philology. Apart from Gaspar, the leading original prose writers in Konkani of this period were Antonio de Saldanha, who exclled in saints's lives, meditations and pastoral discourses, his best-rated work being Miracles of St. Anthony (1655), and Miguel de Almeida with his excellent sermons for Lent and on Saints. The greatest creation of the age, however, is Almeida's Onvalleancho mollo in five volumes, Konkani's Summa Theologica, in which complex theological concepts are conveyed in vivid prose poetry. In it 'scholastic precision, opulent philosophical vocabulary and the imagery of baroque rhetoric are acclimatised in the Konkani's musical tongue.'

With the waning of religious fervour after this golden period of its literature, Konkani suffered neglect. Portuguese conversion policy making non-conformist Hindus flee southward (16th c.), followed by Christians (18th c.) owing to famines, epidemics, Maratha incursions, civil and religious orders for Konkani's suppression (1684-1857) gradually broke up its literary unity. Nevertheless, it continued to be written and published in its regional variants, mainly in Roman, Kannada and Devanagari scripts.

Under persecution and in exile Konkani prose continued to be a vehicle of expression of the disintegrated Konkani communities scattered in the regions along the west coast of India, providing solace and hope for them. In Kerala, the earliest extant text is in a highly developed Konkani notarial prose, a testimonial dated 24 April 1675 given by three Cochin Konkani physicians authenticating the Dutchman Van Rheeds' masterpiece on Indian plants prepared with their assistance. John Leyden informs of the existence of Konkani prose translations of the Bhagavadam, Linga puranas and Epics (probably contemporaneous with the braga MS) as well as original works like Virbhadra-charitra and Parashurama-charitra, Sthala puranas of temples and even histories of pirates in Konkani prose.

Leyden's findings came at a time of a great ferment in Indian prose, fomented by William Carey's programme of translations of the Bible into Indian languages. Carey finalised the Konkani prose version of the New Testament and the Pentateuch, with the help of Konkani-speaking pandits, calling it Dharmalem Pustak (c. 1805), the most monumental prose text in Konkani for its Christian speakers in Karnataka. In Goa Fr. Pascal Dias stands out as a leading writer of devotional Konkani prose, with his enduring Preparation Mental Prayer and New Meditations published later in 1856-57 which provided much-needed spiritual sustenance to the people. Among Hindus in Karnataka, besides devotional poetry, Narayana Tirtha's prose allegory Mana-indriyanlem charitra (19th c.) is an important philosophical work. The Gita has been rendered into Konkani prose by several writers including B.N. Kamati, Upendra Pai, Swami Prabhavananda. The collected Diwali addresses of Pandurangashrama (1847-1915) and Anandashrama (1902-66) to their congregations are specimens of Konkani metaphysical prose.

Later, inspired by Fr. Angelo Maffoi's grammatical and lexicographic work, Konkani Christians were drawn into a vigorous literary movement with outstanding writer, Luis Mascarenhas, launching his Konkani dirvom (1912) from Mangalore. Around it flourished eminent prose-writers like Alex Pais, P.J.D'Souza, S.S.Talmaki, F.Sylvester Menezes. Another milestone in the development of Konkani prose was the establishment of the Raknno (1938) publications by Sylvester Menezes, who himself wrote about eighty books on various themes. Raknno continues to be a forum of expression of the aspirations of the Konkanis of the region fostering books in elegant prose. Major works of religious prose have been Imitation of Christ rendered in Konkani by Fr. Polese, and the New Testament by Raymond Mascarenhas. Writers of devotional prose avidly read are Gregory Coelho, Basil Rosario, Minguel Colaco, Ligorio Vaz.

Prose in the realm of the profane also developed to a high degree spurred on by the above two leading journals, with short story, novel and drama being assiduously cultivated and largely circulated. The novelists, short-story writers and dramatists gave a sense of style and maturity to Konkani prose. Besides, there were others who could develop the potential of Konkani prose, for example J.A. Fernandes' Amcho soddvonddar (1953) is a major work in finely-wrought Konkani prose, based on the New Testament, and L.J. Sequeira wrote a dissertation on caste-system among Goan Christians (1911). Fr. Ludovico Pereira did pioneering journalistic work in Rotti (1914) and, inter alia, wrote Christacho Pattlau (1933), a Konkani prose rendering of Imitation of Christ. Fr. A.R. Mendes' prolific socio-relgious literature in Konkani prose is widely read. Fr. A. Pereira's biographies are edifying and popular as is his autobiographical novel Vadoll ani varem (1979), an important landmark in Konkani prose (Roman script), portraying the afflicted life of an idealistic Christian priest. Fr. Nicolau Pereira's adaptations Evechi nit and Konn mhaka dhortolo (1978) are well done and so is Evagrio. Fr. Antonio de Souza's book on space exploration (1979). Jorge's translations from Gorky and Sholokov are note-worthy. Younger writers include playwrights Tomaxinho Cardoso, Frs. Planton Faria and Freddy da Costa, and novelists I. Souza and Jess Fernandes. Olivinho Gomes' biography (1968) and a narrative version of Kalidasa's Shakuntala (1980) are in exquisite Konkani prose.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It was with Valaulikar that the modern Konkani literary renaissance gathered forceful momentum, especially in the domain of the critical and historical prose. He called for the socio-literary reconstruction of Konkani society (Hindus and Christians mainly) in his consummately stirring prose, appraising them of their distinct common culture ruptured by accidents of history, produced inspiring accounts of their no mean achievements and handled with mastery drama, short story, biography, history, religion, grammar and linguistics. His Konkani bhasechem zoit (1930) is a systematic exposition of Konkani's distinctiveness, Goenkaranchi Goeam-bhaili vasnnuk (1928), a well-documented history of Goan emigration (Part I), and Bhagvantalem git, a Konkani rendering of the Gita in simple and chaste prose. His magnum opus is Gomantopanishat (1933) in two volumes, a philosophical treasure-house. R.P. Vaidya wrote excellent prose in Prachi-Prabba (1905-15), V.K. Wagh continued with historical writing as did R.N. Naik, accomplished prose-writer, who translated Gandhiji's writings as well as Tolstoy's and Maugham's stories and wrote an original monograph on Shenoi Goembab (1979). Earlier, B.B. Borkar's Gita pravachana (1956) from Vinoba Bhave had demonstrated the potential of Konkani prose, reinforced with Paigambar (1978) from Khalil Gibran's The Prophet and Nagesh Sondes Brihathar Vairragyashatakam (1977).

P.P. Shirodkar's Zati vornnanchem samazshattr (1975), a sociological disquisition on caste-system, and Shripad Desai's Yaksha-prasu (1976) and Raghuvansha (1973) are explorations in new realms in Konkani prose. Ravindra Kelekar excelled in essays of a philosophical outlook in Uzuaddache sur (1973). His Velle-voileo ghulo (1971) and Sangati (1977) are crisp, thought-provoking diaries; Himalayant is a travelogue (1977) and Novi shalla (1962) an experiment in education. They all mark bold and new directions in Konkani prose. Dattaram Sukhtankar's essays in Man'ni punov (1976) crackle with wit and humour as do A.N. Mhambro's especially in Goenchi asmitai (1978).

Uniform liturgical texts as well as modern Konkani translations of the Bible have been done for all Konkani-speaking dioceses (Catholoic) of Bombay, Goa, Pune, Belgaum, Mangalore and Chikmangllur, and are in everyday use in churches and chapels of their jurisdiction.

As contacts between the various regional and religous Konkani communities grow in intensity, Konkani prose, hitherto disintegrated, converges into a homogeneous and dynamic literary medium of expression of the thoughts and feelings of the community.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.N. Mhambro, Prasada-Ful's Preface (1971); Gerson de Cunha, The Konkani Language and literature (Bombay, 1881); Jose Pereira, Konkani, a Language (Dharwar 1971); Literary Konkani (Dharwar, 1973); Leo D'Souza, Mongllurcham Konkani Bhaxent Sahit (Mangalore, 1969).

O.G.

PROSE (Maithili). The development of Maithili prose shows roughly three stages: early, medieval and modern.

The earliest specimens of Maithili prose are to be found in Kuvalaya-mala-katha and Ukti-vyakti-prakarana by Damodar Sharma, written around the twelfth century. In spite of being produced outside Mithila and under the influence of Apabhramsha and Avahattha, they contain sentences and verbal forms which may safely be called Maithila. Damodar Sharma, a protage of Raja Govindachandra of Varnasi, wrote them in Sanskrit as readers for students, and by way of examples put in a number of vernacular words, idioms and sentences which undoubtedly represent Maithili of that time.

The full-fledged literary form of Maithili prose is manifest in Varnaratnakara of Jyotirishvara Thakur (1280-1340), who was a court pandit of Harisimhadeva (1296-1324), the last Karnata ruler of Mithila. At the instance of his patron, Jyotirishvara composed the work in prose for the guidance of vernacular poets. This is the earliest prose work in Maithili. The manuscript of this book was discovered by Harprasad Shastri towards the end of the last century and was first published in 1940 by the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal, edited by Sunitikumar Chatterjee and Babua Mishra.

Divided in seven parts, the work describes a variety of things and situations in elegant as well as pedantic style. Whenever he describes anything elegant, he shows his poetic genius, adorning the prose with figures of speech, as is evident in the descriptions of the heroine, the harlot, seasons, forests, parks, lakes, etc. It is no wonder if these descriptions are compared with those of Kadambari. As against them, when he describes prosaic things he lists them without any lustre, but even here his style, at times, is sonorous with alliteration and rhyme. At places in his prose work the sentences are rhythmical and acquire the charm of verse. These qualities have made the prose of Varnaratnakar remarkable.

In the first decade of the 15th century we find Kirtilata and Kirti-pataka of Vidyapati, interspersed with prose-passages which, notwithstanding the structural influence of Avahattha, are specimens of early Maithili. Such prose passages often show resemblance to the prose of Varnaratnakara.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PROSE (MALAYALAM)

During the period from the 16th to the 19th century the development of Maithili prose was surprisingly slow. There is, perhaps, no instance of exclusive or independent use of prose. We expect prose dialogue in dramas, but in Kirtania dramas prose dialogues are in Sanskrit and Prakrit. Whatever prose in the medieval period is found, it is not for literary use but only for business transactions. It may be called 'documentary prose'. This form of prose, however, shows the lexical, grammatical and syntactical features of the language.

For a study of the literary form of prose in the medieval period, we have to go to writings outside Mithila. For a number of historical, cultural, religious and social reasons, Maithili was the medium of literary and religious expression in the adjacent regions of Bengal, Assam, Orissa and Nepal. The dramas produced in Assam and Nepal contain, besides songs, prose dialogues in Maithili.

In Assam, Sankaradeva, the great Vaishnava saint, adopted a type of drama called 'Ankiya nata' as a means of popularising his cult. He wrote six such dramas and was followed by Madhavadeva, Gopaladeva, Ramacharana Thakur, Daityari Thakur and others. Maithili is the sole medium of all these dramas, although the influence of the Assamese language cannot be denied.

In Nepal, during the period from the 16th to the 18th century, a large number of Maithili plays were produced under the patronage of the Malla rulers of Nepal. Many of them contain dialogues cast in simple Maithili prose, though some of them are elaborate prose passages of exquisite literary merit. From this point of view Hara-Gaurivivaha and Maditakuvalayashva of Jagajyotimalla are the best. Nalacharita and Ushaharana of Jagatprakashmalla, Gaurivivaha, Madhavanala and Rukminiharana of Bhupatindramalla, and Ushaharana, Mandhatrupakhyana, Kolasuravadha and Andhakasuravadha of Ranjitmalla have enough prose dialogues which present the pure form of contemporary Maithili.

The modern period of Maithili literature starts from Chanda Jha (1830-1907). He first translated Purushapariksha of Vidyapati (1350-1440) and this was the beginning of modern Maithili prose writing. The language of this translation is not as natural as that of his works in verse inasmuch as it follows the Sanskrit sentence pattern and suffers from archaism. The modern Maithili prose is first found in Jivan Jha in his drama Sundar sanyog (1904) and then in his other dramas. But it attained satisfactory refinement only with the publication of Maithila-hitasadhana (1905), Mithila Moda (1906) and Mithila Mihir (1908). In developing the Maithili prose style the names of M.M. Muralidhar Jha, Parameshvar Jha, Laldas, Janardan Jha 'Janasidan', Rasbehari Das, Taracharan Jha, etc. deserve specific mention.

R.J.

PROSE (Malayalam). It was a language called Malanattu Tamil that used to be spoken in Kerala in ancient days. Later, it developed into Malayalam, a language almost entirely different from its ancestor. There is enough evidence to show that long before this change took place there had existed certain local peculiarities in the original language.

In course of time, Malanattu Tamil, the common man's medium of oral communication, began to show the influence of Sanskrit. It is in this Sanskritised language that most of the inscriptions were written. The inscriptions are immensely useful in the study of the evolution of the language, especially its prose. Even by the beginning of AD 825, Malanattu Tamil had shown some of the symptoms in its development into Malayalam.

From the inscriptions of the tenth and eleventh centuries it is clear that there were continuing changes in the language. The sentence structure seen in the 'Muzhukkulakaccham' and later inscriptions is different from that in the earlier ones. Bhasha kautaliyam, a work of the twelfth century, shows the linguistic changes due to philological processes known as Talavyadesam, Anunasikatiprasaram, Swarasamvaranam and Purushabhedanirasam. When we proceed from Kautaliyam to 'attaprakaras' and 'kramadipikas,' both of uncertain authorship and undecided date, we find a prose style much changed from the earlier forms. This is particularly notable in respect of vocabulary. The above mentioned works being scientific treatises, the language used in them is free from flourishes. Here we can see the terse style of Malayalam prose. This is true of the contemporary inscriptions as well.

Dutavakyam, a work belonging to the fourth quarter of the fourteenth century, abounds in long sentences which are generally used in discourses. Certain art-forms like pathakam, which came into being from a desire to popularise puranas and history, also contributed to the evolution of the language at this stage. It is here that we come across the form of language known as Nampyar Tamil, which has been referred to in the well-known Lilatilakam (15th c.). Brahmandapuranam gadyam of the first half of the fourteenth century, is written in Nampyar Tamil. Except from the plentiful occurrence of Sanskrit words, its language is not much different from that of Dutavakyam. In short, one can see a complex prose style developed through discourses and a simpler and purely written style developed through books.

The special features of the language that existed in the three centuries beginning with the thirteenth are: (a) prose had little importance, the period being dominated by poetry, (b) Chakyars and Nampyars took pains to spread prose among the masses through their discourses, (c) the prose that took shape in this way shows the influence of Sanskrit in vocabulary and syntax, and (d) a concise language form had been slowly developing.

The contact with foreigners and their attempts at religious conversion have had considerable influence on Malayalam prose since those days. But the fact must not be forgotten that the kind of prose used by the missionaries was inseparably akin to the process of development that had been set in motion much earlier. There were attempts by foreign missionaries like Paulinos Padiri (1748-1806), Benjamin Bailey (1805-1871), Joseph Peter, Herman Gundert (1814-1893), and Richard Colins who wrote dictionaries and books on grammar. Several other works on language appeared during this time, which helped prose to establish itself as a medium of communication. The prose during this time acquired a dexterity, which enabled it to deal with varied subjects like India charitam of Aymanam P. John (1825-1893), Mahachcharitasamgraham of Visakham Tirunal, Pulleli Kunchu of Archdeacon Koshi (1826-1900), Minaketanacharitam of Ayilyam Tirunal (1832-1880) and Almarattam of Ummen Pilippose (1838-1880).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Nineteenth century saw a revival in the form and content of Malayalam prose. It mainly happened through the efforts of Kerala Varma Valiakoil Tampuran (1845-1915) who tried to integrate the two trends of prose-writing in Malayalam, the prose used by the Christian missionaries, and the highly ornate, Sanskritised prose that already existed. Tampuran was well-versed not only in English and Sanskrit, but also in several other Indian languages. He welcomed the influence of English, revitalised prose, and made it competent to handle all branches of knowledge. He became President of the Text Book Committee and wrote a number of books on a wide variety of subjects such as history, geography, ethis, civics and economics. His nephew, A.R. Rajaraja Varma, was the first scholar to set down the rules of Malayalam grammar. His major contribution to Malayalam prose is Sahityasahyam.

Another eminent writer who tried to promote prose-writing in Malayalam is Kandathil Varghese Mappila. He started the daily Malayala manorama from Kottayam. Even before Malayala manorama, journalism had taken root in Malayalam, with Vijnananikshepam, Keralanitram and Kerala Patrika. Journalism made prose writing more popular with the ordinary people. Varghese Mappila believed that a good prose writer is more relevant to society than an average poet. The cause of prose was espoused by some major writers of the period. Several monthlies also appeared around this time, the most prominent of them being Vidyavilasini, Vidyavinodini and Bhashaposhini.

Essay as a prose form became popular in Malayalam with writers like Kerala Varma, Rajaraja Varma, Kunhiraman Nayanar, C.P. Achyuta Menon and Appan Tampuran. Other writers who wrote informative and interesting articles are R. Eswara Pillai, K.R. Krishna Pillai, I.C. Chacko and O.M. Cherian. Essayists like Kuttippuzha Krishna Pillai, C.J. Thomas, M. Govindan and V.T. Bhattathiripad wrote essays with a social purpose, while E.V. Krishna Pillai and Sanjayan excelled in a satirical and humorous style of writing. During the modern times, the scope of the essay has become so varied that it has become an effective medium to handle any subject.

Another branch of prose that originated and developed in Malayalam is the novel. The first attempt in this direction is Kundalata by Appu Nedungadi, but the first important novel Indulekha was written by O. Chandu Menon. This novel was followed by the historical novels of C.V. Raman Pillai and Valiakoil Tampuran's Akbar. Subsequently, this form flourished and thrived under many major writers who exploited it to express their creative urges and outlook on life. Some prominent novelists in Malayalam are Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, Vaikkom Muhammed Basheer, P. Kesava Dev, S.K. Pottekkat, Uroob, Parappurathu, Kovilan, M.T. Vasudevan Nair. The short story also developed as a popular literary form. Among the major writers of short stories, mention may be made of Vengayil Kunhiraman Nayanar, Moorkoth Kumaran, Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, Kesava Dev, Ponkunnam Varkey, Karoor, Lalitambika Antharjanam, V.K.N., Malayattur, N.P. Chellappan Nair and many others.

The travelogue became a popular form after the publication of G.P. Pillai's Landanum Parisum (London and Paris). K.P. Kesava Menon's Bilathi vishesham established the form. Among the several writers of travelogue, N.V. Krishna Warrior, K.M. George, K.P.S. Menon, T.K. Krishna Menon are important, but the most significant contribution is that of S.K. Pottekkat who has given unforgettable accounts of the countries he had visited. Some of his important books are Balidweep, Malaya nadukalil and Indonesian diary.

During the contemporary period, prose covers a vast variety of fields like science, history, criticism and history of literature. Consequently the language of prose also became more flexible, to deal with the variety and diversity of the material. The process of evolution in prose is still going on in Malayalam.

T.G.R.P.

PROSE (Marathi). The history of Marathi prose dates back to the 11th century as is evident from stone inscriptions and copper plate carvings, but proper writing in prose came only in the last quarter of the 12th century with the Mahanubhava sect. The better known prose works of the sect are Lila charitra and Drishtanta patha.

By the 14th century the influence of the Mahanubava started waning and 'Varkari' or 'Bhagavata Dharma' gained popularity. Eknath (1533-99) wrote a few allegories in the Persianized language of the Muslim court.

During the Maratha rule a vast body of historical prose accounts, called 'Bakhar', came into being. Bakhar consisted of correspondence and documents and served as a chronicle. The subjects ranged from heroic descriptions of battles and family histories of rulers with elaborate sketches of persons of historical eminence. Their language was forceful and rich in metaphors, and their style was picturesque, though highly Sanskritised. Bakhar had a distinct Marathi flavour, typically associated with the form. More than two hundred bakhars were written during the 16th and 19th centuries, notable among them being Bhausahebanchi bakhar by Krishnaji Shamrao, Rakshastangadichi bakhar and Panipatchi bakhar.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In the 19th century, with the advent of printing introduced by Christian missionaries, prose writing gathered a new momentum: Dnyanodaya (1841), a periodical started by the missionaries, proved an encouraging medium for prose-writing. This served as a source of inspiration to nationalists like Tilak, Chiplunkar, Agarkar, Gokhale and others in their journalistic writings. Prose writing in the 19th and early 20th centuries consisted of thought-provoking essays, articles in nationalistic spirit and forceful editorials. Most of the prose writing, however, was didactic in spirit and academic in style. Balshastri Jambhekar, Jotiba Phule and Lokahitavadi used the essay form as a vehicle for propounding their ideas on social change.

Around 1931 N.S. Phadke brought in the personal essay in Marathi literature. He added a new dimension of literary sensitivity to the form of the essay. Iravati Karve (Paripurti), Durga Bhagwat (Pais), Kusamavati Deshpande and Vinda Karandikar gave it a poetic touch. In Durga Bhagwat's essays one sees great heights of scholarly musings. Anant Kanekar's essays mark social awareness, echoing the influence of western thinkers like Ibsen, Maupassant and even Chekhov. Shrinivas Kulkarni's Doah gives a new aspect to the essay form by presenting child psychology.

Humour found its way to Marathi prose by the end of the 19th century. Though the essays written earlier on political subjects did not lack sarcasm and ridicule, humour became more wholesome in S.K. Kolhatkar's essays. Sudamyache pohe (1938) is a collection of his essays on topics ranging from the profession of a barber to protests against reformers. C.V. Joshi enriched humour in Marathi with his books Chimanravanche charhat and Anakhi Chimanrao. He gives delightful pictures of middle class life in a colloquial language. S.M. Paranjape and A.B. Kolhatkar made an ingenuous use of irony exposing the incongruities and absurdities of contemporary society. P.K. Atre and Dattu Bandekar too seasoned their journalistic writings with broad and genial humour that reminds one of G.K. Chesterton. In the later years P.L. Deshpande, V.V. Bokil, D.M. Mirasdar and Gangadhar Gadgil added a new dimension to prose-writing. P.L. Deshpande's Batatyachi chaal, Khogirbharti, Golaberij and Vyakti ani valli offer delightful reading through parodies and pen-portraits of the typical middle-class Maharashtrian life. Gadgil's sense of humour is richly expressed in his Bandu and Amhi aaple Dhaddopant. His central character Bandu became a household name for sheer entertainment.

Marathi prose is also rich in travelogues. Maza pravas was written in 1883 by Vishnubhat Godse. P.L. Deshpande's Apurvai and Vangachitre, Gangadhar Gadgil's Gopuranchya pradeshat and Sata samudra palikade, Prabhakar Padhye's Tokonama, P.K. Atre's Kelyane deshatan and D.B. Mokashi's Athara laksha paule are important landmarks in this genre of writing.

Lilacharitra, a compilation by the disciples of Swami Chakradhar, was perhaps the first biographical account of the Swami. Later biographical writing came from such saint poets as Namdev, Changdev and Jnaneshwar. Some patriotic biographies on figures of national and historical importance came in stray articles and books. Among the earlier biographies the renowned ones are Socrates by Krishnashastri Chiplunkar, Dr. Johnson by Vishnushastri Chiplunkar, Raja Chhatrapati by B.M. Purandare and Dr. Babasaheb Ambedkar by Dhananjay Keer. Among the better known autobiographies are S.K. Kolhatkar's Atmavritta, S.M. Mate's Chitrapat, P.K. Atre's Karheche pani and Mi kasa zalo. Atre's autobiography tells the story of his life in a very interesting style, bringing out the different facets of his personality and his varied professional life. Bhavanrao Pant, a ruler of Aundh, candidly revealed some none too graceful facts about the lifestyle of rulers in his Amtacharitra (1946). Among modern Marathi autobiographies Smritichitre by Laxmibai Tilak was a landmark. This was followed by Anandibai Karve's Maze puran (1944) and Parvatibai Athavle's Mazi kahani (1928). Sangtye aaika, an autobiography of the actress Hansa Wadkar, and Snehankita by Snehaprabha Pradhan were marked by honesty of purpose. Ramnagari by Ram Nagarkar, Mala uddhvasta vhaychay by Mallika Amarshekh, and Nach ga ghuma by Madhavi Desai were also quite popular.

Marathi prose is rich in literary criticism also. R.S. Jog, K.N. Vatve, R.S. Walimbe and V.V. Mirashi have closely examined Sanskrit and western classics giving new critical insights to readers and researchers. Earlier literary cirticism was published in the form of articles in periodicals like Vividhajnan vistar and Marathi jnanaprasarak. Ganeshshastri Lele's Sahitya shastra (1872) and Daji Pradhan's Rasumadhav (1868) are pioneering books in scholarly classical criticism.

Parashurampant Tatya Godbole wrote Kekadarsha (1867) to bring great poets like Moropant close to the common man. In the early years of the 20th century two different schools of thought, namely 'Art for art's sake' and 'Art for life's sake', came to the fore. V.S. Khandekar was the supporter of the former, while N.S. Phadke of the latter. Saneguruji's translation of Tolstoy, entitled Kala mhanje kay, propagated social commitment for artists, and S.V. Ketkar's scholarly treatise Maharashtriyanche kavyaparikshan (1928) added a social dimension to literary criticism. R.S. Jog's Abhinav kavyaprakash (1930) is a commentary on the development of Marathi poetry. Narahar Kurundkar's Dhar ani kath offers a comprehensive view of the development of the Marathi novel. Tarkatirth Lakshmanshastri Joshi's Adhunik Marathi sahityachi samiksha ani rasasiddhanta is a treatise on prosody, the theory of Rasa and the appreciation of poetry. R.C. Dhere's research ranges from the cultural history to the folk literature of Maharashtra. He has edited a large number of ancient Marathi texts including Srikrishna charitra (1933) and Shivadigvijay (1975). He has written extensively on the different religious sects of Maharashtra in his books like Nathsampradayacha Itihas. (1959), Chakrapani (1977) and Shri Vitthal ek sampradaya (1984). Khadak ani pani by Gangadhar Gadgil is a compilation of his articles and literary criticism on different writers and their works. R.B. Patankar and Sharadchandra Muktibodh have also made significant contribution to aesthetics. V.L. Bhave's Maharashtra saraswat is a valuable contribution to the culture of Maharashtra. S.N. Banahatti, S.G. Tulpule and V.L. Kulkarni have enriched Marathi prose by their contribution to literary criticism. Durga Bhagwat, Sarojini Vaidya, Vijaya Rajyadhyaksha, G.M. Pawar, Shankar Vaidya, Anand Yadhav, R.C. Dhere, K.P. Kulkarni and M.D. Hatkangalekar have also contributed to Marathi scholarly criticism and research.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The recent development in Marathi prose is 'Dalit sahitya's which is mostly autobiographical. This trend has emerged as a result of the 'avarna' class writers' search for 'identity'. These writers come from a class of people subjected to social oppression and injustice for centuries. The Dalit literature comes thus as a forceful protest in such books as Balutè by Daya Pawar, Upara by Lakshman Mane, Zombi by Anand Yadav and Uchalya by Lakshman Gaikwad.

Ur.J.

PROSE (Nepali). The written form of the Nepali language can be traced back to AD 981 in the stone inscriptions of King Damupal at Dullu in western Nepal. But the first ever book in this language is a prose translation of Bhasvati, a book on astrology written originally in Sanskrit. It was translated in AD 1400 by an anonymous author. And the first travelogue was Raja Gaganiraj ko yatra written by Karabir Rawal in 1493.

Nepali prose was at first confined to the royal decrees in gold and copper-plate inscriptions, stone inscriptions and other administrative records. There were books of known and unknown authorship dealing with subjects like medicine, chemistry and divinations of little literary value.

The first ever fiction in Nepali was a translation, Mahabharat Viratparva by Shaktiballav Aryal in 1771. Next in the series of fictional writing is Bhanudatta's Hitopadesh (1776) translated from Sanskrit. If these two works of fiction mark the take off point of narrative prose, Prithvinarayan Shah's Divyopadesh (1774) marks the same with regard to persuasive prose. In fact, the language of Divyapadesh is more literary than that of the two other works mentioned before.

It may be added here that with the translations by Aryal and Bhanudatta, a long era of translated prose from Sanskrit into Nepali started. It was only occasionally interspersed with translations from languages other than Sanskrit. Such translated prose encompasses not only literary genres like fiction, drama and travelogues but also other non-literary writings. The Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Puranas were the prime sources of the translated prose. Ramaswamedh, Sundarananda Bara's Adhyatma Ramayana (c. 1833), Padam Sharma's Ramayana Lankakanda and Ramdas's Bhaktikanda Ramayana were translations from the Ramayana. Most of these were based on the Adhyatma Ramayana and not the Ramayana of Valmiki. Bhawanidatta Pandey's Viratparva, Udyogparva, Adiparva, etc. were based on the Mahabharata; and Markandeya purana, Gitagovinda, Swasthani Vratakatha, etc. were based on the Puranas. In the field of non-fictional prose, Jangabahadurko belayet yatra (c. 1853) is an important work.

Literary prose in Nepali completes its first phase with the coming of Motiram Bhatta. The prose of this phase is basically descriptive and narrative. The use of long, repetitive and conjugated sentences appear as a common feature in the writings of this period and the lavish use of adjectives and adjectival phrases gives it an elevated and emotive form.

The second phase of Nepali prose literature begins with the publication of Birsikka (1889) and Motiram Bhatta's Kavi Bhanubhakta Acharya ka jivan-charitra (1891). These also mark the dawn of the age of printing and publication. Banaras became a centre for Nepali publication which it has remained even today. This place has contributed to the development of Nepali literature in yet another way—by providing a congenial atmosphere for general education as well as literary development so utterly lacking in Nepal under the Ranas. Some of those who grew up in this atmosphere and acquired literary eminence later were Motiram Bhatta (1866-1896), Chiranjivi Sharma (1861-1934), Naradev Pandey (1871-1944) and Kulachandra Gautam (1875-1958). Of these scholars, Bhatta and Sharma have a distinction by way of introducing Arabic and Persian literary themes and modes of expressions in Nepali, while Gautam is well-known for his highly Sanskritised prose style. Besides, Bhatta established a bookstall-cum-library in Kathmandu and published the first Nepali journal, Gorkha Bharat jivan, from Banaras in 1887.

Journalistic prose in Nepali started with the publication of Gorkhey khabar kagat (1901) edited by Gangaprasad Pradhan at Darjeeling and of Gorkha-patra (1901) at Kathmandu. These were followed by a series of literary journals like Madhavi (1908), Sundari (1906) and Gorkhali (1916) at Banaras, Gorkha sansar (1926) and Tarun Gorkha (1928) at Dehradun, Gorkha mitra (1924) in Calcutta, and Chandrika (1917) and Nepali sahitya sammelan patrika (1931) at Darjeeling.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

This phase may be considered important in view of the all-round development of Nepali prose literature. Besides dramatic and persuasive prose writings, a good number of fiction books (long as well as short) were also published during this phase. It is also marked by the emergence of structural specifications of literary genres. At the end of this phase there was a note of modernity in prose literature while poetry still remained archaic, burdened with over-used figures of speech, traditional rhapsody and trite imagery. Unlike the first phase of its development, Nepali prose also acquired stylistic features from sources like Persian, Arabic and Hindi languages and literatures. The syntax was more cohesive and sentences shorter, simpler and less repetitive. However, certain features, especially the verb-forms, which were prominent in the earlier period, still persisted in the works of Motiram Bhatta, Chiranjivi Sharma and Sadasiva Sharma.

The developmental form of Nepali prose enters its third phase with the emergence of authors like Chakrapani Chalise, Pahalmansingh Swar, Suryavikram Jnawali, Parasmani Pradhan, Shambhuprasad Dhungel and Somnath Sigdel. This phase is generally known as the modern phase of Nepali literature. Modernity in this phase is found in styles as well as themes. Nepali sankshipta Ramayana (1915) and Nepali sankshipta Bharat (1918) by Chakrapani Chalise became popular mainly due to their lucid prose style. The works of Pahalmansingh Swar show an attempt to introduce some realistic motifs in drama. Suryavikram Jnawali, not withstanding his several reservations about certain rules of grammar, rendered a yeoman's service to the development of Nepali prose literature.

Parasmani Pradhan is one of the architects of modern Nepali prose. He did pioneering work in the fields of grammar, linguistic studies, lexicography and text-book writing. Somnath Sigdel is well-known for his style of condensed writing and his books on Sanskrit poetics and Nepali grammar. He falls in the tradition of the highly Sanskritized Nepali prose-style of Kulachandra Gautam. Shambhuprasad Dhungel is regarded as the first essayist in Nepali. Being primarily a poet, his prose is highly poetic and ornamental.

The period between 1908 and 1934 may be regarded as transitional. On the one hand, there were scholars trained in the tradition of Sanskrit grammar, literature and ethics, on the other, the writers of younger generation had come in contact with western thought and system of education. The works of authors like Dharanidhar, Jnawali, Mahananda and Lekhnath combine these two traditions.

With the publication of Sharada (1934) the three major genres of Nepali prose literature—essay, short fiction and literary criticism—enter the modern phase. While writers like Lakshmiprasad Devkota, Hridayachandra Singh Pradhan, Premraj Sharma, Narendramani Acharya Dixit and Silwal Pandit introduced modern styles and structure in persuasive prose, others like Guruprasad Mainali, Puskar Shamsher, Bal Krishna Sama, Bishweshwarprasad Koirala and Bhawani Bhikshu established a new tradition by introducing the modern form of short fiction.

The modern age of literary criticism in Nepali begins with the publication of an article entitled Angreji sahitya ko prabhav (1932) by Ramkrishna Sharma. Sharma was followed by others like Ratnadhvaj Joshi, Ishwar Baral, Hridayachandra Singh Pradhan and Churanath Bhattarai.

With the end of the tyrannical anarchy in Nepal and the imperialist rule in India, several new vistas opened up for an all-round development of the people and their literatures in these two countries. The people could write and publish more freely now. As a result, literary realism dominated prose-writings after 1950. Among the writers the most prominent were Poshan Pandey, Ramesh Vikal, Vijaya Malla, Indrabahadur Rai, Sanu Lama, Parijat, Matsyendra Pradhan, Shankar Lamichhaney, Mahananda Poudyal, Ramlal Adhikari, Kishore Nepal, Balkrishna Pokhrel, Dilliram Timsina, Basudev Tripathi, Churamani Bandhu, Lakhidevi Sundas, Kamala Sanskrityayan and Kamalmani Dixit. Of these again, the first seven were trend-setters in the realm of Nepali fiction, while others were essayists and literary critics. Vijaya Malla was a trend-setter in fiction as well as in drama.

Apart from the bearings of the Sanskrit language and grammar, the influence of English and Hindi on Nepali prose is also noticed. This influence of the non-Nepali languages and grammars on Nepali was not looked upon favourably by some young writers. In 1956 they launched a movement by publishing a new magazine called Naulo pailo in Banaras. The movement was named Jharroved. It was puritan in nature. The editors of that journal were Balkrishna Pokhrel and Taranath Sharma. This movement made quite a commotion in literary cricles and even some established writers began to think again about the use of language.

Two more literary movements launched in this period must be mentioned here: Pragativadi Andolan (1959) and Ayameli Andolan. The first was launched by Krishnachandra Singh Pradhan, Govindaprasad Lohani, Bhawani Ghimiray, Shyamprasad Sharma, D.P. Adhikari, Taranath Sharma, Basudev Luitel, Sarita Dhakal, Dharmaraj Thapa and Anandadev Bhatta. Ayameli Andolan (1962) started at Darjeeling and was launched by Indrabahadur Rai, Bairagi Kaila and Ishwar Ballabh. Indrabahadur Rai as a writer of the Tesro ayam (The third dimension) has also developed a unique prose style.

One of the significant developments in the modern phase is the growing interest in linguistics and language studies. This is witnessed especially in the works of Balkrishna Pokhrel, Churamani Bandhu, Ballabhmani Dahal, Subhadra Subba, Dilliram Timsina, Mahananda Sapkota, Mohanraj Sharma, Ramraj Pant and Shivaraj Sharma.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The most notable trend in the modern phase is, however, the extensive use of symbols and imagery. It is also noticed that ironical overtones and metaphorical expressions are gradually dominating the persuasive prose while the critical writings are marked by a more objective approach. The general syntax is direct and crisp. The influence of realism, surrealism, Marxism, Freud, the Absurd and existentialism is growing particularly in narrative prose. The persuasive prose is more contemplative. There is such a bewildering variety of themes today that a literary historian of the modern phase is at a loss when he tries to point out the fundamental trends in literary prose.

Ga.

PROSE (Oriya). Though verse constituted the main bulk of the old Oriya literature, the prose also made simultaneous progress. Inscriptions bear testimony to the fact that Oriya prose flourished even earlier than the fourteenth century. Scholars think that the Mahalingeshwar inscription dated AD 900 refers to the growth of Oriya prose writing like 'Ta putuli parabata tapi mahapatra'. A number of inscriptions of the Ganga and Suryabanshi kings have been discovered in different parts of Orissa. The Lingaraj temple inscription of Bhubaneswar, Jagannath temple and Markandeshwar temple inscriptions of Puri, Lakshminarayana temple inscriptions of Sinhachala, Madhukeshwar temple inscription of Mukhalingam, Stambheshwari temple inscription of Sonepur and Narasinghnath temple inscription of Sambalpur throw considerable light on the progress of Oriya prose. The inscriptions were written in Sanskrit but because of royal patronage Oriya prose is also found occasionally in them.

The Stambheswari temple inscription at Sonepur engraved by the Ganga king, Bhanu Dev, in AD 1268 runs: 'Aha je harai, jahar kapale Sibatala, Brahma tala, Bishnu tala tini tala padai tahara kapalai nibanasa hoi.' Here, 'harai' 'padai' 'hoi' are pure Oriya verbs. The Oriya prose in the bilingual inscription (Tamil and Oriya) of the Ganga King, Narasingh Dev II, of AD 1295 reads 'Taparaj mahamuni Dubabhata Acharyakai bandhakala... uttatraswora nayakanakara tanhu ghetala (ghenila). Taparaj mani Siva prapte thanapati hoile.... Durabhata acharye suni aka rasi boli maitrapakhsya hoila.' Kunjabebhari Tripathy in his work, A Study of Early Oriya Inscriptions, has proved that the Urrazam inscription (AD 1050) of Chikakol district is one of the oldest inscriptions in Oriya. Oriya prose mixed with Sanskrit is found in the copper-plate grants of the Ganga and Suryavanshi kings. The Kenduli copper-plate grant (AD 1383) of Narsingh Dev and Shankarananda Math copper-plate grant of AD 1395 corroborate this. The Oriya language enjoyed full patronage during the reign of Kapileswar Gajapati, the founder of the Suryavanshi dynasty. So, royal proclamations were engraved in Oriya in the Puri and Lingaraj temple inscriptions. Oriya prose found equal place beside the Sanskrit and Telugu languages in the Balangalani copper-plate grant of Kapilendra Deva. Other than Sanskrit the contemporary inscriptions found in North India seldom refer to the regional languages, but there is a distinct departure from the prevailing tradition in the case of the Orissa inscriptions. The eminent historian, D.C. Sarkar in his work Indian Epigraphy, says, 'Some official characters of the Gajapati kings, and many others issued by the later rulers of Orissa, are written entirely in Oriya. Private inscriptions belonging to the later medieval period are numerous.' According to Banshidhar Mohanty Oriya prose is frequently used in the Mahabharata and Chandi purana of Sarala Das who wrote between the fourteenth century and the fifteenth. Moreover, he tells us, the purani letters were written in the form of prose. In this connection mention may be made of 'Balaramanka agnya patrika' (Letter written by Balaram), 'Bhimanka agnya patrika' (Letter written by Bhima) as referred to in Sarala Mahabharata and the 'Mahishasura agnya patrika' (Letter written by Mahishasura) of the Chandi-purana. In the 'agnya patrika' of Balarama' Oriya prose reads:

> Drijodhana chhamukuk agnya srimukha. Srihasta prasada santaka. Yeha padhi duta achana suni Sambakumara tule tohara duhita Chandrabatiki gheni bahana hoi tu karijibu drasana naile naucheta dhusasana. Durjaya Durbila Jaydarath Karna Bhurisraba bahlika Bhisma Drona Shakuni se yegar akhsyauni bala gheni patoyare sabadhane thibu. Nohile tu asi mora tule samara karibu.

Though verse constitutes the main feature of Oriya literature of the sixteenth century, it has also some examples of prose like the Madalapanji (A chronicle of the Puri Jagannath temple). Some scholars hold that this chronicle started to be written as early as the eleventh century, though others think that it started much later, in the sixteenth century. The 'Deul Karnas' (Kayastha officials of the Puri temple) wrote this monumental work on hereditary basis. This chronicle is an important record of the different religious ceremonies, festivals and administration of the temple as well as of the prevailing social and political events of the country. It is unique in Indian literature as it was written over a long period of time, spanning several generations. Scholars like Artaballava Mohanty, Gopalchandra Praharaj and Suryanarayana Das hold that it started in the eleventh century. According to Artaballava Mohanty, 'The language of the Panji does not seem to be older than that of the eleventh or twelfth century. The language of the records of Jajati, it is not difficult to see, belongs to the same period. The fact is that the language underwent changes at the hands of the scribes of a later date when they transcribed the same from the old and moth-eaten panjis. From the twelfth century onwards the development of the language is traceable.' Gopalchandra Praharaj, supporting this view, says 'The Madalapanji, the annals of the great temple at Puri, was begun to be preserved in the temple since the eleventh century by King Cholaganga Deva.' Suryanarayan Das also corroborated this view in his history of Oriya literature. But the eminent scholar, Ramprasad Chandra, disagrees and holds that the chronicles began to be compiled only in the sixteenth century. He says, 'The annals were probably compiled for the first time in the beginning of the reign of Ramchandra Deva and we have, therefore, accurate accounts of the events that happened before.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Subsequently this view came to be favoured by scholars like H.K. Mahatab, Krishnachandra Panigrahi, Parmananda Acharya and many others.

Another significant prose work of the sixteenth century Oriya literature is Rudrasudhanidhi. It is a 'gadya kabya' (poetic prose). It has a rich vocabulary and elegant diction. According to Mayadhar Mansingh, 'Rudrasudhanidhi would be treated with respect as a prose masterpiece in any language.'

Chacherilita, discovered and edited by Ashutosh Patnaik, is another excellent prose work coming down from the sixteenth century. The Brahmagita of Balaram Das and Tulavina of Jagannath Das also contain specimens of prose. These works are a blend of prose and verse. The Somanath bratakatha of the seventeenth century is also another brilliant piece of prose work. Batris sinhasana of Siva Das, Chatura vinoda of Brajanath Badajena and some prose commentaries on ancient Oriya kavya and the prose translation of Gitagovinda also paved the way for Oriya prose.

Several 'bratas' or rites have prevailed in Orissa since the times of the Gangas. A specific style of prose evolved centring these bratas. Among these mention may be made of Somanath brata, Sudarsa brata, Khudurukani brata and Khulana sundari brata. The (kathas as they are called) are written in prose, but recited as if they were in verse.

But in a stricter sense prose-writing developed only after 1803 with the British occupation of Orissa. Christian missionaries like William Carey, Amos Sutton and Bomphil translated the Bible into Oriya prose and wrote many other religious tracts. They published a journal called Jnanaruna. In order to impart education to the masses the missionaries with the help of some writers published many text-books in Oriya prose. For five decades or more in the nineteenth century Oriya prose appeared to be influenced by Bengali and English. The starting of a printing press in Orissa and the publication of many periodicals and journals in the later half of the nineteenth century created a congenial atmosphere for the development of Oriya prose. Utkal dipika (1866), Balasore sambad bahika (1868), Utkal darpana (1873), Utkal putra (1874), Bideshi (1874), Utkal madhupa (1878), Naba sambada (1887), Odia o nabasambad (1888), Utkal prabha (1891), Bijuli (1893), Indradhanu (1893), Utkal sahitya (1897), Alochana (1900) etc. laid the foundation of Oriya prose in the nineteenth century. Novels, travelogues, dramas, essays and short stories came to be written towards the last two decades of the nineteenth century.

The first seven decades of the nineteenth century were an era of text-books. The Oriya prose of the period was still in the making, and failed to achieve perfection, because it sought to imitate Bengali and English. However, during the last three decades of the nineteenth century, Ramasankar, Gourisankar, Nilmoni Vidyaratna, Pyarimohan Acharya, Fakirmohan Senapati, Vishwanath Kar, Madhusudan Rao and Radhanath Ray enriched the Oriya prose literature.

Oriya prose literature was enriched considerably during the first half of the twentieth century. The scope of the prose writings was enlarged and writers enriched it with elevated thoughts and ideas. The monthly journals like Utkal sahitya, Mukur, Satyabadi, Jugabina, Sahakara, Nababharata and Arati of this period stimulated the progress of prose. The prose writings of the last two decades of the nineteenth century reveal the impact of Sanskrit, though there were writers like Fakirmohan Senapati who wrote novels and short stories in the colloquial language.

Simplicity of expression, lucidity and refinement became the main features of prose at the beginning of the twentieth century. The Satyabadi School of writers set the standard. Gopabandhu Das, Nilakantha Das, Godavaris Mishra, Kripasindhu Mishra, Basudeb Mohapatra etc. of the Satyabadi School contributed to the richness of Oriya prose. Simultaneously, writers of Utkal sahitya and Mukura like Gopalballava Das, Nandakishore Bala, Gopalchandra Praharaj, Bankanidhi Patnaik, Gangadhar Meher, Chandrasekhar Nanda, Dayanidhi Mishra, Bhikaricharan Patnaik, Shyamasundar Rajguru, Jalandhar Dev, Gopinath Nanda, Mrityunjay Rath and Sashibhushan Ray, who wrote essays, novels, stories, dramas, criticism and travelogues of considerable merit, enriched prose. Oriya prose began to make great progress from the third decade of the twentieth century because of the Sabuja and Nabajuga Movements. Prose during the following two decades became more reflective and analytical, refined and elegant. Chintamoni Mohanty, Upendrakishore Mohanty, Upendrakishore Das, Baishnabacharan Das, Brajabihari Mohanty, Girijasankar Ray, Govindachandra Tripathy, Bipinbihari Ray, Mohinimohan Senapathi, Padmacharan Patnaik, Kulamoni Das, Ratnakar Pati, Artaballava Mohanty, Binayaka Mishra, Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Sachchidananda Rautray, Lakshmikanta Mohapatra, Sarala Devi, Nityananda Mohapatra, Kaliprasanna Kavi, Kalia Panigrahi, Chintamoni Mishra, Kahnucharan Mohanty, Harekrishna Mahatab, Kamalakanta Das, Anantaprasad Panda, Lakshmidhar Nayak, Chandramoni Das, Ashwinikumar Ghosh,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kalicharan Patnaik, Advaitacharan Mohanty, Kartikkumar Ghosh and many others made this possible.

The most famous among our contemporary essayists and critics who have left their distinctive mark on Oriya prose are Chittaranjan Das, Surendra Mohanty, Chandrasekhar Rath, Gourikumar Brahma, Natabar Samantaray, Krishnachandra Panigrahi, Kedarnath Mohapatra, Nabinkumar Sahu, Bhubaneswar Behera, Sriramchandra Das, Baidyanath Mishra, Pathani Patnaik, Deviprasanna Patnaik, Narendra Mishra, Srinibas Mishra, Banshidhar Mohanty, Gopalchandra Mishra, Khageswar Mohapatra, Nilamoni Mishra, Chintamoni Behera, Hemantakumar Das, Birakishore Das, Debendra Mohanty, Dasarathi Das, Kunjabehari Das, Brindabanchandra Acharya, Suryanarayan Das, Ratnakar Chaini, Baishnabacharan Samal, Krishnacharan Behera, Sachchidananda Mishra and Gangadhar Bala.

The renowned travelogue writers include Mayadhar Mansingh, Umesh Panigrahi, Sriharsha Mishra, Monoja Das, Surendra Mohanty, Kunjabehari Das, Sradhakar Supakar, Bhubaneswar Behera, Satrughna Nath, Krishnaprasad Mishra, Golakbihari Dhall, Govinda Das, Akhilamohan Patnaik, etc.

Among the writers of autobiography are Nilakantha Das, Godavarish Mishra, Harekrishna Mahatab, Lakshminarayan Sahu, Vaishnaba Pani, Ramakrishna Nanda, Pabitramohan Pradhan, Udayanath Rath, Kunjabehari Das, Kalicharan Patnaik, Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Govindachandra Mishra, etc.

Oriya prose assumed its present form because of the efforts of the above writers, besides many others. However, Oriya prose is still on the path of progress and development.

P.P.

PROSE (Pali) is a literary medium distinguished from poetry and bears a more intimate correspondence to the patterns of everyday speech. The Pali prose consists of Tipitaka, Sutta-nipata, inscriptions, commentaries, Milindapanha, Atthakathas, Jatakas, etc. Pali literature is famous for its own classification and the words of the Buddha classified in nine 'Angas', such as Sutta, Geyya, Veyyakarana, Gatha, Udana, Itibuttaka, Jataka, Abhutadhamma and Vedalla. The sutras are mainly in prose. Suttapitaka comprises the original sermons of the Buddha. It is regarded as the most authentic source of Dhamma. It is divided into five Nikayas: Digha-nikaya, Majjhima-nikaya, Samyutta-nikaya, Anguttara-nikaya and Khuddaka-nikaya. The commentaries on the texts of the Vinaya, Sutta and Abhidhammapitakas were followed by more commentaries chronologically discriminated as mula (original) and anu (subsequent). As Bhikshu Siddhartha puts it, there is no doubt that "The Buddha preached his doctrine in the standard vernacular of the Magadha country, and his disciples studied and taught it in that very language." It is, therefore, estimated that Pali prose came into existence in about 500 BC. It is remarkable that Pali prose took the place of Prakrit prose.

The oldest and the most important part of Palitipitaka is Suttapitaka. Chief disciples of the Buddha were reciters of Dhamma and Vinaya who formed the chorus. There are varied and vivid descriptions in the suttas. Their style is marked by the use of compilation technique, interspersing of mythical and historical facts, dramatic action, repetition, dialogue and abundance of similes.

The remarkable period of non-canonical Pali literature is characterised by commentaries which were compiled on the Tipitaka and which were based on the Singhalese Atthakatha. Buddhaghosha is the highest personality in commentary literature. He wrote extensive commentaries on almost all the books of the Tipitaka except a few books of the Khuddaka-nikaya. His chief contribution is Visuddhiamagga (the path of purification) written in the style of Abhidhamma. The commentaries and sub-commentaries on the Vinayapitaka would make a long list, indeed. Monks, both in India and in Sri Lanka attempted these commentaries. The Vinayapitaka is a seminal work that contains elaborate rules concerning the duties and obligations of a disciple towards his teacher and vice versa. The fifth nikaya of the Suttapitaka, the Khuddaka-nikaya, comprises fifteen books, out of which the Suttanipata is the fifth one. It teaches a householder to keep away from fourteen evils and to give his or her best services to parents, teachers, wife, children, friends and Shramana-brahmanas. Suttanipata itself is a good example of Pali prose.

The Pali inscriptions are ascribed to the period between 300 BC and AD 1500 and about three hundred inscriptions written in the Pali language are available. The upper limit of these inscriptions may be decided by Ashokan inscriptions and the lower limit by the famous Kalyani inscriptions of Burmese king Dhamma-cheti (AD 1476). The inscriptions were mainly inscribed by king Ashoka, Kanishka and some Burmese kings. These inscriptions are mostly engraved on pillars and cave-walls.

Actually the Milinda panha in its original form has been lost and the present work is merely a Pali translation of the original made at a very early date in Sri Lanka. At present it comprises seven books; but it originally consisted of only a small portion of the first, and the whole of the second and third books. The author of the text quotes a large number of passages from the Pitaka texts, which he introduces by formulas. Milinda-panha follows the style of the suttas. It contains a conversation between the Indo-Greek king Menander and Thera Nagasena discussing a number of problems and disputed points in Buddhism. The probable date of its composition is first century AD. It is the most famous work in the non-canonical Pali literature. Excerpts from the work have been quoted by Buddhaghosha, like Tipitaka, in his Atthakathas. The subject-matter of Milinda-panha is divided into seven chapters. The descriptions are literary and the style is vivid and lucid. Though the dialogue is philosophical, it is distinct and clear.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Atthakathas in their original form have been lost. At present, these are available in old Singhalese. Acharya Buddhaghosha went to Sri Lanka for translating these Atthakathas from old Singhalese into Pali. The Atthakatha literature was enriched by not only Buddhaghosha, but also Buddhaddatta and Dhammapala in the fourth-fifth century AD. Buddhaghosha in his different Atthakatha quoted many old Singhalese Atthakathas and some of them are (i) Maha-Atthakathas; (ii) Maha-pachchari; (iii) Kurundi; (iv) Andhatthakatha; (v) Sankhepa-Atthakathas; (vi) Agmatthakatha and (vii) Achariyanam Samanatthakatha.

It is also interesting to note that the Jatakas are full of stories of kings, robbers, ministers, arms, wars, women, spirits, sea-faring adventurers. Actually all this story-telling business is called 'frivolous talk'. The Jatakas contain fables, most of which are like other Indian fables whose main aim is to teach 'niti' or worldly wisdom. It is a fact that the Jataka stories give us a picture of earlier narrative literature and the conditions of civilization during the first century AD. Directly or indirectly the Jatakas have also enriched the literature of many other peoples and have, therefore, been of immense importance to world literature.

D.S.

PROSE (Prakrit). The Prakrit prose consists of certain specific sutras, inscriptions, devotional literature, tales and legends, commentaries, champu kavyas (mixture of prose and poetry) and Sattaka plays. Undoubtedly, the sutras were embodied in the form of prose from the very beginning. The lines of 'Navakara mantra' - 'Namo arihantanam, namo siddhanam' etc. - definitely belong to the Prakrit prose of the sixth century BC. Not only this 'mantra', but several Bhatties (Bhaktis) and Samaiyapathas (Samayika pathas) were also in vogue since ancient times. The oldest form of prose represents the first Srutaskandha of Ayarangasutta composed about 500 BC. Most of the Svetambara canonical texts were composed invariably in both prose and verse. The oldest inscriptions of India are found in Prakrit. Prakrit inscriptions are ascribed to the period between 400 BC and AD 400, and they are mostly inscribed by Ashoka, Kharavela and Satvahanas.

Most of the commentaries in Prakrit are on the Jaina canonical literature and are classified mainly under Niryukti, Bhashya, Churni and Tika. The commentaries are generally in prose. The period of these commentaries ranges from the second century AD to the sixteenth century AD.

Prakrit literature consists of, besides the commentaries, an extremely valuable narrative literature including stories of every kind—romances, novels, parables, beast fables, legends, fairy tales, and funny stories of every description. We find the art of presentation fully developed in these works.

The prose form in Prakrit is original and does not bear resemblance to Sanskrit prose, though there are many writings, like prose-kavya, remarkable in both idea and style which compare well with those in Sanskrit literature.

The Prakrit prose is variegated and displays a variety of form, diction and imagery. At places, the writer shows great artistic skill in his treatment of sound and meaning. There is a perfect synthesis of sound and meaning, the pictorial and the musical, which leaves a lasting impression on the mind as does poetry. One may, therefore, claim that the Prakrit prose has all the qualities of poetry.

The Prakrit prose is also found in dialogue:

Goyama savanaphala
Se nam bhante savana kim phale?
Nanaphale.
Se nam bhante nane kim phale?
Vinnanaphale.

Like the inscriptions, the canonical sutras are written in such a forceful language that they have become extremely concise:

Tena vi sorattha-visayagirinayarapattanachandaguhathiyena atthangamaha-nimittaparayena ganthavochchhedo hohaditti j jadabhayena-pavayanavachchhalena dakkhinavahairiyanam mahimae miliyanam leho pesido. (Commentary on Satakhandagama)

Actually the sutra-style has been so well employed in 'Satkhandagama' and 'Kasayapahuda Sutta' that the words have the effect of mantras or formulas.

It is estimated that there are more than two thousand inscriptions in the Prakrit language. The earliest inscriptions of Kharavela and Ashoka belong to the third century BC. Their language is Prakrit, which was the administrative language of the Mauryas. Inscriptions at Sannati, Banavasi and Malavalli belonging to the second and third centuries AD are also in Prakrit.

The main quality of Prakrit prose inheres in the variety of diction. We find different styles and different tones everywhere. They show a high degree of versatility in the composition of narrative passages. The various styles of classical Sanskrit which had gone out of currency were reshaped by the prose-writers of Prakrit. Sanghadasgani, Uddyotanasuri, Haribhadrasuri, Shilankacharya, Nemichandrasuri, Gunachandragani, Jaisinghasuri and Mahendrasuri were indeed, prolific writers of genius.

D.S.

PROSE (Punjabi). The actual year of the origin of Punjabi prose cannot be traced in the absence of a full record of manuscripts. Akadsi mahatam, considered by some scholars to be the first prose work in Punjabi, is said to have been written in the 13th century. The first complete prose work in Punjabi is decidedly Puratan janamsakhi, written in the first half of the 17th century. According to Bhai Vir Singh, the year of its composition is 1635.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Janamsakhis owe their origin as a prose form to the Persian genre 'Malfouz' (Life and miracles of sufi saints) and 'Akwalas' (Collection of the works of the saints). The janamsakhis (biographies) are woven around the life and deeds of Guru Nanak Dev, the first Sikh guru. The notable janamsakhis are Meherban wali janamsakhi, Bhai Bale wali janamsakhi and Bhai Mani Singh wali janamsakhi. Janamsakhis are the most important prose compositions containing descriptions, narratives, and real or imaginary conversations of Guru Nanak and other Gurus with famous Hindu and Muslim spiritual personalities. These are thus the literary precursors of the modern novel and short story.

'Goshti' is the other prose form of that time. Goshtis are spiritual discourses or dialogues between the saints and their disciples or opponents. Some of the goshtis are Makke di goshti, and goshtis with Ajitta Randhawa, Guru Nanak Dev, Budda, Baba Lal and the holy Quran. Guru Nanak is invariably on one side in these goshtis. The formative influence on goshtis and janamsakhis is that of the Jatakas, the Sanskrit Vaishnavite texts, the Quran and the Persian ethical works.

Sikhan di bhagatmal, which is associated with the name of Bhai Mani Singh, is a combination of goshti and sakhi.

'Paramarth' or commentary on the Guru Vani is yet another prose form along with 'Parchi' (introduction). Parchi Bhai Ghaniyaji and Parchi patshahi daswin (Sewa Das) were composed somewhat later than the sakhis. While parchi was meant to present the philosophy of its hero as against life-events in the sakhi, the paramarth aimed at introducing the meaning of the Vani.

The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries are considered the golden period in the history of Punjabi 'Vartik' (prose). During this period, many important Hindu religious texts, legends, myths, etc. were translated into Punjabi. The translation of the Bhagwat Gita into Punjabi was successfully attempted by Nihal Chand, Kishan Das and Noor Hussain. Gulab Das rendered Gita sar into Punjabi. The other works which were translated during the eighteenth century were: Teeka Vedant, Gita mahatam, Vivek sar, Bhogal puran, Adi Ramayan, Vishnupuran (all from Sanskrit), Vivek Sindhu (from Prakrit), Paras Bhag and Masnavi Bhakha (from Persian),

'Nasihatnama', 'Sukhan', 'Bachan', 'Rahitnama', 'Hukamnama', 'Masla' and 'Uthanika' were other prose forms prevalent at that time. All these works are heavily loaded with words and expressions from Sanskrit, Hindwi, Braj bhasha and Persian. These writings have not come to us in their pure form because of their being interpolated by subsequent authors. However, these writings represent the composite culture of Punjab.

In the nineteenth century the social concerns gained prominence over the religious themes. Literature became an institution of social reform. The Arya Samaj, the Singh Sabha and the Dev Samaj movements played an important role in the development of Punjabi prose.

The effect of these was cross-cultural and reformist but later factional considerations also surfaced. This resulted in the mixed character of the prose writings of the second half of the 19th century.

During Maharaja Ranjit Singh's rule, Punjabi prose borrowed freely from Persian, which was the official language. Subjects of Muslim and Hindu culture, history and mythology dominated the prose. The publication of the first Punjabi grammar and dictionary and the translation of the Bible and other scriptures paved the way for standardization of Punjabi diction.

While the mainstay of prose in the first half of the nineteenth century was spirituality, the second half showed a tendency towards historical accounts and social themes. These were the first steps towards modern literary prose.

The setting up of printing presses with Gurmukhi typeface at Ludhiana and Lahore helped the launching of many newspapers. Akhbar Sri Darbar Sahib was started in 1867. It was soon followed by Gurmat prakash. The others were Khalsa akhbar (1886), Singh Sabha Gazette (1890) and Khalsa samachar (1899).

Another notable feature was the practice of change from one script to another. Attar Singh transcribed Kundalinan, Jagat vinod, Naunihal gulbadan in Gurmukhi in 1847. Giani Ditt Singh (1853-1901) was the founder of the Singh Sabha movement. He wrote Niti parkash, Durga parbandh, Gurmat arti parkash and Gugga gapaur, etc. His works usually had restrained humour also. Pandit Tara Singh Narottam authored Guru bansawali and Gurmat mirne sagar. Then there was Pandit Sharda Ram Phillauri (1837-1881), one of the founders of the modern Punjabi prose. He freed Punjabi from the influence of Braj bhasha and was the author of Punjabi baat cheet and Sikh raj di vithia. He is also famous for his 'Arti', now used all over India ('Jai Jagdish Hare'). Biharilal Puri (1830-1885) was another architect of Punjabi prose. Some of his books are Vidya ratnakar, Chitravali, Anek darshan, Pingal manjri and Punjabi vyakaran. Charan Singh (1853-1908) wrote Shabad birti parkash. Bani biora, and Jang maroli. He translated Shakuntala into Punjabi. Baba Ram Singh, the founder of Kuka Movement which played a significant role in the freedom struggle, was also a prolific prose writer. His work Hukamname is an exquisite piece of prose writing.

This period is also marked by a renewed interest in history and mythology. Tarikh Guru Khalsa by Giani Gian Singh (1822-1925), Tarikh Sidhu Bararan by Attar Singh (d. 1899) and Gurshabad ratnakar mahakosh by

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bhai Kahan Singh Nabha were written during this priod.

In the modern period. Bhai Vir Singh (1872-1957) gave a literary shape to Punjabi prose. His celebrated works include Guru Nanak chamatkar and Kalgidhar chamatkar. Mohan Singh Vaid (1881-1936) also contributed richly to prose through his works. Atam suddhar and Atam tyag. Puratan biraan bare is another scholarly work by Bhai Jodh Singh.

Puran Singh (1881-1931) was essentially a poet, but he also wrote prose. He translated the works of Carlyle and Emerson. His Khulley lekh proved to be a trendsetter. He influenced a whole generation of writers. His prose is uninhibited and open-ended, and with him the Punjabi prose came of age.

Gurbax Singh 'Preetlari' (1985-1978), founder of the monthly, Preetlari, gave a new dimension to prose. He coined new words after English usage and introduced English literary works through translations in his magazine. A progressive writer, he encouraged social realism in literature. Sawin padhri zindgi, Parasan lammi umar and Merian abhul yadaan are some of his widely read books. Teja Singh's (1844-58) Arsee (autobiography) is another rewarding work of prose.

Balbir Singh (Sudh sarup), Kapur Singh (Sapt shring), Mohan Singh Diwana (Devinder batisi), Gopal Singh (Sahit di parkh), Piara Singh Padam (Hindustani kala) Gurbachan Singh Talib (Adhunik Punjabi vartik and Unpachhatey Krah), Giani Gurdit Singh (Mera pind), etc, are some of the important writers of the past few decades. Punjabi prose, indeed, developed in various branches like biography, travelogue, autobiography, humour, criticism and journalism.

Apart from Sant Singh Sekhon, the literary critics, who have made their mark, are Harbhajan Singh, Attar Singh, Kesar Singh Keasar, Sutinder Singh Noor, Mohanjeet, Joginder Singh Rahi, Jagbir Singh, Atamjeet Singh, Raghbir Singh Sirjana, Ravinder Singh Ravi, Gurbachan Singh, Manjit Singh, Tejwant Gill, Surjeet Hans and others.

Charan Singh Shaheed, the creator of humorous character, 'Baba Variama', was the pioneer of satire and humour in Punjabi literature, Harinder Singh Roop (Chunjan paunche), Suba Singh (Modern Heer), Giani Gurdit Singh (Mera pind), Piara Singh Data (April Fool), Gurnam Singh Tir (Mainu maiton bachao), Anant Singh Kabuli, etc, are other well-known figures in this field. K.L. Garg, Bhushan, Gurdev Chauhan, Bipin Goel are some other fresh voices in this genre.

Punjabi has a very rich tradition of biographical writing, but autobiography is quite a late development in Punjabi prose. Arsee (Teja Singh), Adhi mitti adha sona (Wanjara Bedi), Kis pai kholon ganthri (Kartar Singh Duggal), Meri filmi atamkatha (Balraj Sahni), Nangi dhup (Balwant Gargi), Raseedi ticket (Amrita Pritam), Khanabadosh (Ajit Cour), Nange pairan da safar (Dalip Kaur Tiwana), Maleh jharian (Ram Sarup Ankhi) are some of the significant autobiographical works.

Rehka chitter (Pen portraits) is yet another new prose form popularised by newspapers and magazines. Balwant Gargi is the most prolific writer in this genre. Surme wali akh, Nim de patte, Kaudian wala sapp are the most hilarious pen portraits that have appeared in Punjabi prose. Kalam di akh (Karanjit Singh), Shanakthi prade (Bhagwant Singh), and Badlan de rang (Kulbir Singh Kang) are other notable creations. Gagan Pakistani, Harbhajan Singh, Kulbir Singh Kang and Bhushan Dhianpuri are practitioners of 'lalit nibandh' (creative essay). Punjabi journalism has also made rapid strides. Ajeet, Punjabi Tribune and Nawan zamana are the daily newspapers which have contributed a lot to this genre. Magazines like Arsee, Nagmani, Lo, Lakir, Kaumi ekta, Sirjana, Akas have also enriched the literary taste of the readers.

Safarnama sahitya (Travelogue) is a fast growing new prose form. Lal Singh was the first writer to write a travelogue in Punjabi. His Mera vilayati safarnama is a trend-setter. S.S. Amol, Ram Singh, Piara Singh Data, M.S. Randhawa, Sohan Singh Josh, Balwant Gargi, Balraj Sahni, Harbhajan Halwarvi and Harbhajan Singh have contributed richly to this important literary genre.

From Sakhi to Safarnama, the Punjabi prose has, indeed, traversed a long distance.

G.C.

PROSE (Rajasthani). The earliest known prose works date back to the second half of the thirteenth and the first half of the fourteenth centuries. These are minor writings on the rituals of the Jain religion. They are: Aradhana (1273), Bal shiksha (1279), Atichar (1283), Navakar vyakhyan (1301), Sarva tirth-namaskar stavan (1302) and Atichar (1312). There is, however, no mention of the authors. Out of the above six, Navakar vyakhyan is in the form of a commentary on the original Prakrit in the 'Tika' style of the Sanskrit scholars. Another such work is Tattva vichar prakaran (about 1363) which contains explanatory notes on some of the principles of Jainism. The elementary form of prose, as found in such works, testifies to the fact that the Rajasthani language was in the process of formation since the eighth century.

The development of Rajasthani prose, since the earliest period, may be treated in four stages: (a) the elementary stage (13th-14th c.), (b) the developmental stage (15th-16th c.), (c) the developed stage (17th-19th c.) and (d) the modern stage (20th century). During the first three periods we find mostly religious, historical or documentary writings, and the Jains have largely contributed to them. As a matter of fact, the credit for preserving the early specimens of Rajasthani prose goes to the Jain scholars and their religious institutions. Some scholars believe that the Jains leaned heavily towards

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Gujarati in their prose style, but one has to bear in mind that Gujarati and Rajasthani came of the same joint family and the difference between the two was not sharply accentuated in the past.

Speaking of the kinds of Jain religious prose writings, we have agam, ang, upang, sutra, stotra, charitra, and philosophic treatises. There are other Jain writings also, besides the above, which describe rituals, religious ceremonies and festivals, etc. The Hindus too had their scriptures retold, but the vast multitude of this religious literature was written in the late 18th and 19th centuries.

The historical prose includes Pattavali (description of head priests), Utpatti granth (origin of various sects), Vansavali (pedigrees), Khyat (histories of clans and kingdoms), Vat (stories), Vigata (details of particular events or places, etc.), Ilakabanama (collection of correspondence), and Parvana (government orders). All of them are historical, more or less, in form and substance.

The literary or artistic prose consists of Vat (stories), Duva vait (rhymed prose in Urdu structure), and Vachanika (rhymed and unrhymed prose). A tradition of 'varnaks' also existed which contained specimens of various descriptions, such as famines, seasons, feasts, palaces, wars, courts, huntings, cities, markets, dresses and scores of other subjects.

The scientific prose comprised some original writings, but mostly translations and commentaries on subjects like Ayurveda (medicine), Jyotish (astrology), Shakun (omens), Samudrik (palmistry), Tantra-yantra-mantra (occult sciences), Shalihotra (study of horses and elephants), etc.

Coming to the development of various kinds of prose and the authors themselves, we have first Sangram Singh who composed Bal shiksha (1279) with a view to teaching Sanskrit grammar to the beginners. Later, during the developmental stage, mention may be made of Tarunprabhasuri, who composed Sadavasyak balavbodh (1354) which is a commentary on some didactic text. Somsundar (1399-1443), Merusundar (1468-1578) and Parsvachandra (1480-1555) were other prominent writers, besides dozens of others, who also wrote commentaries. As the style was mainly used to explain Sanskrit and Prakrit words, there was no scope for free flow of thought or imagination here.

Among the historical works Jinvardhan's Gurvavali (1422) tops the list, while Prithvichandra vagvilas (1421) of Manikyasundar Suri is a fine specimen of literary or artistic prose. It is a love story, written in the style of a luxuriously rich description of places and persons on the pattern of Bana's Kadambari.

The first non-Jain work in the vachanika style is Achaldas khichi ri vachanika, written by a Charan poet, Shivdas Gadan (c. 1428). It is simple in form and style. Vachanikas have also been attempted by the Jains.

The third and the most important stage in the development of prose is marked by some famous historical works, such as Dalapat vilas (c. 1600), Nainasi ri khyat (c. 1650), Dayaldas ri khyat (c. 1852), Bankidas ri khyat (c. 1830). Stories, other than tales of history, were also written in a large number. The main characteristic of these writings is a simple descriptive style, interspersed with poems suiting the occasion. Further, they make use of idioms and phrases of common parlance which make them quite interesting. A survey called Marwara ra paraganan ri vigata was also written by one Nainasi (c. 1650).

The religious, literary and other prose writings were continued by the Jains and others. Some prominent names are: Rathor Ratan Maheshdasot ri vachanika-Khiriya Jagga (c. 1604), Narsinghdas ki duwavait, Rajan Rauta ro vatvanav, Khichi Gangev Nimbavat ro dopaharo (varnak style), Sabha sringar (c.1705), Vansh bhaskar Suryamall (1815-1868).

Translations of scientific works and commentaries thereon were also made. By the end of the 19th century Rajasthani prose was capable of dealing with all subjects, and appropriate terminology was accordingly evolved.

It was, however, renaissance of oriental learning that encouraged some local scholars to take up the cause of the language. Though sincere attempts were made by devoted scholars to enrich the language in modern genres, the real break-through was possible only in the post-Independence period. During these last thirty years or so, novelists, short story-writers and play-wrights have appeared on the scene with dozens of periodicals. All these genres as well as others, like travelogues, reminiscences, caricatures, and essays have received good attention. The style and form in many of them have descended through Hindi or English, and only rarely through other regional languages. Credit must also be given to those village-oriented writers who have a hold on the language of the masses. That is why novelists and short-story writers like Annaram Sudama, Narsingh Rajpurohit, R.D. Shrimali, Nanuram Sanskarta, and Baijanath Panwar have come to lime light. Others like K.K. Kant, Yadavendra Chandra, Sanwar Daiya, K.D. Barath and Manohar Sharma are conspicuous by their technique only. Some of the prize-winning novels and collections of stories are Mewai ra runkh (1979-80) by A.R. Sudama, Parbhatio taro and Ratavaso (1961) by Narsingh Rajpurohit, Salavatan (1981) by R.D. Shrimali and Hun gori kin piya ri (1969) by Yadavendra Chandra. The only literary drama is Tas ro ghar (1972) by Yadavendra, though there is an anthology of one-act plays also. Miscellaneous writings are best represented by Rajasthani sanskriti ra chitaram by Jahur Khan Mehar, another prize winning work. Others worth a mention are Shabadka (1960) by S.N. Joshi, Galagachiya (1960) by K.L. Sethiya, Sonal bhing by Manohar Sharma, Banagi by B.L. Nahata, Uniyara (1970) by S.R. Changani, and Atarvan by B.N. Purohit. Traditional and folk styles are represented by Laxmikumari Chundawat and V.D. Detha in their Manjhal rat and Phulwari respectively. But what is lacking in modern prose is literature on criticism and technical subjects.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Preceding the post-Independence era were the writings of Shivchandra Bharatiya, Gulabchandra Nagauri, B.P. Daruka and others who lived away from their homeland and produced one-act-plays, dramas, short stories and novels inspired by other regional languages.

Raw. S.

PROSE (Sanskrit). The evolution of literary prose in Sanskrit can be traced to inscriptions of the first four centuries AD. But the use of prose itself goes back to much more ancient times. Leaving out the metrical Rigveda and Samaveda, the rest of the Vedic literature, in parts, is in prose. In the Yajurveda the 'Brahmana' portion is in prose. Again, in the 15th and 16th 'kandas' of the Atharvaveda more than fifty 'suktas' are in prose. About thirty 'suktas' spread over the rest of the 'kandas' are also in prose. It is, however, to be noted that this prose is in no way comparable to the literary prose of later times. The prose employed in the 'Brahmanas' does not differ much from this prose. Yet, the prose of the 'Akhyanas' appears to be a little improved from the literary point of view. 'Shunahshepakhyana' of the Aitareya-Brahmana and 'Pururavorvashyupakhyana' of the Shatapatha Brahmana are the best examples of this kind of prose. The prose of the Aranyakas is similar to that. The Upanishads such as Brihadaranyaka and Chhandogya are in a language nearer classical prose.

The best specimen of the Sanskrit prose of the 'shastra' mould can be seen in Patanjali's Mahabhashya. There are many Akhyanas composed in the old prose style of the Mahabharata. The story of Upamanyu occurring in the third chapter of Adiparvah is a good example of this prose. The Mahabharata uses the terms 'Katha' and 'Akhyayika' which show that Sanskrit prose had already assumed a literary form before the time of the Mahabhashya. Katyayana uses the term 'Akhyayika' in his Vartikas. In connection with one such vartika, Patanjali mentions three Akhyayikas, viz., Vasavadatta, Sumanottara and Bhaimarathi. Nothing is known about their form and content. Further, the name Brihatkatha and the appellation 'Katha' given to the different accounts in the Panchatantra, as also the name Akhyayika given to one account in the Panchatantra (i.e. 'Tantrakhyayika'), demonstrate that the prose forms, Katha and Akhyayika, were already prevalent in the ancient times. The references to the ancient prose works such as Vararuchi's Charumati, Somila's Shudrakakatha and Shripalitta's Tarangavati are found in Bhoja's Shringaraprakasha, Dhanapala's Tilakamanjari. None of them is available now. Bana considers his Kadambari a Katha and his Harshacharita an Akhyayika. Bhamaha and Dandin too discuss the characteristics of Katha and Akhyayika. The famous prose writers in Sanskrit, Dandin, Subandhu and Bana, were not the first writers in the field. Bana himself, in his introduction to the Harshacharita, refers to a celebrity in the field known as Bhattara Harichandra. The work of Harichandra is, however, not available now. Hence, the first specimen of literary prose is to be seen in the inscriptions of the first four centuries AD, especially in the Allahabad Pillar Inscription (i.e. Harisena's Samudraguptaprashasti, AD 350)

If the entire literature in Sanskrit prose is taken into consideration, the tradition of prose romance represented by the works of Dandin, Subandhu and Bana is but one branch. The second branch is represented by the tradition of popular tales developed from Gunadhya's Brihatkatha and its Sanskrit versions. The third branch is fable literature represented by the Panchatantra and the Hitopadesha.

Bhamaha and Dandin have discussed the characteristics of the two types of prose romance, called Katha and Akhyayika. This shows that they existed long before them. The works of Bana and Subandhu come later. According to Bhamaha, the Akhyayika has a historical theme and the narrator in it is the hero himself. Its divisions are called 'Ucchvasas'. Katha, on the other hand, has a fictitious theme, and the narrator in it is not the hero. Dandin calls this distinction baseless. It is the works of Bana which revive this distinction between the two types. The prose romances conforming to the above descriptions are briefly taken up here.

In the form in which it is now available, Dandin's Dashakumaracharita (7th c. AD) appears to be an incomplete work. As the title indicates, it should have had the stories of ten princes, but in the part attributed to Dandin (i.e., eight Ucchvasas), the stories of only eight princes are found. The Purvapithika in five ucchvasas fulfils the requirement of providing the background story along with the accounts of two princes which bring the total number to ten. The Uttarapithika, on the other hand, completes the story of Vishruta which is left incomplete in the original.

Dashakumaracharita is a book of adventurous stories strung together by the thin thread of friendship among the heroes of those stories. The life and temperament of the different strata of society are reflected in them. There are cases of excessive sensuality and lack of taste as, for instance, in the descriptions of Ambalika and Kandukavati and in the scenes of love-making. The magnanimity in theme or in taste, which we find in Subandhu and Bana, is not seen in Dashakumaracharita, but its prose style is chaste, simple and pleasing. It is pleasing on account of its sonorous Anuprasa and gentle syllabic arrangement.

Subandhu's Vasavadatta conforms to the characteristics of Katha described by Bhamaha, but Subandhu has not shown much skill in the construction of the story. Nor is there skill in characterisation. His prose style is his strong point. However, even when there is no undue liking for long compounds, an excessive use of 'Shlesha' and 'Virodhabhasa' renders the style sometimes difficult and unintelligible. Bana's Kadambari is a good specimen of the genre of prose romance called Katha. The theme is fictitious. The title of the prose romance is after the name of its heroine, Kadambari. The work has two parts: the Purvabhaga was completed by Bana, while the Uttarabhaga was composed by his son, Bhushanabhatta. The story of the book relates the life of its two heroes during their two lives. The authors have ingeniously fabricated the story of the two lives of Chandrapida and Pundarika by following the technique of building up a 'story within story'. There is a close similarity between this story and that of Sumanas (or Sumanasa), involving the motifs of the course of life and rebirth which we come across in Kathasaritsagara and Brihatkathamanjari. It is true that the framework of the story is incredible, but the feelings of love, joy and sorrow so deep-rooted in human life, are treated with great skill.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The most outstanding parts of Kadambari are its descriptions. Whatever Bana describes, he does with thoroughness. His rich vocabulary is matched with his keen observation of life. It is this juxtaposition that has earned him the reputation: 'Banochchistam jagatsarvam'.

His Harshacharita is a prose romance of the 'akhyayika' type. Its theme is historical. The first 'Ucchvasa' is devoted to the autobiography of Bana. The rest of the seven ucchvasas are devoted to the portrayal of the life and achievements of king Shriharsha of Sthaneshwar. The book, like Kadambari, is remarkable for its descriptions, but, unlike Kadambari, the descriptions here are shorter and less comprehensive. Shriharsha's filial devotion, brotherly affection towards Rajyashri and patronage of learning are portrayed well by the poet. Karuna is the predominant sentiment in the book.

Bana occupies the highest position among the prose writers in Sanskrit and represents the best tradition of Sanskrit prose style. Dandin speaks of the long compounds giving rise to 'ojas' (vigour) as the life of prose—'Samasabhuyastvametad gadyasya jivitam'. Bana's prose conforms to this requirement. The use of long compounds was the practice of the day, and Bana accepted the tradition and enriched it further. His long compounds have a rare musical quality.

A number of writers tried to imitate Bana both in his style and in his descriptions. The first among them is a Shvetambara Jaina poet Dhanapalaa, son of Sarvadeva. He flourished in the court of Munja Vakpatiraja of Dhara, and composed a katha-type prose romance, called Tilakamanjari. In its introductory verses he mentions Shripalitta, author of Tarangavati, Rudra, author of Trailokyasundarikatha, and Bhushana who completed Kadambari. The theme of this katha is the love and union of Tilakamanjari, a Vidyadhara damsel, and Harivahana of Ayodhya. The characters and situations in this work bring to our memory those of Bana's Kadambari. Tilakamanjari is indeed a replica of Kadambari.

Udayasundarikatha is prose romance of the katha type by another Jaina poet, called Soddhala. The use of verse in the body of this work makes it different from Kadambari, bringing it nearer to 'champu'. The tendency of using verse in narration is already found in Dhanapala's Tilakamanjari, but it is more marked in Soddhala's work. Although it is called a katha, there are chapter-divisions into ucchvasas as in an akhyayika. The first ucchvasa is devoted to the author's life. He was the son of Sura and Padmavati, the couple belonging to the Valabha Kayastha family of Gujarat. He received patronage from Chittaraja, Nagarjuna and Mummuniraja, the Konkan kings of Sthanaka (Thana, near Bombay). Vatsaraja of Lata was also his patron for some time. Thus the date of his work is AD 1026-1050. In its eight ucchvasas the work depicts the fictitious love story of Udayasundari and Malayavahana. Soddhala's metrical passages are more charming than his prose passages.

Gadyachintamani by a Digambara Jaina poet, Vadibhasimha (Odeyadeva), is a prose romance. The theme is connected with Satyadhara and his son Jivandhara. The author, perhaps, took his theme from Gunabhadra's Uttarapurana and other Jaina works. Like Bana, he introduces long descriptions. Moral teaching is the main purpose of the work.

Vemabhupalacharita by Vamanabhatta Bana is a prose romance of the akhyayika-type. Vemabhupala was another name of Kondavidu Viranarayana who flourished during AD 1403-1420. The poet wrote this work to make his patron immortal in literature.

A study of these works reveals that the prose romance, which reached the pinnacle of glory with Bana, gradually deteriorated at the hands of his imitators. The free use of verse in narration brought the prose romance nearer the champu genre.

The second type of prose literature in Sanskrit is represented by popular tales. The first collection of popular tales was Brihatkatha, a work of Gunadhya in Paishachi language. The original Brihatkatha is not available now. Its story can be roughly known from its later Sanskrit versions. The exact date of Brihatkatha cannot be ascertained. References to it are found in works belonging to AD 600 onwards. For instance Dandin, in his Kavyadarsha, refers to it as 'Bhutabhashamayim prahuradbhutartham Brihatkatham'. In the Dashakumaracharita there is a reference to the story of Naravahanadatta found in Brihatkatha. The same reference is found in the Vasavadatta of Subandhu. Besides referring to Brihatkatha in his Kadambari, Bana refers to it in his Harshacharita also. Hence Brihatkatha must have belonged to a date prior to AD 600. Since it is said to have been written in Paishachi language, it is possible to assume that the tradition of popular tales first began in Prakrit and developed later in Sanskrit.

The metrical versions of Brihatkatha are three: Brihatkathamanjari of the Kashmiri Kshemendra (11th c. AD), Kathasaritsagara of the Kashmiri Somadeva (11th c. AD) and Brihatkathashlokasangraha of the Nepalese

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Budhasvamin (10th c. AD). Kshemendra's work has 7,500 shlokas, while Somadeva's work has 21,000 shlokas. Budhasvamin's work, which was composed at least 100 years before the other two, has 4,539 shlokas, so far as it is available now.

Since the original Brihatkatha is lost to us, the first available collection of popular tales in prose is Vetalapanchavimshati. Its metrical version is found in the Kashmiri versions of Brihatkatha, though most probably it was an independent collection of popular tales. Many versions are available. Among them the version of Shivadasa is the best. Its date is not known.

Simhasanadvatrimshika or Vikramacharita is a collection of thirty-two stories. This work is available in two recensions, the northern and the southern. The northern recension has three versions as Kshemankara Muni's version, Vararuchi's Bengal version, and an anonymous one. The southern recension is called Vikramacharita. There is no difference in the main story. The thirty-two stories are narrated by the thirty-two statues of Vikramaditya's throne. These stories are addressed to Bhoja who comes there to ascend the throne. Every story is intended to bring out the merits and achievements of Vikrama.

Shukasaptati, as the name indicates, is a collection of seventy stories narrated by a parrot. The aim of these stories is to give entertainment, but not edification. This is clear from the very style of the narration. This work is available in two recensions: one by Chintamani Bhatta and another by a Shvetambara Jaina. The stories reveal how men and women deceive their partners in life for their selfish ends. Though the stories do not reflect cultured taste, they are certainly of popular appeal.

Bharatakadvatrimshika is a collection of thirty-two stories, reflecting the ridiculous behaviour of certain Sanyasins, called Bharatakas. The date and authorship of the work are not known.

Purushapariksha is a collection of forty-four popular stories written by the Maithila poet Vidyapati. The stories depict the qualities of men in a charming style. This collection was very popular, and was written in the fourteenth century.

Katharatnakara by Hemavijaya Gani is a collection of 258 short stories. The work belongs to the seventeenth century. The stories in this collection are of different types, as moral stories, anecdotes, etc. These short stories contain the accounts of fools, rogues and tricksters. They contain stanzas in Sanskrit, Prakrit and regional languages.

Some Jaina Prabandhas deserve consideration among the popular tales. They appear like historical accounts. But they are really anecdotes about some celebrities. They portray certain situations about poets set in certain imaginary settings. Some of them are popular tales about poets and their patrons. Prabandhachintamani of Merutunga is one such collection. It was completed in 1306. It consists of five 'prakashas'. The first prakasha contains stories about Vikramaditya, Satavahana, and Munja and Bhoja of Dhara. The third and fourth prakashas contain stories about the rulers of Anhilvad. The fifth prakasha gives the stories of Shiladitya, Lakshmanasena, Jayachandra, Bhartrihari.

Prabandhakosha of Rajeshekhara Suri is another Jaina prabandha of the type of Prabandhachintamani. It was completed in 1348. It contains 24 prabandhas. The stories collected here are of seven kings, such as Lakshmanasena, Madanavarma, three ordinary persons, ten Jaina preceptors such as Hemachandra, and four poets, viz., Sriharsha, Harihara, Amarachandra and Digambara Madanakirti.

Bhojaprabandha of Ballala (16th c.) belongs to the same category. It is not a Jaina prabandha. The main purpose of this work is to eulogise the patronage of Bhoja. It is in his court that poets like Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti, Dandin, Magha and others meet and exchange their poetic flashes and display their poetic skills. One should forget the chronological facts and enjoy 'kavya-vinoda' in this prabandha.

The third branch of Sanskrit prose is fable literature. Two collections of fables intended to teach political wisdom and a code of behaviour have come down to us. They are Panchatantra and Hitopadesha. Although it is difficult to say as to when the stories with animal characters began, it is possible to say that such stories were common knowledge from the ancient times. In one of the hymns of the Rigveda, a dog, called Sarama, holds negotiations with Panis as an envoy of Indra. Here the loyalty towards the master and the shrewd intelligence of the dog are portrayed. In Chhandogyopanisad there is a story of dogs searching for a leader who can cry aloud on their behalf for food. The aim here is no political teaching. The cunning fox, the mischievous cat and the greedy eagle play their part in some stories of the Mahabharata. Such stories and the animal characters of Bauddha jatakas might have wielded a direct influence on the fables. The refined forms of fables are found in the Panchatantra and the Hitopadesha. These collections were prepared for the sole purpose of offering political wisdom and moral lessons to young princes.

The Panchatantra is not one book, but a series of books. The stories were prevalent in different versions in different times. Hertel (Das Panchatantra) and Edgerton (The Panchatantra Reconstructed) have refuted with arguments that the Panchatantra was extant originally in Prakrit. The original text which formed the basis for the Pahlavi version in AD 570 was the oldest recension. The date and name of that version are not known. The text of that recension, too, is not available. Among the four recensions, Tantrakhyayika is regarded by Hertel as the nearest to the original. The stories of Panchatantra in the Brihatkathamanjari are short and less interesting, those in Kathasaritsagara are longer and more interesting. The Jaina version has seven stories, and Purnabhadra's version has twenty-one stories more than in other versions. The southern version itself has several variations. It contains all the stories and one story of 'a shepherdess and her lovers' in excess.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Panchatantra, as it is available now, has five parts: Mitrabheda, Mitraprapti, Kakolukiya (Sandhi-vigraha), Labdapranasha and Aparikshitakaraka. These five parts are related to a background story: King Amarashakti of Mahilaropya had four sons, who were dull and averse to learning. The king invited learned scholars to his court and made an appeal to them, asking if one of them could take up the responsibility of educating his sons. Vishnusharman, among the scholars, alone stood up and offered to educate the princes. He took the princes to his hermitage and taught them the principles of polity and general morality through the charming medium of fables.

The Hitopadesha is a collection which draws mostly on the Panchatantra, but it is independent in arrangement. The collection was made by one Narayana who flourished in the court of Dhavalachandra. A manuscript of this work is dated 1373. Hence, Narayana must have flourished before 1373. This work has only four parts, and all the stories of the Panchatantra are not found here but some stories which are not found in the Panchatantra are found in this collection.

M.S.Sw.

PROSE (Sindhi). When the Sanskritised Sindhi language reached a definite stage of development around 1000, it had already been under some influence of the alien Arabic language, for Sindh was an Arabian colony from 712 to 1058. Thereafter, from 1520 to 1737, Sindh remained wholly or partly under the sway of the Arghuns, Tarkhans, and also Mughal subedars, and the Persian way of life and letters showed its impact on the Sindhi society and literature.

Sindh was annexed to the British India in 1843 and the English language threw open the flood-gates of modern knowledge to the modern Indian languages, including Sindhi. With the attainment of Independence in 1947, India and Pakistan shared between themselves Sindhi, Punjabi, Urdu and Bengali. Thus, Sindh saw two periods of the native rule during the medieval times, one from 1058 to 1520 when the Sumras and Sammas ruled, and the other from 1737 to 1843 when the Kalhoras and the Talpurs held the throne.

In spite of the earlier two native periods and the present Independence era, the Arabic, Persian and English influences (in that order) have also been parts of the Sindhi psyche. That these influences worked upon the indigenous Hindu tradition is evident from the fact that great many Hindu works were lost. For instance, the original work in the old Sindhi Rajauni lai sikhya (Instruction for the kings) which narrated stories from the Mahabharata and also of the later-day Indian sagas of war and peace, and about which we come to know through the later Arabic and Persian versions, is not available. S.K. Chatterji has discussed the now lost Sindhi work and its extant Arabic and Persian versions in the appendix to his Languages and Literature of Modern India (Calcutta, 1963).

The first stirrings of Sindhi prose were evident in the first Sindhi translation of the Quran by Qazi Azizullah Muta'alawi (1747-1824), the Sindhi translations of 50 odd Persian works on the Islamic theology and ritual practices, e.g., Bina al-Islam by Mukhdum Muhammad Hashim (1692-1761) and the Sindhi translations of parts of the Bible, viz., St. Matthew and St. John, done by the two Christian missionaries of Bengal in 1825. These translations respectively show the Arabic, Persian and English influences. And, while the translations of Arabic and Persian works are in Abul Hasan's 28 letter alphabet, the translation of the English Bible is in Devanagari. All these works constituting the first attempts at writing Sindhi prose are done in a poetical style; the accent on emotive element (and not on the factual one) in meaning and the use of rhyme and of alliteration make them the works of poetic prose. These works offer instances of the semi-grammatical language.

The first regular, non-religious work of Sindhi prose, therefore, was Akhani Rai D'yach ain Sorath ji (The story of Rai D'yach and Sorath) by Udharam Thanwardas Mirchandani (1833-1883). Appended to George Stack's A Grammar of Sindhi Language, published with the Sindhi text in Devanagari, it recounts the Sindhi folk-tale in a simple, lucid style.

With the abolition of Persian as the official language in the Indian sub-continent in 1837 and introduction of the Perso-Arabic script for Sindhi in 1853, "the two renovations in the modernisation of Sindhi language and literature", according to Annemarie Schimmel in her Sindhi Literature (Wiesbaden, 1974), both Hindu and Muslim writers joined their hands to translate ethical and educational works from Hindi and English into Sindhi for the Sindhi schools run by the Government. Though personally in favour of Devanagari for Sindhi, George Stack helped the government in bringing out text-books in the Perso-Arabic script after the 1853 decision. The main writers of the text-books were (1) Nandiram Merani, who wrote in 1853 Babanamo, a primer for the new entrants in the schools, and also translated into Sindhi in 1854 Aesop's Tales by the title of Isap jun akhanyun; (ii) Ghulam Husain Qureshi, who published Bhambhe zamindar ji g'alhi (The story of Bhambho, the landlord), an adaptation of a Hindi story by Pandit Bansidhar Chiranjivalal, in 1854, and also Mufid assibyan, a book of interesting stories for children, an adaptation of a Hindi book, in 1861; (iii) Sayyid Miran Muhammad Shah-I (1829-1892), who translated in 1855 Pandit Bansidhar Chiranjivalal's Hindi story into Sindhi by the name of Sudhature

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kudhature ji g'alhi, the story in which a good, diligent and intelligent boy Sudhaturo is contrasted with "a bad, lazy and stupid boy" Kudhaturo; (iv) Prabhudas Anandram, who wrote Sindhi histories of India and England in 1863 and 1868 respectively; (v) Narayan Jagannath (1825-1874), a Maharashtrian settled in Sindh, who produced in Sindhi a book on Geography of Sindh, in 1865; (vi) Kauromal Chandanmal (1844-1916), who published many books in discursive and non-discursive Sindhi prose, the first among them being Pako pahu (Determination, 1862), a book making a strong plea for women's education; and (vii) Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929), a prolific writer, who turned his pen on almost all subjects and in almost all genres.

Kauromal Chandanmal, Mirza Qalich Beg, Dayaram Gidumal (1857-1927) and Parmanand Mewaram (1866-1938) formed in themselves the first Sindhi prose writers' quartet. Besides writing a book on women's education, Kauromal brought out another one on the lives of some Indian women by the title of Arya nari charitra (The Aryan woman characters, 1905). The first Sindhi essayist, he wrote extensively on the panchayats, health, agriculture and folklore in a style which was at once simple and stately. Forty-four of his essays are collected in the book entitled Sahitik pushpa (Literary flowers, 1960). He also translated from Sanskrit Harsha's play Ratnavali, and from Bengali Bankimchandra's Radharani, Indira, etc. Mirza Qalich Beg was the author of more than 300 books, majority of them being translations and adaptations from Arabic, Persian, English and Hindi. His first book Maqalat-e-hikmat (Essays of wisdom, 1877) was a translation of Bacon's Essays. The original novel Zinat was the most successful work by him; in it he was able to give objective correlatives of his own emotions and ideas about a family life in Sindh of his times. The most learned Sindhi author of the times, Dayaram Gidumal distinguished himself for his elegant, eloquent prose in his commentaries on Japaji Saheb (1891), Bhagavadgita (1893) and Yoga darshana (1903). Parmanand Mewaram's periodical Jote (Light) published articles by him and by others. These articles, which were remarkable for their rich, varied content and lucid, forceful style, were collected in Dil Bahar (The heart's spring, 1904) and Gula phula (Flowers, Vol.I, 1925; Vol.II, 1936). His two great lexicographical works are Sindhi-English Dictionary (1910) and English-Sindhi Dictionary (1933).

As in other modern Indian languages, in Sindhi, too, the prose made a great progress in all fields of literature in the twentieth century. Hundreds of original Sindhi writers came forward to cater to the needs of resurgent Sindhi, which had earlier been under the alien influence of the Arabic, Persian and English languages. For the writers like Bherumal Maherchand (1875-1950), H.M. Gurbaxani (1884-1947), Lalchand Amardinomal (1885-1954) and Jethmal Parsram (1886-1948), another quartet of Sindhi prose writers, the English education which had been responsible for modern knowledge, became a means to know their own life and literature better. A writer of travelogues and erudite essays, Bherumal Maherchand wrote Sindh jo sailani (A traveller through Sindh) in 1923 and Sindhi B'olia ji tarikh (History of Sindhi language) in 1941. While Dayaram Gidumal had been the first literary critic for his essay Samia je slokani jo tatparju (The quintessence of Sami's slokas, 1885), H.M. Gurbaxani was easily the first modern literary critic—"modern" in the strict sense of the term. Adopting the new critical methods, he wrote a scholarly introduction to his Shah jo risalo (1923), dealing with the sufi poet's life as also various aspects of his poetry, viz., religious and philosophic thought, language, grammatical forms and imagery. Lalchand Amardinomal's Shahano Shah (1914), Sunharo Sachal (1916) and Berangi bagh jo gul Sindhi (1920) were published by Sindhi Sahit Society founded by him in 1914. J'ethmal Parsram, too, launched the Nain Sindhi Library series of books/booklets. His Sachal sarmast (1922) tackle many a problem of logic, philosophy and psychology in Sachal's poetry.

By 1940, the progressive movement showed itself in the field of Sindhi letters. And with it were introduced the Marxist method of literary criticism. Barkat Ali Azad's essay Adab ain zindagi (Literature and life) of 1942 and Gobind Malhi's prefatorial essay Sahita mein inquilabi tahrik (Revolutionary movement in literature) and Pirah Phuti (a collection of short stories) of 1945 set the Marxist trend in Sindhi. After the partition of India, A.J. Uttam and Kirat Babani gave impetus to progressive criticism.

With the further spread of education in free India and greater awareness of problems in life, the Sindhi writers have helped develop literary prose in various modern forms.

Mo.J.

PROSE (Tamil). The Tamil word for 'prose' is 'urai-natai' which means 'the speech on foot', i.e., 'language that walks and does not profess to fly'. There is no ground for asserting that there were prose works before the beginning of the seventeenth century. But we find some clues from which we can infer that there might have been such works. Tolkappiyar, the author of Tolkappiyam, defines the province of prose. He divides all kinds of compositions into two main divisions: (1) Compositions where all the requisite rules are strictly observed, and (2) Compositions where such rules are not limited. Under the latter division are included prose, commentaries, riddles and proverbs. The chief characteristic feature attributed by Tolkappiyar to prose is 'tonmai', which means 'speaking of old'.

The first prose in Tamil that we can positively point out is to be found in Silappadikaram. The author of Silappadikaram. on rare occasions dispenses with poetry and attempts prose, but these expressions having the features of alliteration, assonance and rhythm sound more like poetry.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

From about the eighth century AD, and more particularly after the tenth century AD, Tamil prose assumed a notable prominence, when several commentaries were written on the early classics. The first one is Nakkirar's commentary on Iraiyanar akapporul written by Nilakantanar or Muchiri. Among the other outstanding commentaries may be mentioned the works of Ilampuranar, Chenavaraiyar, Nachchinarkkiniyar, Atiyarkkunallar and Parimelalakar Nachchinarkkiniyar, who lived in the fourteenth century, was a scholar and a master of simple prose style. Another commentator who enriched prose is Sivagana Swamikal (AD 1500). His elaborate commentary on Sivagnana potam of Meykanta Tevar has won very high admiration.

Though these and later commentaries are products of great skill and profound learning, they are highly ornate and pedantic. At places many of them are more terse than the originals. Apart from the commentaries, we find inscriptions written in prose but the style is predominantly administrative and not purely literary. All these bear witness to the fact that prose did exist and the Tamils were well-versed in it; but they did not treat it as an independent branch of literature.

Prose came to be established as a specific branch of literature with the European missionaries. Among the early prose writers who produced original works in Tamil was Robert-de-Nobili, the founder of Madurai Jesuit Mission. He wrote several prose works like Atma nirnayam, Katavul nirnayam and Tattuvakkannati. Constantius Joseph Beschi (1680-1747), popularly known as Viramamunivar, is another good prose writer. Paramartta guru katai is one of his outstanding works. It is a prose narrative, with many stories interwoven, dealing with a priest and his followers. Beschi was the first man to use Tamil prose for creative purposes. T.P. Minakshisundaram, therefore, considers him the 'Father of Modern Prose'. Arumuka Navalar (1822-1889) of Ceylon was one of the early prose writers who turned to secular subjects besides writing on religious themes. Many prose renderings of epics like Tiruvilaiyatarpuranam, Periyapuranam and Kantapuranam were attempted by him. He also brought out primers for school-going children.

During the modern age of Tamil literature the range of literary efforts became widened. As a result of this healthy change Tamil scholars began to think in terms of creating and fostering new branches of prose literature such as the essay, literary criticism, biography, travelogue and science literature which have registered considerable growth.

C. Subramaniya Bharati, the distinguished poet, is an innovator in the field of prose as well. As in poetry, he chalked out a new line in prose and successfully created a beautiful and powerful Tamil prose style, using the common speech which was intelligible even to the ordinary people.

He did this, without, however, substantial break either with grammar or Tamil literary usage and traditions. This was his great achievement. His prose writings are a model of what Tamil literary prose should be and therefore it has exercised a great influence on modern Tamil writing.

U.V. Swaminatha Aiyar (1885-1942) began to write in prose, as it were, accidentally by way of prefaces to his scholarly editions of ancient classics. During the last ten years of his life he regularly contributed articles to the leading Tamil journals. His essays have been collected and published under the title Nan kantatum kettatum (What I heard and saw). V. Kalyanasundaranar (Tiru. Vi. Ka) is another good essayist. He is a master of short sentences which lead to the creation of many telling phrases and a few catch-words, rather epigrams. Himself a journalist, his newspaper editorials, essays and addresses have been published under the title Tamil cholai and Tamil tenral. Tiru. Vi. Ka. expressed all modern thoughts of history, science, philosophy and politics in Tamil, revealing the wonderful possibilities of Tamil as a vehicle of modern thought.

The development of journalism in Tamil is one of the most important factors for the development of Tamil essays. In 1906, C. Subramania Bharati, the great Tamil poet, started a paper of his own, called India. Tiru. Vi. Ka. founded Deshabhaktan (The patriot) in 1917. Varatarajalu Nayudu founded Tamil nadu in 1923. All these journals provided encouragement to Tamil writers. Besides newspapers, magazines also became popular. Ananta vikatan, Pirachanta vikatan, and Kalki had important repercussions on the course of modern Tamil prose. It was the journalists who made Tamil prose flexible and expressive.

Maraimalai Atikal (1876-1950), one of the greatest masters of Tamil prose, was the protagonist of a new movement which was oriented in favour of pure and chaste Tamil. This movement is called 'Tanittamil Iyakkam' (pure Tamil movement). Maraimalai Atikal seriously condemned the admixture of foreign words in Tamil writing. Even though the movement was unsuccessful in its efforts, it had its own impact in the development of Tamil prose.

When Tamil literature liberated itself from the rigidity of formal classicism and moved away in new directions, it became inevitable that new standards of criticism should also be laid down. Critics like S. Vaiyapury Pillai (1891-1956), S.R. Markkapantu Sarma, K. Kailasapati, K.N. Subramanyam wrote many books of criticism and added new colour to Tamil prose. M. Ramalingam's Naval ilakkiyam (Novel literature, 1972) explains the basic technique of the novel. His Putiya-urai nadai (Modern prose, 1978), for which he was given the

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sahitya Akademi Award (1981), analyses the basic principles of good prose.

The writing of biographies was taken up as a major literary endeavour only recently. U.V. Swaminatha Aiyar is known as the father of modern biography. His eminent work on his Guru, Makavittuvan Minakshi Sundaram Pillai charittiram (The life of Meenakshisundaram Pillai, 1935), reminds us of Boswell's Life of Johnson. There was great variety in the techniques and forms employed in the biographies of the period. Some of the interesting biographies are V. Ramachami's (Va. Ra) Mahakavi Bharatiyar (Bharatiar, the poet), Tiru. Vi. Ka's Enatu valkkaik kurippukkal (My life: some stray notes), P.S. Acharya's Nan arinta Tamil manikal (Some Tamil scholars I have known) and M.P. Sivananam's Enatu porattankal (My struggles). Kannadasan's biography, entitled Vanavasam (The life in the forest), is notable for its plain truths and sensitive style.

One of the earlist writers of travelogue, in its modern connotation, is A.K. Chettiyar who wrote Ulakam churriya Tamilan (The globe-trotter Tamilian). Another notable writer is Maniyan. His books published under the same title, Itayam pesukiratu (The heart speaks), are good accounts of life abroad. Sosalicha natukalil makkal talaivar (People's leader in socialistic countries) is the title of R. Venkataraman's report of Kamaraj's tour of Soviet Russia along with the author. N.D. Sundaravativelu, the distinguished educationist, was another Tamil writer who visited the Soviet Union. His Inkum ankum (Here and there) is mainly on the Soviet education system and the extent to which it can be followed in India.

V. Kanakachapai Pillai, M. Rajamanikkanar and T.V. Sadasivapantarattar have made substantial contribution to the field of historical research. Pantarattar's Pirkalac cholar varalaru (The history of later Cholas) in three volumes is a commendable work. The first history of Tamil literature was written by K. Subramanya Pillai. K.S. Srinivasa Pillai's Tamil varalaru (The history of Tamil language) is another major work in this field. M. Arunachalam wrote a complete history of Tamil literature, of which more than ten volumes have been published so far. The Tamil Nadu Text Book Society has brought out quite a good number of publications on varied subjects like Economics, Political Science, Sociology, Psychology and Anthropology. Many of these books are of an advanced nature and should be useful for university students. Thus modern Tamil prose has found its development in all branches of knowledge and hence it has become 'an adequately powerful tool for any work that may be asked of it'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.M. Paramasivanandam, Tamil urai-natai valarchi (Madras, 1961); M. Ramalingam, Irupatam nurrantu Tamil ilakkiyam (Madras, 1973) and Putiya urai-natai (Madras, 1978); R.E. Asher, Some Landmarks in the History of Tamil Prose (Madras, 1973); Sami Chelvanayagam, Tamil urai-natai varalaru (Kumbakonam, 1957); V.S. Changalvaraya Pillai, History of Tamil Prose Literature (Madras, 1960).

M.R.

PROSE (Telugu). Dhananjaya's stone inscription dated AD 575 found at Kalumuru in Kadapa district is entirely in Telugu prose, and proves the existence of Telugu as an independent language enjoying royal patronage in the ancient times. A study of Telugu inscriptions in the pre-Nannayan age starting with the Kadapa inscriptions to the Koravi inscriptions of Chalukya Bhima I of the tenth century reveals that a series of phonological, orthographical and morphological changes had taken place resulting in a language much similar to Nannaya's language in the Mahabharata. The study also reveals that Telugu had gradually come out of the influence of Prakrit, absorbing at the same time more and more words of Sanskrit origin. The sentences of incomplete predication gave place to sentences of complete predication; in addition to the simple participle construction, there developed sentences with clauses introduced by relative pronouns as in Sanskrit. However, a comparison of Nannaya's prose with that of the Koravi inscription shows that there existed some difference between the two. As has been well-observed by B. Krishnamurthy, during this period (AD 500 —1100) there developed a poetic language parallel to the popular language. The inscriptions reflect the influence of literary style, but this style does not reflect the changes in the spoken language. Thus Telugu seems to have existed on three levels–the level of the people, the level of inscriptions and the level of literature. The second one, perhaps, corresponds to the 'shishta vyavaharika' of later times. The inscriptions after 1100 also continued to reflect the changes at popular level as well as the literary standard of the day. The inscriptions of the Vijayanagar period contain prose full of literary flourishes and shabdalankaras along with ordinary colloquial expressions.

Nannaya himself testifies to the fact that there were highly accomplished prose writers in the court of Rajarajanarendra. He used prose for simple narrative purposes or to achieve a dramatic directness or to describe a little episode. It has been observed that he gave equal importance to prose and verse in his Mahabharata. In the hands of the prabandha poets of a later date prose was cultivated more for its rhythmic beauty than for genuine artistic purposes.

Independent of prabandhas, prose began to develop as a separate branch of literature towards the close of the fourteenth century when Krishnamacharya composed his famous Simhagiri vachanamulu. Vachana compositions of Akkamahadevi in Kannada might have inspired Telugu writers to compose vachanas in Telugu. Simhagiri vachanamulu paved the way for Tallapaka Peda Tirumalacharya's Venkateshwara vachanamulu (AD 1468-1553) which became equally popular. Though these vachanas are of Shaivite origin, they became popular with the Vaishnavites too because of their popular appeal and the rivalry between the two powerful movements of bhakti. These vachanas are in the form of an address or appeal to a deity and are imbued with religious emotion. Though they are simple when compared with the prose in the prabandhas, they cannot be called plain prose.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The first prose work appeared towards the end of the sixteenth century. It is a historical work entitled Pratapacharitra by Ekamranatha. The narration is in the style of Nannaya at its low ebb, but on the whole it is a satisfactory work. The second prose work seems to have been inspired by the first. It is called Rayavachakam written by an unknown official in the time of Vishwanatha Nayaka of Mathura. Like Ekamranatha, he too wrote about Krishna Devaraya sometime after his hero was gone. The work is in the nature of report. Its style is colloquial. The author makes free use of foreign words and intersperses his narrative with sermons on morality and political wisdom, drawing heavily on the Mahabharata, Chanakya's Arthashastra and Baddena's Nitishataka. If Ekamranatha's Pratapacharitra inspired Kaseppa's poetical work Siddheshwara vijayam, Rayavachakam inspired Kurmara Dhurjati's Krishnaraya vijayam.

The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, popularly called the period of Southern School in Telugu, may be called the golden age of prose. The seat of power now shifted from the mainland of Telugu to Tanjore, Mathura and Chenji. Mysore and Pudukkota too, became strong holds of Telugu literature. Prose enjoyed the royal patronage and people's support. Colloquial prose, even the vulgar one, found admission into the 'yakshagana', a typical literary form of the age and a forerunner of modern drama. The reason for the sudden flowering of prose may be the urgent need to communicate the beauty of Telugu to the people whose mother tongue is non Telugu, but even more urgent is the need to counteract the proselytising influence of the Christian missionaries like Robert De Nobili and Joseph Beschi. Nrisimha Kavi's Bharata Savitri written in simple but chaste style was a household word in those days. It told the main events of the Mahabharata in a simple, colloquial language. The religious impulse is clearly seen in such compositions as Vijaranga Chokkanatha's Maghamahatmyam, Shriranga-mahatmyam and Linganamakhi Kameswara Kavi's Dhenumahatmyam. But the most outstanding works of the period are Samukham Venkata Krishnappa's Gamini Bharatam and Sarangadhara charitra, Kaluve Virraju's Bharata sangraham in collaboration with Tupakula Anantha Bhupala and Tupakula Anantabhupala's Vishnupuranam. They were written in an elevated but eminently readable style. Only two works of the puranic type, however, seem to have been written entirely in a colloquial style. They are Uttaragopuram and Uttara Ramayanam.

Among the purely religious works mention may be made of Viveka sindhuvu of Kashi Chennabasaveshwara, and Vedanta vartikam of Paramanandayati. Christian veda katha samkshepam and Srishtirahasyam are important works of Christian origin.

The impetus given by Nayaka kings to Telugu prose continued in the nineteenth century. The taste once created by religious impulse is now exploited by the instinct of delight in story telling. Poems like Shukasaptati and Hamsa vimshati were retold with great gusto; Kathasaritsagara and Brihat katha, stories of foreign origin like Arabian Nights and Chardarvisu kathalu and native stories of wit and wisdom like the tales of Tenali Rama and Tatachari were collected and published. Critical commentaries on classics like Manucharitra were also written in plain colloquial idiom. Travel literature like Yenugula Viraswamy's Kashiyatra charitra also appeared during this period. This healthy growth of prose was unfortunately arrested for nearly a hundred years by the misplaced enthusiasm of Paravastu Chinnayya Suri (1806-1862) and his followers. Chinnayya Suri wrote his Nitichandrika (1853) in a highly artificial, though elevated, style to illustrate his own principles of composition codified in his famous Bala vyakaranam and Sutrandhra vyakaranam. The other writers like Kokkonda Venkataratnam Pantulu followed suit. Swamineni Muddu Narasimham Naidu protested against the artificial granthika style but in vain. Kandukuri Viresalingam Pantulu (1840-1919) cultivated a modified variety of the neo-classical style for his purposes, but could not reverse the trend. Viresalingam Pantulu was essentially a social reformer. He decided to use his literary talents, which were indeed very high, to propagate his ideals. He exploited the medium of prose to fight against the ills of the society. In the very process of his fighting, he enriched Telugu literature with new literary genres like the essay, autobiography, biography, farce and above all the novel. His Rajashekhara charitra is not the first Telugu novel as claimed by him, but the first significant novel, for the first novel, Shrirangaraja charitra (1872) of N. Gopala Krishnamma Chetty (1823-88), had no social impact at all. The first autobiography in Telugu is Na eruka by Adibhatta Narayana Das (1894). The delayed publication deprived Das of the credit due to him. But there is no gainsaying the fact that Pantulu's autobiography is one of the finest and most influential of its genre. As the services he rendered to Telugu prose are unique he is justly acclaimed as the father of modern prose.

In the twentieth century with the phenomenal growth of newspapers, literary journals and academic bodies, and with the influence of the cinema, radio and television, prose has assumed a myriad shapes and styles. The short-story and the novel dominate all other forms of prose.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The rise of women as a class of writers is a special feature of modern times. They have dominated the literary scene for the past two decades. A new sensibility is evident in their writings. Tenneti Hemalata Muppalla Ranganayakamma, Bina Devi, Yeddanapudi Sulochana Rani, Koduri Kausalya Devi, Utukuru Lakshmikantamma, P. Yasoda Reddi, Malati Chendur and K. Ramalakshmi are some of the outstanding writers of prose. Koduri Lilavati has specialised in children's literature. As Telugu has now become the medium of instruction in schools and colleges and as it has been declared official language replacing English at every level of administration, a stage is set for greater achievements and new adventures. The prospects of prose, indeed, are very bright.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Adibhatta Narayana Das, Na eruka; Bhadriraju Krishna Murty, Bhashodyamam; Divakarla Venkatavadhani, Andhra vagmaya charitra, Andhra vagmayarambha dasa, Vol. I (Hyderabad, 1960); D. Visweswara Rao (ed.), Acanta Venkata Sankhyayana Sarma Birth Centenary Souvenir (Hyderabad); Gobburi Venkatananda Raghava Rao, Andhra vachana rachana parinamam (Rajahmundry, 1961); G. V. Sitapati, History of Telugu Literature (New Delhi, 1969); M. Kulasekhara Rao, Telugu vachana vikasamu (Hyderabad, 1975).

G. Sr.

PROSE (Urdu). Prose as a literary form in Urdu is much younger than poetry. The origin of Urdu poetry can be traced back to the beginning of the 16th century, while Urdu prose had its beginning three centuries later, in the first decade of the 19th century. The second notable difference between the two literary forms is that while Urdu poetry had its natural growth at the initiative of individual poets who somewhat imitated Persian poetry, Urdu prose had an institutionalised origin. Gilchrist of Fort William College, Calcutta, employed writers and translators to prepare prose books meant for educating Englishmen in idiomatic but simple and fluent Urdu. Most of these books were translations of famous Persian and Sanskrit works.

The Fort William College was founded in 1800 and was closed down in 1820, but during this short period it effectively performed two gigantic tasks: introducing prose literature in Urdu and starting a new literary language, Khari Boli, which was subsequently known as Hindi. In most languages, literature has its beginning in poetry, whereas in Khari Boli, it started in the prose form.

The top name among the early writers of Urdu prose is that of Mir Amman. He wrote Bagh-o-bahar, a collection of five autobiographical stories told by four mendicants and a king. Strictly speaking, it is a translation of an earlier tale, but its narrative and descriptive style makes it an original work and it is as popular today as it was about two centuries ago.

The notable colleagues of Mir Amman at the Fort William College were Sher Ali 'Afsos', Haider Bakhsh 'Haideri', Kazim Ali 'Jawan', Beni Narain, Mirza Ali 'Lutf', etc.'Afsos' is known for his work Bagh-e-Urdu and 'Haideri' for his translations, Tota kahani and Araish-e-mahfil.

The prose style of the writers of the Fort William College was marked by simplicity and fluency which was later reflected in the religious books of several writers at Delhi. Notable among such writers were Moulvi Hafiz Ahmad, Moulvi Mohammad Safa, Moulvi Abdul Qadir and Moulvi Wali Mohammad. Some grammar books were also written at this time. Christian missionaries too made many translations of the Bible into Urdu and Shah Abdul Qadir translated the Quran into Urdu.

All these works were written with a social purpose; accordingly they were written in a way so as to make them comprehensible and interesting to the average reader. But the Persian prose of the medieval period found in model letters (insha) and history books, showed an extremely heavy and pedantic style, the main object being the display of the writer's knowledge. It contained quite a number of synonyms with many rhyming words and phrases. Highly educated persons appreciated this style. As a reaction to the simple and lucid style of Calcutta and Delhi, an elaborate, ornate style developed, particularly at Lucknow. In Urdu letters too, the Persian style was adopted and some 'Dastans' (long fantastic tales) were written or translated. The most notable work of this kind was Fasana-e-ajaib by Rajab Ali Beg 'Saroor'. Faqir Mohammad 'Goya', a commander of the Avadh army, wrote Bustan-e-Hikmat. It is a translation of a Persian classic, and though its style is not ornamental, it is extremely heavy. All the same it was very popular in the middle of the 19th century.

But in Delhi no attempt was made to revive the old style of prose. Ghalib's collections of letters are universally recognised as the harbinger of a natural style of writing. Even before the publication of these letters, Imam Bakhsh Sahbai, at the behest of the English Principal of Delhi College, translated a Persian book on the art of poetry into Urdu. Its Persian name, Hadyaqul Balaghat, was retained in the translation. Certainly, in the matter of sentence structure, it is different from the present-day style, but it is marked by spontaneity and simplicity. Master Ram Chander was another writer of simple academic books in Urdu.

The origin of modern Urdu prose is found in the writings of Syed Ahmad Khan. In the earlier works of Syed, like Asar-e-Sanadid, there is more Persianisation than in his later works. Since his object was dissemination of a new social philosophy, his approach had to be direct and simple. The fluency and the consequent dictional charm speak for Syed's inborn literary capacity, though he devoted all his energy to social writings alone and none to creative writing.

The supporters of Syed were mainly intellectuals who, besides being rooted in Islamic tradition, were exposed to modern social realities, and like him presented Islam in the modern light. Notable among them were Hali and Shibli. Hali translated the new upsurge mainly in the field of literary criticism. Shibli did the same in the re-interpretation of the history of Islam.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The main works of this period are Syed's interpretation of the Quran, besides some historical writings and articles published in his journal Tahzib-ul-Akklaq. Hali wrote a detailed preface to his poetic collection which was later printed separately under the title, Muqaddama-e-shiar-o-shairi. This was his manifesto of the new literary consciousness. His other notable prose works are Hayat-e-Javed, Yadgar-e-Ghalib and Hayat-e-Saadi. These are biographies of Syed, Ghalib and Saadi respectively. Shibli's main works are Shiar-ul-Ajam, Tafsir-ul-Quran and many other historical books.

Other supporters of Syed, who made their mark as prose writers, were Mohammad Husain 'Azad', Nazeer Ahmad, Zaka Ullah, Muhsin-ul-Mulk, Vagar-ul-Mulk and Chiragh Ali. Zaka Ullah translated some 150 books into simple Urdu. Chiragh Ali wrote many books on subjects relating to Islam. Muhsin-ul-Mulk and Vaqar-ul-Mulk were officers and contributed many articles to Tahzib-ul-Akhlaq. Mohammad Husain Azad wrote Ab-e-Hayat, the first history of Urdu literature. He was also an essayist and developed a new allegorical and scintillating style of Urdu prose.

In other fields like essay writing and journalism, some of the renowned personalities are Abdul Haleem 'Sharar', Abdul Majid Dariyabadi, Abul Kalam Azad, Lajpat Rai, Sulaiman Nadvi, Zafar Ali Khan, Mula Ram Wafa, etc.

Despite its short period of development, Urdu prose has made great strides and its future is still brighter.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Abdul Haee, Gule-Raana; Aejaz Husain, Mukhtasar Tarikhe-Adabe-Urdu; A.H. Junaidi, Urdu Adab ki Tarikh; Masud Hasan Khan, Muqaddamae-Tarikhe-Zabane-Urdu; Mohd. Baqar, Tarikhe-Nazmo-Nasre-Urdu; Sulaiman Nadvi, Shair-ul-Hind.

Sa.K.

PROSODY (Apabhramsha). Apabhramsha literature has some special genres and metrical types different from those we find in Prakrit and Sanskrit literature. Apabhramsha metres provide a base for the new Indo-Aryan poetry which is quite remarkable for the great range and variety of metres it uses. The poems were mostly sung before an audience and it was the basic shaping factor for a variety of metrical types and structures but, besides metres peculiar to Apabhramsha, there are others which it shares with Prakrit and Sanskrit for limited purposes.

Like the Prakrit metres, most of the Apabhramsha metres are 'matra' (quantity) metres as against the 'varna' (syllabic) metres of Sanskrit. Many of the Apabhramsha metrical types are genre-specific, i.e. certain metres are characteristically used for certain genres. Traditional manuals of Apabhramsha prosody have also, by and large, described the metres genre-wise.

Depending upon the number of lines in its stanzas, the metres were classified into Dvipadi (two lined), Chatushpadi (four-lined), Panchapadi (five-lined) and Satpadi (six-lined). Further, according to the equal or the unequal lines in the stanza, the metres were divided into Sarvasama (all lines equal), Antarasama (alternate lines equal), Ardhasama (each half with equal lines) and Samkirna (lines with unequal length).

Each verse-line consists of a specified number of matras ('moras' or syllabic instants). A short syllable has the value of one matra. A long syllable or a syllable followed by a conjunct consonant has the value of two matras. The matras of a verse-line are grouped into 'ganas' (groups), which consist of two six-matras. Rhyme was compulsory for Apabhramsha metres. Different types have different rhyme-schemes: (a) Sarvasama Chatuspadi, one rhyme for all the lines in a stanza; (b) Antarasama Chatuspadi, mostly only the even lines, but in a few cases only the odd lines rhyme; (c) Ardhasama Chatuspadi, rhyming a with b, c with d; (d) Panchapadi, c rhyming with e; (e) Satpadi, a rhymes with b, d with e, and c with f. Besides the simple metres, Apabhramsha used several compound metres (Shirsakas) in which stanzas of two or three metres were joined so as to form a single unit.

We have to depend considerably upon traditional manuals of prosody (like the Vritta-jatisamucchaya, the Svayambhucchanda, the Chandonushasana, the Kavidarpana etc.) for the correct picture of the metres of different genres, though in some cases we can check up with the actual practice in the examples preserved.

For metres in the Sandhibandha, different metres were used in the three structural parts of each of the Kadavakas constituting a Sandhi.

For the metres in the commencing piece (optional) heading the Kadavaka (a unit of epic structure), certain specified Dvipadis, Chatuspadis and Shirsakas were used for this purpose. On the basis of what we find in some important Sandhibandhas we assume the following metres were in vogue for the Kadavaka-opening betwen the ninth and the eleventh century AD: (a) Dvipadis: Manjari (21 matra per line), Hela (22), Shalabhanjika (24), Kamalekha (27), Dvipadi (28), Rachita (28), Malayamanjari (30), Aranala (30) and Gatha (30+27); (b) Chatuspadis: Malayavilasita (8), Jambhettika (9), Apsarovilasita (12), Gandhodakadhara (13), Khandaka (13), Paranaka (15), Vadanaka (16), Nidhyayika (19), Avali (20), Resavalaya (21) and Doha (13+11); (c) Shirsakas: Matra + Doha (called Radda or Vastu), Matra + Manjari, and Dvipadi + Matra + Doha.

In the case of some such Gathas in the Dvipadi and Khandaka, the language is usually Prakrit instead of Apabhramsha. These, and some other metres used for the

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kadavaka-commencing piece are described together by the metrical manuals like the Svayambhuchhanda and the Chandonushasana in special chapters called 'Khanjaka' and 'Shirshaka' which form a part of their section on Prakrit metres.

(b) For the metres in the main body of the Kadavaka, a metrical type having sixteen matras per line, with the class name Paddhadika, is used as a rule. Its three varieties are (1) Vadanaka (end: -uu or --), (2) Paddhadika (end: u-u) and (3) Paranaka (actually 15 matras per line; end: uuu or u-). These occur as rhyming couplets (Yamakas). These three are the standard narrative metres of Apabhramsha poetry. The main body of all the Kadavakas of a Sandhi is either uniformly in only one of these metres, or for different Kadavakas of a Sandhi they are used variously.

When for occasional variation the main body of the Kadavakas of a particular Sandhi are composed in a variety of metres, different from the three standard ones, we find a host of Prakrit and Aphabhramsha metres in use, even some Sanskrit ones. In Svayambhu's Paumachariya, for example, 36 different metres are used in this way in a few Sandhis. The figure for his Ritthanemichariya is 44, and for Pushpadanta's Mahapurana about 50.These include those cases also, in which for specific themes and effects, only once in a while a Kadavaka is composed in a fancy metre.

(c) For the metres in the concluding piece (Ghatta, Dhruvaka of Dhruva) of the Kadavaka, according to the traditional manuals, Dvipadis, Chatuspadis and Satpadis can occur in the Ghatta of the Kadavaka. These manuals describe one hundred and ten types of Antarasama Chatuspadis, an equal number of Ardhasama Chatuspadis, several types of Sarvasama Chatuspadis and 64 types of Dvipadis.

Each of the unequal lines of these Antarasama and Ardhasama Chatuspadis can have 7 to 16 matras. The Sarvasamas can have 9 to 17 matras per line. The Dvipadis can have 28 to 40 matras per line.

There were numerous types of Satpadi-Ghattas, with each of its two halves having equal or unequal lines each consisting of 7 to 17 matras and 24 types were specially known. They had the following structure: a, b, d and e can have equally either 7 or 8 or 9 matras, while c and f can have equally 10 to 17 matras.

We can have some idea of the actual practice of the poets from the works of Svayambhu and Puspadanta: the Paumachariya with its 90 Sandhis has 20 types of Antarasama Chatuspadi, 1 type of Ardhasama Chatuspadi, 3 types of Sarvasama Chatuspadi, and 11 types of Satpadis. The Ritthanemichariya has comparable figures, while the Mahapurana has relatively less variety (14, 3 and 10 types respectively).

(d) For the metres of the Rasabandha, the characteristically Apabhramsha type of the Rasabandha, which was a lyrical poem of modest length with some narrative content, has a Sarvasama Chatuspadi with 21 matras per line (ending in three short syllables) as its standard metre. It was variously called Rasaka or Rasavalaya (and later on, also Chatuspadi, Vastuka, Abhanaka or Rasakula). Along with it a large variety of popular metres were also used for variation. From the Samdesharasaka, which, even though a late specimen, can be taken as largely representing the earlier tradition, we find that Rasavalaya is used as the principal metre, and the other metres used for variation include Paddhadika (16 matras), Vastuka (24), Madanavatara (20), Dvipadi (28), Dohaka (13+11), Chudala Dohaka (13+16), Domilaka (10+8+14), Radda (=Matra+Dohaka), Satpada (=Rasavalaya+Ullala), Khadahadaka (=Bhramaravali+Gatha), Giti (12+18), Malini (15 syllables), Totaka (four times uu-), Bhramaravali (five times uu -) and a few others. A few more like Adilla, Madilla, Narkutaka, Vilasini, Jarangaka,etc., were also used in the Rasaka according to the traditional manuals. As most of the Rasakas are lost we are not in a position to verify this.

The Upadesha-rasayana-rasa is composed wholly in the Vadanaka metre. This seems to be a later development in the Rasaka form. There was an earlier type of Rasaka also which seems to have continued in Apabhramsha from Prakrit literature. It was a short lyrical poem, consisting of (a) four-lined stanzas in any one out of the 27 types of Dvipadis, (b) four Gitika stanzas, each following a Dvipadi stanza, and (c) four Vidarika stanzas interspersing the Dvipadis and Gitikas. The Vidarika can be a Dhruvaka, i.e. a refrain, and in that case Gitika could not occur. No actual specimens of this type of Rasaka are preserved except two or three Charchari, songs occurring incidentally in some narrative prose works. Virahanka's Vrttajatisamuchchaya aims at describing the metres and structure of this type of Rasaka.

(e) For the metres in popular songs, prayers and lyric-songs sung on auspicious occasions like marriages were composed in metres like Utsaha, Hela, Vadanaka and Adilla. They were known as Mangalas.

Songs in praise of a distinguished person like a king or a hero (who was metaphorically referred to as an excellent white bull, dhavala) were four-lined, six-lined or eight-lined, and some specific metres were used for them as we can see from the descriptions given by Svayambhu and Hemachandra. The latter has defined the Shri, Yashas, Kirti, Guna, Bhramara and Amara varieties of the Dhavala songs. This Dhavala type also was an inheritance from Prakrit, as such songs had been written since the opening centuries of the Christian era by famous poets like Satavahana. No Apabhramsha Dhavalas are preserved except the illustrations composed by Hemachandra in his Chhandonushasana.

The songs adoring or eulogizing deities were known as Phulladakas. For these, metres like Utsaha (24 matras) were used, but usually these songs violated most of the metrical rules.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Songs eulogizing any person were called Jhambatakas. A metre of 14 matras was used for this purpose.

No specimen of Apabhramsha Phulladakas and Jhambatakas is preserved.

The Charya songs composed by the Buddhist Siddhas of the Sahajayana sect were either in Doha or Vadanaka metres, or else they had a very loose metrical structure of popular songs.

Many of the above mentioned metres (and literary genres) of Apabhramsha poetry continued to be in use with various modifications in the early and medieval periods, of several new Indo-Aryan literatures, and some of them continue to be used even today in folk-poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.C. Bhayani (ed.), Paumachariu (Bombay, 1953-1960); H.C. Velankar (ed.), Vrttajati-samuchchaya (Jodhpur, 1962), Kavidarpana (Jodhpur, 1962), and Chhandonushasana (Bombay, 1961); Jinavijaya Muni and H.C. Bhayani (ed .), Samdesharasaka (Bombay, 1945); L. Alsdorf (ed.), Harivamshapurana (Hamburg, 1936); M.C. Modi (ed.), Chakkammuvaeso (Baroda, 1972).

H.C.B.

PROSODY (Assamese). The basic rhythm of verse in Assamese metre rests on the regular recurrence of syllable-clusters, either of equal length or of some well-organized pattern in the order of their succession. But its rhythm never demands, unlike Sanskrit or English metre, a fixed pattern of the varying types of syllables within the body of the metrical sections. However, the pattern within each foot-division, though essentially free in the arrangement of syllables, is based upon a contrast of two different varieties of syllables. Of the two varieties, one is known as open syllable (mukta dal), and the other as closed syllable (ruddha dal). A syllable ending in a vowel, with or without an onset of consonants, which may vary from one to three, is an open syllable, e.g., a, ki, spa, skru. Similarly, a closed syllable represents almost anything of such a kind : (i) two conjoined vowels, (ii) some diphthongs, (iii) consonants ending in dipthongs, or (iv) all phonemes ending in consonants with single vowel interludes. Closed syllables are like ai, iu, sau, snan, etc.

Assamese prosody regards a foot-division (parba) as the base of its metre. Needless to say, a foot-division is formed by the insertion of a pause (yati) at regular intervals, which intervenes in the undulation of the syllable clusters. In the Assamese metre, it has been observed, the pause is felt naturally in relation to sound and musical time at a position whenever the circuit of a syllable-cluster of four to seven units is completed. It may be noted, parenthetically, sometimes it tends to cover as many as eight or ten units at a stretch, which but gives rise to the formation of a twin foot-division (yugma parba). On the secondary level of the rhythm in the Assamese metre, a verse-line (charan or pankti) is formed on the structure of a combination of foot-divisions from two to six in number in conformity to a definite pattern of their arrangement. Besides, in all end-stop verses (yatiprantik chhanda), the final sense-pause (bhavayati) and the final metrical pause (chhandayati) tend to synchronize though chronologically not in their occurrences. In the same way, on the tertiary level of rhythm, a stanza (stavak) manifests in the combination of verse-lines ranging from two to eight in number in accordance with a definite pattern. Ordinarily, the verse-lines in the Assamese metre follow a definite rhyme-scheme within the stanza they belong to; and the end-rhymes serve both the purpose of the natural melody of the verse-line and the approach of a metrical pause suited to it which defines itself as a line on the structural plane.

The Assamese prosody recognizes three different styles of metre which differ from one another in relation to the mode of grouping of the syllables as unit or units. The moric style (matravritta) in which isometrism is based on the aggregate of the fixed values of the syllables grouped together is the simplest in the technique of construction as far as scansion is concerned, and is also the most musical in effect. As for the fixed value of syllables, it is commonly accepted that an open syllable represents the standard duration of a short vowel providing the mora (kala) of the unit. As for the closed syllable, it measures twice the length of that of the standard unit.

Then, there is another composite style (yaugik) in which isometrism is based upon the aggregate variable values of the syllables as they are grouped together. In this style, the time-values of the syllables are variable in the sense that they take notice of the dual nature of the closed syllables as manifest in terms of unit. This dual nature of a closed syllable depends upon its position within the word it belongs to and also upon the varying nature of the word itself. Generally, a closed syllable in this style is invariably bimoric when it occupies the final position of a word, and it tends to be monomoric when it is a Sanskrit loan-word placed not in the final position. As for the nature of its rhythm, it has a flowing movement in sharp contrast to the rippling flow of the pure moric style.

As for the third style, which is known as the syllabic style (swaravritta), its isometrism rests on the aggregate of the number of syllables with no reference to their individual time-values. Besides, the style admits what is the only variety of tetrasyllabic metre. Its regular periodicity is attained on the basis of four syllables carrying the weight of six units in terms of mora. It happens because of a natural propensity of the tongue to dwell a bit longer over certain syllables on the time scale, and even more when an accented syllable comes in the way. Furthermore, its internal and deeper rhythm is enriched by some overtones of accent-variations colouring the fundamental rhythm using for its base a contrast of qualities in the two kinds of syllables. It may be noted that sometimes the overtones become so prominent that the fundamental rhythm itself gets supplanted. It is because of this that the undulation of the syllable-clusters in this style lends the impression of a series of high and low ripples, instead of long and short ones as felt in the other two styles.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Assamese prosodists have some very poetic names bestowed upon the numerous verse-forms prevalent in the Assamese metre and the most popular ones are the ekavali (6.5), kasum-mala (6.6), payar (8.6), dulari (6.6.8), chabi (8.8.6.4), chaupadi (8.8.8.6) and lechari (6.4.6.4.8.6). There are many others built on permutation and combination of these traditional verse-forms. However, with the coming of blank verse and free verse all regular patterns of metre completely disappeared, making the whole business of metrical equation irrelevant to Assamese prosody.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mahendra Bora, Asamiya kavitar chhanda (Gauhati, 1962), Fundamentals of Assamese Metre (Dibrugarh, 1977).; Navakanta Barua, Asamiya chhanda silpar bhumika (Gauhati, 1962); Tirthanath Sarma, Sahitya vidya parikrama (Pathsala, 1962).

M.B.

PROSODY (Bengali). Unlike music which has very little to do with the accents and intonations of a spoken language, prosody has to depend, to a very large extent, on the characteristic speech habit of a particular people. Indeed, it is the systematisation of the phonetic characteristics of a language, its mode of pronunciation and particularly its dynamic character that constitutes the art of versification in that language. It should be stated at the very outset that the long vowels of Sanskrit and its Prakrit followers have lost their quantitative value in Bengali pronunciation. In Bengali all vowels are normally pronounced as short though all of them may be lengthened under certain circumstances. In versification this lengthening of vowels is regulated in different ways, and this has given rise to three distinct systems of versification in the language. The next important point to note is that Bengali verse movement is rather symmetrical than rhythmical and that this movement is regulated according to a traditional or new design chosen by the poet. This is how endless and diverse forms of verse have emerged and enriched Bengali poetical literature. It should also be stated here that Bengali verse, though not rhythmical in the proper sense, has some sort of an undulating motion with a kind of gentle rise and fall required by the speech habit of the people. This subdued quality of the Bengali language was first detected by Rabindranath who succeeded in intensifying it by resorting to various devices so as to impart a fairly perceptible rhythmic quality to many of his compositions. But they are too fine to be felt by those who are not habitually familiar with Bengali articulation.

The dynamic character of a couplet of Bengali verses involves the simultaneous existence of four different movements, viz., those of the syllable (dala), the foot (parva), the clause (pada) and the verse (pangkti) two of which go to form a distich or couplet (jugmaka). Of these four metrical divisions the syllable, as the unit of articulate speech, ultimately governs the whole system of metrics. Hence it deserves to be properly analysed in a discussion of prosody. As the essential part of a syallable is the vowel, a brief account of Bengali vowels should be given at the outset.

For prosodical purposes Bengali vowels, instead of being classified as short (hrasva) and long (dirgha) in the traditional manner, should be placed in two groups, viz., open and closed. Bengali open vowels (mukta svar) are only six in number: a,a,i,e,o,u; while closed vowels (ruddha svar) are at least sixteen in number: ai̱, au̱, ae̱, (ay̱), ao̱,; āi̱, āu̱, āe̱ (āy), āo̱; ūi̱; ui̱ ei̱; eu̱; ee̱; (ey̱), eo̱; oe̱ (oy), oo̱. In Sanskrit there are only two closed vowels (ai̱, au̱) which are shown in writing as single alphabetical letters though their composite character is unmistakably felt in pronunciation. In Bengali the two traditional closed vowels are written both as single letters and as double letters. Each of the above sixteen pairs of vowels is pronounced by a single effort of the vocal organ and therefore should be regarded as a single vowel. The first component of a closed vowel, which is fully pronounced and hence called 'mukhya svar', is its substantive part; the second component, pronounced only partially and called 'khanda svar', is its complementary part.

The syllable may be defined as the unit of pronunciation forming a word or part of a word and containing one vowel sound, open or closed, and often consonant(s) on one side or both, the whole being uttered together. Like vowels syllables also are of two kinds: (1) open syllables, i.e., those which terminate with an open vowel and are not followed by a consonant, and (2) closed syllables, i.e., those which contain either an open vowel followed by one consonant or more or a closed vowel which may or may not be followed by consonants. Thus the first syllable of the words ai.ra.va.ta, sau.ra.bha, sun.da.ra, and vais-.na-va. are closed and the rest are open.

There is no term in Sanskrit or its successors that may be regarded as fully synonymous with the English word 'syllable,' both open and closed. In Sanskrit 'akshara' and 'varna' are synonymous with each other and both of them may mean a letter or an open syllable, but not a closed syllable. Sanskrit as well as Bengali usage allows us to say that the word 'kavita' consists of three 'aksharas' or 'varnas' (meaning 'open syllables'); on the other hand it also allows us to say that this word kavita consists of six aksharas or varnas (meaning 'letters'). According to Sanskrit prosody the word 'samprikta' consists of three aksharas: sa. mpri. kta, but phonetically it consists of three syllables: sam. prik. ta. To avoid this ambiguity and incongruity, we may accept the word 'dhvani-dala' (lit. 'a piece of sound') or preferably simply dala, technically meaning a 'syllable' in the comprehensive sense, that is, meaning both open and closed syllables at the same time. Hence the expressions 'open syllable' and 'closed syllable' may be conveniently rendered as mukta dala and ruddha dala respectively in Indian languages. These technical terms are now widely used by Bengali prosodists and have been in use for a fairly long period.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The quantitative values of both kinds of syllable in Bengali versification are determined by the mode of their pronunciation. An open syllable, when pronounced singly, is invariably lengthened so as to cover twice as much sound quantity as it would if pronounced with other syllables. Thus the word ma. ta when pronounced in the normal way would contain two units of sound quantity called kala (mora). But if we pronounce the syllables ma and ta separately, each of them will naturally be lengthened and cover two such units of sound, that is, each of them will acquire a bimoric value.

Cha. li cha.li / pa-pa- / ta.li ta.li / jay. All of the eight open syllables of the first and third feet of this line are short and unimoric (ekakala), for they are pronounced together with the adjacent syllable of the same word. But the two open syllables of the second foot are pronounced separately and are, therefore, long and bimoric (dvikala). But it should be clearly stated that the use of bimoric open syllables is very seldom found in Bengali verses, for open syllables even of monosyllabic words are not generally pronounced singly. On the other hand, closed syllables are frequently lengthened so as to occupy the space of two more as they are compressed into the space of one mora only for metrical purposes. This elastic character of the closed syllable is greatly responsible for imparting a very rich rhythmic variety to Bengali versification.

Closed syllables of both short and long varieties have always been in use in Bengali literature for ages. But it was Rabindranath who first discovered the potential energy latent in the closed syllable, and when he released and utilised that energy in a regulated manner three distinct systems of versification emerged in a short period of a few years (1887-1900).

There is a very large class of metres forming by far the major part of Bengali poetry, in which closed syllables of both kinds, the short (unimoric) and the long (bimoric) come into full play at the same time. This system of versification, in which both the unimoric and bimoric values of closed syllables are utilised in a reasonably ordered manner, may with propriety be called 'Misravritta' (composite), a term now widely used by Bengali prosodists. This has been the standard system of versification for centuries. But it was in a more or less amorphous or fluid state until the eighteenth century when the poet Bharatchandra Ray (1712-60), the greatest artist, so far, in versification, stabilised it by following the principle of written characters (called aksharas in Bengali) in his own versifying, instead of a phonetic principle. Hence this system came to be known as 'aksharavritta', obviously a misleading term, and continued to be in use until the advent of Rabindranath who gave the finishing touches to this system and placed it on the sure foundation of a phonetic principle by recognising and utilising the dual function of the closed syllable system in an ordered manner.

E. sun. dar / a.ran.yer / pal.la.ber /sta.re. In this line there are six closed syllables of which three (dar, yer, ber) are ultimate (i.e.,belonging to the end of a word) and the remaining three (sun, ran, pal) are either initial or penultimate. What is important to note here is that according to Bengali speech habit all the three ultimate closed syllables are long and bimoric in value, while the other three are short and unimoric. The open syllables are short and unimoric everywhere. Monosyllabic words consisting of an open syllable are generally pronounced together with either the preceding or the succeeding word and are therefore regarded as short and unimoric. That is why the first open syllable of the first foot of the above example, viz., the syllable 'e', forming a separate word by itself (meaning 'this'), has to be pronounced together with the next succeeding word and as such it is short and unimoric.

There is another system of versification in which all closed syllables, irrespective of their position in a word, are generally lengthened in recitation and are, therefore, regarded as bimoric, while the open syllables remain short and unimoric.

This system has very reasonably been called Kalavritta (moric). The kalavritta system may be viewed as the Bengali counterpart of the Sanskrit and Prakrit system known as Matravritta.

Chan.chal / mau. ma. chi / gun.ja.ri / gay. be-.nu.bane / mar. ma. re / dak. shin / bay.

In these two lines there are nine closed syllables, of which five (chan, mau, gun, mar, dak) are initial and the rest are ultimate, single closed syllables forming separate words by themselves (gay, bay) being regarded as ultimate. All of them, irrespective of their positions in a word, are invariably recited as long and are, therefore, bimoric. Open syllables are invariably short and unimoric. It is thus clear that all full feet (purna parva) are tetramoric and the last two truncated feet (khandita parva) are bimoric, the total number of morae in each verse being fourteen.

There is a third system of versification in Bengali which may be termed Dalavritta (syllabic), for it is mainly based on the number of syllables in each foot, irrespective of their open and closed varieties.

A.pa.ta.ta./ ei a.nan.de / gar.be be.rai / ne.che, ka.li.das to / na. mei a. chen / a.mi a.chi / ben.che. Except the last two truncated feet which are disyllabic (dvidala) all feet are tetrasyllabic (chaturdala), the total number of syllables in each verse being fourteen. Upon observation it will be found that in two feet all the four syllables are open, in one foot there is only one closed syllable and in three others the number of closed syllables is limited to two, without considering their position in a foot. The principal conditions, which this syllabic system is subjected to, are as follows: All feet of a syllabic verse except the last one, which may or may not be truncated, generally consist of four syllables of which at least one, but preferably two, should be closed with occasional exceptions of (i) a foot of four open syllables and (ii) a foot of three syllables of which at least the first two are closed.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Two consecutive closed syllables are generally avoided, as they are likely to disturb the metrical balance with a jarring effect on the ear. But this condition is not binding, and poets very often violate it unscrupulously in cases of poetical necessity, as will be found in the example quoted below.

A.mi. ja.di/jan.ma ni.tem/ka.li.da.ser/ka.le, dai.be ha.tem/da. sham rat.na/ na.ba.rat.ner/ma.le. In fact, this is admittedly the easiest and most natural system of versification in Bengali.

The three main metrical divisions, viz.,the verse (pangkti), the clause (pada) and the foot (parva) are determined by a full pause (purnajati), a medial pause (ardhajati) and a light pause (laghujati) respectively, graded according to their intensity or strength. For obvious reasons these pauses may also be called pangkti-jati, pada-jati and parva-jati respectively. The term pada should be carefully distinguished from the term 'foot' of English prosody as well as from 'pada' (or charana) of Sanskrit prosody. A verse composed of one pada, two, three or four padas (clauses) has traditionally come to be known as ekapadi, dvipadi, tripad or chaupadi, respectively, according to the number of its component parts. A pada again generally consists of two or three payars and, so, it may be described as dviparvika (two-footed) or triparvika (three-footed) respectively. A parva, which may be regarded as the basic division of Bengali verse, is composed of matras (metrical units), which may vary from four to seven in number. Bengali matras belong to two distinct categories, viz., the dala-matra (syllabic unit), and the kala-matra (moric unit). These two distinct kinds of metrical units have given rise to the two different systems of Bengali versification, viz., the dalavritta (syllabic) and the kalavritta (moric). The latter under the influence of local articulation habit was, in the course of time, modified into what is now known as mishra-kalavritta or simply mishravritta (composite).

In Sanskrit and Prakrit prosody matra and kala are regarded as synonymous terms, though their etymological senses are not identical. This is because all Sanskrit and Prakrit verses were considered fundamentally quantitative, that is, moric and nothing like Bengali syllabic metres was in vogue at that time, and as such there was no necessity for differentiating the one from the other. Bengali prosody has, however, to deal with two distinct streams of versification based on two kinds of metrical units. It is, therefore, necessary to make a distinction between the terms, matra and kala. For this reason in Bengali prosody the word 'matra' has to be taken in its primary sense (unit of measure) so that it may be equally applied to both categories of versification, dalavritta and kalavritta (simple and composite), the term kala (lit., particle, minute portion) being reserved to mean a 'more' (unit of metrical quantity) in the technical sense.

The smallest and commonest verse division is the chatur-matra parva style (four-unit foot) which may be composed in three different styles (riti), viz., dalavritta, kalavritta and mishravritta. Three examples of these styles are given below in the same order.

Mrityuke je / eriye chale // mrityu tarei /tane, mrityu jara / buk pete lay // banchte tarai / jane.
Bandire /diye gechha // muktir / sudha, satyer / bara-male // sajale ba : sudha.

Janmechhi je / martya-kole // ghhrina kari / tare chhutiba na / svarga ar // mukti khunji : bare.

The word 'eriye' in the first example is read as 'edye' and, so, it has only two syllables, not three. Such examples are very often found in dalavritta verses. In kalavritta verses of both varieties composed of tetramoric feet (chatushkala parva) the light pause (laghujati) is often ignored or obscured so that a clause (full or truncated) composed of two feet is recited without break. Such elision of light pauses (laghujati-lopa: indicated by an erect line of two dots) occurs very often in kalavritta and mishravritta verses composed of tetramoric feet, and less frequently in dalavritta verses composed of tetrasyllabic feet. No keen observer will fail to feel that the second pause indicated by two erect lines in each verse (pangkti) of the above examples is weaker than the one at its end (that need not be shown by any sign), but stronger than the other two, in other words, it is of medium strength. Hence it is called ardhajati. This medial pause divides the whole verse into two unequal parts or clauses (padas), the full clause (purna pada) and the truncated clause (khandita or apurna pada). A verse consisting of two padas is known as dvipadi. A dvipadi verse that has eight and six matras (syllabic or moric) in its two padas, respectively, is known as Payar. This Payar variety of dvipadi is the most well-known traditional verse form in Bengali literature. Like almost all verse forms the Payar form also may be composed in three styles and may thus be known as dalavritta Payar, kalavritta Payar or mishravritta Payar, as shown above. A longer form of Payar was introduced by the poet Rangalal Benerjee in 1858, and is now known as Mahapayar or Dirghapayar. This longer payar consists of two padas having eight and ten matras respectively.

Jare tumi / niche phela // se tomare / bandhibe je / niche, pashchate re : khechha jare // se tomare pashchate ta: nichhe.

This is an instance of mishravritta Mahapayar, which is generally used to express serious ideas. Dalavritta and kalavritta mahapayaras are also in use, but not commonly.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The next important traditional verse form is the tripadi having three padas of different lengths arranged in different orders, but generally in the order of 8+8+6 or 10 matras. The following couplet is an example of mishravritta tripadi of 8+8+6 matras.

E bal ko : thay, pele // apan ko : ler chhele eta jare / tane :
e nishthur / jara-shrote // prem elo / kotha hate
manaber / prane :

Dalavritta and Kalavritta tripadis are also very common. Another traditional verse form is the chaupadi composed in three styles usually having 8+8+6 matras in its four padas. An instance of mishravritta chaupadi is given below.

Nairashya kabhu na jane, // bipatti kichhu na mane, apurba amrita prane // ananta nabin, eman mayer pran // je bishver / konokhane tilek peyechhe sthan, // se ki matrihin ?

In these two verses all the parva-jati except one remain unexpressed (abyakta) in recitation and are not shown here by any sign. It should be noted that in cases of such elision of light pauses (jatilopa) the matras are generally distributed in the order 3-3-2 in a full pada and in the order of 3-3 in curtailed pada. There is no dearth of dalavritta and kalavritta chaupadis also in Bengali literature.

The panchakala parva is used only in the kalavritta (moric) style. Here is an instance of the tripadi verse form based on panchakala parvas:

Pancha-share / dagdha kare // karechha e ki sannyasi
diyechha tare / bishvamay / chha raye.

Obviously this is an adaptation of a verse-form from Jayadeva's well-known song (Gitam 19) beginning with vadasi yadi kinchidapi, etc. There is an intentional lacuna of one kala at the end of the second pada.

The Satkala parva of the mishravritta (composite) style was in very common use till the end of the nineteenth century, but this has gone out of use in the present. Nowadays this is used only in the moric style. Indeed, of all the moric foot-forms the most favourite is this hexamoric foot.

Mayur-kanthi / parechhi kankan / khani, durba-shyamal / anchal bakshe / tani.

This is an instance of the ekapadi verse form (i.e., without ardhajati in the verse) based on the satkala parva. Ekapadi verses are not extensively used in any style. The dvipadi, tripadi and chaupadi verse forms based on the satkala parva are quite common.

The saptakala of the composite style also has gone out of use in the present century, and in the simple moric style also its use is not very extensive. The saptadala parva also, not unknown in the past, has not very much ground in recent times.

The most important innovations of modern times relate to the mishravritta payar. The end-stopped riming (sa-mil) lines of the traditional short Payar of fourteen matras, usually with an ardhajati after the eight, easily tended to become monotonous and was not considered a suitable vehicle for epic poems. So Madhusudan Dâtta (1824-73) took courage to do away with the shackles of rimes and fixed pauses, and thus turned the pages into a kind of rimeless (a-mil) and enjambed (pravahaman) Payar, formerly known as amitrakshar Payar (1859) and generally taken for the Bengali counterpart of Miltonian blank verse. This new Payar was very successfully used by Madhusudan in his great epic poem, the Meghnadvad kavya (1861) which was entirely based on this rimeless enjambed Payar. After him came Rabindranath who used this new Payar as the vehicle of some of his dramas, such as, Raja o rani (1889), and Bisarjan (1890). At the same time he introduced a riming variety of this enjambed Payar for some of his longer lyrical poems of a serious nature. His next step was to give the long Payar of eighteen matras the enjambed character, with or without rime. It is enough to state here that his well-known poems 'Meghdut' (Manasi kavya) and 'Ebar phirao more' (Chitra kavya) may very well be taken as two good representatives of the riming variety of the short and long enjambed Payar respectively.

Then it was felt that the fixed length of the Payar verse, short or long, was also a sort of impediment in the way of the free mobility of poetic thoughts. As a result of this arose a kind of formless riming verse which has been described by Rabindranath as bera-bhanga or gandi bhanga (i.e., "fenceless" or "cordonless") Payar. This formless Payar first appeared in his Balaka (1916) and is now generally known as muktaka Payar or simply Muktak:

Nidarun dukkha-rate // mrityu-ghate manush churnila jabe // nija martya-sima takhan dibe na dekha // debatar amar mahima?

It should be noted that, though all conventional rules about the length of Payar verses as well as their pauses and rimes at fixed places or in fixed order were dispensed with, the fundamental laws of composing matras as well as those of parva and pada formation were retained. The above example of muktak Payar is composed according to the mishravritta style. The muktak Payar composed in dalavritta style, which also goes to the credit of Rabindranath, made its first appearance in his Balaka, but attained perfection in his Palataka (1918).

It is almost certain that in the earliest period of known history two parallel and distinct systems of versification were prevalent in Bengal. One was of indigenous origin based on the local speech habit, and used in unwritten folk literature while the other was an exotic system imposed on Bengali polite literature. The indigenous system found its way later into written literature and came to be known as Lachari or Nachari, but it was generally reserved for the use of the lower ranks. The oldest specimens of this folk style (Laukika or Daisika riti) are found in Bijay Gupta's Manasamangal (15th c). The Dhamali songs of Lachandas (16th c.), supposed to be sung by women, were very ably composed in this style, but the devotional songs of Ramprasad Sen (1720-81) gave it a status of honour and paved its way into polite or serious literature. Later, Rabindranath, Dwijendralal, Satyendranath and others enriched this system with much strength, beauty and almost endless variety of forms, and placed it almost equally with the traditional standard style (sadhu riti), now technically called mishravritta. The old folk style Lachari is now known as Dalavritta for reasons explained above. The exotic system of versification, then known as matravritta, was prevalent in polite literature which adopted the Apabhramsha (or Avahatta) language as its medium. This classical matravritta style gradually came to be imposed on Old Bengali, as is evident from the Charya songs, but this exotic system could not be assimilated, the local speech habit being too strong for such assimilation. This maladjustment is also a salient feature of the metrical composition of the Charya songs and cannot be missed by a careful observer. The influence of the matravritta style gradually dwindled and the local Bengali speech habit asserted itself more and more, and out of this admixture appeared a new variety of verse style, found in Baru Chandidasa's Shrikrishna-kirtan (15th c.), which after further development came to be known as aksharavritta and now called mishravritta as stated above. Though the exotic matravritta system had disappeared from the scene for some time, it reappeared soon with Brajabuli, an artificial language very often adopted by the Vaishnava poets, Govindadas, Jnanadas and others for their Padavali songs. The Apabhramsha matravritta metres in Brajabuli garb, and set to melodious tunes, were not very repugnant to Bengali ears. Yet the normal speech habit of the Bengali poets sometimes asserted itself and adversely so affected the metrical composition of their Padavali songs that the traditional long vowels were now and then treated as short, thus maintaining the required metrical quantity of the verse divisions as far as possible. It should be noted that the Vaishnava poets resorted to the archaic matravritta style only in their Brajabuli padavalis while the mishravritta was the prevailing style of their Bengali padavalis. In time the Brajabuli went out of vogue and with it the old matravritta style, but towards the end of the nineteenth century (1887-90) Rabindranath revived this style by adapting it to the prevailing Bengali speech habit. The archaic matravritta in this new life has been renamed kalavritta for reasons explained before. This kalavritta style, which with its largest variety of forms has now become the chief medium of Bengali lyric poetry, may be regarded as the greatest contribution of Rabindranath to Bengali versification.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bengali prosody can, by no means, be considered to be a part of the heritage of continuation of the classical prosody, though some very meagre and indirect influence of the old matravritta style may be traced in its early stages as shown before. On the other hand, the departure from classical prosody from the very beginning may be regarded as the most important factor that characterises the history of Bengali versification. So, no comparison can profitably be instituted between Bengali prosody and that of most other Indian languages except perhaps Assamese and Oriya.

Classical (Sanskrit and Prakrit) prosody deals with two distinct styles of versification, aksharavritta (or varnavritta) and matravritta (or jati). Of these two the aksharavritta style had nothing to do with the origin and development of Bengali metres. On the other hand, though the Bengali metres phonetically deviated from the Apabhramsha matravritta to a great extent even in the remote past, it succeeded in retaining at least two of its verse forms, viz., the Padakulaka (of 8+8 matras) and the Chaupaia (of 2/ 8+8+12 matras) which were in the course of time transformed into the two most important verse forms of Bengali, the Payar (of 8+6 matras) and the Tripadi (of 8+8+10 matras) respectively. This is the richest legacy received by Bengali from its predecessor.

It must be noted that the Padakulaka in later times came to be known as Chaupai in Hindi prosody which is quite different from Prakrit Chaupaia. The term Chaupaia again should be carefully distinguished from the Bengali term Chaupadi, for Prakrit Chaupaia (Chatushpadika) means a tetrastich, i.e., a group of 4 verses (padas) whereas Bengali Chaupadi means a verse composed of 4 clauses (padas). The first two matras of each verse of the Chaupaia in reality require to be treated as an anacrusis (atiparva) in recitation. It is apparent that in the Chaupaia tetrastich there used to be verse rimes in the order of a a b b. In addition to this the first two caesuric divisions of 8 matras usually rimed with each other. It also seems that sometimes the internal rimes were dispensed with. In the course of time the anacrusis of two matras came to be dropped. Instances of this lopped variety of the Chaupaia are found in the Padavali songs of Jayadeva as well as in the Charya songs which may be regarded as the immediately preceding stage of the Bengali Tripadi. In later time the Chaupaia without the anarcrusis became known as Sara in Hindi prosody.

It is now an admitted fact that the union of the exotic matravritta and the indigenous proto-lachari style has in time given rise to the modern Bengali standard (sadhu) style of versification. This hybrid system, which is popularly known as aksharavritta, definitely a misnomer, is now technically called mishravritta, a name indicative of its origin and its constitution at the same time. Though the classical matravritta system failed to be naturalised in Bengali, some of its froms (not found in the Prakrita-paingala except the Padakulaka and the Chaupaia) were rendered into Sanskrit by Jayadeva in the Padavali songs of his Gitagovinda. Some of these matravritta verse forms were directly borrowed later by Bharatchandra, Rabin-

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

dranath and others for their songs in which the moric values of Sanskrit long and short vowels are scrupulously maintained; e.g., Jayadeva's

'Chandana-charchita // nilakalevara // pitavasanavana // - mali' is the metrical model (Prakrit lopped Chaupaia. later Hindi Sara) of Rabindranath's well-known song (now our national anthem)-- Janagana-mana-adhi //- nayaka jaya he// Bharata-bhagya bidhata. But in the penultimate or third line of each stanza of the anthem some alteration was made for the sake of variation. It should, however, be noted that the first syllable (Pan) of the verse 'Panjaba-Sindhu' etc. has to be treated as an anacrusis (atiparva) and not as a constituent part of it, and the syllable 'he' of the word 'gahe' in the last stanza is required to be pronounced short for metrical necessity. Dwijendralal Ray's well-known song 'Patitoddharini Gange' is another good example of the same metrical pattern. The Sanskrit Pajjhatika chhanda (same as Pada-kulaka of Prakrita-paingala) as found in Shankaracharya's Mohamudgara was directly adopted by Dwijendralal in his sarcastic poem, 'Karna-bimardan'. But such examples of direct adoption of Sanskrit metres in Bengali are very rare. They are sometimes adopted in songs mainly for their classical or musical effect or for both, and in ordinary recitable poems for their comic effect.

Verse forms adapted from Jayadeva's Sanskrit Pada-valis and made suitable for Bengali recitation are also found in the writings of Rabindranath, Bijaychandra and others.

Poet Narahari Chakravarti (early 18th century) tried to introduce classical varnavritta (as well as matravritta) verse forms into Bengali on a large scale, but he utterly failed to leave his legacy behind. Bharatchandra, his abler contemporary, experimented with only a few minor varnavritta verse forms, such as Tunaka, Totaka, Bhujanga-prayata etc. with some success, but they have always been regarded only as curios from classical metres in Bengali. In the last four decades of the nineteenth century a group of poets, Bhuvanmohan Raychaudhuri, Baladev Palit, Bijaychandra Majumdar, Hargobinda Laskar and others made bold attempts to introduce into Bengali even the major varnavritta verse forms in the classical way, but their attempts have come to nothing. For, the classical way of intonation goes directly against the grain of Bengali speech habit. In fact, Bankimchandra, Rabindranath and others openly denounced all such vain attempts at introducing the classical style and verse forms into Bengali. Only a few specimens of varnavritta verses written in the classical fashion have, however, been saved from oblivion for their successful comic effect, e.g., a few stanzas in Shikharini and only one stanza in Mandakranta by Dvijendranath Thakur (1840-1926) as well as a fairly long poem named 'Kalivaina' in Anustup by Dwijendralal Ray (1883-1913). Satyendranath Datta (1882-1922), a master poet in versification, while conscious of the futility of using long vowels in the classical way, hoped to succeed in introducing the varied rhythmic patterns of classical verse forms into Bengali by substituting closed syllables for long vowels. His experiments with Mandakranta, Malini, Ruchira, Totaka, Panchachamara etc., far from courting immediate or utter failure, became somewhat popular with a class of poets and readers. A specimen example of Satyendranath's new Mandakranta deserves to be quoted:

Nishthur yakshesh,/ nahika kripalesh,/ rajye ar tar bichar nei, ajnar langhan/karila eke, ar/ shasti bhunjan du-jankei.
hay mor kantar/ na chhila aparadh,/mithya sayey sei katai klesh, durbhar bichchhed/ abala buke bay,/ pamshu kuntal, malin besh.

After all, this is a very poor substitute for classical Mandakranta, nor is it quite compatible with Bengali metrical tradition and habits. So it took almost no time after Satyendranath to disappear from the field leaving almost nothing behind but some museum value for prosodists.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Amulyadhan Mukherjee, Bangla chhander mul-sutra (1962); Anandmohan Basu, Bangla padabalir chhanda (1968); Dilipkumar Ray Chhandasiki (1968); Nilratan Sen. Adhunik Bangla-chhanda, 2 Vols. (1979-80); Prabodhechandra Sen, Chhandaparikrama (1977), 'Rabindranath: The Architect of Bengali Versification' in Visva-Bharati Quarterly, May (1981) to April (1982); P.C. Sen, Chhanda-sopan (1980), Bangla chhander rupakar Rabindranath (1981), Bangla chhanda-chintar krama-bikas (1978), Adhunik Bangla chhanda-chintar krama-bikas (1978), and Adhunki Bangla chhanda-sahitya (1980); Rabindranath Tagore, Chhanda (3rd ed., 1976); Ram Bhal Tewari, Adhunik Bangla of Hindi chhanda (1977); Suhridkumar Bhowmik, Bangla chhander bibartan (1978); Tarapada Bhattacharya, Chhanda-tattva o chhandobibartan (1971); Tarapada Mukherjee, Bangla chhanda (1980).

P.C.S.

PROSODY (Dogri). Dogri does not have any prosody or prosodic literature of its own. Dogri poets have, by and large, followed prosodic forms used in Sanskrit, Hindi or Urdu poetry, depending on their literary background or current practice. It is not, therefore, surprising that the two writers, Champa Sharma and Satyapal Shrivatsa 'Vikal', have confined their study on the subject to the use of Hindi metric forms, or chhandas as seen in Dogri poetry. Champa Sharma, in her book Dogri kavya charcha (1970), enumerates some Hindi metric forms with illustrations from Dogri poetry. Shrivatsa 'Vikal' also illustrates the use of some Hindi metric forms with examples from Dogri poetry in his article published in Shiraza in 1974.

The early poets of Dogri, Devi Ditta (Dattu), Rudra Dutt, Shivram, Trilochan, Gangaram, Ramdhan and their other contemporaries display good metrical skill in their compositions, as some of them were well-acquainted with Sanskrit and Hindi (Brajbhasha) prosodic forms and literature. Even an unlettered poet like Lakkhu shows remarkable skill of versifying in metrical forms of Brajbhasha. The Dogri poets of the 40's and 50's, like Hardutt Sharma, Dinu Bhai 'Pant', Ramnath Shastri, Vedpal 'Deep', Yash Sharma, Shambhunath Sharma, Parmanand 'Almast', Kehari Singh 'Madhukar', Padma Sachdev and Raghunath Singh Samyal wrote their compositions in metrical forms like doha, kundali (kundaliya), chaupai, kavitta, savaiyya, and rhyme and measure patterns of Hindi chhandas, and bahars used in Urdu ghazal in the case of Dogri ghazal. Dogri literature had no tradition of verse composition in the form of free verse. An outstanding name in prosodic perfection in Dogri poetry is that of Krishna Smailpuri who exploited all kinds of Hindi and Urdu metres and brought his metrical skill into play in his poems and ghazals. Swami Brahmanand Tirth used the common metrical form of Dogri folk ballads in his verse compositions on Vedanta.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Young poet Charan Singh was the first Dogri poet to use free verse in Dogri poetry effectively. Some older poets like Padma Sachdev, and a number of new poets like Jitendra Udhampuri, Shivram 'Deep', Om Prakash Sharma 'Sarathi', Mohan Singh and Kunwar 'Viyogi' have taken to free verse. A new trend in Dogri poetry after 1960 has been a revolt against the set patterns of metre and form, as reflected in the work of new poets mentioned above. Lately, Dogri ghazal has assumed an important position in Dogri poetry, and one comes across several lapses of metrical discipline in this popular form of verse composition also.

These days both forms of poetry, viz. metrically fettered and free verse, are prevalent. Some poets practise both the styles.

Ch.S.

PROSODY (Gujarati). Pingal pravesh (1845) was the first work on prosody in Gujarati written by Narmadashankar Dave. It gives information about the metres which were commonly used in Gujarati poetry. His contemporary, Dalpatram (1820-1898), who had studied prosody from Devanand Swami, the preceptor of his sect, wrote a book on the subject, Dalpat pingal, giving a comprehensive picture of all the Sanskrit as well as Gujarati metres with copious illustrations. Thus by the middle of the nineteenth century, Gujarati literature had two authentic works of prosody. In 1902, Ranchhodbhai Udayram (1837-1923) published Rana pingal in three volumes. It is a voluminous work on prosody in which he has not only scanned Gujarati and Sanskrit metres, but also the ones like Abhanga, Dindi, and Ovi which were borrowed from Marathi. Ran pingal is a remarkable work as it is the first detailed and comprehensive work on metres.

In 1932, Keshavlal Dhruva's (1859-1937) Padyaracha-nani aitihasik samalochna was published. It is a critical review of the evolution of prosody from Vedic metres to the Gujarati metres through Apabhramsha and Prakrit metres. It is a monumental research work on prosody.

Ramnarayan Pathak (1887-1955) has to his credit two works on prosody. Prachin Gujarati chhando (1948) is the first work in which he has minutely examined the nature of rules governing the composition of metres ranging from the Doha of Apabhramsha to the Deshis of Dayaram, covering the evolution of metres in old and medieval Gujarati literature. His second work. Brihat pingal, is a monumental work, on Gujarati prosody. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1956 for this work. The work is in fifteen chapters. The author has not treated the subject on traditional lines, but has given a coherent account of the evolution of metres and the forces responsible for this evolution in Gujarati.

C.M.

PROSODY (Hindi). All fine arts—music, dance and poetry-are based on rhythm. In poetry, metre is the constituent part of rhythm, and the basis of metre is organization of sound movement by accent, which may be stress, duration or pitch. Metre is not an accidental or conventional ornament of poetry, it is a vital product of the poetic spirit. It is metre that distinguishes poetry from prose. Even poems written in free verse have a pattern of sounds, a flow, and a rhythm.

The system of Hindi prosody is essentially based on Sanskrit prosody where rules of composition are quite complicated. It came of age in the Riti Kal (1650-1850). In the earliest phase, Adi Kal, the most frequently used metres were doha, chhapaya, totak, tomar, paddhari narach and vir. There is a difference of opinion, however, about doha. While Hazari Prasad Dwivedi asserts that the Hindi poets borrowed it from Apabhramsha, Ram Gopal Sharma 'Dinesh' claims that it is of Hindi origin. In support of his argument he says that the Hindi poets rejected the Apabhramsha metres pajhatika and arilla and introduced a new pattern by accepting chaupai in place of arilla. This pattern—a number of chaupais (five or seven) followed by a doha—became very popular and was later employed by a number of devotional poets, specially Jayasi and Tulsi.

In Bhakti Kal (1350-1650), the 'Nirgun' saint poets mostly used such metres as the sakhi and the shabada, besides chaupai, kavitta, and hamspada. The other saint poets—the 'Sagun' bhakta poets—however, composed songs and sang them before the audience in accompaniment with musical instruments like Tanpura, Vina, or Sitar. A few of these poets like Surdas, Haridas, etc. set their padas in various classical ragas and raginis like Jogia, Khamaj, Pillu, Bhairvi, Kaharva. In their works, poetry tends to become music. Metres used for eight-line verses were mostly kavitta and savaiyya.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PROSODY (HINDI)

Works on prosody too were written in this age. Hita-tarangini by Kripa Ram, Sahitya lahari by Surdas, Rasa-manjari by Nandadas and Chhandmala by Keshav are prominent works on prosody. From these works it is evident that the poets have not only interest in prosody but also erudition and analytical capacity to discuss the complex problems of versification.

It was, however, in Riti Kal that elaborate treatises on prosody were attempted. Almost all of them are based on either Bhatt Kedar's Vratt-ratnakar or Prakrit paengalam, an exhaustive and systematic work on prosody. Chintamani Tripathi (1600-1680), a great authority on the subject, based his Chhand-vichar on Prakrit paengalam. Bhikhari Das, after studying works on prosody written in Sanskrit and Prakrit, wrote his famous works-Chhandornav pingal and Chhand-prakash. He is different from his contemporaries in a way. First, besides defining and illustrating metres discussed in the earlier works, he introduced certain new metres. Secondly, he used Brajbhasha prose in his elucidation and commentary. Mati Ram is one of the poets of this age who undertook the task seriously. The other poets worth mentioning are Bhushan, Murlidhar and Sukhdeva Misra. Their works are Chhandoday-prakash (1966), Chhandsar-sangrah (1701) and Vratt-vichar (1761) respectively.

Poets of the Bharatendu period (1868-1900) stood on cross-roads of tradition and resurgence. And as a result the old and the new rub shoulders in prosody too. Jwala Swarup (Rudra-pingal, 1889), Umrao Singh Chhand-mahodadhi, 1878), Jagannath Prasad 'Bhanu' (Chhand-prabhakar, 1894) and Gopal Chandra 'Giridhardas' (Chhandovarnan) wrote their works on prosody on the old pattern of the Riti poets. In creative writing too they employed patterns of versification adopted by the earlier poets—rola, harigitika, kavitta and savaiyya, or composed padas or devotional songs using traditional metres like vishnupada, sarsi, sar, tatank and vir, known for their musical quality. A few explored the immense wealth of folk songs and gave Hindi poetry a number of delightful patterns. Folklore musicals like Lavani, Kajari etc. enriched Hindi poetry. Urdu ghazal and Bengali payar and dirgha palit were also emulated in modified forms. One is delighted to see the variety of metrical patterns in the poetic compositions of this age.

With the zeal of a crusader Mahavir Prasad Dwivedi tried to expand the vision of the Hindi writers of his age. He suggested to the poets to make experiments with new metres. Inspired by him Maithilisharan Gupta specialized in Harigitika, Ayodhyasingh Upadhyaya 'Hariaudh' in Sanskrit varnik metres and chaupadas of Urdu style, Nathuram Sharma 'Shankar' in kavitta-savaiyya, and Bhagwan Din in Urdu bahars. Dwivedi himself tried his hand at old Sanskrit metres, such as shikharini, malini, bhujangprayat, indravajra, etc. He translated Sanskrit works like Ritu-samhar, Piyush-lahari, Mahimna-stotra and Git-Govind in Hindi using the Sanskrit metres so that they could serve as models to the poets of his age. Another significant feature of the age was the use of blank verse. In the Bharatendu age Balkrishna Bhatta, like Johnson, had conceded that poetry might subsist without rhyme, and yet it is helpful. Dwivedi too asserted that rhyme is not integral to metre, sometimes it is a handicap and obstructs the free flow of expression. Guided by him several Hindi poets freed themselves from the bondage of rhyme. This opened new avenues for Hindi poets to follow, specially the poets of Chhayavad and Nai kavita.

It should be remembered, however, that rhythm in the poetry of this period is rather laboured, and the poets tried to adhere strictly to the stringent rules prescribed in the books on prosody. Many a poet took their cue from Chhand-prabhakar, the book on prosody written by Jagannath Prasad 'Bhanu'. The malady lay in the spirit of the age which laid emphasis on morality and preaching. The poetic compositions are, therefore, prosaic and didactic, written in a matter of fact style.

Romantic poetry (Chhayavad) was a revolt against the trends prevalent in the preceding age and brought about revolutionary changes both in content and in form. Theirs is subjective poetry. They felt that traditional metres would not serve their purpose. Intensity of emotion and imagination called for lyrical forms which led to experimentation and innovations. Like the English romantic poets Wordsworth and Coleridge they admitted the usefulness of metre for poetic composition. For them metre is not a 'superadded charm' but an integral part of a poem which also assists in controlling the flood of emotions. Sumitranandan Pant in the introduction to his anthology of poems Pallav writes, "There is close relationship between poetry and metre. If poetry is the music of our soul, metre is its heart-beat. Just as the banks of a river keep its bounds under control, metre controls the surging emotions of a poet and provides necessary rhythm and musicality to his poetic compositions. Words arranged in metrical form create a magnetic circle around them and there flows an electric current in the lines of a poem." He however, insists that a poet should not be forced to write in a particular metre. He should be free to employ metres of his choice and make innovations, if necessary. He firmly asserts that the choice of metre would depend on the content. Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala', a standard-bearer of revolt, also used metres in his poems.

Another factor responsible for rejecting old metres is the change in poetic diction. The task left incomplete by the poets of the preceding age was accomplished by the chhayavadi poets. They made the rugged Khariboli as musical and soft as possible. To sum up, the chhayavadi poets used traditional metres only rarely. They did not strictly follow the rigid rules regarding short and long syllables, pause (yati), the length of a fast and even rhythm. Their only concern was to express themselves in a suitable mode. By effecting new permutation and combination of the feet of the traditional metre they made several innovations:

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

1. They used blank verse and reconstituted old metres on the basis of rhythm and end rhyme. If Pant mixed paddhari and chaupai in the poems of Gunjan, 'Prasad' did the same in the 'Darshan' canto of Kamayani. The songs of the 'Ida' canto are based on Paddhari with a slight change in the pattern of instants.
2. They have employed mostly 'matrik chhand' (metres based on instants) instead of 'varnika chhand' (metres based on the 'ganas').
3. They invented new moulds to express their emotions. Among the new experiments the most notable are the metres used in Ram ki shakti-puja and Tulsidas. The first is now called 'Shakti-puja' metre. In his other poems too, Nirala displayed delicate skill and mastery in employing metres suited most to the content.
4. Those poets who initially wrote in Brajbhasha employed old metres but with an eye on musicality. Prasad's Chitradhar is an example.
5. As the chhayavadis were primarily lyrical poets, they cared more for rhythm. Sometimes they used two short vowels instead of one long vowel, or two long vowels and one short vowel.

The chhayavadi poets were also receptive to literary influences around them. They were attracted towards the metres employed by English, Bengali and Urdu poets. The blank verse and free verse (Verse libre) attracted them most. As it does not insist on end rhymes, blank verse has more flexibility. The effect of blank verse depends more upon variation than upon anything else, and by this variation accompanied by stop or enjambment at the end of the line, verse paragraphs are constituted. The blank verse lines are so knitted together by variation of pause, stop and enjambment that neither the eye nor the voice is disposed to make a halt till the close of the paragraph. Thus blank verse gives more freedom to a poet. The chhayavadi poets, however, did not copy the blank verse as used by the English poets. They made alterations according to their need. While in the West it was based on iambic pentametre or heroic verse, the Hindi poets based it on traditional metres—plavangam, piyushvarshi, tatank, etc. The blank verse however, did not prove a success because like the Varna-vrattas of Sanskrit it did not suit the genius of the Hindi language. Soon the poets turned to free verse (mukta chhand), a metrical pattern which keeps itself free from the rigid rules of prosody. The rhythm of traditional metres is retained here but a poet is free to expand or shorten the line length. Here rhyme is not obligatory. Though it retains the characteristics of metre – inner and primary speech rhythms of the language—it is free from traditional bondages. Nirala in his introduction to Parimal writes, "Free from the bondage of metre, it is a metrical composition because of its rhythm and flow. While the flow gives it the magic of metre, its freedom from rigid rules proclaims its freedom." It lays emphasis on musical rhythm and therefore is not totally averse to end rhymes. Even before Nirala, Prasad had used it in Lahar. These poets, like the poets of Nai kavita, thought that free verse is the natural medium of the poet's expression because here the spoken rhythm is unerringly caught. As a result of their contact with Bengali poetry, these poets used payar, amritakshar and 'free' verse stanzas of poets like Michael Madhusudan Datt. From Urdu they took ghazal and rubai, with slight changes here and there.

To some readers it appears there is no metrical pattern, worth the name, in the post-chhayavadi poetry. It is true that these poets did not use traditional metres though they are not absent in toto, since they have been used in their altered forms. Moreover, rhythm, the most vital constituent of metre, is invariably present there. Free verse, with its immense potentialities, was abundantly used by a number of post-chhayavadi poets. It suited them most because they were keen to state their personal experience without bothering either for ornamentation or melody.

In experimental poetry the emphasis is on thought content rather that on emotive element. It is poetry of discontent, anger and disillusionment. It searches for new imagery, new upmans (objects of comparison), new diction and new metre. As Agyeya wrote in Tar saptak

> Free are my metres, diction free
> And emotions still freer.

The poets experimented with new patterns of rhythm and sometimes used mixed rhythms in the feet or line. Thus we come across two types of poems: (i) Those with a definite regular rhythm, and (ii) those where mixed rhythms have been employed. In the first category of poems there is a constant flow of a rippling rivulet. The poems of Girija Kumar Mathur and Bhawani Prasad Misra are fine specimens of this class of poems. Many poems in the second category, because of their predominant thought-content, but lack of musicality, look like prose pieces.

Another thing that strikes the student of Hindi prosody is that while in the pre-experimental poetry, the feet of a verse were either long or short, here they have assumed various geometrical forms – plus (+), multiplication (×), triangle, or quadrangle. The tendency to use mixed rhymes in a poem has increased. To the new poets content is more important, hence rhythm is not taken care of. They sometimes talk of sense-rhythm without bothering about word-rhythm or sound-rhythm. As a result their poems tend to become prosaic.

The new poets have used traditional metres too but with new rhythmical patterns. For example, Girija Kumar Mathur has used piyushvarshi, paddhar and chaupai in their new forms. A foot of the old metre is bifurcated or trifurcated. As regards pause, the poets violate the old rules and employ it more intelligently so that the sense is more easily grasped. A few poets like Agyeya have even used Japanese metres like 'Haiku'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

This short survey reveals that the Hindi poets have used a variety of metres and have experimented with new patterns. Freeing themselves from the bondage of traditional prosody they have invented new metrical patterns based on primary rhythms so essential for metre. What Vernon Arnold said about Indian poets almost a century ago is true even today. "The faculty of inventing and appreciating new and delicate variations of rhythm seems to be a special gift of the race."

S.S.G.

PROSODY (Kannada). There are a few ancient and modern works on prosody in Kannada giving the general principles of verse composition as also the general features of verse types. Kavirajamarga (c. 850), generally attributed to Nripatunga, is the first work which gives some of the principles of Kannada versification. The most important among the ancient works on prosody is Chhandombudhi by Nagavarma (c. 990). Among the later ones, Kavijihvabandhana by Ishvara (c. 1500), Chhandassara by Gunachandra (c. 1650) and Nandi chhandornava by Virabhadra (1846) may be mentioned.

From about 1925, the study of prosody led some writers to compose works like Kannada kaipidi (Pt. I, 1936), Kannada chhandovikasa (1956), Kannada chhanndahsvarupa (1978) and Kannada chhandassina charitre (1980). Of these the last one seems to be the most significant effort in any of the Indian languages.

In addition,. certain features of a few important Kannada verse types have been described in a few well-known Sanskrit treatises Brihaddeshi by Matanga (c. 10th century,) viz. Chhandonushasana of Jayakirti (c. 1050), Manasollasa by Somesvara II (1129) and Sangita ratnakara by Sarangaratnakara (c. 1250).

The verse types now extant in Kannada are mainly of three kinds: 'varna-vrittas', 'matra-vrittas', 'amsha-vrittas'. Varna and matra-vrittas in Kannada follow to a great extent their Sanskrit and Prakrit prototypes. A distinctive feature here is the use of rhyme (prasa) at the beginning but the rule of yati, i.e. caesura, is followed optionally. About the amshavrittas a little more has to be said. These are the native vrittas of the language. In these vrittas, ganas are not formed by short and long syllables but by syllables which might be either short or long. These syllables are 'amshas'. Two amshas form a brahmagana, three form a vishnugana, while four form rudragana. While scanning it is necessary that the first amsha must be either one long or two short ones. But sometimes this condition varies. In place of one type of gana another type of gana might have been used. This is common in all types of amsha-vrittas. Such amiability and elasticity are more natural in these types of vrittas in folksongs; similarly adherence to the rules of composition is also natural in the instances of classical literature.

Varna-vrittas are the vrittas governed by the music of sound variation. There are five main divisions in them, viz., sama, ardhasama, vishama, dandaka and mala. In general characteristics they are like the sama and other divisions of Sanskrit. All these are mainly found in old Kannada works. As in Sanskrit, sama-vrittas are largely used in Kannada also; others are very few and far between. If all those used by Kannada writers are put together there may be about 150 samavrittas, about 10-15 ardhasama-vrittas about 20-25 vishama-vrittas, about 10-15 dandakas, and 5 mala-vrittas. There are also about 10 vrittas with matra and varna combined scanning which are slightly different from this group but which may be broadly be included in it.

Sama-vritta type is the main base for the poetic composition. Whether prose or poetry, it is universally used. Though about 10-20 sama-vritta types are mostly used in the standard literary compositions, the six types usually known as khyata karnatakas are prominent. They are in three pairs, viz. shardulavikridita, mattebhavikridita, sragdhare-mahasragdhare, champakamale-utpalamale. Of these the second in each pair seems to have been formulated on the model of the first by the Kannada poets themselves. There are many more types formulated on the pattern of the known varna vrittas. Again in ardhasama types, pushpitagra, malabharini and viyogini, in vishama types tripadonnati and a few upjatis; in dandaka types gadya dandaka; in mala variety the lalita and in varnavrittas, utsava and layottara are found here and there.

Matra-vrittas were vrittas of matralayagati originally used in Sanskrit and Prakrit languages. Some of these have been taken over by Kannada. In addition a few of the deshya or amsha vrittas have been converted into matra-vrittas in course of time. Of the first group the important are kanda and ragale. Kanda took its form in imitation and with the influence of aryagiti, a variant of the two-lined arya vritta and its Prakritic form sandhaka. The main features of this form are the same as of those. Because of the rhyme at the beginning the two lines there have become four lines here. In the champu and other kinds of poetical works this is generally found liberally. As arya is in Sanskrit, so is this used for sutras in grammar, rhetorical work and other treatises. Ragales in Kannada have their origin in Apabhramsha literature. They are generally formed by a large number of couplets as their prototypes such as paddhati, padakulaka and nadanavatara which are found in Apabhramsha. The ancient champu authors have scarcely used ragales in their works for describing towns, extolling Jina, etc. Later on during twelfth and thirteenth centuries when the language took the form of Middle Kannada, this ragale became established in three types, lalita, mandanila and utsaha, with rhymes both at the beginning and at the end, it became a metre for many works. Harihara was a powerful representative of the poets of this period. He and his followers used ragale to describe the greatness of Shiva and to narrate the stories of the devotees of Shiva.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Like these the other independent metres used in poems that became popular during the same period are the varieties of matra satpadis of six lines in each one. There was only one amsha satpadi in the beginning. In course of time this branched off into six, named sara, kusuma, bhoga, bhamini, parivardhini and vardhaka. In addition there is uddanda which is not so very important. Raghavanka, Kumaravyasa, Chamarasa, and Laksmisha are the famous satpadi poets.

Among the other matra-vrittas, chaupadi, dhavala and sisapadya deserve mention. Chaupadi in Manaumiya chaupada and other works, dhavala in traditional folk songs and sisapadya in yakshagana works are generally prevalent. The root of dhavala and sisapadya are possibly in the Prakrit metres. All these are the matra-vrittas liked by the commonfolk. The nature of the yakshagana verse types and other matra metres which are found in the folk literature and folk art are yet to be studied properly.

Amsha vrittas are usually referred to as 'Karnataka vishayajati vrittas' or 'Karnata vishayabhashajatis'. It means that these vrittas are natural to the Kannada language. Yet it has to be observed that on some vrittas at least, there is some influence of Sanskrit and Prakrit metres. In old treatises are mentioned akkara, tripadi, ele, chaupadi, chandovatamsa, akkarike, madanavati, gitike, utsaha and shatpadi. Among these akkara, tripadi and shatpadi are more common; in early literary works and inscriptions these and to some extent gitike and utsaha are used here and there. All the compositions mentioned above must have been freely used from a long time in the folk literature, the essence of the country's culture. Even now we see them either in their original form or in their adaptations. Most of the songs in folk literature are in tripadi. We can hear various types of singing even to this day. It has a wide range from common millstone songs to the philosophical ones. It is in this tripadi metre that Sarvajna composed his moral sayings. After the amsha tripadis were converted into matra tripadis by some vachanakaras of the twelfth century, both these forms developed into parallel streams.

Amsha satpadi which appeared as early as the eleventh century in inscriptions, disappeared after it was converted into matra satpadi. During the fourteenth-fifteenth century sobagina sone mattu and sangatya metres appeared newly and came to be extensively used. In them the most common was the sangatya. There are hundreds of poems in Kannada composed in this metre. Ratnakara, the author of Bharatesha vaibhava is an able representative of this metre. Similarly Kanakadasa, Nanjunda, Mangarasa and others are also famous. What position tripadi has in oral tradition, sangatya has in the written literature.

Apart from these there are many other amsha vrittas concealed in folk literature, in kirtanas of Haridasas about which research has yet to be made.

Modern Kannada prosody dates from the latter part of the 19th century onwards. The old matra metres took a new shape after certain changes; entirely new metres also came into vogue. This was possible because of the contact with the English language and literature by the poets of this period. S.G. Narasimhachar, B.M. Srikanthia, H.Narayana Rao, P. Mangesha Rao, M.Govinda Pai and others initiated it. New metres were employed in the translations of English lyrics with modern subjects and in children's poems in school texts such new metres were used. The first noteworthy work is English gitegalu (1921) by B.M. Srikanthaia. Using ganas of three, four or five matras and composing four or manylined stanzas, in lines short or long according to the need, with modern elegant language became the order. In the choice of rhymes, construction of ganas, etc. a limited freedom was enjoyed. 'Srinivasa,' D.R. Bendre, Kuvempu, V.K. Gokak, P.T. Narasimhachar, V. Sitaramia and others are a few noteworthy poets of navodaya metre, as it is commonly called.

In addition to the fourlined and manylined verses and stray poems, sonnets of fourteen lines, blank verse and odes of many lines have also been used in Kannada in the names of ashtasatpadi, saralaragale and pragatha respectively. Independent collections of sonnets have been published; sarala ragale is very well suited for drama, short or long poems. In style and subject the pragatha is like the ode in English. Apart from these some of the poets of this period have also used the old matra and amsha vrittas in some of their works to bring out variety and to show their capability.

In the last few years there has been another flow of metric type usually known as navya chhandassu or mukta chhandassu in which certain rules regarding the earlier metric forms in the number of lines, rhythm, formation of ganas, etc. have been discarded. Following the metric compositions of the poets in English and other languages of the modern world, independent compositions have now become very common. In the poems of M.Gopalakrishna Adiga, A.K. Ramanujan and others these features are striking.

T.V.V.S.

PROSODY (Kashmiri). In Kashmiri, scholars have yet to deduce a system of prosody to suit the needs of the language. In certain matters, Kashmiri is by and large different from her sister langages in the Indian subcontinent. Though basically a language of the Indo-Aryan family, Kashmiri has developed a different phonetic system. The present temper and structure of Kashmiri is the outcome of its surroundings and different cultural and social impacts during the course of centuries. As such the metric sysem of any other language could have hardly suited its needs. Kashmiri has a number of vowels and has adopted certain consonants of other languages also, thus increasing the number of consonants to a considerable extent. It is for this variation in the linguistic temper and structure that we cannot scan Kashmiri poems on the prosodic scale of Sanskrit or Persian. Therefore, under the present conditions, the prosodic situation of Kashmiri can only be reviewed in the light of Sanskrit and Persian prosody.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

During the early phase, Sanskrit was the court language of Kashmir and it enjoyed great popularity. Prior to 15th century, Kashmir was called Shardabhumi; and Shardapeetha (Abode of learning). The deep and wide influence of Sanskrit is evident on the early writings in Kashmiri. The early composers took the clue from Sanskrit so far as the metric system was concerned, as they had the glorious tradition of Sanskrit available to them.

The earliest poetic form of Kashmiri is called 'Vakh', which is derived from the Sanskrit 'Vakya'. Vakya is not a form of poetry in Sanskrit, but 'Vakh' is one of the many names of Sarasvati. Kashmiri vakya is like a 'sutra' or an aphorism and is reserved for the communication of spiritual experiencs or the experience of the god-head. It was because of the sanctity and sacredness attached to such utterances that the poetry has been called 'vakh'.

The vakhs are definitely on the pattern of Sanskrit compositions so far as their prosodic elements are concerned.

The vakhs of Shatikanth (14th c.) consist of four lines each of which the first and third lines have sixteen matras and the second and fourth lines fifteen matras each.

But sometimes we come across a variation in this system. The vakhs of Lal Ded (14th c.) are four-line stanzas. As compared to Shatikanth, she pays little heed to prosodic elements. Her vakh is by and large an extended form of a Hindi 'doha'. She maintains the rhythm of her verse with the help of her emotions and creates the atmosphere of music with the help of stress on the tongue.

The rhyme scheme of her vakhs is varied and has patterns like ab ab, ad cd and ab ac. In some of her vakhs, she has made use of refrain also, which is peculiar to the 'Vatsun' form of Kashmiri poetry.

As a matter of fact a vakh is a double doha. It was mostly composed in the 'savajya' metre and has sixteen to twenty feet in it.

The poetry of Nund Rishi (1377-1438) is called 'Shruk' which has its origin in Sanskrit shloka. In Sanskrit, the 'Anushtubh' of four padas is the metre of the shloka, but in Kashmiri this principle has not been adhered to. The shruks of Nund Rishi are long poems and have very little in common with Sanskrit shlokas. After the 14th century, Persian exercised considerable influence on Kashmiri. And it is from this influence that ghazal, masnavi, rubai, qita, musaddas, mukhamas, etc. found their way in Kashmiri after the Persian fashion.

From the 17th century onwards, Kashmiri poets wote on Persian models or patterns, adopting Persian prosodic patterns and some of the metres used by them are poles apart from those of the Persian. This metric difference surfaces while examining the compositions of Haba Khatoon (17th c.) and Arnimal (18th c.). One comes across the usage of different metres in the stanzas and it can, thus, be concluded that such metres are the poets' own invention, and the poems having such metres have been composed on the model of local folk tradition. Such variations are visible in Kashmiri folk-songs like 'Pad', 'Nenda baath', 'Rov' and 'Lolo' also, which have nothing to do with the Sanskrit or Persian prosodic rules.

Under the influence of western literature some new forms have been introduced in Kashmiri since 1945. These new western forms include free verse, blank verse, sonnet and prose-poetry. All these forms are in currency today, but the composers are hardly aware of their pre-requisites.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Abdul Ahad Azad, Kashmiri zaban aur shairi Vol. I (Srinagar, 1959); Abinashchandra Bose, Hymns from the Vedas (Calcutta, 1960); Avtar Krishan Rahbar, Kashri adbuk tarikh (Srinagar, 1965); K.C. Pandey, Indian Aesthetics (Varanasi, 1969).

Mo.S.

PROSODY (Maithili) has its own history and tradition. The earliest metrical compositions in Maithili are the 'charyas' of the Siddhas (8th to 11th c.). The manuscripts discovered so far do not mention the names of metres; instead, they invariably mention the name of 'raga' (melody). This tradition in Maithili continued for long. Lochana (1650-1710) in his Ragatarangini, a treatise on music, mentioning the name of raga says that 'the name of the metre is also the same, and defines the metre broadly. Chandra Jha (1831-1907), following him, repeats the same phrase in his Ramayana. Apparently, the identity of raga with metre seems untenable, but the relation of raga with metre cannot be denied. Jayakanta Mishra rightly terms the metre conceived by Lochana as 'song metre' or 'tala-vritta'.

Maithili has inherited metres not from Sanskrit or Prakrit but from Apabhramsha. This source is common to all modern Indo-Aryan languages. But from the earliest times the eastern languages have developed a special type of metres suited to their genius. The Apabhramsha metres are generally matrika, i.e. based on count of moras, whereas the eastern metres are syllabic where only the syllables are counted. Take for example

(1) 'Sajani Madhava dekhala aja' = 15 matras

(2) 'Ekada e Bharatera kono vanya tale' = 14 varnas

In the early phase eastern languages used both types of metres, but later they dropped th matra-vritta altogether. The Western languages never adopted the syllabic type. In Maithili we find both the types current till the medieval period. Now modern Maithili prefers the

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Apabhramsha matrika metres which rule over the whole Western India.

The earliest and the richest source of Maithili prosody is Prakrita paeengalam. Some of it was compiled in Mithila. It contains some verses in praise of Vireshvara, Chandeshvara and Amritakara who were prominent figures of the then Mithila. Its earliest commentary is attributed to Ravikara who belonged to the Dighave family of Maithila Brahmans. Several other Maithils also wrote commentaries on it. Maithila pandits included the Apabhramsha metres in their Sanskrit works on prosody. Vanibhushana by Damodara (11th c.) and Ekavali by Gokulanatha Upadhyaya (1685-1716) are the best examples. Vidyapati (1350-1440) in his Apabhramsha work Kirti-lata shows a variety of such metres. The Maithili lyrics also adopted or adapted these metres with suitable modifications. Nevertheless, we find a good number of lyrics (or songs) mostly in the early period composed in syllabic metres prevalent more in the east. In modern times Chanda Jha has used a variety of metres, mentioning the name of each. The poets of the present-day Mithila try to create something new out of the old, but their creation is only a twist of chaupai and gitika metres. The most recent poets discard all norms of prosody and prefer poetry free from the shackles of versification.

Books on Maithili prosody are not many. Sankshipta Maithili chhandashastra by Govinda Jha is the best book which covers all periods and trends. Its analysis, classification and scanning are based on scientific methods.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bholashankar Vyas (ed.), Prakrita paengalam (Varanasi, 1956); Chanda Jha, Mithilabhasha Ramayana (Patna, 1977); Damodara Mishra, Vanibhushana (Bombay, 1915); Govinda Jha, Sankshipta Maithili chhandashastra (Darbhanga, 1960); Ramdev Jha, Maithili Shaiva sahityaka bhumika (Patna, 1982); Shashinath Jha (ed.), Lochanakrita Ragatarangini (Patna, 1980) and Ekavali Gokulanathakrita (Darbhanga, 1986).

Go.J.

PROSODY (Malayalam) It was only in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries that Malayalam developed its own prosodic system. In Malayalam, poetry began to be written from the twelfth century onwards; the metres used in those formative days of versification were borrowed either from classical Sanskrit or Tamil. Folk songs were however, composed by unknown poets in indigenous melodies. In later Malayalam prosody, one finds influences of these three types.

Malayalam poetry uses both Sanskrit metres and indigenous metres. Definitions of Malayalam metres, however, did not appear till 1878. The most authentic prosodic text now being used in educational institutions in Kerala is A.R.Raja Varma's Vrittamanjari written in 1904. A major portion of this book deals with Sanskrit prosody; only one-fourth is devoted to indigenous metres. But the definitions, however incomplete, are sound.

Malayalam being a member of the Dravidian family, its metres are structurally different from those of Sanskrit. They run in couplets and are rhythmic and musical. The two line unit is not a self-contained one as a shloka in Sanskrit. A stanza can have as many couplets as necessary. There is no uniform stanza pattern. However, this rule is not without exception. There are musical recitational pieces (kirtanas) composed of four-line stanzas, each ending with a refrain.

Rules of long and short syllables and adherence to the number of syllables in a line or couplet are not rigid as in Sanskrit. While in Sanskrit there are hard and fast rules regarding the number and succession of long and short syllables in a foot or line, Malayalam metres, being musical, only vaguely indicate their composition and style of recitation. A great deal of freedom is allowed within the loose structure.

Whether a syllable is a long or a short syllable mainly depends on the position it occupies in a foot. A short syllable can be elongated and a long shortened, though the latter is less common, as its position requires.

Indigenous metres are of two kinds: those which have fixed number of syllables in a line and those which have no fixity in their number. Those which are only recited and not sung to 'tala' have fixed number of syllables. Those which are sung to tala and which are mainly borrowed from folk songs and the performing folk arts have fixed numbers of matras instead of syllables. However, it would be misleading to call the former syllabic metres and the latter matric metres since both have a matra-syllable equation unlike in varnic chhandas of Sanskrit.

Malayalam matra vrittas are divided into those having two, three, four and five matras in a foot. Those composed of more matras such as six and seven can be scanned by adding one or two of these basic types, e.g.3+3,3+4 etc. These 'ganas' (feet) have not been given separate names; they are only called 'dvimatra', 'trimatra' etc. according to the tala of each metre.

Malayalam metres are divided into seven types according to the poetic tradition to which they belong. They are the following:

(1) Gatha: This is a couplet of uneven lines, 12 in the first and 10 in the second. This metre became popular owing the Krishnagatha, a fifteenth century work. (2). Pana: The word 'Pana' means a devotional song. This is a metre of eleven syllables in a line used in Janappana written in the sixteenth century. (3). Kilippattu: The literal meaning of this word is parrot song. A major portion of devotional literature was written in the five types of metres used in kilippattu works. (4). Kirtana: There are many works like Harinama kirtanam and Irupattinalu vrittam composed in quatrains in different metres and a refrain at the end of each stanza. (5). Tullalppattu: Tullal (meaning dance) is a solo dance which became popular in the eighteenth century. The dancer himself sings. There are three kinds of tullal. 'parayan',

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'sitankan' and 'ottan', each having different costumes and each type associated with different metres and rhythmic dance sequences. (6). Vanchippattu: This is the boat-song metre popularized by Ramapurattu Variar in the eighteenth century. It has sixteen syllables in the first line and thirteen in the second. (7). Kaikottikkalippattu: This word literally means clapping and dancing. Women dance on festive occasions like Onam singing some folk songs. These songs employ rhythmic metres used in poetry with musical twists and turns. These were introduced with rare, sophistication and polish into serious poetry on a large scale by Changampuzha and Edappilli in the second quarter of this century. They have neither been named nor convincingly defined by prosodists.

The metres used in the language down the centuries number over a hundred. Many of them are formed by the permutation and combinations of a few basic types. These types and their most representative metres are the following. 1. Dvimatra of Chaturmatra: Tarangini formed by four chaturmatra (or 8 dvimatra) ganas in each of the two lines. (2). Trimatra: Annanata formed by six ganas of three matras in each line. (3). Panchamatra: Kakali formed by four ganas of five matras. (4). Mishravrittas: Mishravrittas are formed by combining two types of ganas. There are combinations of matraganas and aksharaganas in this type as follows: (i) Combination of trimatra and chaturmatra, e.g. Mallika which has four ganas of seven (3+4) matras. (ii) Samasamam which has a double trimatra (6 matras) succeeded by a chaturmatra gana. (iii) Svagata which is a combination of panchamatra and chaturmatra. (iv) Keka. which is a syllabic metre in fourteen syllables in each line the order 3+2+2, 3+2+2.

All Malayalam metres have a medial pause. A variety of metres has been formed by (a) dropping syllables or matras at the beginning, middle or end of a line or a gana (b) adding a hypermetric syllable in the beginning or end of a line (c) converting one long syllable by two short or vice-versa and (4) by elongating and eliding syllables i.e. subjecting them to positional inflexion. Some poets have borrowed syllabic metres of Sanskrit and fashioned them on the basis of Malayalam prosody by replacing longs by two shorts and vice-versa and by employing such other devices that are characteristic of indigenous versification.

The yardstick adopted in Vrittamanjari is directly borrowed from Sanskrit prosody though with minor adjustments. Later prosodists argued that since folk metres were free musical forms, only the terms of musicology could define them scientifically. Appan Tampuran (1875-1941) devised a scheme of notation for Malayalam by which fractions of matras and elongation into more than two matras can be indicated.

Though he has devised a scheme, he has not shown with examples how each metre can be defined on this basis.

Tampuran's scheme was further developed by Kuttikrishna Marar (1900-1974). While the former uses one yardstick for Sanskrit and another for indigenous metres, the latter holds that tala is the basis of all metres all over the world. In the first part of his Vrittashilpam, he says that all varnavrittas of Sanskrit are, in fact, matravrittas put in the strait-jacket of trimatraganas and convincingly scans out all the syllabic metres of Sanskrit on the basis of tala ganas; the same yardstick is used in the analysis of Malayalam metres in the second part. He freely uses the terminology of Indian music to indicate recitational variations.

It has been accepted by all prosodists that mechanical scansion on the basis of akshara or matra will not do justice to the flexible prosodic system of Malayalam and that the style of recitation and the most important factor, but they are trying to meet half-way between music and metre which are interdependent and both of which have rhythm as their basis.

Free verse or vers libre is not still very popular in Malayalam owing to the freedom enjoyed by poets in the handling of metres. G. Sankara Kurup tried to write prose poems; he also tried to split lines according to their logical divisions. It was only in the sixties that poets began to experiment with prose rhythms and speech rhythms in their compositions. The city-bred poet who does not have in his blood the folk rhythms which created indigenous metres have now started to write poetry in prose. Finding that the rhythms created by these poets fail of communicate with the readers, some have started to go back to the traditional metres. Even Sanskrit metres seem to have staged a come back: there is a month, Kavanakautukam, Trichur, devoted entirely to poems in classical Sanskrit metres.

Thanks to the translation boom in the sixties, Malayalam readers were introduced to the metres of other Indian languages. Sankara Kurup's translation of Tagore and Vennikkulam's rendering of Bharati are done in the metres of the original. T.K. Bhattathiri's Ramacharitamanasam (1968) is a Malayalam rendering of the Hindi classic in the metres used in the original. Metre to metre (vrittanuvritta) rendering was attempted from Sanskrit, but not from other Indian languages till the sixties. Malayalam has yet to evolve a system of prosodic analysis which breaks the linguistic barriers and includes all kinds of poetic activity including free verse.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.R. Raja Raja Varma, Vrittamanjari (Trivandrum. 1904): Appan Tampuran, Dravida vrittangalum avayute dashaparinamangalum (Trichur, 1930); K.K. Vadhyar. Vrittavicharam (Kottayam. 1967); Xuttikrishna Marar, Vrittashilpam (Calicut, Rev. Edn. 1958); P. Kunnikrishna Menon, Bhashavrittadipika (Kottayam, 1972).

O.M.A

PROSODY (Marathi) Prosody in medieval Marathi was merely the application of Sanskrit classical rules to the writings in Marathi. The great saint-poets seldom observed the rules of classical verse compositions. The greatest of the medieval Marathi verse forms were never scanned and analysed by even such classicists as Moropant, though many others used the more popular verse forms including the 'Ovi' and its formalized variation, 'Abhanga'. The saint poets very rarely turned to Sanskrit metres, with the exception of Ramadas, who composed poems in an amazingly large variety of classical metres. Eknath and Tukaram used the classical metre 'Bhujanga-prayata' only once or twice. The rest of the myriad 'Bhakti' poets stuck to writing their songs in popular verse forms.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A peculiar feature of medieval Marathi was 'akhyana', a rhythmic 'churna' composition. Vishwanath in his Sahitya-darpana gives four-fold classification of such rhythmic, nonmetrical stanzas as 'churna','muktaka' and others. Marathi classical poets employed them in their longer verse narratives.

Sanskrit prosody had accepted some of the Prakrit verse forms like 'arya' and 'Matrasamaka'. Pingala in his Chhandasutra did it and others, who followed him, did likewise. Thus some regional 'matra vrittas' found their place in medieval prosody. But it was left to the 19th century prosodists like Parashuramtatya Godbole and his contemporaries to scan such regional verse forms as Abhanga, Ghanakshari, Dindi etc. They were accepted as a significant part of the repertory of the Marathi prosody. Besides the Sanskrit 'gana vrittas', based on the three-fold syllabic beats of 'ganas' and the 'matra vrittas', like Arya and Dindi, based on 'matra ganas', a third category of metres called 'akshara chhandas' was added to the medieval metres. Abhanga and ghanakshari were the well-known specimens of the new category.A very significant contribution to medieval metres was the introduction of 'Katav' or 'Katibandha'. This new verse form was based on the old 'matra vritta' called 'padakulaka', a variation of 'Matrasamaka'. It was a composition that was not in the four or five lined stanza form, but was a long drawn composition, with rhymed run-on lines formimg 'Kadaves or 'Kadavakas' of Prakrit- Apabhramsha prosody.

The Mahanubhava poet Krishna Dimbha (15th century AD), poet Vitthala and the idefatigable master of medieval verse, Moropant, excelled in Sanskrit metres; yet it was Moropant again who made varied uses of the Prakrit-Apabhramsha metres. Arya (the Prakrit 'Geeti') the best known of these metres, was named after him as the 'Moropanti Arya'. It is strange, however, to see that most of the other metres, found in the Apabharamsha treatises and texts, did not make any marked inroad on the medieval regional writings.

The Mahanubhava poet Krishna Dimbha seems to have had an access to some as yet unknown treatise of classical metres, for he has, in his Rukmini-swayamvara used many metres of some obscure origin. But Kedar-abhatta's Vritta-ratnakara was known to later medieval poets. Moropant had actually studied it. There were very few significant attempts at analysing these metres. Poet Niranjana Madhava tried his hand at such an exercise in his Sad-vrittamuktavali but the outcome was only a rehash of the old treatises. One Ramachandra Daivadnya, perhaps at the end of the 18th century, did the same in Chhando-manjari. The first attempt a enlarging the repertory of the classical prosody was made by Parashur-amtatya Godbole in his Vritta-darpana, in the latter half of the 19th century. The very unique attempt at analysing Abhanga was made by the great saint poet Namdev (13th century) who devoted two Abhangas to describe the full gamut of details used in composing the two-fold Abhanga.

The modern approach to prosody is radical. The three-fold classification prevalent in the old prosody, is accepted, but it is interpreted in the light of new developments in the field of linguistics. Here free verse plays an all-pervading role. It is based on the 'spoken rhythm'. Stresses are recognized, but their use remains subjective, as 'stress' is not a phoneme used in Marathi and the other North Indian languages. In this field of metres and versification unique analytical insight is displayed by Madhavarao Patwardhan, in his Chhandorachana. N.G. Joshi followed him and established various rythmic patterns, including those of the free verse, in his Marathi chhandorachana. In another book he dealt with the historical development of Marathi verse patterns and the prosody, and in his third book he has studied Marathi verse patterns in the light of verse forms in the ancient Indian and western languages and has given a comparative resume of the verse forms and metres in Marathi and other modern Indian languages, such as Gujarati, Hindi, Urdu, Bengali and Kannada.

Studies in modern linguistics with reference to the inherent spoken rhythm of Marathi language might add new dimensions to an analysis of prosody in Marathi.

N.G.J.

PROSODY (Oriya). In Oriya language there is no stress in the pronunciation of words and sentences. In ancient Oriya literature this absence of stress and monotony in pronunciation were made up by the introduction of tunes into a composition while reciting it. For this reason we find that in Oriya poetry lyrics are very common. Even ancient Oriya prose pieces like Tulabhina, Brahmagita, Batris singhasana katha etc. are written in rythmic lyrical style.

The most primitive forms of Oriya prosody are found in folk-songs, bridal-farewell songs, nursery rhymes and proverbs. The metres in charyapadas, the oldest verse compositions in Oriya literature, were written in metres with an unequal number of syllables in the couplets. Sarala Das, the pioneer Oriya poet, introduced dandi metre in his Mahabharata. This metre was also used by Balarama Das in his Jagamohan Ramayana, by Achyuta-nanda and Bipranarayan in Harivamsa and by Pitambar Das in his Nrusinha Purana.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The contemporaries of Sarala Das such as Sisukinkar Das, Markanda Das, Kavi Damodara and Dharanidhar introduced various metres and ragas in their chautisas and 'chhandas'. Later on Jagannath Das, while composing the Bhagavata in Oriya, used the nine-lettered metre in Gurjari raga. This metre became popular as the Bhagavata chhanda. During the Bhakti age the famous five poet-devotees, popularly known as panchasakhas, also composed devotional poems in new metres.

Prosody in Oriya literature reached its culmination in the Riti Yuga, well known for its stylisation in poetry. Upendra Bhanja, the uncrowned king of Oriya literature, introduced numerous metres, ragas and raginis and gave them lyrical forms. The Bhanja literature is full of different ragas and raginis. Other poets who followed in the footsteps of Upendra Bhanja in introducing different metres in their compositions are Baladeva Ratha, Abhimanyu Samant Simhar, Dinakrushna Das, Gopalkrushna, Gourahari, etc.

As every letter in Oriya is scripted distinctly and there is no difference in pronunciation between long and short vowels, the letter-based metres are more popular in Oriya literature than the syllable based. In ancient times Oriya poets had attempted to compose poems in syllable-based metres as in Sanskrit literature, but those compositions could not be popular as they were not in tune with Oriya style of pronunciation. Next to dandi metre the letter-based metres have been accepted as popular metres in Oriya. Sri Balabhadra Bohidar in his book Yatipat has mentioned twelve Oriya metres with pause. They are Anandabhairava, Kanada, Chokhi, Kamodi, Natavani, Malasri, Purabi, Vasanta, etc. Oriya folk-songs, swing-songs, the song of yogi and the 'Chaiti parva' songs are sung in different metres. Many of these have been adopted in our literature. The chautisas like Usabhilasa of Sisukinkar Das and Ramabibha of Arjuna Das show that by the sixteenth century metres like the Mangala, Malaba, Gurjari, Chokhi, Rasakulya, Bangalasri, Nalini ganda, Aharo, Asadhashukta etc. were in use in Oriya literature. The poets and musicians of the ancient Oriya literature have shown their talent in prosody in creating 'mishra ragas' and 'mishra chhandas' by blending two metres. Some of these are Kedarkamodi, Kedara chakrakeli, Kalyana-ahari, Punnaga baradi, etc.

In the modern period the poets like Ramaprasanna Babu, Prabhakar Vidyaratna and Govinda Ratha have introduced rhyming the last letters in their poetry. This style was followed by Radhanath Ray, and Madhusudan Rao. The introduction and successful application of amitrakshara metre are two noteworthy achievements of Radhanath Ray. An amitrakshari chhanda consists of 14 letters and has pauses on the 8th and 14th letters. This chhanda was used by some of Radhanath's contemporaries and followers. The chhanda has proved congenial for expressing the heroic emotions. As importance is attached to the expression of emotions, the pauses in the metres occur irregularly according to the emotions.

Since 1935 the blank verse and vers libre have been widely used in Oriya literature. The main reason for their use is the revolutionary change in the subject of poetry and in the outlook of the poet. The modern poet attaches the utmost importance to communicating his thoughts and emotions with suitable sound impressions. Madanmohan Patnaik, Kalindi Charan Panigrahi have made use of the blank verse with unequal letters rhyming the last letters in the lines. Subsequently Sachidananda Routray, Anant Patnaik, Raghunath Das and Vinod Nayak have made it popular in Oriya. The contemporary Oriya poems may be broadly divided into four categories.

1) Vers libre without rhyming the last letter.
2) Unequal couplets, with rhyming at the end;
3) blending (1) and (2) above;
4) expressing modern thought in old style.

As modern Oriya poetry has deviated from music, Oriya prosody has undergone great changes.

A.P.

PROSODY (Pali) is the systematic study of metrical structure that follows certain rules regarding system, theory, pattern, and style of versification. Vuttodaya or Vrattodaya is a famous prosodic work in Pali literature. It deals mainly with the intonation, rhythm, definition and illustrations os specific metres. Systematic compositions on Pali prosody reached their culmination in Vuttodaya. It is a composition in both prose and poetry. The work is fascinating and composed in the style of Champu kavya, and is, therefore divided into six 'parichchhedas' or chapters. It was composed by Sthavira Sangharakkgitta, a disciple of the Simhalese bhikkhu Sariputta, in the later part of the twelfth century AD. There are a number of commentaries written on this prosodic work. First of all, the famous scholar of Pagan bhikkhu Saddhammayanana wrote a commentary entitled Vuttodaya-panchika or Chhandasartha-Vikasini. We also find another commentary written by Vachissara who was a disciple of Simhalese bhikkhu Sariputta. There is one more commentary on Vuttodaya by Bepulla of Vepullabuddhi, entitled Vachnatthajutika.

In the realm of Pali literature, we also find a number of less-known works on prosody, viz. Chhandovichiti, Kavisarapakarana and Kavisara. The tradition of writing books on prosody still continues in some countries in the east. A prosody entitled Chhamdomanjari was written by a Burmese scholar Vishuddhachara in 1887 AD. It will not be out of place to mention here a work entitled Vuttamala written by a Simhalese scholar, Thera Upatapassi. The work deals with intonation, metres, rhythm and rhyme. Thus, in the field of prosody we find quite a few texts in Pali.

D.S.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

PROSODY (Prakrit). The Prakrit gathas were composed in three prominent Vedic metres, viz. Anushtubh, Trishtubh and Jagati. Anustubh came to be monopolized by epic poets, while Trishtubh and Jagati were used by court poets and bards. In the classical period the metres were based on the number of syllables and a mixture of long and short measures of moras (matras). There were two types of metres, viz. Vritta and Jati.

The Vritta is regulated by 'ganas' or groups of three syllables. The difference between the groups is reckoned by the prosodial instants with short or long measure in each syllable. The syllables are limited by numbers. So the Vritta is called Aksharachhanda or Varnachhanda. According to the above method of counting the syllables, there are three types of vrittas, viz. Sama-vritta, Ardhasama-vritta and Visamavritta. In the Sama-vritta, the four lines are of equal length. In the Ardhasama-vritta the stanza is divisible into two halves which are equal in length and observe the same order of short and long letters. Each half is split up, exactly at the same point, into two unequal lines of different structure, with the result that the first and the third lines totally agree with one another and so do the second and the fourth. In the Vishama-vritta, the four lines are of unequal length and different from each other in their structure. The Ardhasama vrittas in classical Sanskrit are very likely the legacy of the Prakrit poet prosodists. The tendency to cut up a line into two unequal halves is quite obvious in the Prakrit metres. Pingala mentions more than ten varieties of this type.

Sanskrit prosodists recognize three groups of Matravrittas, viz. Dvipadis, Chatuspadis and Ardhasama chatuhpadis. The representative of the first is Army, called Gatha in its Prakrit garb, that of the second is Matrasamaka, and that of the third is Vaitaliya which, as its name shows, was a great favourite with the bards, specially the bards of Magadha. The alternative name of the Vaitaliya is Magadhika. It is very likely that the Vaitaliya and its cognates were originally pure Prakrit metres.

The Matra-vrittas recognise a unit namely the Varna matra. It is closely connected with the Kala matra. The last is time unit on which the music of most of the Prakrit metres is based. The Prakrit metres are adapted to Tala-sangita, i.e. metrical music produced by a regularly occurring time-controlled stress or break in a line.

A unit of two letters, in its four different forms (SS, SI II IS), is actually adopted by a Jaina author. Three oldest metricians viz. Pingala, Bharata and Jayadeva begin their Varna vrittas with Tanumadhya which contains four lines of six letters each and conclude them with Bhujangaprayata or Apavaha, both having twenty-six letters in each of their four lines. Longer metres containing more than twenty-six letters in a line are given a common name, namely, Dandaka. Metres having less than six letters in each line were admitted only late within the fold of metres. Pingala and Jayadeva do not mention them at all. Bharata mentions them under the Dhruvas which were generally composed in Prakrit. Kedara, Jayakirti and Hemachandra regularly mention them; so does Virahanka a little earlier.

There are metres of Ardhasama-vritta in Prakrit, i.e. the metres of four lines, divided into two similar halves, containing lines of unequal length. They are fourteen in all, viz., Vegavati, Upachitra, Chalamadhya, Harinapada, Ketumati, Akhyanika, Viparitakhyanika, Aparavaktra, Puspitagra, Bhadravaratika, Yavavati, Satpadavali, Shikha and Khanja. Hemachandra mentions all these and eighteen more. Kavidarpana mentions only eight. Chalamadhya and Harinapada are respectively called Drutamadhya and Harinodhata by both Hemachandra and Kavidarpana.

Vishama-vrittas contain four lines each of varying length. Thus Udgata has its variants Saurabha and Lalita, Prachupita and its derivatives Vardhamana, Suddhavirattika and Avrasabha, Shloka and its varieties like Vritta, Suvritta, Pathya, Pathya-vritta and others, and lastly Padachatururdhva along with its derivatives like Pathyapida, Apida, Manjari, Lavali and Amritadhara.

The terms are applied for the Matraganas in the Prakrit metres as Da or Daara for a Dvimatra, Ta, Tagana, Taara or Tamsa for a Trimatra, Cha, Chagana, Chaara or Chamsa for a Chaturmatra, Pa, Pagana, Paara or Pamsa for a Panchamatra, and Cha, Chagana, Chaara or Chamsa for a Sanmatra. The different kinds of these Ganas are also similarly expressed by means of easily comprehensible terms. Thus 'patapuvvala' means a Pagana and Tagana both with a short letter at the beginning. La is a short letter and Ga is a long one; 'chau pamsasavvaisesantala' means for Panchamatras, having respectively all short, first short, last short, and last short letters in them; "saalauralahu paruttaraga cha-pa-ca-ta-gana' means a Sanmatra with all short letters (saalalahu) in the middle (uralahu-udaralaghu), a chaturmatra with a long letter at the end (uttaraga).

The text of Prakrit prosody was written by Svayambhu. His work is entitled as Svayambhucchhandas. He was very probably a Jaina monk. He must have lived in the tenth century of the Christian era, at the earliest. In his work. Svayambhu mentions Panchamsasarabhuta, Bahulartha and Laksyalaksanavisuddha. Amsa here means a Gana, usually a Matragana. The other old and new writers on Prakrit metres are Virahanka, Nanditadhya and Ratnasekhara. The five Amsas or the Matraganas which are generally used in defining Matra-vrittas are those that contain respectively two, three, four, five and six matras in them. They are called da, ta, cha, pa, sa by Hemachandra and ka, ccha, ta, tta and pa by Kavidarapana. Svayambhu's work is intended to be the essence of metres based on these five Matraganas.

Hemachandra in his work entitled Chhandanushasana mentioned the Prakrit metres. He divides the Prakrit metres under four main heads, namely, Arya, Galitaka,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Khanjaka and Shirsaka. Under the first head, about twenty-five metres beginning with Ripuchhanda and ending with Maladaman, all derived from the Giti, are defined, Hemachandra gives us about twenty-three metres under the Galitakas. There are twenty-one matras in a line of the normal Galitaka. It is characterized by the Yamaka at the end. All these Galitakas are Chatuspadi metres of four lines of equal length. Of these twenty-three Galitakas, about elven bear the name Galitaka preceded by a preposition like 'vi' or an adjective like 'subha', 'ugra', etc. The remaining twelve have independent names like Bhusana and Hiravali. All these have the Antya Yamaka. The shortest among these is the Muktavali with sixteen matras in a line. The Muktavali is surely a Tala-vritta.

A Khanjaka is formed when a Galitaka does not possess the Yamaka but is only characterized by the Anuprasa. But the standard Khanjaka contains twenty-three Matras in each of its four lines. Mahatonaka is only a variation of this with different groups of Matras.

The Shirsakas are broadly defined as the Khanjakas lengthened at will. Shirsakas are divided into two, such as the sama and visama shirsakas. The former has in each of its four lines the first half of a Gatha, where the last long letter is replaced by a Trimatra and is preceded by any even number of the chaturmatrika groups. The first half of the Gatha itself is formed by the first half of a Gatha to which one pair of Chaturmatras is added before the final long letter. The Visama shirsaka, on the other hand, is formed by a line of a Mala-galitaka extended by the addition of an uneven number of pairs of the chaturmatrika groups. Mala-galitaka contains one sanmatra followed by ten chaturmatras.

Among the other works on Prakrit prosody, Pingala's Prakrit-pingala-sutra is quite well-known. It belongs to the fourteenth century at the earliest. This text is written in verse and contains a large number of recent prosodic expressions. Pingala uses algebraic expressions for short and long syllables and to indicate the feet of the metres.

Bi.S.

PROSODY (Punjabi). Punjabi prosody is the same as that of Hindi and other Indian languages of the Aryan family. And in both Punjabi and Hindi the metres are of two kinds in respect of scanning. In one kind the length of the line is measured simply by the count of letters. There are three such metres in common use in Punjabi: 'Korara', 'Savayya' and 'Kabit'. The line in korara measures fourteen letters, each letter having the same metrical value, and the lines rhyme in couplets. But in the more sophisticated form, the fourth line forms the refrain, and the whole measure can be divided into four-line units, of which the third line rhymes with the fourth or the refrain line. Thus all the third lines also end with the same rhyme. But there is no fixed length of the measure as a whole, and the longer the same refrain carries the measure, the more skilful it is considered. The word 'korara' means a lash, and the name accords with the fact of the refrain repeating itself like a lash. The measure is not popular in more sophisticated writing and is confined more or less to simple narrative with a rustic or folk character.

The 'savayya' is a stanza of four lines, all rhyming together, each measuring 21-22 letters. It is used in more sophisticated writing, which is generally more commentative than narrative.

The 'kabit' is again a stanza of four lines, all rhyming together, and each line measures 31 to 32 letters. The line is generally, but not necessarily, scannable into four sections, of which the first three consisting each of eight letters rhyme together, thus providing what may be called internal rhymes. The fourth section may contain seven or eight letters. This stanza form is eminently suitable for a narrative. Generally every writer of a romantic or other kind of narrative mixes kabits with koraras and of course an occasional savayya may also be thrown in. One of the most popular verse romances of rural Punjab, Bhagwan Singh's version of the love story of Hir and Ranjha, consists entirely of kabits.

These measures are called 'varanik chhaandas' from varana meaning letter. The other kind is called 'matrik' from matra meaning something corresponding to a syllable in the Italian or western system. In fact, it is the matra ending with long a,i,e,o,ai and au, that corresponds to the western term 'syllable', while the short matra is indeed half a syllable.

There is really no count of matrik measures, but the most common and popular are: The 'Chaupai', a stanza of two couplets, in which the line consists of 16 metras (short) or an equivalent mixture of short and long matras. And a sequence of chaupais may be of any length, but the most common length is eight stanzas of eight lines or four couplets each; it is called an 'ashtapadi', which thus consists of 64 lines. One of the most popular poems with these sequences is the Sukhmani, a composition of Guru Arjan, the fifth Sikh Guru. It has 24 such sequences or ashtapadis, and there is a couplet of a different length (a 'dohira' or 'shloka') leading each ashtapadi or sequence.

In Hindi the most popular such narrative is Tulsidas's Ramayana, in which also couplets (dohiras) and other stanza forms are freely interspersed.

The next most popular stanza form is the dohira or couplet, of which each line measures 24 matras (short) or their equivalent (mixed), with a pause after 13 short matras. It is not used much for long narratives, probably because of its slow tempo, but it is very popular in meditative or reflective poetry,where it is given the name of shloka. In the Guru Granth of the Sikhs there are three such sequences: the shlokas of Guru Tegh Bahadur, the ninth Guru, of Sheikh Farid and of Kabir.

The most successful and popular use of this verse in a narrative has been made in the verse romance of Mirza Sahiban, the original of which, not available in its complete version, is that of Pilu, a popular poet of the sixteenth century and a contemporary of Guru Arjan Dev.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Another very popular stanza form is 'Davayya', which is either a single, or a double couplet of four-lined unit, each line consisting of 28 short matras or their mixed equivalent, with a pause after 16 short matras. The best use of this form has been made in some verse romances of the first half of the nineteenth century like Sasi Punu of Hashim Shah and Hatim Tai, Kama Kanwar te Kamalata, Shirin Farihad and Yusuf Zulaikha of Ahmad Yar of Maharaja Ranjit Singh's time.

Another popular stanza form is the 'Upaman' or 'Nisani chhand', the line length of which is 21 to 23 matras (short) or their mixed equivalent with a pause after the 9th or 12th line, that is in the middle. It has been used mostly in 'vars' or heroic poems, like Jangnama of Bhai Gurudas (II) of the time of Guru Gobind Singh, Mirajnama and Jangnama of Kadir Yar. Bhai Gurudas (I) of the time of Guru Arjan Dev (16th c.) has also used this form in about half of his 38 vars which are didactic in content.

Punjabi verse has adopted many matras from Persian also, of which the most popular are the ghazal, the rubai and the masnavi. Their scanning is also done according to the Persian system or 'Aruz', but as the distinction between the Persian 'sakim' or static, and 'mutaharrak' or kinetic, is not observed in Punjabi pronunciation, sometimes Persian loan words are also indiscriminately scanned much to the disgust of the more fastidious.

Perhaps the most popular verse form, the 'bait', used in Waris Shah's Hir Ranjha, and in most other verse romances up to the end of the nineteenth century, partakes of the character of Persian as well as native prosody of both kinds. According to the varanik system, the line consists of 23-24 letters, and according to the matrik system, it consists of 32 matras (short) or their mixed equivalent. It can be scanned according to the Persian uruz also. Its first known use is to be found in the writings of Muslim poets like Hamid and Muqbal, and by its absence in Hindi poetry, one is inclined to think that it was introduced by Punjabi Muslim poets. It continues to be used in modern Punjabi also, often disguised by breaking the line into two and limiting the length of the stanza to eight such lines. In the earlier uses of the bait, too, the stanza consisted of four lines, as in Muqbal, but later, this limit was more often exceeded than observed.

S.S.S.

PROSODY (Rajasthani) may safely be divided into two separate parts, one of Dingal geet and the other of the traditional metres. The geet metre is an invention of the charans who have used it extensively in their narrative poems as well as in their 'Prabandha kavyas'. Geets of all varieties have been defined and illustrated by scholars in their treatises on the subject.

Some scholars have also laboured to detail such geets as have close resemblance to traditional metres. The traditional metres are commonly used in poems which are rather descriptive by nature. The trend has come down to us from ancient works of Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha. chaupai and duha were used in the early works of Rajasthani. Though early writers used chaupai in the main text, a number of other writers used other metres also, such as arilla, paddhari, motidam, totako, nisani, beakkhari, chhappay and bhujangi, duly interspersed with gaha and duha (Doha). Vachanika and Davavaita also act to break the monotony of description. In some popular works we find the introduction of certain stanzas set to music. Ramgiri, Dhanashri, Sameri, Drupada and Sindhu are some of the popular ragas sung by reciters. Kanhadade prabandh and Mehoji Ramayana contain such ragas along with other less important ones. Some works have been written throughout in a single metre. Bhujangi, veli, chappay, jhulana, soratha, duha are some such metres used in Veli Krishna Rukmini ri by Prithviraj Rathod, Kartar Bawani by Durasa Adha, Vir satsai by Surajmal, and Mansingh ra jhulana by Durasa Adha. These metres are explained in concerned treatises. Raghunath rupak, Raghuvar jas-prakash, Pingal shiromani are some of the treatises which have adopted such metres from the old series which usually do not find a regular place in Rajasthani, Bijumala, hanufal, druta vilambit, chandrayana, naracha, tomar, udhor, kundaliya, chaubola, sarasi, tribhangi, vetal, satak, jhamal, romkanda, tatank, bhakhadi, rasavali, pawado, etc. are some such metres. They are, in fact, defined in Hindi metre books.

A frequent change of metres in longer poems is customary with poets. This is done not only to break the monotony of the descriptive part, but also to show off one's knowledge. Suryamal's Vansha-bhaskar is an example which displays the author's desire to exhibit his scholarship.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mahatabchand Khared, Raghunath rupak (Banaras); N.S. Bhati (ed.), Pingal shiromani (Jodhpur); Sitaram Lalas (ed.), Raghuvar jas-prakash (Jodhpur).

Raw.S.

PROSODY (Sanskrit), Metrical composition in Sanskrit appeared at the very beginning of its literature. The whole of the Rigveda, the earliest literary document extant (c. 2500 BC.), is metrical, consisting of some 36000 lines in a variety of metres. Since then the development of the metrical composition has been kept up with various innovations which have been made from time to time.

Because the Vedas consisted of numerous metrical passages, Chhanda-shastra (Prosody) was developed quite early as one of the auxiliaries of the Vedas (Vedanga). Prosody is regarded as the feet of the Vedas—'chhandah padau tu Vedasya'. The Vedic texts refer here and there to the names of metres and to the number of syllables in them. The earliest systematic treatment of metres is found in the Rikpratishakhya of Shaunaka, Shankhyayana-Shrauta-sutra and Nidana-sutra. But the earliest extant specific work in the field is Chhandas-sutra or Pingala or Pingalanaga. Pingala deals with the Vedic metre in two chapters and with the classical Sanskrit metres in the other six chapters. A good number of other works were also written during the course of the centuries. Of the later theorists, only Jayadeva (c.AD 800) and Krishnabhatta (Vritta-muktavali mid. 18th c.) deal with the Vedic metres as well. Vrittaratnakara of Kedarabhatta (c. 1100) is a popular treatise.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Syllables may be either short (laghu) or long (guru). A rhythmic frequency of the short and long syllables forms a metrical line. Usually, four lines (padas) having a similar pattern form one unit, called a 'rik' (if Vedic) or a 'padya'. There are 'riks' with three lines also. Prosodists distinguish two modes for considering the patterns.

(i) Varna-vrittas: Eight combinations of short and long syllables in groups of threes are called 'gunas' and each of them is designated more popularly by letters ma, ya, etc. Various combinations of the gunas are called Varna-vrittas (iso-syllabic).

(ii) Matra-vrittas: Five groups, gunas, of four matras (short syllabic quantity) are recognised. Usually two lines, each consisting of a certain number of chatur-matra-gunas, are called a matra-vritta (iso-chronic).

The metres are further distinguished as Sama and Visamavrittas.

Longer metrical lines have pauses at certain intervals, called yati, caesura. Prosodists vary in their opinion about this.

The Vedic metre is treated as 'akshara-vrittas' only. That is, they are distinguished on the basis of the total number of syllables in them. Rikpratishakhya knows clearly about the application of quantitative analysis. But it is not made the basis for distinction, probably because the scheme is not strictly adhered to. Even the modern scholars who have studied Vedic prosody can find the predominance of this or that pattern only. The last four syllables, called cadence, have some regularity in the quantity of syllables. It is either iambic or trochaic. The caesura too sometimes might affect the pattern.

The Vedic metre shows infinite variety. It developed into the later varna-vrittas. The development was for bringing in more regularity, uniformity and systematisation. The description of the newly invented shloka by Valmiki is, perhaps, true history: "padabaddho akshar-asamah tantrilaya samanavitah". The matra-vrittas are not the direct descendant of the Vedic metre. Such vrittas are more suitable for a song, and they were widely used in Prakrit. Though later Sanskrit prosody prescribed many regulations, it never lost sight of possibilities for innovation. The synthetic nature of the language too has lent support to this view.

'Prasa', rhyme, is not discussed in Sanskrit prosody. It is considered a verbal figure. Some theorists like Jayakirti do refer to the Dvitiyakshara-prasa, repetition of the second phoneme of the first line in the same place in each of the succeeding lines.

That prosody aids textual criticism is obvious. Analysis of the Vedic metre beyond the number of syllables has given rise to questions whether there was a palimpsest of the Veda at any time and whether the older spellings of the words have been retained. A study of Vedic prosody has enabled the scholars to think of the chronological stratification of the Vedic texts.

In the classical period, starting with the Ramayana of Valmiki, the metrical mode of presentation was utilised to the maximum. Whether a scientific treatise or a story-book, not to speak of literary works, the metrical medium was adopted. No doubt, it facilitated memorisation, but when compared with the amount of the non-metrical writing, one feels that the reason for the adoption of metre runs much deeper. Perhaps, the quotation in Vamana's Kavyalankara-sutra-vritti gives the lead: Prose is considered the touchstone of poets—'gadyam kavinam nikasham vadanti'. Metre, when properly employed, adds to the aesthetic appeal of the composition and covers, to some extent, its defects, if any. Critics like Mahimabhatta and Kshemendra have pointed out that metre, too, has a role in providing aesthetic experience.

R.S.S.M.

PROSODY (Sindhi). Sindhi has been, since the Arab conquest of it in AD 712, the cradle of twin civilizations, Hindu and Islamic. Small wonder then, the Sindhi poetry has been composed in the indigenous metrical forms of doha, soratha, baro duho, tunveri duho, chaupai, chaupaai, etc., and the alien prosodical forms of ghazal, qasida, qita, rubai, etc. Though by AD 786, the Aruz, the science of Islamic prosody, had been codified by the Arabic philologist, Khalil-ben-Ahmed, it was only during the eighteenth century that the first impact of the Islamic metres and forms of poetry was registered in the Sindhi works of Makhdum Abdul Rauf Bhatti (1682-1752), a contemporary of Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752). But the latter, like all his predecessors, used the Hindi doha and its varieties only.

The doha was the main vehicle of poetic expression in Sindhi, as in other Apabhramsha literatures, even before AD 1000, around which New Indo-Aryan speeches, including Sindhi, appeared. The doha proper is made up of two stichs of verse lines having 24 matras each. 'Laghu', a syllable with a short vowel, lasts one matra,and 'guru', a syllable with a long vowel, has two matras. Both the lines of doha have two hemistichs each with the arrangement that the first and third hemistichs have 13 matras each and the second and fourth have 11 matras each. The second and fourth ones rhyme with laghus at their end.

The soratho (Soratha), tunveri duho (doha) and baro

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

duho, too, have two stichs of 48 each, for these are also varieties of the doha form. But it is the rhyming scheme and varying (either 13 or 11) number of matras in the 4-hemistichs sequence that make the difference. The first and third hemistichs of the soratho verse have 11 matras each with rhyme at their end. As the soratho is reverse of the duho, the baro duho is reverse of the tunveri duho. While the tunveri duho has in its first and fourth hemistichs 13 matras each and in its second and third ones 11 matras each, the baro duho has in its first and fourth hemistichs 11 matras each and in its second and third ones 13 matras each.

It is the 11 matras hemistichs which rhyme together. This holds good in many a variety of the Sindhi bayt form, in which the Sindhi saint and sufi poets have expressed themselves in the duho, soratho, tunveri duho and baro duho separately and also jointly. For instance, Shah Abdul Latif knits in his bayts (i) a stich of soratho succeeding a duho, or a stich of duho preceding a tunveri duho = 3 stichs, (ii) a stich of duho between two stichs of soratho, or a stich of soratho succeeding a baro duho = 3 stichs, (iii) a duho and a tunveri duho in one = 4 stichs, (iv) a baro duho and a tunveri duho = 4 stichs, (v) a baro duho, a stich of duho and a tunveri duho = 5 stichs, (vi) two duha preceding a stich of soratho or one and a half duha preceding a tunveri duho = 5 stichs, etc., and retains the scheme of the 11 matra hemistichs rhyming together. Thus, the Sindhi bayt became a blanket term for duho, soratho, baro duho, tunveri duho and their varied placings side by side.

The 'wai' form, which comes at the end of every 'dastan', or a section of a story, in the sufi poets' 'suruds' or 'surs' or modes of singing, to give them finale or to serve as an epilogue to the dastan, is also based on the doha-soratha forms. It is lyrical and not reflective, its theme being love or prayer. The wai begins with a 'thallu', or refrain, which is repeated after every stich (verse). A wai consists of about ten stichs or verses.

Besides the bayt and wai forms, the chaupai and chaupaai were used in the Sindhi saint and sufi poetry, especialy in the 'Mati' appended to 'Sur kapaiti' of the Shah jo risalo, brought out by Diwan Tarachand Shaukiram in 1909, in every stanza of which (the Mati) one chaupaai was linked with half a chaupai. The chaupaai consists of 4 lines of verse, each line with 16 matras and without laghu at the end, and the chaupai also has 4 lines, each line with 15 matras, ending at laghu, for it has one matra less than its cognate form. 'Yati', or harmonical pause, in both the chhandas comes after eight matras.

Sindhi has also advantageously employed several other 'matrik' chhandas like dikpala, kundali, lalit pada, lavani, rola, shakti, samana and vira. But these metres do not seem to have been used before the advent of British rule in Sindh (1843), for during the British rule, Sindh came into still wider contacts with the rest of India.

The nature of Sindhi prosody expressed itself best in Pingala Muni's Chhanda shastra for centuries together and it was about two and a half centuries ago that the Sindhi poets took to the Ilm-e-Aruz also. The first published book of verse based on it was Diwan-e-Gul, a collection of ghazals by Akhund Gul Muhammad (1812-1859). The first descriptive Sindhi book on the rules of Islamic metres was published in 1920 by Mirza Qalich Beg and, curiously enough, it was called Sindhi Vyakarana (Sindhi grammar) Vol. IV, a Sanskritised name for the book dealing with the semitic subject, Ilm-e-Aruz. The Vol. IV of the Sindhi Vyakarana, in its second section discusses (i) the art of writing poetry as distinct from that of writing prose, (ii) the three principles of 'sabab', 'vatad' and 'fasila', the eight pillars, 'arkan', on which rest the Persian metres; scansion of such metres, (iii) kafia and radif, or rhyme and word or a group of words succeeding the rhyme, and (iv) some common defects noticed in the practising of this art. The book is marked by its failure to properly appreciate and scan the chhandas employed by the early Sindhi poets.

Following Mirza Qalich Beg, some other authors produced works on the Ilm-e-Aruz, describing in detail its nature, function and rules. The basic unit is a 'misra', a hemistich or half-line. Each verse is made up of two misras and the sum of their syllables denote a metre. Number of classical Persian metres is 16: 'tawil;, 'madid', 'basit', 'kamil', 'wafir', 'hazaj', 'rajaz', 'ramal', 'sari', 'munsarih', 'khafif', 'muzari', 'muqtazab', 'mujtath', 'mutadarik', 'mutaqrib', though not all of them have been employed in the Sindhi poetry. These metres have different arrangements of short and long syllables. Besides, the poetry written in these metres has rigid rhyme patterns. The qasida and ghazal are rhymed aa, ba, da, ea, and the qita, a form which deals with a particular subject, and masnavi, a form which narrates a romantic story or dilates on a mystical or ethical problem, are rhymed as couplets, i.e., aa, bb, cc, etc. The rubai or quatrain, has three of its lines, the first, second and fourth, rhymed.

The verse forms with stanzas of five, six and eight lines are called mukhammas, musaddas and musamman respectively and have their rigid rhyme schemes, i.e. mukhammas: aaaaa, bbbba, cccca, etc., musaddas: aaaaaa, bbbbaa, ccccaa, etc., musamman : rhymed the same way as musaddas, aaaaaaa, bbbbbaa, ccccccaa, etc.

Besides these, there are two other similar verse forms (but they have no fixed number of lines), viz., the 'tarjiaband' and the 'tarkib-band'. They may run even in 12 lines. In both, the first four lines are rhymed aaba. As the number of lines in the stanza goes up, new rhymes are employed, but the final two lines, which are always a refrain, are rhymed with each other and not with any preceding lines, i.e., six lines : aabacc, eight lines : aabacadd, ten lines: aabacadaee, twelve lines : aabacadaeaff.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Najib Ullah, in his Islamic Literature (New York, 1963), distinguishes the two verse forms in that the rhymes of the final two lines repeat as a refrain in each succeeding stanza of the tarjia-band and the final two lines do not repeat the same rhymes in succeeding stanzas of the tarkib-band.

Since Sindhi has an advantage of having both the systems of prosody, Hindu and Islamic, its modern poetry abounds in such examples as could be scanned, side by side, in both the systems. The fifth 'ganj' of the Panja ganja (Five treasures, 1973) by J.K. Bhavnani laudably attempts at exploring the possibilities of comparing some Islamic metres with the older varanik chhandas, e.g. yagana/mutaqarib, ragana/mutadarik; yagana guru/hazaj; rangana guru/ramal; tagana guru/rajaz; sagana laghu guru/kamil; jagana laghu guru/wafir.

Students of comparative literature (or rather of comparative prosody) will observe with interest that in the following example by Hasaram Piya the dikpala chhanda is scanned in parallel with the muzari bahar: "Sathi na hane inda shayad uhe zamana/rahiji vya adhura ulfat sanda fasana...."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asanand Chhataram, Ilm-e-aruz and Hindi Pingala (1973); J.K. Bhavnani, Chhanda sug' andhi (Ajmer, 1953), Itr-e-aruz (Ajmer, 1954) and Panja ganja (New Delhi, 1973); Lekhraj Aziz, Gul va khar (Bombay, c. 1952); Mirza Qalich Beg, Sindhi vyakarana, Vol. IV (1920); Motilal Jotwani, Alankara ain chhanda (1965); Sheikh Muhammad Ibrahim Khalil, Rahnuma-e-shairi (Three volumes in 1935, 1936 and 1948)

Mo.J.

PROSODY (Tamil). The study of prosody, as part of grammatical system, is closely connected with the study of language and literature. Tolkappiyam is the earliest grammatical work extant in Tamil. It consists of three major divisions, namely 'eluttatikaram' (phonology), 'sollatikaram' (syntax) and 'porulatikaram' (poetics and prosody). The eighth chapter of 'porulatikaram' deals with poetic composition and is called 'cheyyuliyal'. Many commentators explain why the chapter is called cheyyuliyal. According to Ilampuranar, the first commentator of Tolkappiyam, it is called so since it deals with the grammar of poetic composition. Perachiriyar, however, holds the view that the chapter deals not only with the constituents of poetry but also with the seven types of literary compositions which have metrical forms. In this respect this chapter on poetic compositions is unique and broad-based, covering a wide range of literary compositions.

The term 'cheyyul' is derived from the foot 'chey' which means 'to compose' or 'to make', and this word is nearer the Greek word 'Poetikos' which is derived from the word 'Poesis' So it is better to interpret 'Cheyyuliyal' as a grammar of the genre of literary composition as also a grammar of prosody. In the very first chuttiram (sutra) of Cheyyuliyal, Tolkappiyar gives twenty-six consitutents (yappiyal vakai or prosodial kinds) of poetry and eight types of beauty which heighten the charm of poetry. He also uses the word 'cheyyul' which represents the shades of meaning, such as poetry, poetical, and poetical composition. In one chuttiram, he further mentions seven forms of cheyyul, namely 'pattu' (poetry), 'urai' (prose), 'nul' (grammar), 'vaymoli' (old saying)' 'pici' (riddle), 'ankatam' (satire) and 'mutusol' (proverb). Here the word 'yappu' refers to the composition of the work of the form which is used to express the idea conceived fully in 'the line formed of letters and other prosodial elements'.

It is a fact that Tolkappiyar did not consider it necessary to have a separate section as 'yappakikaram', the chapter on prosody. But in the medieval period it was felt necessary to have separate grammars on 'yappu' or prosody. And also most of these grammatical works were written under the partonage of the imperial Cholas. The author of Yapparungalam is said to be Amitasagaranar. It is a popular belief that Amitasagaranar is the author of both the works Yapparungalam and Yapparungalakkarigai. Yapparungalam is an elaborate treatise on prosody but the name of its commentator is not known. The commentary is really an encyclopaedia of Tamil prosody. Its importance consists in its being the only source of information on the works of prosody popular before Amitasagaranar. In contrast, Yapparungalakkarigai is a simple and condensed version of Yapparungalam. It is almost a guide book for the students of prosody. Kunasagarar, however, is said to be the commentator of Yapparungalam.

Both these works consist of three major divisions, viz., Uruppiyal (chapter on constituents of prosody), Cheyyuliyal (chapter on prosody) and Olipiyal (chapter on miscellany). 'Yappu' or prosody is referred to as a metrical device to understand a poem or composition under the process of 'construction' or 'de-construction'. The second part of Yapparungalam deals with the structural analysis of four major kinds of metre and its varieties which are still current in usage and are popularly known as venba, achiryappa, kalippa and vanchippa. The third chapter on miscellany tells about the rules of exception in the analysis of the main features of prosody.

Among the grammatical works written during the time of the later Cholas, Viracholiyam is the first in the category dealing with 'eluttu' (letter), 'sol' (word), 'porul' (theme), 'yappu' (prosody), and 'ani' (rhetoric/alamkara). Puttamittiranar, the author of this work, has devoted one chapter exclusively to the study of prosody under the title Yappatikaram. The titles of the chapters in the work itself show the author's predisposition to introduce the Sanskrit prosodic tradition into Tamil. The author says that there are 'muttagam', 'kulagam', 'tokai' and 'kappiyam' and they are generally in the form of 'yappu'. But in the works Tolkappiyam, Yapparungalam and Yapparungalakkarigai, 'yappu' of prosody is a device which stands for the connection between letter and foot, and its function is to express the conceived idea by letter and foot. By reading these grammatical works on prosody and their commentaries, one can see that there are three different groups of scholars headed by Tolkappiyar, Kakkaippatiniyar, Mayeswarar and Avinayanar propagating their theories of Tamil prosody and formulating rules and regulations in addition to the grammatical tradition of Sanskrit prosody.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Still the student of Tamil prosody is on the verge of confusion for his inability to formulate any composite view on Tamil prosody by reading these works. Creativity in poetry transcends the rules of prosody as handed down to us from the days of Tolkappiyam. It is worth remembering a proverb in Tamil which says that it is better to live by beating the drums than by writing poems by learning 'Karigai'. People like Vichakapperumal Iyer, Bharatidasan, Ki.Va. Jagannathan and A.K. Paranthamanar understand this problem and have written books on Tamil prosody in a simplified manner. Among the works Selvam's Yappum kavithaiyum (Prosody and poetry, 1975) is worthy of mention. It helps one understand the living tradition of Tamil prosody.

C.Ra.

PROSODY (Telugu). Metrical composition in Telugu had begun long before Nannaya, the first poet who wrote his Andhra Mahabharata. A number of inscriptions in Telugu belonging to pre-Nannaya Age (AD 500-AD 1000) prove the fact beyond any doubt. In addition to the epigraphical evidence, there are a number of allusions to works earlier than Nannaya's in the writings of later poets and anthologists. Apart from these, there are systematic studies of metres (called 'chhandas') like Janasraya chhandas, Jayadeva chhandas and others attributed to Gunga Vijayaditya, and Vadindra chudamani or Vanchana, all said to have been composed sometime before Nannaya. Of these Janasraya chhandas alone is extant. It deals with Sanskrit prosody in the main, but includes certain 'jatis' which do not belong to Sanskrit. Even Bharata's Natyashastra describes a native metre, sirsaka, which is identified as sisapadya in Telugu. There is a reference to Jayadeva chhandas by Nagavarma (AD 1000) in his Chhandombudhi, a prosodic work in Kannada. Malliya Recha, the first prosodist in Telugu in his Kavijanasraya (11th c.), has also mentioned the work. From what has been said it is clear that we have a vast body of metrical poetry in Telegu in pre-Nannaya age, though much of it is lost to us now.

In addition to the written poetry referred to above, there was also a kind of oral poetry known as 'pada kavita' in the same period.

A student of Telugu prosody is often confronted with the difficulty of distinguishing a deshi metre from Sanskrit metre on account of the interaction between Telugu and Sanskrit in the pre-Nannaya period. As a result of this interaction some of the native metres like dwipada, dandaka were introduced to Sanskrit. They are described as Sanskrit metres in the treatises of Sanskrit prosody. Similarly, Sanskrit metres like utpalamala and champakamala found their way into Telugu by the tenth century AD. The mutual influence was so great that a native metre like ragada found its way into a classic of Sanskrit, Yasastilaka champu by Somadeva Suri (9th century AD). Similarly a kanda padya of Telugu origin is found in a Sanskrit inscription of AD 980.

Some of the deshi metres owe their origin to Kannada, (ragada, akkara etc). 'Upaganas' and 'matraic' feet also come from Kannada. Nannaya is said to have followed Pampa, Ranna and Nagavarma in introducing Sanskrit metres into Telugu. Kavijanasraya by Mallia Reca, the first extant work on prosody in Telugu, is indebted to Chhandombudhi (AD 1000) of Nagavarma.

Telugu has absorbed the Sanskrit prosodic system in its entirety. The definition of long and short syllables, the formation of feet, both syllabic and matraic, the ramification of verses (prastara krama), the six solutions (shatpratyayas), presiding deities of syllabic feet, benefic and malefic effects of the feet in certain positions, twenty-six genres, chhandas, starting with Ukti—all these are there in Telugu. The yati (pause) and prasa (second letter alliteration), however, do not come from Sanskrit, though the termini technici are retained as in Sanskrit. These two distinguishing features of Telugu are the life of Telugu prosody and it is they that make Telugu poetry what it is. They seem to come from Tamil and Kannada respectively, though they are not regularly and exactly used as in Telugu.

Some important aspects of Telugu prosody are: (1) Long and short syllables (guru and laghu); a verse is called a 'padya' in Telugu, though sometimes it is called 'vritta' rather loosely. Each line is called a 'pada' (a quarter-verse). Guru and laghu give structure to the verse. A 'matra' is the basic unit of measure. (2) Feet (ganas): In addition to the eight 'nisarga ganas' given below we have the following four di-syllabic feet; gaga (--); laga (U-) also called Vagana; lala (----U U). The Nisarga ganas are: Magana (Molossus), U-- Yagana (Bacchic); -U-Ragana (Cretic); U U - sagana (Anapaest); -- U Tagana (Antibacchic) U-U Jagana (Amphibrach)- U U Bhagana (Dactyl); U U U Nagana (Tribrach). In addition to these Sanskrit derived 'Akshara ganas' (Syllabic feet) there are upaganas derived from Kannada. They are called Surya, Indra and Chandra ganas instead of Brahma, Vishnu and Rudra ganas as in Kannada. Their number also is reduced. (3) Vritta: In Telugu, vishama vrittas do not occur at all. Verses of deshi origin consist of matraic feet and upaganas. These are further subdivided into those which are conditioned by the identical collocation of initial laghus and gurus and those which are not conditioned thus. In the first division we have jatis including kanda (six varieties) utsaha, taruvoja, five varieties of akkara, manjari dwipa-da, tripada, chatushpadi, panchapadi, shatpadi, ragada, kalika, utkalika. The second division includes the nine varieties of gita (Ataveladi, etc) and the seven kinds of Sisa. They are called upajatis. (4) Yati and Prasa: In Telugu prosody yati, also called visranti, virati, vadi, vall, does not indicate a pause in recitation as in Sanskrit 4th letter but stands for the 'first letter alliteration' as C.P. Brown put it. Allitertion here includes assonance as well. The recurrence of the letter is with respect to the vowel as well as the consonant. The first letter in a line gives direction of the line and hence it is called vadi as in Tamil. The first letter in a line or another letter which is in accord with it, both in its vowel and consonant components, called mitrakshara should be repeated at the specified position in the line. Example: "Bhuri satvulu sarva loka vi bhul vi bhuti samriddhulu...." This is a line of the verse called Mattakokila. The first letter Bhu agrees with the eleventh letter, which is its place of yati. It is to be noticed that the word does not break after the tenth letter as in Sanskrit. The history of Telugu prosody is in a way the history of yati and prasa. The number and nature of yatis has been a battle ground of the metrists. Malliya Recha (1100), our first prosodist in his Kavijanasraya, identified only ten kinds of yati, while Appakavi (1650) mentioned as many as forty-one. Kuchimanchi Venkatraya Kavi (18th c.) enumerated 72 kinds. It is a very intricate subject. We give here the most elementary ones. The letters mentioned are mitraksharas: (1) a, a, ai, au (2) i, i, ru, e, e, (3) u, u, o, o, (4) k, kh, g, gh, (5) ca, cha, ja, jha (6) ta, tha, da, dha (7) ta, tha, d, dha (8) pa, pha, ba, bha (9) n and n (10) 1 and 1 (11) r and r (12) sa, sa sa, ha (13) a, ya, ha (14) pu, phu, bu, bhu, mu. Telugu prosodists not only retained the Sanskrit terms yati and prasa, but also retained the method of indicating the place of pause, though sometimes they varied it even in metres of Sanskrit origin. In metres like Prithivi, Indravajra and Upendravajra they defined new positions for yati. In Sanskrit shikhirini, for example, there is a pause at the seventh letter. In Telugu it is shifted to the thirteenth letter. Bhujangaprayata has no yati in Sanskrit, but in Telugu it is introduced at the eighth letter. Prasa in Telugu prosody means the second letter alliteration in each of the four lines of a verse. It is enough if a consonant is repeated in all the four lines; vowels do not have relevance at all. Example; "Tegu talalu molacu talalum-diguvambadu talau mogilu-jagamantra gani yatala polen." In this kanda padya the second 'g' constitutes prasa. Recha did not record any varieties of prasa, but Anantamatya (15th c.) identified twelve prasas. Appakavi (1650) mentioned as many as seventeen. Others have identified a few more. The most important aspect is the use of prasa as yati in certain native metres. That is, in place of the first letter the second letter may be taken as yati. This is called prasayati or pravadi. Example: "Bindu purvamai tamalo-na bondu bamalu". In this line of gita padya the underlined second letter is repeated instead of the first.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(5) Names of metres: Telugu prosodists like those of Kannada give sometimes new names to old Sanskrit metres. For example, Shashivadhana in Sanskrit is Champakamala in Telugu. Sanskrit Sarala is Tarala in Telugu.

Though it is possible to generate 13, 42, 17,726 sama vrittas and many more crores of other vrittas, in actual practice, no poet in Sanskrit or Telugu has ever used more than fifty in all. Of these Nannaya used only nine common metres and twenty-three rare metres. The later poets rarely showed an inclination to use new metres to experiment with the texture of the popular metre. Nannaya, Tikkana, Shrinatha and Kankanti Paparaju are some of our classical poets who were interested in metrical innovations. The following are the most common metres in use from the time of Nannaya to the present day: (1) utpalamala: Bha ra na ba bha ra va. (yati-10th letter):

"Rajaku laika bhu sanudu rajama noharu danya ra jate."

(2) Champakamala: Na, ja, bha, ja, ja, ra; (yati-11th letter): "Ghana durithanu bandha ka li kala ja dosa tusa ra samhatin".

(3) Sardula vikriditam: Ma, sa, ja, sa, ta ta, ga. (yati-13th letter): "Tretadwa para san dhi nuddha a madam dhibhuta vidwesi jiö" (4) Mattobhavikriditam: Sa, bha, ra, na, ma, ya, la, ga. (yati-14th letter): "lviye num sata tambuna yeda ga ram bistam bulai yun du ba". Of the changing metres, upajatis (1) Kanda (2) Sisa (3) Gita (4) Ataveladi have been there since Nannaya's time.

To disgusted with the stereotyped metre diction, modern poets in Telugu began to experiment in many directions. Traditionalists like Kokkonda Venkata Ratham Pantulu not only introduced anustubh verse into Telugu but found new metres like vendi bangaru. Other writers tried to write old metres like utpalamala without observing yati and prasa. Rayaprolu's Dutamattebham is an example of this type. Gurazada Appa Rao's discovery of 'mutyala saralu' is a great event in the history of prosody. Gurazada said he had tried to imitate the rhythm of a Darsee Ghazell in Telugu, but later research proved that after all it is only a variation of the old deshi metre ragada—harinagati ragada in particular. Lyric measures of deshi type in matra feet captured the imagination of the romantic poets like Abburi Rama Krishna Rao, Devulapalli Krishna Sastry, Basavaraju Appa Rao, Viswanatha Satyanarayana, Nanduri Subba Rao, ete. Arudra deliberately exploited a beautiful folk-metre in his Kunalamma padalu. A comparable resurrection of a forgotten deshi metre of Kannada origin is Viswanatha Satyanarayana's Madhyakkaralu which won the Sahitya Akademi Award. Sri Sri, the modern Telugu poet, is a master of metrical art. His Mahaprasthanam is a very popular book, but some of the lyrics in it are but variations on Satpadis and various kinds of Ragadas. His prose poems too are significant. Pathabhi, Arudra, Sistala, Srirangam Narayana Babu, B.G.Tilak, Gunturu Sesendra Sarma and many others have been writing vachana kavita. Kunduri

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Anjaneyulu emerged as a prominent poet in modern poetry. Critics have been trying to find out the underlying principles of vachana kavita. Some people argued that it could be called free verse, but Kunduri and others insisted that it is vachana padyam on account of its lineation. As every poet divides his thought into padas or lines, it is clear that the poet wants to distinguish his writing from mere prose where sentence alone forms the unit. Even though 'free verse' cannot be divided into akshara ganas or matra ganas as in traditional prosody, it is possible to divide it into certain units of thought, called bhavaganas. He has succeeded in suggesting that 'niamarahitya' (absence of a principle) itself cannot be taken as the characteristic of vachana kavita. A subtle internal rhythm organises the content of vachana kavita into a form of its own. It is certain that we cannot find a right mould as in the past for free verse, because then it will cease to be free. Vachana kavita for all its regulating principles is bound to remain flexible and free. The latest development in Telugu poetry is 'mini kavitodyamam'. Though its practitioners claim that it is a movement by itself, and though they have already published an anthology under the title Minikavita viplavam (1980), it appears to be no more than an untenable posture. It does not differ in essence from vachana kavita. Economy of word and shortness of size are the conspicuous features of these pieces, but they are not the defining qualities of their composition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D. Venkatavadhani, Andhra vangmayarambhadasa, Vol I (Hyderabad, 1960); G.V. Sitapati, Telugulo chhandoritalu (Hyderabad, 1961); Nidadavolu Venkata Rao (ed), Kavijanasrayamu; Ravuri Doraswamy Sarma, Telugu bhashalo chhando ritulu (Madras, 1962); Sri Sri, 'Mutyala saram' in Saraswata vyasamulu, Vol. IV (Hyderabad, 1963); Tekumalla Rajagopala Rao, Chhandasshastramu (Madras, 1929).

G.Sr.

PROSODY (Urdu) is based on Persian prosody, which itself is based on Arabic prosody. In its essentials it is extremely exact, but it does blur around the edges. Most of this blurred area consists of Sanskrit, Hindi and folk-poetry metres which are not always classifiable within the Urdu system. The great merit of this prosody is its power to give an analytical scansion of any quantitatively metrical Urdu line. It does this by using synthetic code words capable of representing any sequence of sounds that can occur in such a line. These synthetic words, called 'afail', are all derived from eight paradigmatic forms based on the triliteral Arabic root 'feain-lam'. They encode and exemplify the sound sequences which they are intended to describe. They thus permit one simultaneously to describe and to perfectly imitate any metrical line.

Since this prosody is quantitative, its basic unit of measurement is the letter (harf). When a letter stands alone, it represents a short sound. When two letters combine, they represent a long sound. There cannot be a combination of more than two letters. When spelling and pronunciation do not agree, scansion is normally governed by pronunciation. The Urdu prosodic system, unlike that of Sanskrit, generates a decided preponderance of long sounds over short ones. Thus for poetic convenience certain long sounds are optionally treated as short in accordance with the requirements of metre. This phenomenon is much more common in Urdu than in Persian.

Western writers on Perso-Arabic prosody have tended to use the terms 'short syllable' and 'long syllable' to describe the phenomena designated above as 'short sound' and 'long sound'. While the value of the term 'syllable' is undeniable, the term cannot be used in this context without doing some violence to its original connotation. The concepts of the 'quiescent letter' (harf-e sakin) and the 'moveable letter' (harf-e mutaharrik) admirably meet the requirements of an ultimately letter-based system. Since there are only eight original code words, each of which has many variants, it is easier to explain the formation of the variants by describing them as the result of deleting letters from, or adding them to, the original code words. The resulting transformations cannot be causally explained in terms of syllables.

The main strength of the system lies in its almost perfect precision. The inflexibility of its patterns permits it to come close to defining a metrical line in absolute terms. Yet it is flexible enough to absorb certain outside elements. For example, the system does not have a concept corresponding to the Sanskrit 'matrik chhand', yet there are several metres where both theory and practice permit a great deal of free variation. Similarly, the classical theory does not recognise a caesura. Yet a number of metres commonly used in Urdu and Persian do have a full caesura.

About nineteen theoretical metrical patterns are used to derive the actual metres that Urdu poetry uses. Of these paradigms, six are used in their original form as well. A large number of variations of these nineteen are in normal use; even more are possible for the metrically sophisticated poet. The theoretical rigidity of the system thus does not limit the variety achievable in practice.

The system is so designed that it will not normally generate a sound-pattern that does not occur in the ideal state of the language. For example, three short sounds do not occur consecutively in the language. The system therefore prevents such a sequence from being generated. This is in strong and interesting contrast to Sanskrit prosody, in which long sequences of short syllables are common. The Urdu system, though theoretically oriented toward long sequences of long syllables, provides a judicious mix of shorts and longs, in the ratio of one short syllable to about three long ones. The result is that Urdu metres sound sometimes crisp, and at other times more sedate.

The minimum unit of verse is a 'sheir', which consists of two lines (misra). Some paradigmatic metres have four feet to each line, some have three. Some of the four-foot metres can be converted into three-foot ones by dropping one specified foot. Some of the four-foot ones can also be doubled into eight-foot ones. The different feet in a metre do not necessarily have the same number of short and long sounds. Shorter feet tend to occur at the beginning or the end of a line. It has often been said, and not by non-scholars alone, that Urdu poets prefer some metres to others because some metres are more 'musical', or are more suited to Urdu. The 'musicality' of a metre is actually a function of the hearer's subjective perception and previous exposure to that metre. So the argument of 'musical' versus 'unmusical' metres is circular. All metres are in fact musical by definition. And the very nature of metre is such that only those metres are possible in a language that are suited to it. So the reason for some metres being preferred to others should be sought elsewhere.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Urdu prosody is strictly formal, in the sense that it does not investigate the interaction of sound and meaning, as modern western prosody does. This prosody, instead, tells us with admirable precision what the sound patterns of a particular poem are. It has never attempted to explain why two poems in an identical metre can sound different.

Indicating short and long sounds by two separate symbols, it is possible conveniently to express the sound pattern of a poem through a diagram. The concept of diagrammatic presentation was, however, unknown to classical metrists. This is why the system seems so difficult to beginners. A mass of theoretical writing on Urdu prosody is available. Very little of it is original, though. Mention may be made of the Persian Darya-e Latafat (1801) by Insha (1757-1817), Miqyasul Ashi'ar (1886) of Mirza Auj, a short note on the caesura in M'a'-ib-e-sukhan (1929) by Hasrat Mohani (1875-1951), some writings of Azmatullah Khan (1887-1927) advocating the adoption of Hindi metres. In more recent times, Gian-chand Jain has theorized about the occurrence of stress patterns in Urdu metre.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.D. Pybus, A Textbook of Urdu Prosody and Rhetoric (Lahore, 1924); Ralph Russell, 'Some problems of the treatment of Urdu metre', Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, April 1960; T. Graham Bailey, 'A guide to the metres of Urdu verse', Bulletin of the School of Oriental & African Studies, Vol. 9, 1937-1939.

S.R.F.

PSEUDONYMOUS LITERATURE (Sanskrit). A pseudonym, according to dictionary, is a fictitious name, especially one assumed by an author, i.e., a nom-de-plume. Pseudonymous literature is, therefore, literature written under an assumed name. Sanskrit is unique in having a vast body of literature, especially gnomic and didactic, or erotic and devotional, which has been traditionally handed down under fictitious names. Treatises on polity, for instance, are palmed off on legendary celestial preceptors like Brihaspati and Shukra or mythological figures like Manu. All Shaiva Agamas are supposed to be the result of Shiva's dialogue with Parvati. Similarly, the entire body of puranas and upa-puranas is ascribed to an eponymous sage, Vyasa. Scholars, however, do not attach credibility to such ascriptions.

In old anthologies of Sanskrit poetry we often find excellent verses ascribed to poets who bear nicknames which are very funny, and we have no means of identifying the authors. These writings come under the head of 'subhasita literature', and it is estimated that the number of verses so collected may be no less than a lakh. In recent years Ludwig Sternbach undertook the task of editing them, but he could only publish before his sad end about 15,000 verses. V. Raghavan too attempted a survey of what he called sobriquet in Sanskrit literature. They relate to the descriptive names attached to poets in later times by their admirers. For example, Kalidasa is given the sobriquet of 'Dipashikha' by someone obviously impressed by the verse which contains this simile in the description of Indumati's Svayamvara in Raghuvamsha. In the same way, we have references to other poets with sobriquets like Chatra-bharavi, Ghantamagha, Dana-ratnakara, Yamuna-trivikrama, Venikrapana-amarachandra, Araghatta-dhanapala, and Karnikara-mankha. These sobriquets, too, need not detain us, since they were not names assumed by the poets themselves to hide their identity.

We have the name of a poet like Ghatakarpara which is a sobriquet divested of the real name, and serving virtually as a pseudonym. A similar example is that of the great commentator Jayamangala, whose sobriquet alone has come down to us, and we have no means of ascertaining his real name. In fact, this author has given us brilliant commentaries on Bhatti-kavya and prosody. We have fifty erotic verses by one 'Chora' (or thief), and often he has been wrongly identified with Bilhana. But exclusive references to him by Bhoja, who lived earlier than Bilhana, prove that he was a pseudonymous poet. Similarly 'Rakshasa-kavya' is a pseudonymous poem. Its author is remembered only as Rakshasa or 'demon' and no other name is known. It is not impossible that the poet chose this nom-de-plume for himself. The poem is also erotic. Unlike these nicknames, a pseudonym, complimentary to the poet, is instanced in 'Utprekshavallabha' adopted by a late 'mahakavya' writer. His work is Bhikshatana-kavya, describing the lila of Shiva as a beggar.

Whether it be a sobriquet or a pseudonym, the verses actually set out in the anthologies under the name are enjoyable, and some specimens of them may be given below in their English renderings. Here is a verse embodying a happy poetic fancy which earns its author the pseudonym, 'Kridachandra' (Toy moon):

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The cresent fallen from Shiva's crest
And the bangle broken in love play,
Joining both into a circle soon,
Parvati tells Shiva with a smile:
"See,O Lord, the full moon!"

In another example a poetess is called 'Vikata-nitamba' (heavy-hipped). Here are her verses:

Don't fear she is tender and soft;
Can a flower break under a bee's weight?
Hold her hard in intimacy;
A sugar-cane gently pres't
Won't yield its juice aright.

Some other pseudonyms noted by Ludwig Sternbach are 'Manovinoda', 'Bheri-bhayankara', 'Mahamanushya', 'Adbhuta-punya'. There are also bawdy verses under this head. It is, however, clear that in Sanskrit there is a whole class of 'muktakas' or pearls preserved in anthologies under pseudonyms and they deserve scholarly attention.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N. Krishnamachariar, History of Classical Sanskrit Literature (Delhi, 1970); Ludwig Sternbach, Mahasubhasitasangraha (Hoshiarpur, 1976-1987); V. Raghavan, "Sobriquet in Sanskrit", Journal of Oriental Research (Madras, XVIII, 4.).

K.Kr.

PUDUMAIPPITTAN (Tamil; b. 1906, d. 1948) was a well-known short story writer. One of the leaders of the so-called Manikkodi group, he was a rebel who found most trends in society frustrating. Born in a traditional orthodox Shaivite family in the Tirunelveli district, he took his B.A. degree and served as sub-editor in two Tamil dailies, Dinamani (1935-1941) and Dinasari (1942-1946), both edited by T.S. Chockalingam. Interested in the late thirties in the pre-war European situation, he was co-author of a biography of Adolf Hitler in Tamil. He also wrote a biography of Mussolini under the title Fascist Jatamuni. Recognised as a master story-teller since the mid-thirties, his writing career extended from 1933 to 1946 when he turned to the Tamil film as script writer.

Pudumaippittan wrote poems, literary criticism, general essays, political comments and plays. He is best known for his short stories, of which more than a third of his total output can be considered outstanding. 'Pudumai' (novelty) and 'pittam' (eccentricity) seemed to have been the hallmarks of his short stories. He was subservient to no ideology and subscribed to no known systems of philosophy. His ideas were uniquely his own and though he was a non-conformist in his personal life, he was consistent throughout his career.

Among his short stories 'Silpiyin narakam' (The hell of the sculptor, 1934) brought him fame. It portrays the dilemma of a sculptor who had created the 'Nataraja' image. If he dedicated it to the temple it would no longer be an art object but a figure of worship, and no one would look at the artistic side of it. Dedicating it to the harem as a mere object of art was out of question in the social milieu to which he belonged. This dichotomy is brought out in the form of dialogue between a Greek soldier, alive to aesthetic traditions, a Hindu Swamiji and the sculptor himself. It deftly evokes the atmosphere of ancient Poompuhar.

A similar ambiguity prevails in his other successful stories like 'Kanchanai' (1941). It is an effective evocation of the macabre and the morbid themes to which Pudumaippittan was addicted throughout his short life. In 'Kadavulum Kandaswamy Pillai' Lord Shiva escapes from the sanctum sanctorum of the temple only to find how difficult it was to live with humankind adjusting to their ways; this again was another theme familiar to the readers of Pudumaippittan in other stories as well. 'Sapa vimochanam', along with 'Kanchanai', is among the best crafted stories of Pudumaippittan. Does Sri Rama have a double standard with regard to his wife Sita and with regard to Ahalya, the wife of Gautama? Ahalya becomes stone again hearing the story from Sita's mouth as to how she had to undergo the fire ordeal to prove her chastity. Rama whom Ahalya had thought of as a hero showed feet of clay; she feels unequal to living again the life gifted by an unworthy person like Rama. The story can be read simply as a proof of the double standards of Rama, but it raises other questions equally valid for the discriminating reader. Ahalya was again a favourite theme with Pudumaippittan; he wrote at least three stories about her. In 'Andru iravu' he rediscovers the joy of telling an old story again taking two incidents from Tiruvilayadar puranam.

In another set of stories, Pudumaippittan seeks to explore the morbid and the abnormal, sometimes in a scientific manner. His 'Vetalams', 'Brahma Rakshasas' and 'Siddhas' are credible and interesting human beings. In quite another set of stories, he introduces the elements of progressivism and social commitment. A woman whoring to earn money for buying medicine for her ailing husband, a human being turned into a machine by routine but turning human for a second during his routine work, the urban cement civilisation to which the Tirunelveli man tries to acclimatise himself, are among the themes which Pudumaippittan handled ably. Still other stories deal with his spiritual quests. But whatever he wrote, his personal stamp was on it. Fifty years after they were written, his stories are extremely fresh and as readable as when they were written.

Pudumaippittan handled the Tamil language with an adequacy for creative purposes which was hardly matched in his own days and can be said to be scarcely matched even today. He was a master of the right word in the right place.

In addition to his stories, he has left some short plays that are equally effective. His short play 'Vaakkum vakkum' is very interesting. He has left a slim volume of verse, modernistic in content, but derived prosodically from the lesser masters of the verse form of the seventeenth century known as the Siddha poets. He also translated widely from the Western fiction. He edited three annual numbers of the Dinamani which gave a fillip to current creative writing in Tamil.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

K.N.S.

PUGGALA-PANNATTI (Pali) is the fourth book of Abhidhamma-pitaka (Buddhist canon), but its contents are not highly metaphysical. It has much in common with Suttapitaka, both in form and in content. Puggala here stands for an individual or one opposed to a class. It does not mean soul as in the Abhidhamma texts.

The list of contents (matika) is given at the beginning of this book containing ten chapters. Chapter one deals with the manifestation of the six pannattis: 'skandha', 'ayatana', 'dhatu', 'sachcha', 'indriya' and 'puggala' which are elaborately treated. Persons are classified according to certain traits which have a bearing on the Buddhist religion. Fifty different types are given with only one characteristic in view. The types given, range from a 'sekha' (learner of the Dhamma) to an 'arahant' (saint). Chapter two deals with the types of persons on the basis of two traits, and twenty-six such types are given. Chapter three classifies the persons: those who defy 'sila' (ethical conduct), those who do not follow 'sila', and those who follow. Chapter four makes four divisions, for example, the division on the basis of speech and action. The next six chapters consider the classification on the basis of six to ten divisions of persons. Thus, for example, Chapter eight sets forth eight types from the beginners to those who have realised Truth. Chapter ten describes ten types of those who are the accomplished ones.

The method employed here is the same as found in Anguttaranikaya. From the point of view of form and content also. 'Sangitsutta' of Digha-nikaya is very similar to this: a part of 'Chattaro-puggala' section of Puggalapannatti is identical with 'Chattaro puggala' of Sangitisutta'. There are repetitions and much of the material is taken from the other parts of the canon, particularly Suttanipata. Puggalapannati may be one of the early abhidhamma texts according to scholars.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R. Monis (ed.), tr. B.C. Law. Designation of Human Types (London, 1924).

R.S.S.M.

PUHALENDI (Tamil; b. 13th c.) was an epic poet who composed Nalavenpa on the story of Nala, an episode in the Mahabharata. Born in Ponvilainda Kalattur in Chengalpet district, near Madras, he was patronised by Chandraswargi, a petty chief ruling from Murnainagar in Malluvanad. The place has not yet been identified. Puhalendi mentions the name in a few places in his poem.

Nalavenpa is written in 424 'venpa' verses. The story of Nala was sung by Puhalendi and later by Prince Ativira Rama-Pandiya in a long poem of 2000 'viruttam' verses under the title of Naitatam. But between these two Nalavenpa seems to have been a more popular poem.

The story of the poem is well-known in India. It is a story of misfortune, suffering, patience and the ultimate triumph of virtue resulting in the reunion of the separated couple. Puhalendi narrated the story in a simple way but also in fine lyrical phrases highlighting the moral content of the story. Venpa is a complicated metre and in later days it was claimed that none can equal Puhalendi in handling it. Before him epic poems in the venpa metre were rare, but after him many used this metre for long narration.

M.Ar.

PUJALAL (Gujarati; b. 1901, d. 1985), whose full name was Pujalal Ranchhod Das Dalvadi, was born at Godhara (Gujarat). While studying for matriculation at Nadiad he came into contact with Ambalal Purani, a well-known Aurobindonian thinker and prose-writer. Through him Pujalal turned to the yoga of Sri Aurobindo. For higher studies he joined Gujarat College, Ahmedabad, but could not pursue the course. In 1923 he worked as a gymnastics teacher in a small school started by Karunashankar Bhatt at Kosindra. In 1926 he settled down at Aurobindo Ashram, Pondicherry.

Pujalal firmly believed that his poetic activity was inspired by Sri Aurobindo and the Mother of the Pondicherry Ashram. His first collection of poems, Parijat, was puplished in 1938 with an introduction by Balvantrai Thakore, a prominent man of letters. The publication of Parijat was considered a phenomenon and was highly acclaimed by eminent critics. Balvantarai, in his introduction, praised Pujalal's range of themes, mastery of metres, proficiency in the sonnet form and picturesque poetic style. He found Shelley's influence on his long poem 'Priya kavitane' and felt that Pujalal's muse was inspired by Shelley's Spirit of Beauty. A well-known critic, Dolarai Mankad, reviewed this collection in Buddhiprakash and praised Pujalal's poetic achievements. Another prominent critic, Vishnuprasad Trivedi, also spoke highly of his creative powers and equated Pujalal with Sundaram and Umashankar Joshi, the two leading poets of the age. Pujalal published a number of small volumes of poems like Japamala, Urmimal and Aradhika, etc. which were later put together in Maha Bhagavati. In his later life Pujalal became a prolific writer and published several collections of poems comprising devotional songs, children's poetry, heroic poetry, etc.

He brought out a collection of poems Kavyaketu in 1980 which resembled his earlier work Parijat. Most of the poems in the collection are long poems revealing the poet's sustained creative power, metrical mastery and ability to express a wide range of sentiments.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Pujalal's poetry, on the whole, has been a powerful expression of Sri Aurobindo's philosophy and vision of life. He wrote poetry in English and Sanskrit also. He published Lotus Petals (1943) and later Rosary. Almost all his English poems were collected in Lotus Grove in 1977. These are songs of a poet who has trodden the path of love and devotion. His Sanskrit poems are collected in Stotra samhita (1977).

Pujalal rendered valuable service by translating Aurobindo's poems into Gujarati. An anthology of them is called Sri Arbindanan kavyao (Poems by Sri Aurobindo), a book published in 1986 after his death. But Pujalal's monumental work is his poetic translation of Sri Aurobindo's Savitri into Gujarati, which was very highly acclaimed and Gujarati Sahitya Parishad awarded him the Sri Aurobindo Gold Medal for it. He wrote Savitri sarasamhita (1975) in prose, giving the substance of Savitri and elucidating its myth and symbolism. His Chhandah pravesh is a treatise on prosody. Pujalal has, indeed, richly contributed to the stream of metaphysical and devotional poetry in Gujarati.

Ra.J.

PUN TA PAAP (Kashmiri), that is 'Righteous act and Sin', is the third novel by Ghulam Nabi Gauhar (b. 1934), published in 1986. It is not only less conventional than Gauhar's earlier novels, Mujrim (1967) and Myul (1973), but also more broad-based than any other Kashmiri novel published so far. It is remarkable on two counts: first, its bulk (covering as many as thirty-four chapters spread over 404 pages); second, its selectively comprehensive coverage of Kashmir, topographical, social and cultural, within the fictional parameters of two parallel love affairs of Jan and Yaqub, the two chums. Jan, the only son of Haji Amiruddin, an affluent forest lessee, is a science graduate who has chosen to work in his father's firm. During his sojourn in a pleasant forest glen he develops intimacy with Reshma, a lovely Gujar lass brought up by the Haji. At this very forest camp, Jan is joined by his chum Yaqub, the elder son of Mansur Ahmad, an Assistant Commissioner, who has risen from the ranks. Yaqub is enthralled by Reshma's friend, Nazal, a shepherd lass, while his stepmother, Atiqa, would like him to marry a cousin of hers whose mother has blackmailed her. Yaqub, however, succeeds in getting the hand of Nazal, but is outwitted by the Haji who manages to receive him and his bride at his bungalow and prevails upon him to rush to Jan with his taped message. The Haji promises to leave Nazal at her in-laws and gives Yaqub his car for an urgent drive to the Rest House at Athavatu. It is there that Jan is waiting for marriage with Reshma whom he has rescued from the clutches of a Gujar abductor. The taped message of the Haji reveals his confession regarding his youthful escapades which could be construed as his having fathered Reshma. In the same breath the Haji talks of Nazal as his daughter-in-law. The novel, thus, ends on an intriguing note of tragic helplessness.

Such a fictional frame has afforded the author a wide scope for an interplay of scenic, socio-cultural and temperamental diversity. The reader is, thereby, treated not only to the scenic splendour of the valley right across from Yusamarg in the south-west to Athavatu in the north-east, but also to a meaningful criss-cross of nature and society, throwing up transitional shades of the post-Independence cultural milieu of Kashmir. The changing patterns of life are effectively reflected, and even the political concerns are revealed here and there in allusions to 1953, the DNC activists, the Mohalla Presidents, the aspiration for maintaining the Kashmir identity, the sense of frustration caused by delay in constructing an alternative highway on the old Mughal route, and so on. The down-town conservatism of Safakadal (VII Bridge) is skilfully juxtaposed with the Civil Lines snobbery of Raja Bagh.

An outstanding feature of the novel is the use of a looking glass as a telling motif. Atiqa's father had purchased it at an auction of the late Maharaja's household furniture. Her doting husband had got it framed in richly carved walnut wood, and fixed up on her dressing table. A proud possession of hers, it reflected not only the loving concern of her husband but also the frivolities of her adolescent past which she took care to black out and write off, particularly her affair with the wicked Shafi Mirza, her college mate. Another interesting device employed by the author is the taped message of the Haji, already referred to.

Despite the fact that some avoidable crudity and inaccuracy have spoilt Gauhar's diction at a number of places, he can rightly be proud of felicity of expression, e.g.

> The mid-day sun of November tasted honey (p. 135):/Reshma stood breaking up the knotty nuts of words so clumsily that the kernel got mixed with the breakage of the rind. (p. 400):/she was in a whirl like a clay-pot revolving on the potter's wheel. (p. 401).

P.N.P.

PUNDALIK, VIDYADHAR GANGADHAR (Marathi; b.1924, d. 1989) did his M.A. in 1952 and Ph.D. in Sociology in 1970. He did his research under the eminent sociologist and Marathi litterateur Iravati Karve. As a teacher, he taught civics, politics and general sociology at the University of Poona where he was a Reader.

He has to his credit five collections of short stories, four full-length plays, two collections of one-act plays, some essays on literary criticism and character sketches. He won three Maharashtra State Awards and the Soviet Land Nehru Award.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

He is well-known for his controversial plays and stories, which raise many fundamental questions about the changing values in society and their ethical and psychological implications. His famous books are Mata Draupadi and Charvak (plays), Chakra (a collection of one-act plays), and three short-story collections Popati chowkat, Tekadivarche peece and Mal. He was associated with the All India Radio and Doordarshan for a few years, and was a member of the General Council of the Sahitya Akademi in 1984.

P.M.

PUNEKAR, SHANKAR MOKASHI (English/Kannada, b.1928), poet, novelist and critic, was born at Dharwar and educated there. He studied under Armado Menezes and V.K. Gokak at college and obtained his Ph.D. degree on The Later Phase in the Development of W.B. Yeats under the guidance of Gokak. He taught English at colleges in Belgaum, I.I.T. (Bombay), and is at present Professor of English at Mysore University.

Mokashi Punekar is the author of about twelve books in English, six books in Kannada, and many research papers and articles. His poetic art has been appreciated by such eminent critics as Herbert Read, according to whom his 'characteristic mode is a poetic fantasy or wit, perhaps nearer to the work of Wallace Stevens than to that of Yeats or Eliot.'

His works in English include two collections of poems, The Captive (1965) with an impressive short preface by Herbert Read, and The Pretender (1968). He has several critical and miscellaneous works to his credit like The Later Phase in the Development of W.B. Yeats (1966), The Later Poems of W.B. Yeats (1978), Studies in Indo-English Literature (1978), P.Lal: An Appreciation, The Indo-Anglian Creed and Allied Essays and Vinayak Krishna Gokak (1974). The Cycle of Seasons (1966) is a translation of Kalidasa's Ritusamhara. His another ambitious translation of Kuvempu's Ramayanadarshanam is yet to appear.

He was awarded the Golden Jubilee Award by Mysore University for his collection of poems, The Pretender. Pashchatya vimarsheya itihasa won him the state Sahitya Akademi Award. He represented India at Struga Poetry Evenings in Yugoslavia. The Karnataka Sahitya Akademi gave him a special award in 1987 for his contribution to Kannada literature. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the Kannada novel Avadheshwari in 1988.

R.M.V.R.

KANNADA: He started writing Kannada verse early. Mayiya muru mukhagalu (Three faces of Maya, 1970) established him as a poet. The title piece has appeared in several anthologies and is regarded as one of the best in the language. However, it was his first realistic novel, Gangawa mattu Gangamayi (Gangawa and Gangamayi, 1956) which made him famous as a writer. Appreciated by both traditionalists and modernists, the novel has been chosen by the National Book Trust for translation into all national languages. His other two novels are Natanarayani, serialised in a magazine, and Avadheshwari, dealing with the protagonists of the Vedic age. His critical works in Kannada include Bendreyavara kavyamimamsa (Bendre's poetic theory, 1964), an attempt to evolve Bendre's poetic theory on the basis of his poems, Pashchatya vimarsheya itihasa (The history of Western criticism, 1976), and Sahitya mattu abhiruchi (Literature and taste, 1982), a collection of critical essays centring on Yeatsian nativisation and de-colonisation theme.

Gi.G.

PUNYTMO RAM KAMATI (Konkani) is a biography of Ram Kamati, a 17th - 18th century Goan, written by the eminent Konkani writer, Sanay Gomybab. The book is subtitled 'A Tragic Historical Life'. A Goan by origin, Kamati was a leading merchant, social worker and statesman. A versatile genius, he had a chequered career as a tobacco merchant, contractor, overseer, soldier and treasurer of the East India Company which he served to the best of his abilities. An honest social worker, he rebuilt the famous Valkeshwar temple and Samalialal temple in Bombay, previously destroyed by the Portuguese. He served the people and the company for nearly four decades and rose to be an influential person of his times. He was the only Indian to be invited at the inauguration of the first ever English Church in Bombay in 1718. Unfortunately, towards the end of his life, some jealous people in collusion with the Company, maliciously involved him in a false scandal and branded him as a traitor, ultimately to be sentenced to life imprisonment.

Sanay Gomybab painstakingly goes through all available age-old documents and other sources to prove that the charges against Ram Kamati were fabricated and baseless. The publisher of the book says, "With the help of documentary evidence, the author has proved beyond doubt that British rulers tried and penalised Ram Kamati most unjustly. The book exposes British justice irrefutably and lays the blame squarely on the then rulers. No jury of any court can possibly nullify the conclusions so convincingly arrived at."

Sanay Gomybab shows a deep involvement with the hero of the biography. He writes: "At the time of writing this account, I feel, by my good fortune, the grand old Kamati himself is standing boldly before me narrating in his own style his tragic story." Indeed, the account of Ram Kamati's rise to glory and his tragic end is a powerful potential theme for a novel or a drama.

The book has an epilogue entitled 'Disturbed hornet's

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

nest of thoughts on reading Rama Kamati's life'. The biography, on the whole is a subjective analysis of Kamati's life and activities in the framework of the existing circumstances. The readers come face to face with the author's nationalistic bent of mind and yet lament Kamati's wrong placement of loyalty and total dedication to the British rulers. The book is rightly regarded as a pioneering effort in Konkani biography.

P.G.T

PURABI (Bengali) is a poetical work by Rabindranath Tagore, written when he was sixty-four. It was published in 1925, along with other works like Grihaprabesh and Prabahini. It was preceded by Lipika (1922) and Sishu bholanath (1922), and followed by Lekhan (1927).

This work consists of seventy-seven poems and is named after its first poem 'Purabi'. The last poem of this anthology is 'Italia'. The first poem was written in January 1924 at Sriniketan (near Santiniketan) and the last was written on 24 January 1925 in Milan, Italy. In the first edition the poems were grouped under three heads: "Purabi", "Pathik" and "Sanchita". But the last group was dropped in later editions. It may be said the poems grouped under 'Pathik' are more significant and suggestive of the central theme of this book. The poems collected in the "Purabi" group were mostly written in 1923. The rest were written between 26 September 1924 and 25 January 1925.

The first few poems were composed when Rabindranath was living in a wooden bungalow built by a Japanese craftsman 'Amed Kasahara' upon a banyan tree at Sriniketan. In March 1924 he set out on his sixth foreign tour to China with some of his associates. In September the same year he was on his seventh foreign tour to South America. On 24 September he left the port of Colombo. During this voyage on his way to Paris he wrote seven poems including 'Sabitri'. From Paris he went to Argentina. He fell ill on the ship and only a few poems were written during his illness. At Buenos Aires, Victoria Ocampo was his host. As many as 26 poems of Purabi were composed there. Rabindranath dedicated this poetical work to Victoria Ocampo whom he called 'Vijaya' when it was published. On his way back to India, he visited Milan where he was warmly welcomed at the People's Theatre. The last poem of this book was written on this occasion. Before he finally left for his homeland, the poet spent a few days in Venice. During this journey he also wrote a prose work, called Pashchim jatrir diary, which is in a sense complementary to Purabi.

Literally, 'purabi' is a 'ragini' or tune in Indian classical music. It is actually a tune of the evening and expresses a sense of deep pathos. Purabi, Rabindranath's work, also signifies the same and is an embodiment of his thoughts and feelings when he was in his sixties. Love is its central theme. It is melancholy love and from the beginning to the end there is a haunting sense of a deep-seated melancholy. There are romantic notes expressing a sense of wonder and mystery as he contemplates love. Rabindranath had written many poems in memory of his sister-in-law, whom he had loved and who had died in her early youth in 1884. In 1914, after a lapse of thirty years, he wrote a remarkable poem named 'Chhabi' in memory of his 'forgotten youth' and love. Nine years after that he again composed a bunch of love-poems incorporated in Purabi. Some of these are directly related to the memory of his sister-in-law, and some of them are concerned with the living memory of Victoria Ocampo. Yet an eternal woman is there, an idealised form of woman he loved in life. 'Kritajna', 'Atithi', 'Leelasangini' and other poems express Rabindranath's experiene of love in his later life. This has also been expressed in another way in Paschim jatrir diary. Rabindranath explained his concept of woman and love in this prose work. He was looking back to his past in search of the eternal woman who could have fulfilled his life with eternal delight.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Edward Thomson, Rabindranath Tagore; Poet and Dramatist (Calcutta, 1979); Kanai Samanta, Rabindra-pratibha; Prabhatkumar Mukherjee, Rabindrajibani (Calcutta, 1961); Pramathanath Bisi, Rabindrasarani (Calcutta, 1962).

Pr.K.

PURAN SINGH, SARDAR (Hindi/Punjabi; b. 1881, d. 1931). Born in a Sikh family, he was educated at Rawalpindi and Lahore. After passing Intermediate examination in 1900 he went to Japan and studied Chemistry at the Imperial University, Tokyo. It was there that he listened to Swami Ramtirtha's lectures and was so impressed that he decided to renounce the world. However, at the persuasion of his mother and dying sister he gave up that idea, married and settled down in life.

A poet, a patriot, a humanist, Sardar Puran Singh was all rolled into one. A litterateur who knew several languages, he contributed handsomely to English, Punjabi and Hindi literature. His translations of Bhai Vir Singh's Punjabi poems, and Punjabi folk songs ('Sisters of the Spinning Wheel' in English) have a certain peculiar literary flavour.

Mahavir Prasad Dwivedi and his famous monthly Saraswati attracted him towards Hindi writing. He has written only six essays in Hindi: 'Sacchi virta', 'Kanya dan', 'Pavitrata', 'Acharana ki sabhyata', 'Mazduri aur prem' and 'America ka masta jogi Walt Whitman'. All of them were published either in Saraswati or in Bharatodaya. Later, they were collected and appeared in book form. He wrote these essays when he was a teacher at Dehradun and were published under the name of Adhyapak Puran Singh.

He is one of those few writers who, in spite of their

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

scant literary output, have left their foot-prints on the sands of time. His essays have been called ethical or social, but they are not so in the conventional sense. As a matter of fact, he wrote inspired by high idealism. Therefore, in his essays he championed the cause of women, the poor and the exploited, nobility of conduct, action against inaction and universal brotherhood. And he advocated them in a language charged with emotion. Buffon's remark 'style is the man' fits him aptly. His impassioned style, sincerity and emotional fervour are reflected in these essays, the characteristics seen later in the writings of such authors as Raghuvir Singh and Hazari Prasad Dwivedi.

Puran Singh's language is simple and forceful. He has no prejudice against any language; so we find a liberal use of words from Sanskrit, Urdu and English in his essays. For him communicability and rapport with the readers are the prime concerns of a writer. His sentences are short; sometimes we have a chain of short independent clauses used to heighten the effect. For special effect he uses contrast or antithesis, and pictorial diction. By employing 'lakshna' (indicated meaning) he forces the reader's attention to the intended meaning. The essays are interspersed with satire, embellishment, and quotations from English and Urdu. His mother tongue was Punjabi, and he could not write correctly in the Nagari script, and would, therefore, write first in the Persian script and then transcribe it into Nagari. And yet his language has natural flow and power of emotion which carry the readers along.

S.S.G.

PUNJABI: Sardar Puran Singh was an eminent Punjabi poet. Though trained to become a pharmaceutical chemist, he turned to poetry at an early age when, during his training in Japan (1900-1903), he chanced upon a copy of Whitman's Leaves of Grass. All his later poetry in Punjabi as well as in English, in a manner, went 'homing' back to that moment, though the influence of the Sikh scriptures ultimately subsumed the Whitmanian dialectic and poetics. Making light of worldly rewards and honours, he sought fulfilment in nature, in the simple pieties of the country life and in the holy word of his Sikh Gurus. By the time of his death, he had attained the status of an 'elder man of letters'. There was hardly a literary genre which did not solicit his creative imagination, and apart from his varied publications, he left behind scores of unpublished manuscripts. Now in the custody of the Punjabi University, these manuscripts have been, with one or two exceptions, edited and published in book form. A special commemorative journal, Puran Singh Studies, has, in addition, carried a few of his English stories and sketches, as also some earlier stray writings in Punjabi.

Puran Singh's Punjabi verse comprises the volumes entitled Khulle maidan (Open spaces, 1922), Khulle ghund (Open veils, 1923) and Khulle asmani rang (Wide blue skies) written in 1927 and published posthumously in 1965. In all these works, the dominant impression is that of a poet inebriated by the miracle and mystery of God's creation. There is a deep reverence for all sentient life, and no creature or form of animal existence is excluded from his wide embrace. Apart from Whitman, there is a perceptible impression on his poetry of the English romantics and mystics like Blake, Wordsworth and Shelley in particular. The feeling of life's richness and amplitude comes through effortlessly. However, his pantheism is almost always imbued with a scriptural spirit, and the imagery and symbols show a remarkable symbiosis of secular and spiritual overtures. Eventually, the poet's love for all created life finds an eloquent expression in his celebration of the Punjabi ethos, mores and moorings. Some of his later poems are marked by a nostalgia for the sights and sounds of his native land. The poetry of thing, place and person assumes a compulsive charm. His regionalism is, in reality, a localized sentiment the force of which stems from his feeling for the mother earth. What he admires most in Punjabi life is the spirit of acceptance, action and commitment. This is in sharp contrast to his distrust of Brahminical intellection and logic-chopping. In some of his poems, he questions the claims of 'murderous philosophy' and the solicitations of the other-wordly and metaphysics. Nor is he bothered by the imponderables and ambiguities of life for all such contradictions are resolved in what he calls 'Guru consciousness'. Again a marked sensuous strain in Puran singh's verse testifies to his love of female beauty in all its forms. The woman is regarded as a vessel in which the human and the divine sail together. The spousal imagery of the Gurbani is often recalled with startling effects. However, the purely sensuous aspect occasionally gives us a faint hint of eroticism. Eventually all human or societal constraints begin to chafe him. In one of his poems he avers that it is the lie that covers its nakedness and that the soul needs no raiment.

Puran Singh is the first poet in the language to employ vers libre in an authentic manner. The Whitmanian prose-poem thus becomes the metrical correlative of his restive and free-wheeling muse. The Whitmanian catalogue and excesses do disturb the tenor of some poems, and tend to create a kind of amorphousness, but happily the rhetoric is often strong enough to carry the burden.

The only volume of essays to appear in Puran Singh's life-time khulle lekh (The open essays, 1929), carries 15 pieces of varying length and the subjects comprehend such topics as love, poetry, religion, art, patriotism. The essays are simply an extension of his poetic themes and have a distinctive lyrical flavour. A volume of his Punjabi essays, Kanyadan te hor lekh (The giving away of the daughter and other essays, 1968), has six pieces, including one on Walt Whitman. His English writings and translations constitute a considerable bulk of his work. These include The Sisters of the Spinning Wheel (1921), Unstrung Beads (1923), Nargas by Bhai Vir Singh, a translation (1924),

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Spirit of Oriental Poetry (1926), The Spirit-Born People (1976), The Bride of the Skies and Other Poems (1976), Spirit of the Sikhs (1978) and Temple Tulips (A novel,1981, etc.

D.S.M.

PURANA (Sanskrit). The puranas constitute a distinctive genre in the annals of Sanskrit religious literature which shed illuminating light on the emergence of the post-Vedic phase of Hinduism. The word 'purana' has been variously interpreted, but the original import is ever clear. It means 'old narrative' and is almost always mentioned along with 'itihasa'. The Atharvaveda (XI.7.24) speaks of puranas along with the four Vedas. Kautilya's Arthashastra (1.5) enumerates 'puranas' and 'itivritta' while defining 'itihasa'. But how far such references are based on actual puranic texts is debatable. The term 'puranas' primarily means a separate genre in which mythological and legendary lore was collected, the roots of which reach back to the Vedic period. But very few of these puranas have come down to us, since the extant puranic texts have been re-organised time and again. The external form and the archaic frame of the older puranas have been retained only as a matter of priestly convenience. Even though referred to earlier, the existence of authentic puranas is definitely proved only in the Sutra literature, e.g. Gautama Dharmasutra (XI.19).

As we investigate the genesis of the extant puranas, we learn that the complete metamorphosis of the Vedic religion did not take place all of a sudden. The puranas offer us vital clues to the transformation of the sacrificial religion into a sectaraian religion with elaborate cult-figures and abundant mythological details. Further, the puranas bear witness to the great manoeuvring ability of the Brahmin priests vying with one another for establishing the supremacy of the presiding deity of their own cult. Its authority is evident from the fact that it has been hailed as the 'fifth Veda'. It can be safely assumed that a good few puranas came into existence long before the beginning of the Christian era, though they might have only formed the primary nucleus and, what is interesting, might have been discarded by later compilers for more pressing cult-considerations. Thus the Apastamba Dharmasutra quotes a verse from a Bhavishyat purana besides two other verses from some unspecified purana text, but none of them is found as such in the texts extant. In fact, the puranas came into being from a very ancient repertoire of the Indo-Aryan society whose basic ingredients are too obscure to be determined. The great epics originated from the same repertoire but developed in their own way. However, the Mahabharata is nearer to the puranic firmament both in compositional style and in world-view; its compilers refer respectfully to the puranas time and again.

The puranic genre does not seem to have any special literary predilection, and it flourished freely as massive compendium of folk tales and myths derived from the oral tradition as well as beliefs and doctrines of all descriptions. Though the archaic form of the genre might have existed as early as the fourth or the fifth century BC, the famous names of eighteen Mahapuranas did not come into vogue earlier than the third century AD. It may be mentioned here that the word 'Mahapurana' originated later; it is found in the Bhagavata (xii.7.10 & 22) and Brahmavaivarta (iv.3.7 & 10). Eighteen puranas have been mentioned in the 'Svargarohana parvan' of the Mahabharata but its authenticity as an early text is doubtful. The Vishnu (iii.6) and the Markandeya (ch. 137), commonly accepted as the two earliest puranas, contain a list of eighteen Mahapuranas. Such lists are also found in the Harivamsha (iii, 135,3), Vayu purana (ch. 104), Matsya purana (ch.53) but these might have been revised many a time and hence their authenticity is doubtful. It may also be noted that the puranas gained bulk only when Brahminism attained supremacy in the Gupta period. Moreover, the number of the puranas swelled with time; at the outset, the puranas do not seem to have been eighteen in number. According to a legend referred to in one of the earliest puranas (i.e. Vishnu) (iii.6), the bards composed only four fundamental puranic texts (i.e. Mulasamhita). The Bhagavata (xii. 7) also speaks of a similar legend. However, we need not surmise that all the puranic texts emerged out of a single Meta-Purana because such a view is extremely untenable.

The eighteen Mahapuranas are: Brahma, Padma, Vishnu, Vayu, Bhagavata, Naradiya, Markandeya, Agni, Bhavishya, Brahmavaivarta, Skanda, Matsya, Kurma, Varaha, Vamana, Brahmanda, Linga and Garuda. Apart from their scriptural value, these Mahapuranas, by and large, are also important for the study of the socio-religious life of the Indian people spread over a millennium.

The phenomenal popularity of these Mahapuranas gave rise to yet another sub-genre known as Upapuranas or secondary puranas, and interestingly these texts are also said to be eighteen in number. Indian orthodoxy ascribed much prestige to this particular auspicious number as is evident from the Mahabharata and Gita. The number of upapuranas is rigidly limited to eighteen by the different bards while there are clear indications of the existence of more texts of the same category. Except the controversy between the Shivapurana and the Vayupurana, there is almost complete agreement regarding the titles of the Mahapuranas, but the names of the Upapuranas vary in different lists. Among the Upapuranas, the following deserve attention. Adya, Narasimha, Shivadharma, Varuna, Kalika, Maheshvara, Shamba, Saura, Parasharokta, Maricha, Bhargava, Kapila, Nandipurana, Naradiya, Manava, Ushanaserita, Shiva, Devibhagavata, Brihaddharma, Aditya, Vishnudharmottara, Nandishvara, etc.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

The Matsyapurana (Ch.53) mentions only four Upapuranas, viz. Narasimha Nandi, Shamba and Aditya; nevertheless it speaks admiringly of them ('loke ye sampratishthitah'), it seems that the remaining upapuranas were not yet composed. The scholars tend to fix the date of the Matsya not later than the second half of the seventh century AD. So the first set of upapuranas seems to have come into being some time before that. As Vallalasena refers to the lists of eighteen upapuranas in his Danasagara, the lower limit may be fixed not later than the ninth century AD. But this is also the time when the principal puranas were taking shape. Therefore even if the Matsya purana speaks of the upapuranas as mere supplements to the principal puranas and of having originated from the latter, this does not seem to be historically true. The upapuranas generally try to establish their claim to the status of principal puranas, and their eagerness on that count is understandable. But, as we have already stated, the number of the principal puranas was restricted to eighteen and was made sacrosanct. When the Smarta adherents of different sectarian systems began propagating their own ideas vigorously, the number of puranas swelled; besides, numerous additions and readjustments were made to the existing puranas. Some elementary details are therefore shared by the principal puranas. At any rate, the new works had to be accommodated as authoritative texts; thus, the concept of a group of eighteen secondary puranas (upapuranas) came into being.

In the form extant, the puranic literature is not confined within the limits of its famous and old definition found in the celebrated lexicon, Amarakosha. The puranas have practically turned into Smriti codes because the five characteristics seem to have been ignored either totally or partially. Before we enumerate these five characteristics it may be noted that in the later phase of puranic composition an attempt was made to differentiate between the principal and secondary puranas merely on the basis of the number of those characteristics. In the Brahmavaivarta (iv. 133.6-7) it has been stated that the five characteristics are meant only for the Upapuranas, while the Mahapuranas are distinguished on the basis of their having ten characteristics. The Bhagavata also speaks of ten such ingredients (xii. 7.9-10). Actually this addition was necessitated as heterogenous material was incorporated from the Smriti tradition and the original 'Panchalakshana' suffered from the blemish known as 'abyapti'. The following five charcteristics are referred to in most of the extant puranas (viz. Vayu iv.10-11; Matsya 53-65; Vishnu iii. 6.25; Garuda 1.125.14; Bhavishya 1.2.4-5; Varaha ii.4.; Bhagavata. xii. 7.8.10): (a) creation (Sarga), (b) recreation (pratisarga), (c) genealogy of gods and sages (Vamsha), (d) cosmic cycles each of which has a Manu, i.e. primeval ancestor of the humanity (manvantarani), and (e) accounts of royal dynasties (Vamshanucharita).

Only the earlier puranas like Vayu, Vishnu, Matsya and Brahmanda are nearer this definition though none of them entirely agrees with it. The Markandeya, Bhagavata and Padma may also be included in this category. It is obvious that the 'Panchalakshana' definition does not take any note of sectarianism even though almost all the extant puranas are dedicated to some particular cult. It may mean that the sectarian zeal did not overpower the Indian society when the five essential characteristics were formulated. As the champions of sectarianism took control of the puranic composition, new definition had to be evolved. The principal puranas like Bhavishya, Garuda, Narada, Skanda, Brahma, Brahmavaivarta, Kurma, Agni, Varaha, Linga and Vamana as well as the upapuranas increasingly leant towards sectarianism. The smarta adherents to the different religious schools zealously advocated their own ideals by way of interpolating new chapters in the already established puranas and also composed new puranic works.

The strikingly varied nature of the contents of the puranas seems to be the result of free use of diverse materials embedded in the great legacy of the Indian people. These materials are as follows: tales (akhyana), anecdotes (upakhyana), songs and ballads (gatha), traditional lore (kalpajokti). These include mythology, cosmogony, various legends, genealogical accounts, folk beliefs, law codes and miscellaneous topics. A close perusal of the puranic texts reveals this genre to be the meeting point of not only innumerable apparent and real diversities but also of mutually exclusive tendencies of Indian socio-cultural milieu stretched over more than a millennium. The puranic literature is a unique outcome of the ever continuing synthesis of various socio-economic formations operative between the fifth century BC and the twelfth century AD. Thus it is linked with the vital spiritual needs and urges of the people, who were trying to absorb the continual influx of new ideas as well as taking into their stride the resultant conflict and tension. The puranic genre should therefore by regarded as the literary-cum-metaphysical correlative of the material life of the Indian society, busy in working out the best possible synthesis in the concluding centuries of the first millennium BC and the first few centuries of the Christian era. The puranas are unique records of the outcome of continual clash and friction, readjustment and mobilisation, conservatism and the accommodating spirit of the Indian society, keen to come to terms with its evolving ethos.

In the proto-puranic stage, the floating ballads, legends, folktales and myths were restructured and gradually collected to suit the new tendencies of pervasive synthesis based on an understanding between various groups of Vedic Aryans and non-Aryan population. The wheel of syncretic assimilation came full circle with the evolution of the new puranic genre since it absorbed material from all the groups of people. This synthesis continued uninterrupted till the momentous metamorphosis of the Brahmanical religion into the puranic sectarian Hinduism was complete. As we go through the different puranas enumerated above, we understand that the change is indeed radical. Unlike the age of the Rigveda, life is now considered to be an unmitigated evil and the sole aim of man is to escape it. Moreover, life is not considered limited to the present life alone, but it is a succession of lives generated by good and evil deeds of man, the fruits of which had to be enjoyed and suffered in the chain of lives. The spiritual goal of the age of the puranas is to snap the chain of rebirths. Performance of sacrifice is found to be totally inadequate to snap the chain of 'Karma' and consequent rebirth, since sacrifice itself was 'Karma' and counterproductive. Instead, the sectarian gods like Vishnu, Shiva, Ganapati, Brahman, Devi etc. are believed to be the sole bestower of emancipation.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The new phase of puranic composition brought in its train numerous new deities with images and temples, pilgrimages, vows, sects etc., thus offering a unique opportunity for the puranic poets to usher in new clusters of stories and anecdotes. Most of these took shape between the third and the eighth century AD. The mode of worship had changed its character by then. The sacrifice offering Vedic Aryans switched over to worship (Puja) of idols. It may be conjectured that the visual appeal of the deities captured the imagination of the Aryans who so long worshipped ideas. Besides, 'puja' or idol-worship is much more emotionally satisfying than 'yajna' or sacrifice, though the latter might have been more pompous and awe-inspiring. In the meantime, the Agamic elements ('Agama lokadharmanam maryada purvanirmita': Mahabharata), embodied in the popular and probably the pre-vedic folk religion, gradually infiltrated into the domain of the Great Tradition and culminated into the composite mythic world of the puranas.

Besides worship of images, vows and pilgrimages play an important role in the puranas. We are frequently told that if one fasts and offers oblations to a particular god, and if one goes on pilgrimage and bestows gifts on Brahmins one acquires the cumulative merit of many sacrifices. The 'panchayajna' of the puranic age clearly reflects the trend of the time. The trouble, expense and complexity in performing a sacrifice with detailed paraphernalia are eliminated, and yet the sense of having performed the necessary rituals is maintained. Many social factors contribute to such a change of outlook. Even before the advent of Buddhism, the violence and bloodshed involved in animal sacrifices had been questioned. In the changed socio-economic formations, the wanton slaughter of animals was no longer economically permissible. The emergence of the concepts of rebirth and Karma were also changing the contours of the old religion. Moreover, a demoralising element of fatalism seems to have penetrated the genral world-view and basic attitude to life.

Then there was altogether a new approach towards religion in the form of 'bhakti' or devotion which meant reliance on a personal god for attaining the ultimate goal and which was a true substitute for elaborate rituals. The puranic world-view was the outcome of the amalgamation of diverse elements in the delineation of which literary considerations were not given much prominence. However, the Bhagavata shows unmistakable poetic skill on many occasions, while the Vishnu, Agni, Padma puranas etc. had their moments of excellence. At any rate, the authors of these puranas do not seem to have any literary ambition, though the genre is an integral part of the Indian cultural history. In spite of its limitations, it would remain an invaluable collection of great dexterity and encyclopaedic range.

Ta.B.

PURANAS: CONTENT. A brief note on the subject-matter of the puranas follows:

The Brahmapurana is generally given as the first in the list of the puranas, and hence it is sometimes called the Adipurana. Among the legends narrated in this purana, mention may be made of those which are related to the creation of the world, the birth of Manu, the primal man, and his descendants, the origin of gods and demigods, and the solar and lunar dynasties. It describes the various parts of the world. Greater parts of the text are devoted to the glorification of sacred places, rivers, etc. A large section is devoted to the life and exploits of Krishna.

The second in the list, the Padmapurana, is a voluminous work divided into six books, called the khandas, viz. Adi, Bhumi, Brahma, Patala, Srishti and Uttara. The first book, i.e. the Srishtikhanda is devoted to the glorification of Vishnu and the creation of the universe. It tells also about the 'pitris' (ancestors) and the rituals of 'shraddha'. The lunar dynasty down to Krishna is also described here. The second book, the Bhumikhanda, i.e. the section on earth, contains, inter alia, the legend of Prahlada, the famous Vishnu devotee. It also devotes a large section to the glorification of sacred places. The Srishtikhanda, describes the various worlds of the gods, especially Vaikuntha, the abode of Vishnu. It narrates the legends of Dushyanta and Shakuntala and Pururavas and Urvashi. The Patalakhanda, the fourth section, describes the nether world, particularly the subterranean regions, the dwellings of the Nagas. The whole Rama legend finds place in this khanda. A few chapters narrate the early life of Krishna with a mention of Radha. The last section, Uttarakhanda, expounds the Vishnu cult and teaches various practices of Yoga.

The Vishnupurana or Vaishnavapurana is primarily a scriputre of the Vishnu cult. It consists of six sections and contains all material, typical to the puranic literature, e.g. the creation of the world, the origin of the gods, dynasties of the world, the stories of Manus, genealogies of royal races—some mythical, others historical. The fifth book of this purana contains a detailed biography of the divine cowherd Krishna.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

The Vayupurana, mentioned in some of the lists as Shiva or Shaiva-purana, is dedicated to the worship of Shiva. Besides the usual puranic material such as the creation of the universe, birth of Manu, etc, the purana abounds in legends narrated for the glorification of Shiva and the teaching of Yoga. It lists many historical dynasties including that of the imperial Guptas.

The Bhagavatapurana is the most famous and popular among the puranas. It still exerts the greatest influence on the life and religion of the Indian people. It is the scripture of the Vaishnavas belonging to a number of sects. After describing all the incarnations of Vishnu, it dwells in greater length on the life, particularly early life, of Krishna in Gokula. It describes the divine love of Krishna and the gopis. This purana is an excellent piece of classical Sanskrit literature and contains at the same time much philosophical material.

The Brihnnaradiya purana is named after its narrator, Narada, the model of Vishnu devotee. It does not touch upon the usual puranic subjects but concentrates on the philosophy and practices of the Vishnu cult. Several of its chapters deal with the duties of different castes and ashramas.

The Markandeyapurana glorifies neither Shiva nor Vishnu but Brahma and the older Vedic gods, such as Indra, Agni, Surya, etc. A part of this purana, 'Devimahatmya', generally believed to have been inserted in this ancient text much later, teaches the worship of goddess Durga and glorifies her various forms and exploits.

The Agni or Agneyapurana, even if it describes the incarnations of Vishnu and dwells on the Vishnu cult, is essentially a Shaivite purana and deals, in detail, with the cults of Shiva worshipped in linga form, and Durga. It also mentions Tantric rites and the cult of Ganesha.

The Bhavishya or Bhavishyatpurana chiefly contains prophecies regarding future. The greater part of the work deals with the Brahmanical ceremonies, feasts, duties of different castes, etc. Some sections deal with sun-worship and the Brahmins from the Sakadvipa, named Bhojakas and Magas.

The Brahmavaivartapurana is divided into four parts. While the fitst three books deal with the creation of Brahma, Prakriti (priomordial nature), Ganesha, etc. the fourth book deals, in great detail, with the life of Krishna and His exploits in Gokula. The sole object of this part is to glorify Krishna and His divine beloved Radha, in myths, legends and hymns.

The Skandapurana is the most extensive work in this class. This purana contains approximately one lakh verses. and is divided into several khandas and samhitas, their number varying in different recensions and editions. The purana contains heterogenous material, both typically puranic and otherwise. A big portion of the text is occupied by legends and myths related to several sacred places, rivers, mountains and other centres of pilgrimage. Innumerable religious ceremonies and 'vratas' have been described in this purana.

The Matsyapurana, besides containing usual puranic legends, describes some of the historical dynasties, with special mention of the Andhra dynasty. The Kurmapurana is divided into four samhitas, viz. Brahmi, Bhagavati, Sauri and Vaishnavi. The purana starts with the legend of the tortoise incarnation of Vishnu and describes the story of churning the ocean by gods and demons. The purana delineates catholicity of spirit, teaching that all deities are the mainifestations of the same supreme God. The work contains a section called 'Ishvaragita' which teaches the same philosophy as in the Bhagavadgita. The Varahapurana embodies the narrative by Varaaha, the third incarnation of lord Vishnu, and describes holy places, besides offering mantras (chants). The Vamanapurana begins with several incarnations of Vishnu with special emphasis on Vamana-avatara (Dwarf incarnation) and then teaches the worship of Shiva in the form of linga in connection with the glorification of sacred places.

The Brahmandapurana, considered to be one of the Vaishnavite puranas, includes, the Adhyatmaramayana, a devotional-philosophical version of the Ramayana episode. The Lingapurana describes the twenty-eight manifestations of Lord Shiva and contains His instructions and exhortations given in the linga form of the Lord. The Garudapurana contains the teachings of Vishnu to Garuda, His divine conveier, and deals with several subjects ranging from astronomy, medicine, grammar and life after death.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Charles Eliot, Hinduism and Buddhism (London, 1921); D.C. Sircar (ed.), Religious Life in Ancient India (Calcutta, 1972); F.C. Pargiter, Ancient Indian Historical Tradition (Oxford 1922); G.N. Farquhar, An Outline of the Religious Literature of India (Oxford, 1920); R.C. Hazra, Studies in the Puranic Records on Hindu Rites and Customs (Delhi, 1975); Studies in the Upapuranas (Calcutta, 1958); R.G. Bhandarkar, Vaishnavism, Saivism and Minor Religious Systems (Strassburg, 1913)

S.M.

PURANA NIGHANTU (Malayalam) compiled by Vettam Mani (b.1921) is an encyclopaedia of Indian mythology, which has already been translated into English under the title Puranic Encyclopaedia. The first volume of the work came out in 1964 and the second in 1965. It is the first book of its kind in any Indian language and has as such proved immensely useful as a reference work to those who have anything to do with the epics and puranas of India. All the characters including messengers and clowns, and other items such as rivers and mountains, mentioned in the eighteen puranas are arranged in the order of the Malayalam alphabet together with all the stories, episodes and allusions associated with them. Wherever necesary, chapter and verse are given for easy reference to the source and in a number of places, lines are quoted from the original books. If an event is mentioned in more than one purana, that is also stated. The book runs into about 1900 pages.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

K.S.N.

PURANANOORU (Tamil) is one of the eight collected works called Ettuttokai. It contains 400 poems on various subjects other than the personal relation between man and woman. The personal relation between the male and female is called 'akam' and all other things come under 'puram' in literary classification. Akam means internal and puram means external. 'Nanooru' means four hundred. The collection of the four hundred lyrics which deal with external affairs of human life is called Purananooru, also known as Purappattu. These four hundred poems were composed by several poets and poetesses from the first to the third century AD. These poets were from all walks of life–like kings, brahmins, businessmen, doctors, teachers, potters, hunters, gypsies. Some of the names of the authors are in pure Tamil such as Viriyoor Nakkan; some are a mixture of Tamil and Sanskrit, like Perum Chittiran; some others are in pure Sanskrit, like Rudra, Lochana, Padma, Damodara, Valmiki, Markandeya, Kapila and Gautama.

The very first poem of Purananooru is the devotional song on Shiva sung by Perum Devanar describing several aspects of Ardhanari godhead, Nadhivahana and Dakshinamurti, worshipped by eighteen ganas and Vedas. The rest 399 poems are written by a number of poets. These poems are on various subjects like the kings, their war, victory or loss, kingdom, rule, charity, festivals, worship, sacrificial rites and the glory of their ancestors. Some poems are on brahmins and other popular and wealthy people equal to kings.

The poems bring out the culture, tradition, mode of life and beliefs of the people. The importance of education, the popularity of the Vedas and Vedic worship along with the native Vedic and Agamic worship are some of the special features described in these poems.

These poems have discussions on the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and other puranas as well. Incidents from epics, like King Chola's sacrificing himself to the eagle for saving the life of a bird, Sita's dropping the ornaments while being carried away by Ravana and the monkeys picking them up, the war between the Kauravas and Pandavas, Karna's parentage, valour, generosity and friendship with the Kauravas, and the episode of Shiva destroying Tripura are dealt with in these poems.

U.Ja.

PURANDARADASA (Kannada; b. 1484, d. 1564), the great musician and composer, has been praised as the foremost of the Haridasas by his master Shri Vyasaraya. He lived at a time when the glory of Vijayanagar empire was at its zenith under Krishnadeva Raya. The earliest reference to his early life is made in the compositions of Vijayadasa who belonged to the eighteenth century. According to Vijayadasa, the saint-musician Purandaradasa hailed from Purandaragarh, which is now in Maharashtra State. By profession he seems to have been a flourishing jewel merchant. He was known as Srinivasa Naik and his wife as Saraswatibai. In spite of his wealth, Srinivasa was, perhaps, a miser by nature. His wife, on the other hand, had all the qualities of a religious woman. Legend goes that it was his wife's spiritual devotion that induced him to give up the pursuit of wealth and become a Haridasa, the servant of the Lord. In one of his songs he pays a rich tribute to his wife for transforming his life.

The later half of Purandaradasa's life as a saint can be traced through his inspiring compositions. He states very clearly in one of his 'suladis' how he was blessed by Sri Vyasaraya who gave him the ankita (nom-de-plume) 'Purandara vittala'. Purandaradasa is said to have composed 4,75,000 songs. Unfortunately, only a thousand compositions are extant. Even among these, there are numerous interpolations, including compositions from his wife and sons. These songs consist of kirtanas, suladis, ugabhogas and vrittanamas, each of which is a category based on music.

There are a fairly good number of songs by Purandaradasa which acquaint us with the gradual development of his spiritual life. His poems reveal that he sometimes felt utterly dejected in life. In such moments he did not hesitate to criticise even the Almighty. After undergoing several trials and tribulations, he seems to have attained God-realisation, and announced boldly that he saw God in all His beauty. Many of his songs in this category are highly reflective and yet lyrical. They are appealing because of the experience of personal communion with the divine.

A good number of his compositions are devoted to the exposition of the Madhva philosophy. He dealt with the fundamental tenets of Dvaita siddhanta. Purandaradasa's individuality lies in conveying the most abstract ideas of religion in simple and unadorned language. He makes use of puranic episodes profusely and uses apt similes to serve his purpose. The terms such as 'panchabheda' (the five-fold differences in the universe), 'taratamya' (gradation of souls), the three-fold pramanas known as 'pratyksha', 'anumana' and 'agamas', are used in accordance with the traditional concepts. These compositions may also be studied from the point of view of relationship which exists between God and a devotee. They may be classified into five divisions known as Shanta, Dasya, Sakhya, Madhura and Vatsalya. In brief, it may be said that Purandaradasa has given us the essence of the Shrimad Bhagavata in these compositions. His sincere feelings expressed in simple Kannada have given these songs an eduring freshness.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Purandaradasa is considered to be the best and foremost representative of Haridasa literature. He is also held in high esteem by musicologists, since he is said to have systematised Carnatic music. His compositions on Ganapati, popularly known as 'Pillari gitas', are taught to the beginners even to this day. Vyasaraya's appreciation of his compositions as 'Purandaropanishat' reflects the achievement of Purandaradasa.

BILIOGRAPHY: A.P. Karmarkar and N.B. Kalamdani, Mystic Teachings of Haridasas of Karnataka (1939); G. Srinivasan, The Haridasas of Karnataka (1972); M.V. Krishna Rao, Purandara and Haridasa Movement (1966); P.H. Krishna Rao, Prayers, Praises and Precepts (2nd ed., 1980); R.D. Ranade, Pathway to God in Kannada Literature (1960); Seshagiri Rao, Anthology of Saint Singer Shri Purandaradasa (1978); S.K. Ramachandra Rao, Purandaradasa (1964); V. Sitharamaiah, Purandara and Haridasa Movement (1966).

G.V.R.

PURANI, AMBALAL BALAKRISHNA (Gujarati; b. 1894, d.1962) was a Gujarati writer and a student of Aurobindo's philosophy. He did his B.Sc. from the University of Bombay in 1913, but art, literature and philosophy were subjects close to his heart. After completing his studies, he devoted himself to reading, writing, public service and freedom struggle. In 1922, he suddenly renounced everything and went to the Pondicherry Ashram. As a devotee, he came very close to Aurobindo, and his writings were inspired by the great master. His translations, letters, stories and contemplative essays bear the imprint of Aurobindo. His translations include Gitanibandho (Aurobindo's Essay on the Gita) in two parts. Maa (Aurobindo's Mother. 1951). Savitrigunjar in three parts (Savitri) and such other works as Purnayoga, Jananayoga, Bhaktiyoga, etc. His translations have a good flow and are close to the original. In this letters and essays his prose style flowered. He also wrote two novels. Tilottama (1913) and Darpanana tukada (1933). Besides Gujarati and English, he was also conversant with a few other languages like Sanskrit, French, Hindi, Bengali, Tamil, etc. He had also a deep understanding of arts and wrote a book on it in English. His greatest contribution was to reach out in Gujarati the spirit of Aurobindo and the inner vision of his epic Savitri. He also delivered a series of lectures on Savitri in Africa, Europe and America in which he tried to reveal the grandeur of Indian culture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jayantilal Acharya (ed.) Ambabhai Purani smriti granth (1969); Umashankar Joshi and others (eds.), Ambubhai Purani shashtipurti abhinandan granth (1955)

P.V.

PURANIK, KRISHNAMOORTHY (Kannada; b. 1911, d. 1985) is a popular novelist, short story writer, and writer of verse plays. His sketches of a rather comic, unheroic, middle-class idealist named Ramu, picturesquely described by the term 'Ramu of borrowed mush', published in monthly Jayanti, won wide popularity and was later collected as Ramuna kathegalu (1946). This intensely ironic style was given up when Puranik undertook to write novels. He started teaching at the Municipal High School, Gokak (1937). He took to writing popular novels. Particularly appealing are his women characters. Mother, sister, nurse, beloved, spouse, courtesan, or rural and semi-urban middle classes are usually the subject of his novels. His readership is vast. He has written nearly a hundred books including some sixty-nine novels. His collections of short stories number about ten. In all these, he portrays the middle class life. He has always an interesting story to tell, and glorifies family ties and presents moving situations. He holds a mirror to our cultural behaviour which forms the legitimate framework for his artistic operations. Of his more remarkable works, the following deserve mention: Mugila mallige (1948), Tereda kannu (1949), Hosabalu (1952), Muttaide (1954), Bevarina bele (1954), Mannina magalu (1956), Dharma devate (1956), Mangalakshate (1958), Deva lahari (1963), Vasundhara (1966), Bayalu gali (1967), Tampu nelalu (1968), Sanadi Appanna (1970). Among his collections of stories, Ramuna kathegalu (Comic sketches of a nincompoop school master), Nimbiya nanju (1960) and Jeeva jenu (1964) are regarded as his best. He is also a remarkable writer of verse plays which have been staged with some success before a discerning audience. Of these verse plays the most popular is his earliest Sairandhri (1946), appreciated by persons of the stature of K.V. Puttappa, D.R. Bendre and Shivaram Karanth. Among other verse plays, Doresani (1949) depicts an aspect of our political life, and Radheya (1952), the life of Karna. Many of his novels have been filmed. He is one of the most prolific writers in Kannada.

S.M.P.

PURANIK, SIDDAYYA (Kannada; b. 1918) is a poet, dramatist and biographer. He started his career in the old Hyderabad state as a Tahsildar, and was later transferred to the new Mysore (now Karnataka) state. In 1958, he joined the Indian Administrative Service and retired as Labour Commissioner in 1976. He received the D. Litt degree of Karnataka University (1975). He was also chosen for the Bhilwara Award of the Bharatiya Bhasha Parishad of Calcutta for his Vachanodyana (1980). He presided over the Kannada Literacy Conference in Gulbarga (1987).

Siddayya Puranik began to write in the best years of the Kannada Navodaya (Renaissance) Age. His works are charged with the idealism and the liberal outlook of this age. The vision of an immanent spirit in the universe and the acceptance of earthly life as a pathway to the hereafter, which he found in the Virashaiva Vachanakaras

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(11th and 12th c.), and the fervent patriotism and the sharp awareness of the misery of the downtrodden, which inspired the freedom struggle under Gandhiji, deeply influenced him. His lyrics reveal a sensitive and reflective poet responsive to the beauty of nature and the joy of life, combined with a zeal to reform society. The title of one of his collections, Modalu manavanagu (Become a human being first, 1969) sums up the spirit of his lyrics. His plays are inspired by ardent patriotism. His Basavannanavara jivana hagu sandesha (1977) is a comprehensive work which has assimilated the material so far brought to light and the several theories advanced by scholars on the life and work of the great religious leader.

Puranik found his best medium in the vachana (a prose-poem form peculiar to Kannada literature). His Vachanodyana (1977) is a collection of 525 vachanas. Vachana nandana (1983) is a collection of 475 vachanas. The work comprises reflections on the ways of the world, on the decay of values and on man's relations with the Supreme. Vachana nandana (1983) is a collection of 475 vachanas.

In his communion with the creator the poet blends joy in the beauty of Nature with a vision of life illuminated by tender human relations, decency and morality, and faith in the wisdom and grace of God.

Puranik has also written a historical novel, Tribhuvanamalla (1974), presenting in the hero, Vikramaditya, the quintessence of the culture of Karnataka.

Puranik is responsive to the world around him and is humanistic and idealistic. But his writing is essentially inspired by moral earnestness. However, he also affirms the value of the experiences of earthly life which mould the human spirit and gives it strength and ripeness.

His other works include: Poetry: Jalapata (1953), Karunashravana (1955), Manasa sarovara (1959), Kallolamale (1968); Drama: Bharatavira (1963), Rajata rekhe (1965); Nirbhanadana (1974); Biography: Sarana charitamrita (1964), Siddharama (1974), Nazir Akbarabadi (1978); Children's literature: Thuppa Rotti ge ge ge (1973).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D. Javaraegowda (ed.), Vachanodyanadarshana (Mysore, 1980); Mirji Annaraya and Krishna Kolhara Kulakarni (eds.), Kavyananda (Shedabala, 1973); Satyananda and Meghamitra (eds.), Kavyananda (Shedabala, 1973); Satyananda and Meghamitra (ed.), Kavyasri kavyananda (Bijapur); S.S. Marulaiah (ed.), Kavyananda (Bangalore, 1981).

L.S.S.R.

PURAPPATTU (Malayalam) are folk songs recited on the occasion of Puram festivals. The festival is celebrated on a day when the asterism Puram occurs in the month of Minam (March-April) or Medam (April-May) every year. While in the Bhagavati temple at Shertallai and at Arattupuzha the festival is held in the month of Minam, at Trichur it occurs in the next month. Recitation of folk songs in groups is not an integral part of the celebration. Only at Shertallai temple it occurs prominently where Purappattu or songs of Puram became an attraction for men. On this occasion, some kind of folk songs were recited by the gathering of men folk, some of whom got drunk. The songs tended to become obscene, and later Purappattu itself got a stigma of obscenity.

It is generally believed that in early days the festival began as an assembly of poets to give expression to their impromptu composition. It was only later that obscene themes were adopted by licentious men with a view to airing local scandals. The songs became degraded to such an extent that for three days anybody, irrespective of his position, could be attacked through them. At a later stage, the bawdy element dominated these songs to such an extent that a royal writ was issued banning all such songs and revelry. Now Purappattu is only a thing of the past.

N.P.U.

PURAPPORUL VEMBA MALAI (Tamil), probably of the 9th century AD, is the earliest available work of exposition on the 'Puram' theme. The author, Iyanar Idhanarf, himself declares that he has followed the classification of Panniru padalam (which can be roughly translated as twelve 'divisions'), an earlier work expounding and defining the classification of thematic content. This work preceded Purapporul vemba malai, may be by a century or so. This grammatical work on 'Puram' theme had each of its twelve divisions (Padalam/tinai) reportedly written by a group of twelve authors, who were students of a legendary, perhaps mythical figure, Agattiar. The most famous among these students was, as tradition goes, Tolkappiar, the author of Tolkappiyam. Panniru padalam is no longer extant and the authorship of Tolkappiar in regard to the first chapter concerning the first division on the Vetchi tinai is disputed by Hampuranar, the commentator of 11th century. Then, again, Tolkappiar could not have been associated with this 12-fold division of Puram themes, as this was a clear departure from Tolkappiar's thematic scheme in Tolkappiam which confined the number of 'tinais' to just seven.

In the absence of Panniru padalam, which is no longer extant, Purapporul vemba malai takes its place as a pioneering work in respect of both the subject of Puram themes and their classification into twelve tinais.

The thematic contents of Sangam poetry which gave rise to these grammatical theorisings largely concerned themselves with love and war, though 'Puram', meaning 'what falls outside of love', would admit of a larger definition. Hence even the themes that were brought under these 12 tinais centred round essentially situations of war though it extended its periphery to cover other areas of life too, i.e. situations that are a fall out of a war and would touch on themes that may seem to belong rather to Aham (love) themes. Hence a further redefining of the areas as 'Puram', 'Aha-puram' and 'Pura-puram' became necessary.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

The 12 tinais of Puram themes, as Purappoorul vemba malai classified and explained them, may be described briefly as follows:

Each of these 'tinais' bear the name of a different flower, so named since the kings, heroes and soldiers involved in the situation wear the flower so specified on such occasions:

Vetchi: lifting the cattle of the enemy, preparations for this operation, its conduct and later celebration on its successful completion; Karandai: operation launched by the attacked country to recover the lost cattle; Vanji: invasion launched subsequently on the enemy territory after a successful cattle lifting operation; Kanji: preparation for resistance and counter–attack on the invading forces; Ulingai: laying a siege on the enemy fortress, and the surrender of the enemy after a successful siege; Nochchi: defence of the fortress under siege—daughters of the soldiers inside the fortress resist the advance of the invaders who demand them in marriage, and the vow of womenfolk who are surrounded; Thumbai: wives of soldiers slain in battle textol their men's valour, which in fact takes on an expression of love; Vaahai: celebration of victory in war, renunciation of all worldly attachments and search for the 'ultimate truth' also fall under this 'tinai'.

These eight complete the 'tinais' which are named after flowers. The following four have no flowers to identify them:

Paadan: Singing in praise of the king, extolling his generosity, virtues and valour in battle, and dancers and singers receiving gifts from the king: this 'tinai' extends also to cover the devotee's love of God; Poduviyal: all matters concerning death: naturally it extends to talk on the transitory nature of life; Kaikilai: this talks of onesided love; Perundinai: this deals with unequal/illmatched love, pining for love, unrequited love, relations with women of easy virtue, etc.

These divisions again are only broad categorizations, as each of these 'tinais' contains further sub-divisions called 'turai' which in total number 349.

Iyanar Idhanar, the grammarian/poet, with a mastery over clarity and brevity, encapsulates his exposition of the whole wide spectrum of the Puram world in all its 12 divisions (tinai) and 349 sub-divisions (turai) in just 19 sutras. Each sutra defines the ambience of the 'tinai' and the 'turai' under it. Then again, each 'turai' is explained by a verse in 'venba' metre (it is this scheme that has given the work its name 'Vemba malai'—a garland of verses in 'venba' metre). Here the author adopts a new device in the process. Unlike the commentators who would formulate their theories in a sutra and illustrate them from the extant and well-known literary works of others, the author of Vemba malai elucidates his own sutras with 'venbas' composed by him, which in such cases is known as 'Kolu'. The venbas, far from being dry attempts at versification as would naturally be expected of grammarians at work with the set purpose of explaining and defining a grammatical rule, rise to levels of rare literary excellence which speak of the author's gifted poetic talents.

Iyanar Idhanar seems to hold Valluvar, the author of the famous classic Tirukkural, in high esteem: for, while has work is studded with the ideas of 'Naladiar' and 'Palamozhi', the Sangam works, at a number of places, he has helped himself in a liberal measure with the typical expressions, ideas and even whole lines of Thiruvalluvar. This is not surprising as Iyanar Idhanar is endowed with qualities which are distinctly Valluvarian, like simplicity of language, economy in expression, directness in communication and the power of thrust. Nothing can illustrate the simplicity of language and power of expression, which is pithiness exemplified, than the fact that traversing across the distance of a millennium between Iyanaridhanar of the 9th century and us in the 20th century, many lines and expressions of Iyanar Idhanar have become the favourite succour of politicians and platform orators.

Ve.S.

PURATHIRATTU (Tamil) is an anthology of Tamil poetry covering nearly ten centuries of literary output from its earliest dawn to twelfth century AD. It was during these centuries that Tamil literature, particularly in poetry, saw the emergence of several works that continue to be regarded as peaks of achievement of Tamil creative genius. It was perhaps felt necessary to have an anthology of select pieces from the vast treasure house of output that was by then available to serve as a handy compendium to students and scholars of Tamil. It was also perfectly in accord with the native Tamil tradition as right from the Sangam times a large part of Tamil literature consisted of only anthologies of select poems, e.g. Pattu pattu (Ten idylls), Aha nanooru (44 love poems), Pura nanooru (400 poems on affairs of the world) and so on. Even the great body of 'bhakti' literature was again anthologies collected some centuries later, by which time a very large chunk of bhakti poems had already suffered the ravages of time. To take only one case, only 312 decads comprising 3064 stanzas of Appar out of 4900 decads have survived. Gnana Sambandar is credited with a stupendous output of over a lakh of stanzas of which only 383 decads of 4152 stanzas have survived, by the time it came to be collected in the 11th century by Nambi Andar Nambi.

However, Purathirattu is a 15th century collection significantly different from earlier anthologies in the sense that it was a selection from out of even such anthologies right from the Sangam period down to Kamban's Ramayanam of the twelfth century. Purathirattu literally means collection (of poems) on worldly themes. Tamil literature from the earliest times had been traditionally classified into two broad categories, one 'Aham' (on matters of the heart, i.e. love) and the other 'Puram' (on matters outside the heart, i.e. worldly affairs). Purathirattu, as its name spells out, contains selections of only those poems that belong to 'Puram'. Then again, the anthologist (the author is not known) has followed the thematic structure of Thirukkural which consists of three parts, 'Aham' (Dharma), 'Porul' (Artha), and 'Kamam' (Kama, love). The anthology, however, leaves out Kamam, as that would not come under 'Puram'. However, a shorter version of Purathirattu which was brought out sometime during the 18th century has selections of poems on love themes.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Purathirattu is divided further into sub-sections, following here again the Thirukkural pattern. This might mean that the intention of the anthologist was perhaps to provide an elaborate exposition of Valluvar's (the author of Thirukkural) world view with illustrations from the body of Tamil literature. This view is reinforced by the fact that the abridged edition of Purathirattu (called Purathirattu churukkam) was also known as Prasanga bharanam (an ornament of discourse). It seems that this was a much used handbook by students and scholars of Tamil literature not only for their personal study but also for discourses as it provided a convenient pick of quotes.

Purathirattu also became, more significantly, a source book of immense value to the Tamil scholastic and research world from the later half of 19th century onwards.

Because of its popularity and constant use, Purathirattu has come down to us almost intact without suffering any mutilation with the passage of time. It contains 1570 poems, long and short, chosen from a large number of anthologies and epics with the added information in colophon on the sources of selections made. This made Purathirattu a source work of immense value in a number of respects. It helped in identifying the sources of illustrations given by the commentators of many old works. Thus the corruptions that crept in many ancient works in the process of copying palm leaf manuscripts were removed and the missing portions were filled in to complete the passages in the mutilated manuscripts.

The selections that have come down to us in the Purathirattu collection are the only fragments now available to us from a large number of major works that have been irretrievably lost. The following can be cited as important examples:

109 verses of Muttollayiram of Sangam period (probably of 5th c. AD)– a work that is learnt to have originally contained 900 love poems; 44 verses of Thahadoor Yathirai– a work of Sangam period of epic quality which describes the war between a Chera king, Perum Cheral Irumporai and Adhikaman Nedumananji of Thahadoor; 41 verses of Perumporul vilakkam (10th c. AD) which is an anthology of illustrative poems on the 'Puram' theme; 66 verses from Valayapati (9th c. AD), a Jaina epic; 19 verses from Kundalakesi (a Buddhist epic) written to counter the influence of Jainism in Tamilnadu; 3 verses from Irumbal kanji (9th c. AD); 9 verses from Santhi puranam (8th c. AD), a Jaina epic which tells the story of a Jaina Thirthankara; 8 verses from Narada charitam, another Jaina epic; 17 verses from Aasiriya malai which seems to be an anthology of poems to illustrate themes on war and heroism in battle, 5 of these poems are said to have been taken from Pazhaya Ramayanam (Old Ramayanam) composed in earlier centuries—nothing further is known either of this work or of the author. And so the list extends.

Some of the other selections add a few more verses to a number of works retrieved, but they are incomplete and in fragments, like Perum Devanar Bharatam, Paripadal, Pattup pattu, etc. All these belong to the Sangam age.

Some others help in retrieving fully many other works like Kalavazhi, Sirupancha Moolam, and epics like Chintamani, Choolamani, etc. whose complete version fell short by a few verses.

All these together give us an idea of what a large segment of Tamil literature has been irretrievably lost to us.

Purathirattu was followed up by a number of such anthological efforts in the following centuries, as Pannol thirattu, Vanna thirattu, Tamil navalar charitam, Perumthogai padal thirattu, Arum Tamil thirattu, etc.

Purathirattu has also been a very valuable and authoritative source book of reference in bringing out an authentic edition of several works of Sangam period, when work in this direction started from the later half of 19th century. Lastly and most importantly, apart from all these scholastic and research values, Purathirattu remains a collection of gems of Tamil poetry.

Ve. S.

PURNA, RAI DEVIPRASAD (Hindi; b. 1868, d. 1915) is an important writer of the Dwivedi age who kept himself away from the orbit of Dwivedi's influence. He wrote independently and tried to harmonise the Brajbhasha kavya tradition with the resurgent Khariboli poetry. Born in Jabalpur, he studied up to B.A. and then took a degree in law. Later, he shifted to Kanpur, where in addition to practising law he devoted himself to social reform.

He had a very fine taste for Brajbhasha poetry. At a time when the Brajbhasha idiom was almost exhausted, he wrote beautiful poems in it and maintained its marvellous tradition with great elegance. He formed a 'Rasik samaj' of fellow poets and edited a magazine called Rasik-vatika. He had also a good knowledge of western philosophy and literature besides ancient Indian literature, poetics, philosophy and culture. Therefore, his poems draw sustenance from both literary and philosophical traditions. In his attitude towards nature he shows the influence of Valmiki and Kalidasa. The description of nature in his ghanakshari and savaiyya is quite interesting.

When we have a close look at his poems we find that in spite of his inclination towards Brajbhasha his poetry is a natural expression of the literary trends of the Bharatendu and the Dwivedi eras. The consciousness of the new awakening and the Swadeshi movement also finds an expression in his works.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Andhakar hai vahan jahan aditya nahin hai,
Murda hai vah desh jahan sahitya nahin hai.

(There is darkness where there is no sun; that country is dead where there is no literature).

As in Bharatendu and Premghan, so in Rai Deviprasad Purna we see the co-existence of both patriotism and loyalty towards the British. He could write 'Dilli durbar' in 1911, as well as poems like 'Swadeshi kundal'. In the beginning he was so much fascinated by Brajbhasha that he even wrote poems on new topics in it but when Khariboli emerged as the language of freedom struggle and new consciousness he did not keep himself away from it. His poems like 'Amaltas', 'Vasant-viyog', 'Swadeshi kundal', 'Naye san ka swagat' 'Navin samvatsar ka swagat' were written in Khariboli in a conversational idiom. In 'Vasant-viyog' India has been compared with a garden with our ancestors as gardeners; this garden the poet says, should be maintained at every cost. The fondness for the past is both the strength and the limitation of his poetry. In the poems of the old style, bhakti and Vedanta provide a vital base, but now the struggles and conflicts of life become the components of his poetic experience. Similarly, the description of changing seasons finds a new dimension in his poetry. Again, a certain romantic disposition in the attitude to nature associates him with Sridhar Pathak and Ramnaresh Tripathi.

Purna has followed the tradition of Bharatendu in linking poetry with music. He had a fine grasp of metre, rhythm and rhyme, and a sensitive ear for music, and could manage to create newness in the old metres also. His similes and metaphors are fresh and free from conventionalism. The range of his creative writings is quite wide, as he tried his hand not only at poetry but also at essays, drama, and translation. He himself acted in 'Ramlila' for which he wrote poetic dialogues. Further, he was a master of lucid and satirical prose. And as a translator, he translated Kalidasa's Meghaduta under the title Dharadhar-dhawan. In the tradition of Meghadut translations Raja Lakshman Singh's Meghadut is quite famous, but compared to Purna's translation it, perhaps, stands in the second row.

The complete collection of his works was published as Purna sangrah. Recently, Rai Deviprasad Purna rachanavali (1988) has also been published. His most important works are Mrityunjaya (1904), Pradarshani-swagat (1906), Ram-Ravan virodh (1906), Swadeshi kundal (1910) and Raj darshan (1911).

K.P.

PUROHIT, HARINARAYAN (Rajasthani; b. 1864, d. 1945) was born at village Sirsi, about 12 miles south-west of Jaipur. His father's name was Jainarayan, but his uncle Mannalal who had adopted him, brought him to Jaipur at a very early age. He studied Sanskrit and Hindi, and practised calligraphy with Mannalal. He learned Urdu and Persian also. He got the Northbrooke Medal twice for standing first at the Intermediate and B.A. examinations of Calcutta University. Lord Lansdowne Medal was also awarded to him for being the best student of Maharaja College, Jaipur. After graduation he joined the administrative service in Jaipur State in 1890-91 and worked for more than 40 years in different capacities until his retirement in 1932.

He was a diligent writer and published a number of books. Some of them are on historical characters like Man Singh and Jai Singh, others are of a general nature like Vikramaditya ke navratna, and a few are related to literary subjects, such as Miran vrihat-padavali, Sundara-granthavali, and Mahakavi Gang ki kavita. He also edited a number of books, though they are unpublished. Some of them may be mentioned here: Daducharit-sangrah, Hamir-raso, Rasa-samudra by Mandan Kavi, and Chitamani pingala.

His collection of manuscripts, long since donated by his son, is preserved in the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute, Jaipur. He was associated throughout his life with Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Rajasthan, Research Society, Calcutta and Hindi Granth-Ratnakar-Karyalaya, Bombay. The Bharat Dharma Mahamandal, Delhi conferred the title of 'Vidya Bhushan' on him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Vidyabhushan granth sangraha, Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute (Jaipur).

G.N.B.

PUROHIT, KESHAV JAGANNATH (Marathi; b. 1923), alias Shantaram, did his M.A. in English literature, and specialised in American literature and linguistics. He taught at the postgraduate level at Nagpur and Bombay Universities. He retired as Principal of Ismail Yusuf College, Bombay. He has fifteen collections of short stories to his credit from Santryacha baag (The orange garden, 1942) to Selected Shantaram (1986). He is known as one of the pioneers of the modern Marathi short story, with psychoanalytical technique and an authentic regional style. He translated Shakespeare, Ibsen and Euripides into Marathi. In 1943 a collection of his personal essays was published. He edited for the Sahitya Akademi an anthology of light essays in Marathi. He received the new York Herald Tribune International short story competition award in 1951 and the state government award for short story writing in 1946, and participated in several U.G.C. seminars on literature. Presently he is editing Marathi vangmaya kosh. A keen student of world literature he has acted as a member on jury committees of the State government, Bharatiya Jnanpith and Sahitya Akademi awards in Marathi literature.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

P.M.

PUROHIT, VENIBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1916, d. 1980) was a poet and journalist. He studied up to Matriculation. He started his professional career in Bombay. For some years during World War II, he worked as a journalist at Ahmedabad. In 1943, he joined the Independence Movement, and spent ten months at Sabarmati Jail in Ahmedabad. In 1949 he went to Bombay, joined Janmabhoomi, a daily, and settled there.

His very first poem 'Purano divado' (Old lamp, 1937) was published in the periodical, Kumar. It is a kind of 'bhajan' (hymn). Sinjarav (The humming, 1955) was the first collection of his poems which drew the attention of many readers. Deepti (Light, 1956), his second collection of poems, shows considerable variety in the choice of themes and expression. This collection depicts many contemporary events. Lyrics and bhajans are also a part of this collection. The poet searches for harmony amidst discord and aims at attaining spiritual elevation. With the help of the traditional rhythm of bhajans at his command, he has enriched Gujarati poetry. 'Hedo', 'Asavar', 'Bagadelo divas' or 'Dasha ane disha' are the notable poems of this collection. Achaman (1975) is his third collection of poems which is rich in a wide range of forms, such as sonnet, ghazal, lyric, 'muktaka', narrative, etc. There is also a wide variety of subjects in his poems such as liberty, love, devotion and spirituality. Some of his poems show poetic refinement while others reveal a strong regional flavour. He has used Sanskrit metres as well as other traditional patterns of rhyme. As a matter of fact these three collections earned him his position as a distinguished poet in the post-Gandhian era.

He has also written some journalistic prose. Attarna diva (Lamp of scent, 1952) is his first collection of short stories. Setu (Bridge) and Vansa nun van (Bamboo forest) are his two other collections of stories. Rich in narration and written in traditional style, these stories are the direct result of his perception of reality. 'Nava dakhalo', 'Tamacho ne lat', 'Lilan Lakadan', etc, display depth of experience which sharpens the literary sensitivity of readers. Apart from short stories, he wrote meditative as well as satirical prose too. In Janmabhoomi, in the column 'Ratan katori', he wrote under the pen-name of 'Aakhe Bhagat', on some real incidents in the lives of actors and actresses. He wrote many satirical articles also on contemporary socio-political events in a column, 'Gofan Geeta', He wrote some film reviews as well and has a few film songs to his credit.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirubhai Thakar, Gujarati sahityani vikas rekha (Surat, 1966); Periodical Kavilok (Ahmedabad, 1981); Jayant Pathak, Aadhunik kavita pravah (Surat, 1963).

P.D.

PURUSHAPARIKSHA (Sanskrit) by Vidyapati is a fifteenth century didactic work in mixed prose and verse, containing tales that introduce orthodox Indian moral teachings to children.

The author is variously known as Vidyapati, Vidyapati Thakkura, Vidyapati-kavi, Vidyapati Sharma, and Abhinava Jayadeva. He was the protege of Shivasimha, King of Mithila, who offered him the village Visapi. Among his other works are: Bhuparikrama, Durgabhaktitarangini, Danavakyavali, Vivadasara, Gayapattana, Kirtilata, and Vaishnava lyrical poems (padavali). Among these the first five works are in Sanskrit, the sixth one in Avahatta, and the seventh in Maithili.

There are three recensions of Purushapariksha: (i) Harachandra Roy's Bengali translation containing 48 episodes, published by Fort William College, Calcutta, 1815, (ii) Gujarati translation with 44 tales, published by the Gujarati Printing Press, Bombay, 1882, and (iii) Hindi translation with 42 stories, published by the Lakshmivenkateshwar Press, Bombay, 1937.

By means of story-telling, the Purushapariksha narrates the result of good and bad actions so that the tender minds can ascertain the character of a perfect individual. It preaches that a person possessing sound moral courage (virattva), intellect (buddhi) and learning (vidya) secures liberation by leading a balanced life in terms of 'dharma' (righteousness), 'artha' (right economic pursuits), 'kama' (ideal family life) and 'moksha' (self-realization)—four cardinal moral principles of the orthodox Indian society. The book has the framework of traditional narration.

In reply to Paravara, King of Chandratapa, who was looking for a suitable groom for his daughter, the sage Vasukti narrated 41 tales, each carrying a moral message. The tales are divided into four sections, titled 'Virakathas' (Tales of valiant deeds), 'Subuddhikathas' (Tales of itelligent deeds), 'Savidyakathas' (Tales of learned people and 'Purusharthakathas' (Tales dealing with Purusharthas, i.e. the four moral principles).

Purushapariksha earned popularity as a textbook for children, especially in Bihar and Bengal for its non-verbose and lucid diction, simplicity of expression, and direct presentation of moral teachings. But most of the tales are so brief and abrupt that they fail to arrest the mind of a story-lover. Moreover, the plot is designed loosely and all episodes stand isolated, without mutual cohesiveness. As a result the book hardly gives us an impression that the tales have a common goal towards which the main plot is developing gradually. However, the most remarkable feature of this work lies in presenting glimpses of the prevailing sentiment of Hindu-Muslim integration in the mid-fifteenth century Mithila.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Chandrakant Pathak (ed. with Hindi tr.), Purushapariksha (Bombay, 1937); M. Krishnamachariar, History of Sanskrit Literature (Delhi, 1974); S.N. Dasgupta and S.K. De, A History of Sanskrit Literature: Classical Period, Vol. I (Calcutta, 1977).

Bik.B.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

PURUSHARTHA (Sanskrit), the ends of a person, is a term denoting a basic socio-ethical concept on which the colossal edifice of Indian civilization has rested from time immemorial: it is the foundation of the orthodox social psychology of India. By means of it the conduct of life in India is modulated in a harmonious way. Four cardinal ends of human life, according to this term, are: 'dharma' (religion, law, righteousness); 'artha' (economics), 'kama' (love, sex); and moksha (liberation); and they are mutually interrelated and interdependent in such a manner that artha and kama based on dharma lead to moksha. Kama again is based on artha. Indian ethos admits dharma, artha and kama only if they have the efficacy to usher in moksha. Moksha is the final end: and dharma, artha and kama, the flowers of the garland of purushartha, are consummated by moksha.

The meanings of the terms artha and kama are clear, while the terms dharma and moksha have many interpretations which vary from one school of thought to another.

Even in the field of Sanskrit literature the concept of purushartha has played a vital role. In India a good piece of literature has always been a significant vehicle of the concept of purushartha. Authorities in Sanskrit poetics have regarded the preaching of purushartha to common people as the chief aim of literature. It is literature alone, according to most poets, that can communicate the essence of the concept of purushartha in a simple but appealing way, while the shastras present this concept in a scholastic fashion.

Bik.B.

PURVALAP (Gujarati), a posthumous collection of poems by Manishankar Ratanji Bhatt 'Kant', is a phenomenon in Gujarati literature. It is the classic expression of the fusion of personal agony and impersonal pursuit. Kant has evolved a new form of 'Khand-kavya' by blending the Greek and Sanskrit concepts of tragedy. Each khand-kavya in the anthology is in a narrative form, conceived lyrically. Harmonized components,rhythmical pattern and sustained episode make for the architectural quality of these poems.

This work consists of four khand-kavyas. 'Vasant vijay' deals with a significant moment before Pandu's death. It is a masterly treatment of the episode in which the cursed Pandu succumbs to sexual desire resulting in his death. Yudhishthir agrees to Duryodhan's proposal for a game of dice. Sahadev and Draupadi foresee the humiliation in store for the Pandavas and Draupadi. 'Chakravakmithun' is based on a popular myth of 'Chakravaks', the bird pair, doomed to be separated every evening. The juxtaposition of the mountain scene and the intense agony of separation has been brought out beautifully in the poem. All his khand-kavyas show the working of the tragedy of love amidst worldly affairs. Even his 'Devyani', though happily wound up at the end, has tragic elements at the very centre of the poem.

Besides these four khand kavyas, 'Sagar ane Shashi' is another poem which recreates the magic of musicality and suggestivity. 'Upahar', a poem of dedication, is a vibrant sonnet with live landscape and personal feelings. There are a few more poems, such as 'Viprayoga', 'Manohar murti' and 'Apni rāt' which express intensity of love for his wife. His use of 'Anjani' metre drawn from Marathi is quite remarkable.

C.T.

PURVARANGA (Sanskrit) literally means 'that which happens before the play'. In Sanskrit dramaturgy, the preliminary action before the commencement of a dramatic performance is called purvaranga. Apart from setting a play in motion, purvaranga also has a ritualistic purpose, because it propitiates the deities and appeases the evil spirits for the success of the performance. In the concluding part, the play and the playwright are also introduced through purvaranga.

Details about the performance of purvaranga are discussed in Bharata's Natyashastra. Purvaranga is accompanied by instrumental and vocal music, dance and recitation. According to Natyashastra, it is divided into two varieties—'shuddha' (pure, simple) and 'chitra' (elaborate and striking). There are nineteen conventional components in purvaranga, out of which the first nine are performed behind the curtain, and the remaining after the curtain has moved away. The first nine include the arrangement of musical instruments, seating of musicians and their initial rehearsals. Later, after the removal of the curtain, dances are performed to the accompaniment of an orchestra and music. The second part comprising the remaining ten items deals with invocations to God and the guardian-deities of the world, the 'Nandi' (invocatory prayer), dance movements and the conversation between Vidushaka, Sutradhara and the Assistant. Later the Sutradhara addresses the audience and introduces the play, the playwright and the theme.

Natyashastra provides detailed discussions of all nineteen elements in purvaranga. The preliminaries are to be performed with elabroate music and dance movements but Bharata warns that the play should not be carried on too long, lest the spectators should get tired of it.

In the prologue in Sanskrit plays the Sutradhara first enters alone and calls for his wife or assistant. After a brief dialogue and a song relating to the season the Sutradhara introduces the first Act of the play. Classical plays had their own prologues, having benedictory verse or verses at the beginning. In Bhasa's plays there is the statement 'nandyante tatah pravishati sutradharah' (After the Nandi, the Sutradhara enters), after which the Sutradhara enters the stage, recites the benedictory verses of the prologue and carries out Prastavana. In later plays like those of Kalidasa, Shudraka, Harsha and Bhavabhuti the benedictory verses are introduced first, after which there is the stage direction, 'nandyante...' These two divergent practices seem to be due to the original twofold division of purvaranga.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Su.G.

PUSHPADANTA (Apabhramsha; 9th-10th c. AD), the poet, came of a Brahmin family and was the son of Keshavabhatta and Mugdhadevi. The parents were followers of Shaivism but later got converted to Digambara Jainism. Pushpadanta had a dark complexion, a lean body, a smiling face, and was unmarried. We do not know about his native place, or where he studied, or who patronised him before he migrated to Manyakheta. He lived in extreme poverty, was humiliated at the court of king Viraraja Kavipati, and moved to Manyakheta, modern Malkheda, which was then the capital of the Rashtrakutas. The pet name of the poet was Khanda or Khandu, but he had many titles such as Ahimanameru, Kavvarayanayara, Kavvapisalla, Kavvarakkhasa, Kaikulatilaya, Sarasainilaya, Vaesunighara. There is no doubt that he had a genius for poetic composition and a great imaginative power. At Manyakheta, he was given patronage by Bharata, minister to the King. Bharata asked him to write the Mahapurana so that his poetic gifts could be rightly used. The poet began his work in AD 959, but lost interest after he had completed 'Adipurana', i.e. the first thirty-seven sandhis. Then it is said the goddess of learning appeared before him and encouraged him to resume the work, which was duly taken up and finished in AD 965.

We have only three works written by the poet: Mahapurana, Nayakumarchariu and Jasharachariu. Mahapurana is a great epic, composed in 102 sandhis, and is qualitatively better than the Sanskrit Mahapurana. Nayakumarachariu contains nine sandhis and Jasharachariu only four. Both are Charitakavyas.

It is quite possible that Pushpadanta completed his Mahapurana during the life time of Bharata. But the other two works were composed under the patronage of Nanna, son of Bharata. It appears that besides these three, he wrote a few more works, one of them in praise of Viraraja as mentioned in the introductory part of Mahapurana, but it was probably lost.

Pushpadanta tells us that he knows little of the works of Akalanka, Kapila, Kanada, Patanjali, Bhasha, Vyasa, Kalidasa, etc., but his works show that he was familiar not only with the Hindu, Buddhist and Jaina religions, and their philosophy and mythology but also with those technical branches of literature, a knowledge of which was part of the necessary equipment of an accomplished poet in ancient India. The poet's reference to three Buddhas, three shaktis, Panchanga mantra, Arishadvarga, seven Vyasanas and seven Rajyangas, etc. shows his knowledge of such works on statecraft as Kamandakiya nitishastra and Kautilya arthashastra. From the details given by him, we can ascertain his date and period. He writes:-

> Nau bujjhiu ayamu saddadhamu
> siddhanta dhavala jaidhavala namu.

The dhavala commentary, as referred to, was written by Virasenacharya in the period of Amoghvarsha I, whose reign began in AD 815. Again, the reference to the plunder of Manyakheta by Harshadeva, an event which took place in the year 972, helps us fix the upper limit.

Hiralal Jain, in his introduction to Jasasharachariu, has made an attempt to fix Pushpadanta's period thus:

i) The mention of his predecessors, particularly of Rudrata, whose date is fixed between 800-850, is helpful.

ii) The poet refers to the death of the Chola king in the war waged by Shubhatunga or Tudiga or Krishnaraja III. This event took place in about AD 940.

iii) The mention of the Siddhartha year of the Shaka era in which he commenced his Mahapurana, and of the Krodhana year of the same era in which he completed it, indicates the years as AD 959 and AD 965. From the above references, it is clear that the poet Pushpadanta lived some time between AD 837 and AD 987.

D.S.

PUSHPADANTA (Prakrit; 1st c. AD.) is a great saint and writer of Prakrit Jaina canonical literature. In the great tradition of canons he was the first who started composing the Satkhandagama. He could write only the first 177 sutras, known as 'Satprarupana'. The Digambara Jainas hold that their sacred literature consisting of Purvas and Angas is lost. They do not therefore accept the authority of the canons of the Shvetambaras. The only surviving pieces of the original Jaina cannon of twelve Angas are, according to the Digambara tradition, preserved in what are popularly known as Dhavala, Jaidhavala, Mahadhavala siddhantas. Actually, the text is Satkhandagama, and Dhavala and Jaidhavala are the commentaries. The teachings of Lord Mahavira were arranged into twelve Angas by his pupil Indrabhuti Gautama and were handed down from preceptor to pupil by word of mouth till gradually they receded into oblivion. Only fractions of them were known to Dharasena who felt the necessity of preserving them. So he called two sages, who afterwards became famous as Pushpadanta and Bhutabali, and taught them portions of the fifth Anga 'Vihapannatti' and the twelfth Anga 'Ditthivada'. These were subsequently reduced to writing in sutra forms by the two eminent pupils. Pushpadanta composed the first 177 sutras, and his colleague Bhutabali wrote the rest, the total being 6,000 sutras.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Pushpadanta is older than Bhutabali. There is a story that Pushpadanta was worshipped by the Devas, and the lines of his teeth were raised uniformly. Therefore the great teacher Acharya Dharasena called him 'Pushpadanta'. Actually, Pushpadanta wrote 'Bisadi' sutras to teach his nephew Jinapalita. Then he sent these sutras to Bhutabali who read them, and knowing that Pushpadanta's life was short, took the work in his hand and completed 'dravyapramananugama' to the end.

The basis of composition is the 'Karmaprakriti Adhikara' of the second Agrayanipurva. The whole text of Satkhandagama is divided into six khandas. The Karma theory is discussed in detail and the language is quite technical. Looking at the contents of Satkhandagama one finds that the school had invented a novel branch of mathematics, quite apart from what we call medieval mathematics. In this branch, called non-universal mathematics, analysis and calculus of sets (rasis) appear to have been developed to express and illustrate the abstruse and philosophical part of religious sermons.

There are two kinds of authors, artha-karta and grantha-karta. So far as Satkhandagama is concerned, the artha-karta is Mahavira Tirthankara, while the grantha-kartas are Gautama and other saints down in succession to Pushpadanta and Bhutabali. The authors of Satkhandagama acquired the knowledge of the traditional lore (siddhanta) from Dharsenacharya. According to the 'pattavali' of Nandisangha the date of Satkhandagama is 663 years after the Nirvana of Mahavira (599-527 BC) and this is widely accepted. However, Jyotiprasad Jain holds the view that the date of Pushpadanta is AD 50-80. It also stands out that the inscription discovered in the Baba Pyara caves near Girnar of Junagarh belong to this period. Probably it is the same Chandragupta cave where Dharsenacharya used to dwell, and he might be the same Dharsena whose demise, according to Sallekhana, is indicated in the inscription. The compilation period of Satkhandagama is said to be AD 75. The language of his text is quite lucid and simple. The Prakrit of the sutras is Sauaraseni influenced by the older Ardha Magadhi, i.e., a mixture of both, called Jaina Sauaraseni by scholars. There is no doubt that the language of the work belongs to the first century of the Christian era.

D.S.

PUSHTI MARG (Hindi). Vallabhacharya (15th-16th c.) was the founder of Pushti Marg which was based on his doctrine of 'Suddhadvaitism'. According to this doctrine, 'Brahm' is the embodiment of 'Sat' (eternity), 'Chit' (Consciousness), 'Anand' (Bliss). Pushti marg considers Srikrishna the perfect incarnation of the divine being, and its followers strive to merge themselves in God's 'Anand lila' through love and self-surrender.

To bless the mórtals,God incarnates Himself on the earth. The motive behind the incarnation is not to safeguard the saints or punish the evil doers but to bestow mukti (salvation) on the devotees. While Navdha bhakti is Sadhana bhakti or Maryada bhakti,based on prayers and observance of rituals, Pushti bhakti is 'Ragatmak' based on devotional love, springing from God's grace and benevolence.

The relation established by the mortal with the divine is called Brahm sambandh. Once that relation is achieved the devotee is forbidden from accepting anything before dedicating it to God. Three kinds of services are offered to God: i) 'Tanuja':dedicating one's self, children and wife to the service of the Lord; ii) 'Vittaja':dedicating one's fame, wealth, riches to God; iii) 'Manasi':transcending one's interest in the self and devoting it entirely to God. This kind of service is the most difficult of all.

In the beginning, motherly affection was the dominant emotion in a Pushtimargi's devotion. Later on, it assimilated service, affection, companionship and beauty within one's 'Rati bhakti'. From the emotional point of view, beauty was of utmost importance and its very ideal was Radha. The ideal devotees of Pushtimarg were Nanda, Yashoda, Gopa and Gopis, who attained salvation through the strength of their love. Heavenly love, completely free from desire, was possible only through God's blessings. In Pushtimarg, God is perceived as an image of eternal bliss. He is the eternal source of beauty and joy. That is why the temples of Pushtimarg have paved the way for the promotion of various art forms.

Vallabhacharya founded the cult of Pushtimarg in accordance with the needs of his times. It was open to everyone without considerations of caste, creed, or sex to join the marg. Hence it attracted within its fold people from high caste Brahmins to lowly Shudras, including women. It was also open to the Muslims who joined the cult and helped in the growth of the Krishna bhakti movement.

The eight famous poets, called 'Ashtachhap' poets, who belonged to Pushtimarg were Vallabhacharya's four disciples Kumbhandas, Surdas, Krishnadas and Paramanandadas, and another four disciples of Vitthalanath (Vallabhacharya's son), namely Govindadas, Chheetswami, Nandadas, and Chaturbhujadas. Devoted to Sri-Nathji, the Lord of their cult, these poets wrote with a sense of camaraderie in praise of the Supreme as well as their preceptors.They belonged to different social orders. Paramanandadas was a brahmin; Krishnadas came from a lower rung of society;Kumbhanadas was a farmer; and nothing can be said authoritatively about Surdas's caste. From these 'Ashtachhap' poets one fact becomes clear that there was no sense of discrimination among the followers of Pushtimarg.

All these poets were gifted singers too. Their contribution to Krishna bhakti movement is of a high order; in fact,Surdas is a lyricist par excellence. Another characteristic worth noting is that these poets were devotees-cum-poets and not preachers. Except Nandadas, none of them tried to attract the people to their cult. Yet they themselves believed in 'Shudhatvatism' and the basic concepts of Pushti bhakti, and their songs embody their faith and devotion. Surdas and Paramanand have also written on the life and times of Krishna.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Ashtachhaap literature is primarily lyrical and free from conventions of versification. The traditions of bhakti which these poets had set up are still followed in the family line of Pushtimargis. The main contribution of these poets lies in the enrichment of Krishna bhakti poetry, embracing all classes of society without any discrimination against the unprivileged and the humble.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dharam Narain Ojha,Sur sahitya mein Pushtimarg bhavna; Dindayal Gupta,Ashatchhaap aur Vallabh sampradaya.

D.L.S.

PUTTANNA, M.S. (Kannada; b. 1854, d. 1930) was a novelist, biographer, historian and writer of children's literature. Though his real name was Lakshminarasimha Shastry, the pet name 'Puttanna' stuck. Brought up by his grandfather and uncle, he took the B.A. degree of Madras University. After working as a teacher for some time, he became Amildar in the Revenue Department. He resigned in 1908 and became a lawyer. In addition to Kannada, he knew Marathi, Urdu and English.

Puttanna's Madiddunno maharaya (1915) is recognized by most critics as the first full-fledged novel in Kannada. It is avowedly didactic, depicting the final triumph of good over evil. The characters are idealized. Yet it presents vividly and realistically the society in which the action takes place, relates action to character and displays a genuine interest in human nature. The style is crisp and incisive. His other novels are Musugu thegeye mayangane (1928) and Avarilladoota (1959), which, like the first, recreate the times of Mummadi Krishnaraja Wodeyar of Mysore.

Puttanna's Nitichintamani (1884), a collection of 165 tales drawn from different sources, was for long an immensely popular work for children. Very short and narrated in simple language, each tale carries a lesson which is set out at the end. His Kunigala Ramasastrygala charitre (1910) on the life of a scholar in the court of Mummadi Krishnaraja, was probably the first biography of a Kannadiga. His Kampooshana charitre is possibly the first biography in the language. He also wrote works of history and prepared Kannada texts for the lower classes. He was a master of clear, incisive prose.

His other works include : Biographies: Sir Salarjangana charitre (1917); Mahamood Gavanan charitre (1922). History: Hinducharitradarpana (1882) with a collaborator; Hinducharitra sangraha (1888) with a collaborator; Chitradurgada paleyagararu (1924); Ikkeri samsthanada charitre (1931); Children's literature : Sumathi Madanakumarara charitre (1897), Translations, etc: Hemachandra vilasa (1899), Kannada rendering of King Lear (prose and verse); Hemalatha (1920), Kannada rendering of Hamlet (prose and verse, unpublished); Petemathenajji (1927),

L.S.S.R.

PUTTAPPA, K.V. (Kannada; b. 1904), or 'Kuvempu' as he is otherwise known, is an eminent poet, novelist, dramatist and biographer in Kannada. He was born in Hirekodige and brought up in his ancestral village Kuppali in the Shimoga district of Karnataka. He was initiated into the Kannada classics by his father. He first studied at a local school at Tirthahalli and then at Mysore. He took an M.A. degree in Kannada in 1929. Later, he joined the University of Mysore as a lecturer and rose to become its Vice-Chancellor from which post he retired in 1960. Kuvempu came under the influence of Sri Ramakrishna Paramahamsa and Swami Vivekananda, and spent thirteen years of his life in the Ramakrishna Ashram. It was during those years that several of his major literary works were written.

Kuvempu started his literary career with a slender collection of English poems, The Beginners' Muse in 1922, but soon switched over to Kannada. His poetic compositions run into as many as twenty-five collections, of which the earliest Kolalu (The flute, 1930) brought him instant fame.

Among his poems, Chitrangada is a narrative in 2000 lines. For the first time in Kannada poetry, the Homeric simile is used here. Each piece is a well-chiselled image, rich in suggestion and melody. Malenedina chitragalu is a collection of pen-pictures of a number of fascinating incidents mainly connected with the poet's early days in his native woods. In his poems on nature we see an ardent devotee and worshipper of nature. The various objects of nature are not insentient things to him but manifestations of the spirit. Kuvempu's love poems are unique, being the love-poems of a sage and a thinker. However, it was not just the glory of love and nature which claimed the poet's attention. Poverty, ignorance, and social injustice too moved him to write many touching poems. His poems, indeed, range from the romantic to the surrealistic.

Kuvempu has rendered several English poems into Kannada, which read almost like original creations. Only two may be mentioned here: Bommanahalli kindari jogi an adaption of Robert Browning's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin', and 'Devaketu' an adaptation of Francis Thompson's 'The Hound of Heaven'. Both have won high praise, the former for the creation of local atmosphere and the latter for the creation of a new series of imagery.

Kuvempu has to his credit seventeen short stories, in which he has effectively portrayed dire poverty, love, death, deception, renunciation and asceticism.

Kuvempu's another strong forte is drama. He has written fourteen plays, each a distinctive contribution to the genre. Nanna Gopala (My Gopala) and Modannana tamma (The cloud's little brother) are children's plays. Jalagara (The scavenger) and Balidana (The sacrifice) are plays on social themes; Raktakshi (The maiden with blood-shot eye) and Birugali (The tempest) are inspired by Shakespeare's Hamlet and The Tempest respectively; Maharatri (The momentous night) deals with Siddhartha's renunciation of the world; Valmikiya bhagya (Valmiki's good fortune), Shmashana Kurukshetra (Kurukshetra, the graveyard), Yamana solu (The defeat of Yama), Shudra-tapasvi (The shudra-ascetic), Chandrahasa, Beralge koral (A throat for a thumb) and Kanina - are all based on Indian mythology.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Nanna Gopala is the dramatization, with necessary modifications, of a parable of Sri Ramakrishna Paramahamsa. The play emphasizes the indispensability of child-like faith for an aspirant to realize God. Modannan tamma describes a child's longing to sail with the cloud. In Maharatri the virile introductory dialogue tunes up the minds of the spectators for Siddhartha's momentous resolve to renounce the world and his pilgrimage to Buddhahood. Shudra-Tapasvi is based on the controversial Shambuka episode in the Ramayana. The playwright has established, through conversation, at once logical and aesthetically convincing, that a Shudra has equal rights for 'tapas' along with others. Shmashana Kurukshetra is both a vision and a symbol. It is the colossal image of the tragedy that the myriad hands of war incessantly mould. In no other play or novel in Kannada has the picture of the devastating cosmic dance of war been so powerfully and poetically painted. Beralgekoral, a play in three scenes significantly named Guru, Karma and Yajna, is a work of pure vision. Drona exacts the thumb of Ekalavya as his 'guru dakshina' (The teacher's fee). This act of Drona costs him nothing less than his own head in the Mahabharata war. A very powerful dialogue, the artistic design of the plot, masterly characterization, and above all, the numerous epigrams which read almost like mantras and give expression to the very essence of Indian philosophy have all combined to make this play a veritable masterpiece.

Kuvempu is a biographer par excellence. One of his works is on Sri Ramakrishna and the other on Swami Vivekananda; the biographies, which are highly poetic, read like novels. His Nenapina doniyalli (In the boat of memories), an autobiography in two volumes running to about 1500 pages, describes the growth of the poet's mind and his poetic personality.

His collection of essays - Kavya vihara, Vibhuti puje, Draupadiya Srimudi, Raso vai sah, Taponandana and Ityadi deal with poetics and literary criticism. In them we find a great poet probing the processes of poetic creation. They show, on the whole, that he belongs to the tradition of ancient Sanskrit aestheticians. but carries with him the erudition of western aesthetics and literary criticism. Kanuru heggaditi and Malegalalli madumagalu are his two epic novels, both of which achieved instant celebrity. They give vivid description of the milieu and the life of the people of Malenad, the mountanous region where the poet hails from. And finally, Sri Ramayana darshanam, an epic in about 22,000 lines, is the magnum opus of the writer.

Kuvempu's writings run nearly to 13,000 pages in print. His remarkable success in experimenting with a variety of metrical forms and his creation of innumerable original images and idioms have inspired hundreds of writers in Kannada.

Kuvempu has been honoured with many awards and titles by the state and the central governments and literary bodies. He presided over the Kannada Literary Conference in Dharwad (1958). His epic Sri Ramayana darshanam won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1955. He received D. Litt degrees (Honoris causa) from the universities of Mysore, Karnatak, Bangalore, Kanpur and Gulbarga, and also from the World Academy of Arts and Culture, San Francisco. The government of Karnataka conferred on him the title of 'Rashtra kavi' in 1964. In 1968 he was awarded the Jnanpith Prashasthi. He became the Honorary Fellow of Sahitya Akademi in 1979 and that of the Kannada Sahitya Parishat in 1986. And finally the President of India honoured him with Padma Vibhushan in 1988.

Pr. Sh.

PUTTASWAMAIAH, B. (Kannada; b. 1897, d. 1984) was a novelist, playwright, journalist and translator. Deprived of education beyond the ninth standard because of his father's death, Puttaswamaiah was a self-made man. He joined the weekly, New Mysore, in 1925. He was the editor of Vokkaligara patrike, Janavani and the first editor of the premier daily Prajavani. He worked with the famous Gubbi Company of Gubbi Veeranna as playwright. He also wrote scripts for a few Kannada films. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award (1964) for his historical novel, Krantikalyana, and the Janmabhumi Trust Award (1971) for his services to Kannada journalism.

Puttaswamaiah wrote eighteen plays, dealing with historical, social and mythological themes. His first play was Shahjahan (1926). He had a fine sense of the theatre, and, at a time when music and verse dominated the professional stage, he made prose plays popular, though not without a struggle. He proved to be among the most popular playwrights of the professional theatre, his major contributions being Gautama Buddha, Yagnaseni, Akka Mahadevi, Sati Tulasi, Kurukshetra and Dashvatara.

Puttaswamaiah also wrote a series of historical novels, recreating the epoch of the religious and social revolution at Kalyana organised by Basaweshwara and other Shivasharanas in the twelfth century. His interest in this form remained alive up to his later years. Among his other novels are Roopalekha, Chalukya thailapa, Tejaswini, Kalyaneshwara and Nagabhanda. He also rendered Durgasaptashati into Kannada.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

L.S.S.R.

PUTUKKURALKAL (Tamil) is a collection of modern poems in Tamil, edited by C.C. Chellappa. The first edition, published in 1962, included sixty-three poems by twenty-four poets. The second edition (the present text), published in 1973, includes fifty-three poems by twenty-two poets. The first poem 'Etarko' by M. Ilaiaperumal apostrophizes Lord Shiva making a sarcastic reference to the dress, residence and ornaments puranically ascribed to Him. 'Un kai nakam' is a famous poem by Sundara Ramaswami. This ambivalent poem asks us, 'Why do we allow dirt to collect in our nails when there is room enough for it elsewhere', and seems to advise man to purge his heart of all vices lest they should corrupt him. 'Marina' by the editor himself, running to 440 lines, describes how the celebrated Marina beach in Madras serves as a health resort, a gymkhana maidan, a playground, a picnic spot and a lovers' heaven. Realism, irony and humour characterize this poem. His 'Anuvukku mun' brings out the irony that 'atom' as the smallest unit of matter was ignored in olden days by both philosophers and scientists, whereas today the scientists have belittled the claims of godhead by inventing the atom bomb while philosophers pray to God for protection against it. Pichamurtti's poems, 'Valittunai', 'Kilikkuntu' and 'Pukkari' register the degeneration in human behaviour, such as war-mongering, black marketing and vulgarisation of art and culture for the sake of mere monitary profits. 'Narakam' by C. Mani describes the modern man in confrontation with his environment. It shows how most aspects of modern life serve to disturb the emotions of man. It drives home the point that neither art nor life helps man sublimate or even compose his troubled emotions. 'Parvai' is a terse and closely-knit poem by P. Manikkavachakam, while his 'Malaikkotai' describes a poor man's dilapidated hut battered by heavy rain. Vallikkannan's 'Vishamum marrum' deals with the concepts of life and death, while his 'Kuruttui' stresses the need of 'internal light' instead of mere external illumination. 'Un kankal', also by him, brings out the soothing effect of love in the dreary routine of life.

The other poets included in this anthology are: K. Kasturirankan, K.A. Sachchitanantam, Hari Srinivasan, P.K. Sundararajan, K.N. Subramanyam, Taruma. Sivaramu, T.K. Duraiswami, Ira. Minakshi, Vi. Rankarajan, K.P. Rajagopalan, N. Venkatraman, T.C. Venogopalan and S. Vaitteswaran. This anthology is dedicated to Subramania Bharati, the harbinger of modern poetry in Tamil. In view of both its form and themes, Putukkuralkal may be considered a representative collection of modern Tamil poetry.

A.A.M.

PUTULNACHER ITIKATHA (Bengali) by Manik Bandopadhya (b. 1908, d. 1956), published in 1936, is a remarkable novel with a palpable allegorical significance disguised under apparent realism. In it one detects a questioning intellect inquiring into reality and individual existence. Like the author's other novels, Itikatha is concerned with death, religion, the supernatural, love, sexuality and the psychological complexities of the individual, blended into allegory with romantic idealism. As the title implies, the novel represents myth, legend and history as framework for the story. It is the tale of the struggles of a single individual, Shashi, against pervasive superstition, ignorance and indifference of the people of Bordia, a village in Bengal. Shashi, the protagonist, is a doctor, young and fresh, imbued with the ideal of ameliorating the sufferings of the poor and the ignorant people of Bordia by acquainting them with the principles of hygiene and a scientific and rational outlook. His father, Gopal, is a disreputable lout who amassed wealth through questionable means and thus got his son to study in Calcutta to be a doctor. Gopal has no sympathy with Shashi's idealism and sees him only as an instrument of earning money and thus climbing up the social ladder. An uneasy relationship exists between the father and the son from the beginning of the novel.

Shashi has a cordial relationship with the villagers, particularly with the families of Haru Ghosh. The novel opens with the description of Haru Ghosh's death from thunder. His son, Paran, looks upon Shashi as his guide and a family friend. Paran's wife Kusum is a wayward and unpredictable woman of inexhaustible vitality who remains untouched by the atmoshphere of pervasive superstition and corruption. She loves Shashi after her own fashion and tries to draw him to hereself in various ways. Paran's sister, Mokshada, tries to get away from the village to fulfil her desires and eventually does so in the company of Kumud, the romantically inclined and bohemian friend of Shashi. Sendidi, the wife of Jamini, becomes a surrogate mother for Shashi, and he brings her back to life from a fatal disease in spite of the direct opposition of her husband and his own father and the calumny of the villagers. Jadab, the 'Siddha purush', a holy man supposedly invested with the highest spiritual powers, has a special affection for Shashi. In order to impress Shashi, the faithless, rational doctor, Jadab mildly boasts that he can foretell the future, including the date of his own death. The news of his 'ichchyamrityu' gets about creating great enthusiasm. It becomes a prestige issue for Jadab leading to a virtual suicide by him and his wife. But in the popular imagination Jadab's death becomes a proof of his supreme spiritual attainment and even confuses rationalists like Shashi. Further, Jadab in his will leaves behind considerable property for the establishment of a hospital in the village under the supervision of Shashi. The more Shashi tries to get out of the stifling atmosphere of the village, the more he gets involved. His ideas continually elude his grasp. In spite of his best efforts, he could not save the son of Basudeb Banerjee. He wanted to concentrate on the hygiene of his family and of the village people, but met with failure. Even his father made fun of his earnestness: "Shashi must be out of his mind. What's the use of health to us?" By the time he discovered his love for Kusum, Kusum's love for him had already died. His efforts to rescue his sister Bindu from the humiliation of living with a husband, who treated her like a whore, failed. He feels totally helpless since things drifted against his best wishes in Gaodia. He gets thoroughly disenchanted and hands over the charge of the hospital to a newly appointed doctor and plans to move out of the village for good. But he is outwitted by his father who tricks him into a situation that makes his stay back at Gaodia, but for Shashi staying at Gaodia meant a surrender to the abyss of perpetual decay and degeneration which he wanted to overcome during his fairly long career as doctor and which threatened to engulf him now.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

In some ways Shashi is close to Camus' Rieux in his novel L'Etranger. Both of them are essentially outsiders who turn out to be misfits in their surroundings. But while Rieux is a mature existentialist, Shashi has just a vague awareness of the irrational nature of human existence. He thought that he had a choice of rejecting Gaodia and venturing out into the wide world. But when the crunch came he could not exercise his choice and was swallowed up by the quagmire of pervasive decay and stagnation.

Mo.A.

PYGAMBARA KAVITVAM (Telugu) is a radical movement in poetry, a purely indigenous movement, with no western influence that came into vogue in 1970. 'Pygam' means message. The message of this movement is that the people should prosper, and injustice and exploitation should end: "A common man competes with the beast for the food that is thrown in the dust bin; a millionaire sits at a feast in a Boeing. The mother country watches both these with an unfeeling indifference. Let us sprinkle cow's urine on her face. Behind the curtains of centuries the innocent have been raped by stubborn religion. Mother Andhra vomited the foreign stuff she could not assimilate. While the entire world stood gazing at this kaleidoscope, from the lap of mother earth rose the five Pygambaras with pen-swords in their determined hands."

Pygambaras published two volumes, Yuga sangitam (1970) and Yuga chaitanyam (1971). They wrote articles about themselves in Jwala and Telugu velugu, magazines from Vijayawada. They published pamphlet poetry too under the name 'Torch light'. Among the poets who wrote in the Pyagambara mode, Sugam Babu, Devi Priya, Olga, Kiran Babu and Kamala Kant are important.

Sugam Babu bewails the place of common man in today's society. "Are we inferior to an animal in a zoo, to a rock in a museum, to a plant in a botanical garden, to the watch dog of a minister or to a minister himself?" One cannot bring out the disparity between classes any better.

Pygambaras define their credo thus: "We are Pygambaras. Ours is 'tapas'. Our beacon light shall dispel 'darkness'. This world is a maze of problems. No path and everywhere darkness. There must be a ray to show you the path." They believe that their poetry is the radium to treat the cancer of war. By belief they are humanitarian, but times force them to take up arms to safeguard peace.

Pyagambara movement, which was started in 1970, came to an end after a few years when Olga, Kiran Babu and Sugam Babu joined the Revolutionary poets' fold. Kamala Kant and Devi Priya remained indecisive. There came about a split and thus disappeared a literary movement in Telugu poetry.

N. Ra.

Q

QAIDI (Dogri) is a novel authored by Deshbandhu Dogra 'Nutan'. The work was selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1982. The author delineates the people living in the interior, rural regions of the Duggar land, engaged in a constant struggle for existence. It is a saga of exploitation of the weaker sections of society. The central character of the novel, Bhagan, emerges as a symbol of the oppressed, particularly the oppressed female. She suffers endlessly, but seldom does she lose her dignity and humanity. She believes in the struggle against tyranny and injustice, and though she shocks the orthodox and the obscurantists in pursuing her belief, she is gentle, kind and helpful to the poor and the needy. In the end she breaks down without bending too much and her death brings her salvation not only from the prison of her body, but also from the prison of social order based on oppression and exploitation. Bhagan's is a very powerful character, vividly drawn, and it is considered the best and the most memorable character in Dogri fiction. Other characters impinging on her life are also drawn deftly and realistically, bringing into focus the whole social milieu of the rural Duggar during 1930-50. The delineation of the complex social relationships, the degeneration of the socio-political system in which the dehumanising forces are at work, where caste, status and money are more important than human values, where the police is ruthless and the revenue officials corrupt, shows the author's close observation and understanding of society.

The language and its creative use are the strong elements of the novel. The language is conversational and idiomatic, drawn from the various regions of Jammu, and its use is appropriate to characters and situations. The author is a teacher by profession, a Marxist by conviction and a researcher by temperament. There are some instances of political haranguing in the second half of the novel, but they do not impair the merit of the novel.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The novel is remarkable for its realistic portrayal of life in the interior of Duggar. Forceful characterisation and live and pulsating language make Qaidi an outstanding contribution to Dogri fiction.

Ni.S.

QALAQ, KHWAJA ASADULLAH (Urdu; d. 1879), son of Khwaja Bahadur Husain Friaq, was a disciple and nephew of Khwaja Wazir of Lucknow. Qalaq used to call himself a disciple of Wajid Ali Shah just for pleasing the latter. Wajid Ali Shah honoured him with the titles of Aftabuddola, Shams Jung, etc. In 1856, he was arrested and taken to Calcutta along with Wajid Ali Shah. He was released after seven months, and he returned to Lucknow where he died.

His main works include: (1) Wasokhte Qalaq and a masnavi entitled Qalaqnama (1846); (2) Masnavi Tilism-e-ulfat written between 1840 and 1854. This long romantic masnavi is his masterpiece; (3) Safar Ashob (1872), a collection of poems in musaddas form containing 372 couplets. The work contains an account of his imprisonment and journey to Calcutta; (4) Diwan Mazhar-e-Ishq (1873).

The importance of Qalaq's writings lies in his masnavis. His masnavi Tilism-e-ulfat is a long romantic tale in imitation of Mir Hasan, but in poetic technique it imitates Gulzar-e-Nasim by Daya Shankar 'Nasim'. Its language is in chaste Lucknow idiom.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Abul Lais Siddiqi, Lucknow ka dabistane shairi; Gian Chand, Urdu masnavi shumali Hind men (Aligarh, 1969).

G.J.

QALICH BEG, MIRZA (Sindhi; b. 1853, d. 1929) was an eminent poet and prose-writer. He was the son of Mirza Faridun Beg, who originally was a Christian and belonged to Georgia. Faridun Beg in his childhood went to Iran along with the prisoners of war, and later, about the age of ten, he was brought to Sindh as a gift for Mir Karam Ali, one of the rulers of Sindh. Thus, Mirza Qalich Beg, though a son of a foreigner, was brought up in Sindhi atmosphere. He started his primary education with the learning of Arabic, Persian and Sindhi. He passed his Matriculation examination in 1872 from the University of Bombay, and the next year got admission to B.A. course at Elphinstone College, Bombay. Mirza Qalich Beg was a brilliant student, but he could not pass the examination owing to sudden sickness and returned to Sindh in 1876. After passing the Magisterial examination of the British government, he entered the administrative service in 1880, and served in different parts of Sindh. In spite of his heavy duties in office, Mirza devoted himself to literary studies. He was well-versed not only in Sindhi but also in Arabic, Persian, English, Hindi and Urdu. He acquired a working knowledge of Gujarati and Marathi while studying in Bombay. He translated the masterpieces of other languages into Sindhi. After his retirement from government service in 1910, he engaged himself in literary activities in good earnest. The total number of books written by him is more than three hundred, out of which about two hundred were published in his life time. He was honoured by the government in 1906 with the medal of Qaisar-e-Hind (Lion of India) and with the title of Shams-ul-ulma (The sun among scholars) in January 1924.

Mirza Qalich Beg's first publication is B'arana shaira (Poems for children, 1870), which he wrote when he was studying at the secondary school. During his studies at college, he wrote on Persian prosody and etymology. Later, he contributed significantly to every branch of literature. Sauda-e-kham (Immature ravings, Part I, 1900, Part II, 1923) is a collection of Mirza's original Sindhi poems mostly based upon his personal experiences in youth. His translation Rubaiyat Omar Khayyam (Rubais of Omar Khayyam, 1905) has been highly appreciated for its natural and lucid rendering of the Persian rubais into Sindhi. Diwan Qalich is a collection of the poet's original ghazals compiled by him in 1928 and published after his death by Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad, in 1957. Amulhu manika (Invaluable gems, Part I in 1920 and Part II in 1923), Motyuni ji dab'uli (Casket of pearls, Part I in 1914 and Part II in 1923), Chandana-haru (Garland of sandalwood, part I in 1916 and part II in 1923) contain selected poems of Persian poets rendered into Sindhi verse by Mirza, while Ajib jawahara (Wonderful gems, 1917) is the collection of poems translated by him from English poetry. No doubt, Mirza had a thorough knowledge of Persian prosody and one can rarely find metrical flaws in his verses. But his poetry generally lacks inspiration, and is overloaded with direct moral instruction. In the field of Sindhi prose, Mirza has practically enriched every branch. A few of his works are: Essays: Maqalat-al-hikmat (Essays of wisdom, translation of Bacon's essays, 1877); Short stories: Dilpasand qissa (Entertaining stories, translation of Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare, 1890); Novel: Dilaram (1888) and Zinat (1890); Plays: Laila-Majnu (1880), Khurshid (1887); Literary criticism: Shah Bhitaia jo ahivalu (Life of Shah Abdul Latif, 1885), Sabit Ali Shah jo ahivalu ain sandasi marsiya (Life of Sabit Ali Shah and his marsiya, 1900); Autobiography: Sao panu ya karo pano (Green leaf or black paper, written in 1923 and published by Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad, in 1965). Mirza was a pioneer in every branch of Sindhi prose. His prose writings vary from small entertaining moral stories for children to very serious thought-provoking essays for highly educated people. He showed his scholarship by writing in the field of philology and compiling a dictionary of Shah Abdul Latif's poetry. The style of Mirza's prose-writings changes according to their subject-matter and the age-groups for which they are meant. But it always shows clarity, brevity and use of simple colloquial language. On the merit of his literary output, he was called Aftab-e-adab (The sun of literature) or the Shakespeare of Sindh.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.A. Allana, Sindhi nasra ji tarikh, 2nd ed. (Hyderabad, 1977); L.H. Ajwani, History of Sindhi Literature (New Delhi, 1970); Muhammad Sidiq Memon, Sindh ji adabi tarikh (Hyderabad, 1951); Muhammad Sidiq Musafir, Qurbu-Qalich (Affectionate tribute to Qalich, Hyderabad, 1936); M.U. Malkani, Sindhi nasra ji tarikh (Bombay, 1968).

M.K.J.

QASIDA (Kashmiri). Like other famous 'Asnaf-i-sukhan' (genres) of Kashmiri poetry, 'qasida' was not written by the ancients. The main reason for the non-availability of this genre during that period is the fact that the poets normally came from the lower classes and had no access to higher circles or the ruling class. Since they had no chance of acting as their courtiers, they did not feel any necessity to praise the kings. Then again, the official and court language of the state has all along been either Sanskrit or Persian and not Kashmiri.

The early qasida written a hundred years ago has been found in a manuscript form, composed by Khwaja Mohammed Dayim (d.1896). In this qasida, the poet has visualized the heavenly qualifications, graciousness, generosity and unparalleled valour of Hazrat Ali, the son-in-law of prophet Mohammad, but this composition has no concordance with the norms of a qasida.

Manawar Shah (d.1925), composed a short qasida of 26 lines in Masnavi form. The technique of this first attempt, no doubt, conforms to the generic norm, but the form is quite different. The poem does not disclose the name of the person to whom it has been dedicated. It is said that the author had great reverence for the Kakroo dynasty of Baramulla and the Malik dynasty of Bonakote (Badipora). Maybe, the qasida was dedicated to one of these patrons for being kind to him during his life time.

Rehman Rahi (b.1925) is the first poet who composed his first and last qasida of 67 lines, entitled Maafinama. The book was published in 1966 and edited by Mohammad Amin Kamil. The work contains poetical ambiguities and its theme is merely an apology; it is, however, not known to whom the poet had apologised. The form adopted is quite different from that of a qasida as the composition is bereft of appropriate rhyming.

Mazaffar Azim (b.1934) composed the second successful qasida, entitled Baa shan-i-jam (1974). In this qasida the satirical attitude of the poet towards his patron, who seems to be annoyed with him, is apparent. The rythmic beauty of this is thrilling and forceful.

Ghulam Nabi Gohar (b.1934) also composed a qasida of 64 lines in praise of the first Muslim saint of the 15th century, Shiekh Nooruddin Noorani. In Kashmiri, a few qasidas do come up to the standard demanded by the genre and can be termed as representative compositions.

Ni.A.

QASIDA (Urdu) is a significant genre of Urdu poetry, having its distinct rhyming scheme as aa, ba, ca. Though mainly devoted to eulogizing kings, nobles, the Prophet, sages and saints, the Urdu qasida is much wider in scope. Lampoons, war poems, or poems dealing with the vicissitudes of life, natural beauty, moral values, anecdotes and historical events, etc., written in the aforesaid rhyming scheme, have also been regarded as qasida.

'Tashbeeb', 'gurez', 'madh' and 'dua' are the main constituents of qasida. Tashbeeb, the prologue, is taken up before panegyrical exposition. A variety of themes, such as amorous passions, natural beauty, physical charms, transitoriness of the world, poetic discourse, historical events, description of dreams, admonition and advice, self-exaltation, lament against vagaries of fortune, etc, are treated by the poet in a lofty expression. Here he tries to display his ingenuity not only by giving free rein to his imagination, but also by stringing together words and phrases of highest order with a view to attracting the attention of his 'mamduh' (person eulogised). After this the poet covertly and subtly passes to eulogium. The transitory connecting verse/verses are known as gurez.

Madh (eulogy) is the main component of a qasida. The poet extols his mamduh, putting together in his person all possible qualities. If he is a royal personage, his grandeur and dignity, valour and chivalry, generosity and hospitality, justice and uprightness, etc. are praised in a hyperbolic manner. His horse, elephant, armoury are the objects of exaltation. By all these artistic ingenuities, the poet aims at pleasing the mamduh as well as displaying the excellence of his literary craft, the former in the hope of getting rewards, and the latter to establish his mastery in poetic art. Kings, rulers and nobles showered wealth on these poets. Towards the end, the poet prays for the mamduh or for himself and closes the qasida at the point of dua (blessings).

Elegant language, lofty expressions, gorgeous phrases and splendid imagery are the basic features of a qasida. All sorts of ornamental techniques and rhetorical devices are used for the embellishment of the verses.

Urdu qasida got an impetus from the very early days of Urdu literature because (i) Persian models were already available, (ii) some early kings of Deccan, like Muhammad Quli Qutub Shah (1569-1611), were poets and tried their hand at qasida and (iii) the poets connected with the royal courts, or those who could win the favour of their mamduh, were enormously rewarded.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Muhammad Quli Qutub Shah initiated the qasida in Urdu. Most of the qasidas composed by him are on religious themes. Ghawwasi (d. 1672), the poet laureate at the court of Abdullah Qutub Shah, pioneered the way for the development of qasida. He combined encomium with religious sentiments, mystic and philosophical teachings and morality.

Nusrati (d. 1674), attached to Adil Shahi royalty, combined his imagination with the description of a war waged and won by his master, thus giving a semblance of epic to his qasida. He was also successful in painting a vivid picture of spring and its effects. Vali (1667-1707) is the last link among the Deccan poets who composed qasida. He chose men of religion for his qasidas, which are an expression of his ardent love for these divines. Mysticism dominates his thought content.

Sauda (1713-1780) may be said to have perfected the art of panegyrics and satire. He embellished his compositions with dignified and elegant expressions. His skills captured the attention of the king and nobles of Delhi, who patronised him for his panegyristic verses. When he left Delhi for Lucknow, laureateship was conferred on him. He used varied themes for the tashbeeb and laboured at it with ardour to make excellent pieces of poetry.

He could write with same ease the 'hajv' (satire) to ridicule persons he disliked. In addition to personal satires, he wrote long poems in strong denunciation of the age of decadence. These odes give a vivid picture of the social degeneration and the poet's awareness of and concern for it.

Other notable contemporary poets like Mir, Mir Hasan, Qaim, Fughan, Baqa, Hasrat, etc., who tried their hand at panegyric, were eclipsed by the glory of Sauda in the field. Most of them tried to follow the pattern set by Sauda, but could not reach his heights.

Soon after appeared Insha (1757-1817) on the scene alongwith Mus-hafi (1750-1824). An erudite scholar, a polyglot and an inventive genius that Insha was, his unrestrained wit, humour and playfulness ransacked his enormous capacities. Mus-hafi was Insha's rival and composed qasidas with all seriousness. His qasidas have both lofty ideas and elegant expression, but they lack vigour. Jur'at, Joshish, Rangin, Mamnoon, Shah Nasir, etc. have made valuable contribution to the encomiastic stock of Urdu.

Zauq (1789-1854) came up as a giant in panegyric poetry and enriched the tradition of Sauda. His genius, ingenuity and brilliance are well-displayed in the odes which are full of lofty imagination, vigour and force.

Momin (1800-1851), averse to craving for favours of the emperor or the nobility, refrained from eulogising them. Saints and divines have been the subject of his odes which he recited melodiously.

Ghalib (1797-1869), whose vanity did not let him compose many qasidas, gave an exquisite freshness to Urdu qasida by the originality of his thought and diction.

At the court of the Nawabs of Avadh, poets like Mahjoor, Mehr, Behr, Goya, Hawas, Rind, Asir, Munir and a host of others added to the rich tradition of qasida, though not necessarily opening new vistas. After the fall of Avadh and Delhi Sultanates, the poets looked to smaller states for patronage. Amir Minai, Dagh, Jalal, Qadr, Tasleem, Mohsin, etc. earned a name in panegyric poetry. Amir Minai (d. 1900) and Mohsin (d. 1905) excelled in 'Natia' (eulogising the Prophet) qasida; Ismail Meerutee, Shibli, Aziz, Riaz and many others used the genre for expressing the spirit of reformation led by Syed.

Qasida, as a literary form, flourished under the patronage of royalty and nobility and declined with the extinction of these institutions, and is no more in vogue.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.A. Siddiqi, Qasida-e-Sauda; A.L. Siddiqi, Lucknow ka dabistan-e-shairi; A.M. Sahar, Urdu men qasidanigari; A.S. Nadvi, Sherul Hind; Hali, Muqaddama sher-o-shairi; I.I. Asar, Kashiful haqaiq; Jafri, Tarikh-e-qasida-e-Urdu; K.D. Ahmed, Urdu shairi per ek nazar; Mehmood Ilahi, Urdu qasidanigari ka tanqidi jaiza; N.H. Hashmi, Dilli Ka dabistan-e-shairi; R.B. Saksena, Tarikh-e-adab-e-Urdu; R.Russel and Khurshidul Islam, Three Mughal Poets.

At.A.S.

QAZI ABDUL GHAFFAR (Urdu) was born in the city of Moradabad and had his education there as well as at Aligarh. He entered politics as a strong supporter of the Khilafat Movement and the Indian National Congress. He visited the countires in West Asia and Europe, and on his return, he was elected Chairman of the Moradabad Municipal Board. Later, he shifted to Hyderabad State and joined the daily newspaper, Payam, as its editor. The paper supported the nationalist movement and denounced the Nizam's autocracy. After 1947, he was appointed General Secretary of the Anjuman Taraqqi-e-Urdu (Hind) and went to Aligarh to take up the post. He died in Aligarh.

His main works include Laila ke khutut, Majnun ki diary (novelettes written in the form of letters and diary), Us ne kaha, Seb ka darakht, Tin paise ki chakri (translation and adaptations), Asar-i-Jamaluddin Afghani, Hayat-i-Ajmal and Asar-i-Abdul Kalam (biographies of Jamaluddin, the famous Muslim thinker of Afghanistan, and Hakim Ajmal Khan and Abdul Kalam Azad, Indian nationalist leaders), and Naqsh-i-Firauq (travelogue of Europe).

Qazi Abdul Ghaffar was a versatile personality. He was a political activist of the Khilafat Movement days and had close relations with the eminent personalities of the period, like Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Hakim Ajmal Khan, Ansari and Sarojini Naidu. He worked as Assistant to Maulana Muhammad Ali.

As a journalist, he edited a powerful national Urdu daily, Payam, which trained a whole generation of Urdu journalists and set a very high standard of news-coverage and came out with fair and well-informed editorial comments—the task that was obviously difficult in a princely State ruled by the Nizam during the British period. His views were respected and the newspaper carved out its own place in the field of journalism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation

As a literary stylist, Qazi Abdul Ghaffar had his own place. He wielded a facile pen and his prose was at once effective and logical. His novelette Laila ke khutut was the first specimen of a truly psycho-analytical fiction written in Urdu, depicting a prostitute's search for identity. It ruthlessly describes the exploitation she is subjected to in a man's world. These letters, written with a colourful literary flavour, contain rare specimens of characterisation.

His Majnun ki diary is the reverse side of the picture painted through the observations of a male chauvinist, who finally finds his own human self and sheds his antipathy for the other sex.

His biographies have clear and sharp analyses of their heroes whose personalities Qazi Abdul Gaffar presents in an objective manner. He does not idealize them, but views them as human beings with creditable achievements, with serious human limitations though. The biographies describe very interesting and absorbing accounts of the significant men of his times. The author's interest has remained in these works as always human, and his judgement and insight pierce through all considerations of rank and office.

Qazi Abdul Ghaffar is a prose stylist par excellence, and a novelist and biographer of significance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M.A. Kazmi, 'Qazi Abdul Ghaffar: Hayat aur karname', Naqoosh, published from Lahore, 'Shakhsiyat Number'.

M.H.

QAZI QADAN (Sindhi; b. 1463, d. 1551) was one of the earliest sufi poets of Sindh. The information with regard to the place of his birth and early life is not available. There is even difference of opinion with regard to the pronunciation of his name. It is said that his ancestors resided in Sevhan and Thatta, the two main centres of learning and literary activities in that period. The poet, however, spent most of the years of his life in Bakhar, another well-known town of Sindh, and in course of time became the Qazi of the town.

The only evidence of Sindhi poetry known to us was seven poems of Qazi Qadan recorded in the Persian manuscript, Bayan-al-arfin, written by Mohammad Raza in 1628. Qazi Qadan was, therefore, considered to be the probable first poet in the Sindhi language. Doubts had always lurked in the minds of the literary historians that there must have been some kind of highly developed literature in Sindhi preceding Shah Abdul Latif and Shah Karim and that the two poets were responsible for continuing the established tradition. It was through the research of Pandit Raja Ram Shastri that an old manuscript called Santon ki vani (Poetry of saints) was discovered by him in a village 'math' of Haryana. The manuscript inter alia includes 112 poems of Qazi Qadan. Later, these poems written in Devnagari script were deciphered by Hiro Thakur and brought out in a book form entitled Qazi Qadan jo kalamu (Poetry of Qazi Qadan, 1978). Qazi Qadan's sojourn in the realms of mysticism, his faith in truth and goodness and above all God, his untiring endeavour to overcome the tragic contradiction between art, artist and society, all these run through the poems which rest on the foundation of sufism, the wave that engulfed the entire Sindhi community during the fifteenth century. Qazi Qadan wrote his poetry in the language and form prevalent in that century and wove into them his spirit and philosophy. When we read Qazi Qadan, we are within the realms of sufism; 'reason' seems to us shallow. Qazi Qadan, the philosopher of enlightenment, pushed the mystic poets, who followed him in the seventeenth century, some steps up the hill, and in theory, at any rate, this gain was consolidated by them.

P.A.

QISSA (Punjabi) is an Arabic term which means 'story'. In Punjabi, it denotes one of the major genres of medieval poetry. Usually it narrates a romantic tale in poetic form. The literary sources of this genre can be traced back to 'mahakavyas' and Akhyanas of classical Indian literature. The Persian Masnavi may also be considered its immediate source of influence. The genre of qissa displays the following characteristics of theme and form.

(a) Primarily it is a form of narrative poetry.
(b) The theme of romantic love finds a prominent place in the Punjabi qissa.
(c) An important variation of this theme is heroic adventure or ethical dilemma. The qissas of Raja Risalu and Puran Bhagat are easily its important instances.
(d) The fictional world of the qissas is created by utilizing the structural principles of myth and romance.
(e) The narrative line is often broken at certain points of the tale to present philosophical or ethical comments of the author. These comments heighten the thematic significance of the situation narrated.
(f) To enhance the dramatic effect of certain situations the qissas often use the technique of a dialogue.
(g) This intermixing of narrative and dramatic modes of expression enhances the aesthetic import of the qissas.
(h) Various 'chhandas' (metres) are used in composing the poetic form of the qissas. 'Davyya' and 'Bait' chhandas are, however, the most popular metres employed by the qissa poets.

In the light of these characteristics (which are certainly not exhaustive), we can conclude that the qissa is primarily a fictional romance in poetry. It utilizes the techniques of narration, dialogue and thematic statement in creating an enriched structure of literature.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The first extant Punjabi qissa is Heer written by poet Damodar during the reign of the Mughal Emperor Akbar (1556-1605). But the origin of this genre is definitely older than this period. Some of the prominent historians of Punjabi literature have expressed their opinion in favour of the 10th/11th century as the period of its first emergence. Pushya's Sassi Punnu may be considered as one of the earliest works in this form, but unfortunately this work is not extant. There are only references to it in the works of other authors. Considering the maturity of Heer Damodar as qissa writing, we can safely assign an early period to the origin of this genre in Punjabi. Qissa Sassi Punnu might have been composed during the early period of Punjabi literature, as its thematic content points towards the ancient characters of lunar mythology. The love tale of Sassi-Punnu had influenced the common people of Punjab to such an extent that 'Sadds' of Punnu were composed by the earliest folk poets.

The first extant qissa of Heer by Damodar marks the beginning of a very powerful new trend in Punjabi literature. the fictional world created by this genre is entirely different from the religious poetry of the sufis, saints, bhaktas and gurus which had dominated the literary scene of Punjab. The emergence of this genre introduced a significant secular trend in the literary writings. This qissa was composed in Davyya chhanda, one of the most popular chhandas of Punjabi poetry. Some of the literary devices and narrative motifs used by Damodar set the traditional pattern for other writers in this genre. The Indian poetic convention of 'manglacharan', used by Damodar, was followed even by the Muslim qissa poets like Waris Shah. The ideal of romantic love is projected in this as well as other qissas by the poets coming after Damodar, viz, Pilloo, Hafiz, Ahmad, Muqbal, Waris, Hassam and others. Apart from Heer Ranjha, the most popular qissa composition, many more qissas based on the legends of Sassi Punnu, Puran Bhagat, Raja Risalu, Mirza Sahiban, Sohani Mahiwal, Saiful Muluk, Yusaf Zulaikha have been composed.

Whereas the qissa of Heer Ranjha, Mirza Sahiban and Sohni Mahiwal express the revolt of the individual against the decadent feudal social system, the qissas like Puran Bhagat symbolically represent man's spiritual struggle against the mundane existence. The ideal of 'Jog' (Yog) upheld in this Qissa is equally matched by 'Raj' and 'Bhog', the ideal of worldly power and despair, in Raja Risalu. Puran and Risalu are brothers having one father but different mothers. They represent the two dominant trends of Punjabi psyche, expressing the ideals of saint, soldier and lover in their respective manifestations.

From the 16th century, we have an unbroken history of this genre even up to the modern period. Damodar, Pilloo, Ahmad and Hafiz are the major qissa poets of the 16th and 17th centuries, marking the first stage of development of this genre. In the 18th century Muqbal, Hamid and Waris Shah emerged on the qissa scene enriching this genre in every respect. Waris Shah alone is such a towering figure that the genre achieves its peak of glory in his Heer.

After Waris came Hassam, Kadaryar, Ahmadyar, Fazal Shah, who flourished during the reign of Maharaja Ranjit Singh and contributed some of the famous qissas to Punjabi, like Sassi by Hassam, Puran Bhagat by Kadaryar and Sohni by Fazal Shah

In the modern age of Punjabi literature starting from 1850, some of the notable qissa writings have appeared extending the history of this genre from the medieval to the modern period; but in the recent times the genre has not shown any sign of a revival.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Punjabi Sahit Kosh (Punjab University, 1971); Punjabi Sahit da ithas (Patiala).

Jag.S.

QISSA-E-MEHR AFROZ-O-DILBAR (Urdu), the narrative, meaning heart-captivating beloved of a handsome youth, had a chequered career. Its manuscript lay in the Gwalior Dargah of Hazratji who handed it over to Agha Hyder Hasan Dehlir of Nizam College, Hyderabad. Agha Hyder Hasan somehow failed to realise its importance. Rafia Sultana, who was then working on the topic, Urdu nasar ka aaghaz-o-irtiqa unnesvin sadi se pehle (Evolution of Urdu prose before the nineteenth century), chanced upon this narrative, but unfortunately she too could not realise its significance. Mas'ud Husain Khan, taking the manuscript from the personal library of Agha Hyder Hasan, brought it out with a useful preface in 1966. Relying on the internal evidence, he opined that the narrative might have been written between 1731 and 1759. Gianchand was also of the view that the narrative belonged to the period around mid-eighteenth century. In Urdu circles the author, Isa Khan, remained almost an enigmatic writer until Prakash 'Monis', ransacking Urdu and Hindi libraries, came upon materials needed for doing a book, Urdu adab par Hindi adab ka asar (Impact of Hindi literature on Urdu literature, 1978). In the opinion of Prakash 'Monis', Isa Khan, who wrote commentaries on Bihari's Satsai, both in Hindi and in Urdu, completed Qissa-e-Mehr Afroz-o-Dilbar around 1752.

The language and lay-out of the narrative bear eloquent testimony to the fact that the writer was immensely influenced by Hindu mythology. The ruler of Ishqabad took to asceticism in despair for not having an heir. He chanced to meet a hermit, Arzobakhsh, who, taking pity upon the former ruler, prayed for the birth of a child to him. The king was consequently blessed with a son. The son, named Mehr Afroz, grew up into a handsome and healthy youth. One day Mehr Afroz alongwith his friend, son of the minister, strayed into a fairy garden where he took a fancy to the fairy princess, Dilwar. She disappeared as soon as she saw the prince. Woebegone, the love-smitten prince Mehr Afroz, assisted by his friend, started journeying far and wide, unmindful of trials and tribulations of tramping over vast distances. By chance they found themselves in a jungle ruled by a monkey-king, who was kind enought to command a monkey to guide them out of the dense jungle. Proceeding a little farther, they came across the fakir, Arzobakhsh, who gave the prince a disc (chakra) which, when hurled, could chop off the head of any demon, his strength notwithstanding. In the process of their onward journey, the prince and his companion were kidnapped by a demon and a demoness respectively. The wazir's son was hung upside down by the demoness. His screams brought the demon-princess, Gul Rukh, on the scene, who falling instantly in love with the youth, freed him, and desired to marry him. He refused to accept the proposal till such time as the prince Mehr Afroz was freed from captivity. Mehr Afroz was also released, and with the help of Gul Rukh's mother, the fairy Dilwar, too, was brought there. Mehr Afroz married his lady-love. The marriage did not turn out to be an unmixed blessing. One demoness, wresting the soul of the prince, took it away. Sorrow-smitten Dilwar was on the point of committing suicide when the king of China, Nazm Alam, metamorphosed into a parrot, informed Dilwar as to how Mehr Afroz's soul had been taken away. According to the parrot's advice, the bed of Mehr Afroz was put beneath a tree. The demoness came every night; she revived Mehr Afroz to life at night and left him soulless around the morning. Dilwar and Gul Rukh now set out in search of fakir, Arzobakhsh. On their way they were overtaken by a demon, who kidnapped Dilwar leaving Gul Rukh all alone. In short, the saint Arzobakhsh had Mehr Afroz released from the demoness and Dilwar from her captivity; the parrot was once again restored to his former self, Nazm Alam, the king of China. The story, thus, ends on a happy note. Mehr Afroz and his wife Dilwar, Wazir's son and his wife Gul Rukh, and Nazam Alam, all got back to peace and prosperity.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Prakash 'Monis' has thrown a flood of light on the Hindu influences in the story. Chakra (disc), fairies, parrot, monkey-king and such other characters have been derived from Hindu mythological sources. The author, Isa Khan, had an appreciable command of Hindi as well as Urdu; he was also well-versed in Hindu mythology. His writings may well be regarded as a significant milestone in the evolution of the Urdu and Hindi prose. Isa Khan belonged to some place in the Brajbhasha region.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Isa Khan, Ras Chandrika (Manuscript, Hindi Sahitya Sammelan Library, Allahabad.); Mas'ud Husain Khan (ed.), Qissa-e-Mehr Afroz-o-Dilbar (Delhi, 1966); Prakash 'Monis', Urdu adab par Hindi adab ka asar (Allahabad, 1978); Raghubar Dayal Rastogi, Hindi gadya ka vikas (Bareilly, 1917).

T.R.

QURAN (Urdu). According to the Muslim belief, the word of Allah was revealed to his final messenger Mohammad (AD 569-632). The word 'Quran' of Aramaic origin first occurs in sura al-Muzzammil (LXXIII:4), third in order of revelation, and is found at 66 places in the book, of which other names are al-Furgan (I:5), al-Kitab (II:2), al-Dhikr (XLIII:44), besides about 53 other adjectives. Some scholars have counted more than 90 names of the Quran.

The basis of the Quran is on 'Wahi', i.e. revelation which is direct communication from Allah through the Archangel Gabriel. The mode and concept of Wahi have been thoroughly discussed by some scholars (Shah Waliullah: Hujjat-ullah al-Baligha, M. Hamidullah: Mohammad Rasulullah).

The first revelation : "Read ! in the name of thy Lord who createth, Createth man from a clot. Read! And thy Lord is the Most Bounteous, Who teacheth by the pen." (XCVI: 1-4) marks the advent of a new era and beginning of a most significant chapter in human history when Mohammad was awakened to his position of prophethood. It was also the starting point of the multifarious and reverberatingly influential role of Islam.

The revelation started on 17th Ramadan (41 years after the birth of the Prophet, AD 609). For 12 years 5 months and 13 days it descended in Makkah (Mecca), i.e. up to the 1st of Rabi-I, 54 years after the birth of the Prophet. From this date till 9th of Dhul Hijja, 63 years after the birth of the Prophet, it belongs to Medina. The last revealed verse of the Quran, according to some scholars, is: "This day have I perfected your religion for you and completed My favour unto you, and have chosen for you as religion al-Islam." (V:3)

According to its chronology of descent, the Quran is divided into two portions: Makka and Madani. The Makkan portion consists of 86 'suras' (chapters) which mostly contain the subjects of 'tauhid' (unity of Allah), 'ibadat' (prayers), 'qayamat' (the day of judgement), 'ba'th ba'd al-maut' (resurrection), 'jaza' and 'saza' (reward and punishment), Hell and Heaven, and universal principles of social behaviour. The Medinite portion of the Quran constitutes 11/30 of the book, and 28 suras are revealed there.

The Quran is also divided into seven 'manzils' (stations), thirty paras (fragments) and 114 suras (chapters). The entire book has 6218 'ayas' (verses), 77437 words and 323671 letters. There are 14 'muqatta'at' (shredded letters) the meanings of which were best known to the Prophet. The commentators have further divided the verses of the Quran according to their purport into 'muhkamat' (exact) and 'mutashabihat' (obscure).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

QURAN

There are universally received principles of the recitation of the Quran and the art of recitation is called 'qira'at' or 'tajwid', the reciter is 'qari', 'muqri' or 'mujawwid'. Those who learn the whole of the Quran by heart (they are over ten million in the world) are called 'hafiz, (preserver). The commentators are known as 'mufassir' and its exegesis is called 'tafsir'. The Quran is recited in seven lections.

The Quran has been preserved from the very first day of its descent with scrupulous methods. The Prophet and his companions used to recite the Quranic verses in their daily prayers. Some of the companions like Abdullah b. Mas'ud (d. AD 652) had also committed the suras of the Quran to writing on parchments, bones, wooden plates, thin tanned skins, etc. Preservation of the Quran through memorizing and writing since the very beginning is also proved by internal evidences, e.g. "But it is clear revelations in the hearts of those who have been given knowledge, and none deny our revelations save wrong-doers" (XXIX: 49), and "By the Mount, And a Scripture inscribed. on fine parchment unrolled (LII: 2-3)".

Abu Bakr, the first Caliph, (d. AD 634) also collected the verses and chapters of the Quran and his successor, Umar b. al-Khattab, the second Caliph, (d. AD 643) continued the practice. This edition remained with Hafasa, daughter of Umar, until Uthman b. Affan, the third Caliph (AD 655) appointed a board of editors to prepare a final and authentic version of the Quran. During the Prophet's life-time, his companions used to scribe the revelations. Among his prominent scribes were Zaid b. Thabit, Ali b. Abi Talib, Khalid b. al-Walid, Abdullah b. Rawaha, Mu'awiya b. Abi Sufyan, etc. According to al-Tabari, there were about 42 such companions who used to write down the Quran by order of the Prophet. When about 700 preservers of the Quran were martyred in the battle of Yamuna, fighting against Banu Hanifa (Fariq K.A. : Kitab al-Riddah), Umar justly apprehended that the Quran might also perish with the fighting soldiers, who were also its preservers. He spoke out his mind to Abu Bakr and advised him to take up the task of its compilation. At first Abu Bakr did not agree to do something that was not done by the Prophet in a formal manner, but later he realized the far-reaching benefits of the proposal. Umar, during his caliphate, made an announcement that anyone in possession of any part of the Quran, whether complete or incomplete, should hand it over to him. Having obtained all available copies of the Quran, the task of preparing a ne varietur text was undertaken. Whatever was found in writing or recited orally, was first attested to by two witnesses on oath. It was decided that wherever variae lectiones were to be found in the Quran, the idiom of Quraish will be opted, as the book had been sent in their dialect. When the edition got prepared. Umar took it into his care and trust. After his death, it was with Hafasa, who was conversant with reading and writing. During the caliphate of Uthman, the rule of Islam had crossed the boundaries of Arabia and reached the farthest corners of the non-Arab countries. Now with the variations in elocution, the very words of the Quran began to be read quite differently because of varied accents and modulations of the non-Arabs. Uthman felt the imperative need of the textus receptus to be officially circulated in all provinces. Hudhaifa b. al-Yaman had taken part in the battle of Armenia and Adharbaijan in Central Asia and had seen there people of Iran and Syria reciting the Quran with wrong modulations and incorrect accents. He told Uthman that he was afraid that the Muslims would also garble the Quran like the scriptures of other peoples. Uthman, following his recommendations, instituted the Board of Editors consisting of Zaid b. Thabit (d. AD 665), Abdullah b. al-Zubair, Said b. al-'As and Abdal-Rahman b. al-Harith. They compiled the present version of the Quran with utmost care and prudence. Muslim scholars believe that the existing order of the Quran is in perfect accord with the will of the Prophet (Ibn Sa'd: Tabaqat V: 510-511). Since the chapter entitled 'Repentence' was sent out during his last days, and the Prophet had not directed where to insert it in the Quran, its subject matter was found in consonance with the chapter of 'spoils' and so it was appended to it.

Uthman got seven copies of this official version scribed in AD 646 and one copy each was despatched to all regional centres along with a letter to governors directing them to destroy all other editions. His own copy was known as Mus'haf-e-Imam. Ibn Fazlullah al-Umari had seen one of these copies in Damascus mosque (Masalik al-Absar I: 195). Ibn Bututa also saw it in Damascus and he mentions the existence of another similar copy in Kufa. According to him, the Damascus manuscript had been burnt during the seige of the city by Timur, but the latter had taken another copy from Basra with him. It was, perhaps, this manuscript which remained with the family of Khwaja Ubaidullah Ahrar till 1869 in Madrasa Diwan Begi at Samarkent (U.S.S.R.). They used to exhibit the same on special occasions and people used to throng from all corners to have a look at it. According to common belief, it was the same copy which Uthman, the third Caliph, was reading when he was assassinated (AD 656). It is said that the verse "And if they believe in the like of that in which ye believe then are they rightly guided. But if they turn away, then are they in schism, and Allah will suffice thee (for defence) against them" (II: 137) was stained with the Caliph's blood when he was murdered. The same copy, written on gazelle hide in old Kufic script is now preserved in the Museum of History at Tashkent.

As for the script of the Quran, the first model of Arabic script was derived from Egyptian Demotic which came to the Peninsula through commercial contacts between the Phoenicians and the Egyptians. The Arabic script adopted 15 letters from the Demotic; then it was influenced by Aramaic and Musnad scripts. The Arab and the European scholars differ on this point. According to the Orientalists, the Arabic script has two ramifications: Kufic, which is derived from Syriac and Naskhi, i.e. influenced by Nabateans. The Arab scholars, however, hold that the Arabic script came from Hira and Anbar (30 miles west of Baghdad). In Mecca it was introduced by Harb b. Umayya b. Adb Shams, who had learnt it from Bishr b. Adb al-Malik, brother of Ukaidir, the ruler of Dumat al-Jandal. The Quran was first scribed in this Kufic script which was free from vowel points and dots. Later, the marking of 'ayas' was made by the first Arabic grammarian, Abual-Aswad al-Dauli, and other punctuations were introduced by al-Sajawandi (d. circa 1164). During the last 1400 years several million copies of the Quran have been scribed. The Institute of Quranic studies at the Muncheu University had collected 42000 complete and incomplete manuscripts of the Quran, and after 50 years of rigorous research on its text, it was concluded that no significant variation was found in their texts. This Institute was razed to the ground during World War II.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Quran reached Europe via Spain and was first translated by Robert Kennett in 1143. Some other notable translators are: Bibliander (1543), Hincklemann (1594), Marrachi (1598), Arbanius (Leiden, 1613), Anclement Abraham (Hamburg, 1694), Galland Antoin (Paris, before 1715), George Sale (Ceo Salee, 1734), Casi Meresgni (1840), Gustave Flugel (1842), Noeldeke (Goetingen, 1860), Berthetemy St. Hilaire (Paris, 1865). Palmer (d. 1883), Fleisher (d. 1888), Savary and William Nassav Less, Rodwell, A.J. Arbery, T.F. Mickel and Marmaduke Pickthal are also prominent among those who produced notable works on the Quran.

In India, the Quran must have reached the western coast with the adventurous Arab sailors. It definitely came to the northern part of this country with the army of Mohammad bin Qasim (AD 712). Since then Muslim scholars have contributed copiously on the subjects of Quran. The first Indian translation of the Quran is attributed to Raja Mehruka of Kashmir, who is reported to have written a letter to Abdullah bin Umar, the governor of Sindh, in AD 883 asking him to depute someone who could interpret Islamic teachings in an Indian language. The Governor deputed a scholar who had translated the Quran in an Indian language (Sanskrit or Kashmiri dialect) up to sura XXXVI. Among the distinguished commentators and translators of the Quran in India are Qazi Shihabuddin Daulatabadi (d. 1445), Ali bin Ahmad al-Mahaimi (d. 1431), Syed Mohammad Gesu Daraz (d. 1421), Sheikh Mubarak Nagauri (d. 1593), Sheikh Faizi, Sheikh NIzamuddin Thanesari (d. 1626), Shah Waliullah of Delhi (d. 1762), Shah Abd al-Qadir (d. 1814), Shah Rafiuddin (d. 1817), Shah Abd al-Aziz (d. 1823), Fateh Mohammad of Jullunder (d. 1915), Ahmad Ali of Lahore (d. 1962), Ashraf Ali Thanvi (d. 1943), Mahmood Hassan Deobandi (d. 1920), Maulana Abdul Kalam Azad, Abul Ala al-Maududi (d. 1978), to name only a few out of several hundred scholars.

Syed Ahmad Khan (d. 1898), Hakim Mohammad Hassan of Amroha (d. 1905), Syed Amir Ali, Deputy Nazir Ahmad (d. 1908), Thana-ullah of Amritsar and Khwaja Hasan Nizami of Delhi (d. 1957), Ahmad Raza Khan of Bareilly and Abdul Majid Daryabadi are among those who have enriched the subject through their scholarly works.

In other Indian languages the translations and exegesis of the Quran can be gauged with the help of the following very brief list:

Telugu: Narain Rao, Venkata Raman, Abdul Ghafoor Karnooli (Vijayawada, 1663); Sanskrit: H. Gundu Rao (Kanpur, 1897); Gurmukhi: Sheikh Mohammad Yusuf (Qadiyan); Bengali : Girishchandra Sen (Calcutta, 1882), Gold Siek (Calcutta, 1908). Na'imuddin Madhu Mian (1901). Kannada: Ashraf Ali Thanvi (16 chapters, 1966). Sindhi: Azizullah (Bombay, 1875), Mohammad Siddique Abdur Rahman (Bombay, 1879). Punjabi: Tafseer-e-Mohammadi by Hafiz M. Mubarakullah (1872), Hidayatullah Ghilzai (Lahore, 1887), Shamsuddin Bukhari (Amritsar, 1894), Firozuddin (Amritsar, 1903). Marathi: Hakim Sufi Mir Yaqub Khan. Tamil: Islamic publishing House, Bangalore. Malayalam: S.N. Krishna Rao (Cochin), C.N. Ahmad Molvi (Calicut). Gujarati: Abdul Qadir bin Luqman (1879), Abdur Rashid (1893), Mohmmad Isfahani (1900), Ghulam Ali (1903).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Abdul Latif, Tarikh al-Quran (Hyderabad, 1919); Abdul Latif Rahmani, Tarikh ul-Quran (Monghyr, 1925); Abdus Samad Sarim, Tarikh ul-Quran (Lahore, (1980); Aslam Jairajpuri, Tarikh ul-Quran (Delhi, 1923); Ghulam Rabbani, Tadween-e-Quran (Delhi, 1956); Ignaz Goldziher, Mohammadanischen Studien, 2 vols. (Halle, 1889-90); Jalaluddin Suyuti, al-Itqan fi ulum al-Quran (Arabic) (reprint Lahore, 1980); John Burton, The Compilation of the Quran (Cambridge University Press, 1977); Khalilur Rahman, Tartib-e-Quran (Lahore 1943); Mohammad Ali Lahori, Jama'ul-Quran (Agra, 1917); Mohammad Wasim Bihari, Tarikh Jama'ul-Quran (Hyderabad Sindh, 1952); R. Bell, Introduction to the Quran (Edinburgh, 1953); Shahabi, Ma'lumat-e-Quran (Delhi, 1933); Subhi Salih; Ulum-al-Quran (Arabic) (Beirut, 1956).

N.A.F

QURRATULAIN HYDER (Urdu)
see under Hyder Qurratulain

R

RADHAKRISHNA SARMA, CHALLA (Telugu; b. 1929) had his M.A., Ph.D. and M. Litt. degrees from Madras University, and is a trilingual writer. In Telugu, Tamil and English he has published more than fifty books, in such genres as poetry, drama, essay, criticism, biography, etc. He has also translated many books into Telugu and Tamil. Some of his famous works are: Vyasa manjusha (Historical essays, 1960), Jayinchina janata (Poetry, 1972), The Ramayana in Telugu and Tamil (A comparative study, 1973) and Telugu and Southern Languages (Research work, 1975). Sarma has also compiled a pictorial dictionary and written many biographical sketches, songs and essays for children. Some of his writings have been translated into Tamil, Malayalam, Marathi, Hindi and English.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Being influenced by Marcus Aurelius and Valmiki, he believes in the fusion of the eastern and western cultures. He started writing in classical Telugu, but slowly emerged into a champion of the spoken idiom. He represented the Sahitya Akademi at the forty-ninth conference of the U.A.I. held in Munich in 1975. Sarma also worked as Regional Secretary of the Sahitya Akademi, Madras, from 1969 to 1981. He has also worked as Professor and Head of the Department of Telugu at the Madurai Kamaraj University, Madurai.

P.S.M.

RADHAKRISHNADAS (Hindi; b. 1865, d. 1907). Younger cousin of Bharatendu Harishchandra, Radhakrishna lost his father in his childhood and was brought up under the guardianship of Bharatendu who was his elder by fifteen years. It was in his company and through his inspiration that Radhakrishna developed interest in Hindi language and literature. A versatile litterateur, he enriched Hindi with his novels, dramas, essays, biographies and poems. Besides completing the drama Sati pratap left incomplete by Bharatendu, he wrote a social drama Dukhini bala (1880) in which he criticised the social evils, especially those related to marriage. Besides, he wrote such historical dramas as Maharani Padmavati (1893) and Maharana Pratap (1897). His historical novels are based on well-known historical episodes and personalities. History and legend, fact and fiction, romance and chivalry are so nicely intertwined in these works that they catch the fancy of the reader. His Nissahaya Hindu (1980) is considered the first political novel in Hindi. It deals with the bigotry of foreign Christian missions and the practice of cow-slaughter. His poems, mainly full of patriotic feelings and bhakti, have been collected and published along with his other works in Radhakrishna granthavali.

As a person fully dedicated to the service of Hindi, Radhakrishnadas organized the research-wing of the Kashi Nagari Pracharini Sabha, edited the Nagari Pracharini patrika and helped in the regular publication of another reputed Hindi journal, Saraswati. He was also the first President of the Nagari Pracharini Sabha and worked for the cause of Hindi.

Gov.R.

RADHAKRISHNAN, C. (Malayalam; b. 1939) was born at Chamravattam near Thiroor in central Kerala. He had his university education in Calicut and Palghat. He was enrolled as a postgraduate student of Applied Physics in Victoria College, Palghat, but before completing the course, he accepted the post of Scientific Assistant in the Astrophysical Observatory at Kodaikanal in 1961. After working there and at Pune for a period of four years, he resigned the post to become the Senior Sub-editor of Science Today, a journal managed by the Times of India group. He left this job too and settled in Cochin, choosing to be a full-time writer and a freelance journalist.

As a writer, Radhakrishnan sprang to fame when the script of his first novel, Nizhalppadukal (In the shadows), was adjudged to be the best in the novel competition conducted by the Mathrubhumi Weekly and serialized in its pages. Its subsequent publication in the book form won him the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award. Almost all the novels written by him subsequently were first serialized in the periodicals before their publication in a book-form.

Apart from Nizhalppadukal, Radhakrishnan has written twenty-three novels. Puzha muthal puzha vare (From the river to the river), Pullippulikalum vellinakshathrangalum (Leopards and silver stars) and Spandamapinikale nandi (Farewell to seismograph) are three of the more notable among them. The last won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1988.

One of the common features of most of his novels, true to his grounding in science and his rational outlook, is that his characters present a world of disgruntled scientists and technologists working in research centres and laboratories. A few of his novels like Swapna parampara (A series of dreams) illustrate his ability to keep abreast of the times in dealing with material relating to mental aberrations such as schizophrenia. Perhaps, the quintessence of what Radhakrishnan learned from his observation of contemporary society is expressed in the following words in the preface to his latest novel Ivide ellavarkum sukham thanne (1988): "There is no one who has not got either the ability to see the right path or the freedom to go along it. All that is required is the courage to regard discomforts and losses as negligible." Another important feature of his novels is that many of characters are non-Keralites.

Radhakrishnan's other works include four collections of short-stories, a play, a collection of poems, a travelogue and three books on science.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.P. Sreedharan, Innatte sahityakaranmar.

K.S.N.

RADHAKRISHNAN, SARVEPALLI (English; b. 1888, d. 1975). Philosopher, educationist, statesman, Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan was born in a Brahmin family of modest means and had his education at Tiruttani, his birth-place, and at Vellore and Madras, and taught philosophy at Madras, Mysore and Calcutta (where he was King George V Professor of Philosophy). His classic history of Indian philosophy appeared in two volumes (1923, 1927), and was admired for its 'form and matter, expository brilliance and estimative fact, textual correlations and technical elucidations.' He gave the Bampton, Haskell, Kamala, Miller and Upton Lectures at various centres of learning in India and abroad, as also the British Academy Lecture on the Buddha. An Idealist View of Life (his Hibbert Lectures) was perhaps his most constructive contribution to philosophy. Radhakrishnan's wide-ranging contacts with the west made him, in C.E.M. Joad's words, 'the liasion officer' (or bridge-builder) between the East and the West. In his writings and lectures, he often recalled how Hinduism in the past reformed itself under the impact of Islam and Christianity, and urged the need for such constant revaluations. He urged that Hinduism should be emphatic in its denunciation of imperfect conceptions of God and worship, and should also democratise its institutions, doing away with dogmas, inequalitis and inequlities, thereby releasing the soul of Hinduism from its temporary bondage to trivialities and prejudices. He became Vice-Chancellor of Andhra University in 1931 and of Banaras Hindu University in 1937, and Spalding Professor at Oxford in 1939. After the coming of Independence, he was appointed India's Ambassador to the USSR in 1948, and was elected Vice-President of India in 1952 and again in 1957, and President of India in 1962. He translated the Gita, the Brahma sutras and the principal Upanishads, also the Dhammapada, into sensitive English, and his lectures and miscellaneous writings were collected into many volumes. He was also Vice-President, and later President, of Sahitya Akademi and helped shape its policies and programmes. After his term as President of India, he retired to Madras in 1967, won the Templeton Award in 1974, and had a peaceful end a year later. As thinker and writer, as educationist and statesman, Radhakrishnan was one of the leading lights of his time, and will have his secure place in the history of modern India.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His major works include: Indian Philosophy (1923 and 1927), The Hindu View of Life (1932), An Idealist View of Life (1932), Eastern Religions and Western Thought (1939).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, Indian Writing in English (1973).

K.R.S.I.

RADHAVIRAHA (Maithili) is an epic in Maithili which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1970. The author Kashikant Mishra 'Madhupa' (1906-1987) has taken its theme from Srimadbhagavata, Harivamsha and Brahmavaivartapurana. The well-known story of Radha and Krishna is here a bit twisted for giving novelty and relevance to the modern weltanschauung by projecting Radha as Bhuvaneshvari, the goddess of universal welfare.

The work is remarkable for its sophisticated rhetoric and poetic craftsmanship. It is rich in Sanskritised poetic diction and conventional imagery, elaborate descriptions and display of a kind of paronomasia, known in Sanskrit as 'yamaka'. It has three distinct styles—descriptive, narrative and emotional, and they are successively displayed in the beginning, the middle and the last portions. The first style is reminiscent of Magha and Shriharsha, the second of Vyasa and the last of Surdas and Vidyapati. The descriptive portion appears to be the tour de force of the poet's intellect, while the last portion is the spontaneous overflow of feeling aptly couched in the form of lyric. Such a style is addressed by a pandit and is meant for pandits; naturally others may find it cumbersome in diction, extravagant in figures of speech (especially yamaka), stale in thought and narrow in outlook. The only contemporary relevance of the work is the heightened treatment of womanhood befitting the modern movement for the emancipation of women.

Go.J.

RADHEYSHYAM 'KATHAVACHAK' (Hindi; b. 1890, d. 1965) was born at Bareilly (U.P.). He was attracted towards music and drama at an early age. His father was fond of music and patronised musicians, especially those who sang devotional songs. Brought up in the atmosphere of devotional music, the child soon learned singing. At eight he happened to see dramas staged by the New Alfred Company and took a fancy for their songs and dialogues, imitating the style and tune of those plays. In those days verse was used in most of the dialogues, and almost all the actors on the stage spoke in high pitched rhymed verses. The main aim of the producer was to earn money by providing cheap entertainment to the audience. Having been brought up in a religious atmosphere, Radheyshyam reacted sharply to this vulgar situation and vowed to transform both the subject-matter and the style of the Parsi theatre through his plays. He wrote on either mythological or historical subjects and aimed at moral education and social reform. Another laudable effort he made was to refine the taste of the audience by gradually removing unnatural and improbable scenes from the plays.

Vir Abhimanyu was his first drama staged in 1914 by the New Alfred Company. Full of pathos and heroic sentiment, it became very popular, and Radheyshyam soon won the hearts of his audience. As melodramatic element in the plays still persisted, he had to compromise on that account in his effort to write plays full of idealism and moral values.

His dramas did not shun verse in dialogue, and scenes of mirth and sadness alternated in a play. His language is

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Hindustani—mixture of Hindi and Urdu. A playwright of the Dwivedi era, he wrote about two dozen plays.

Besides writing plays for the stage, he used to recite the story of Rama in his own melodious style which swayed the audience for a long time.

His important works include: Shravana Kumar, Bal Krishna, Ishvar bhakti, Bhakta Prahlad, Rukmini-mangal, Usha Aniruddha, Draupadi-swayamvar, Bhagvan Shrikrishna, Shanti ke dut, Shakuntala, Mashriqui hur, Krishna Sudama, Bharat Mata and Maharshi Valmiki.

Vi.S.

RADHIKARAMAN PRASAD SINGH, RAJA (Hindi; b.1890, d. 1971) was born in a highly respectable family of Suryapura, Shahabad, Bihar. With the publication of his very first story 'Kanon mein kangana' in the well-known magazine, Indu, he came into limelight in 1913. He belonged to the school of Jaishankar Prasad and all his prose works—novels, short stories, dramas, memoirs—are suffused with idealism and are rich in emotional content influenced by the social, political, economic and religious events of his age. Imbued with traditional moral values, the zeal of a social reformer and Gandhian ideology, he prescribed such solutions to the problems he dealt with as may appear impractical today but were greatly appreciated when he wrote his works. The problems taken up were Hindu-Muslim conflict, untouchability, injustice to women, repressive administration and economic disparity in society.

The canvas of Raja Radhikaraman's works is wide, and consequently he picked up characters from different classes and strata of society. Most of them are representative characters having virtues and vices, generally typical of the people of those classes. Most of his works end up with the victory of virtue over wickedness and injustice. Later, however, he showed a much sharper awareness of the harsh facts of life, and a few of his stories like 'Pad ka mada' are realistic. Though he was not a student of psychoanalysis, his insight into human mind enabled him to probe the psyche of his characters, and therefore in spite of their idealism, his men and women look quite human.

The form and technique of his novels and short stories are traditional. The plot develops with the help of events, dialogues and descriptive passages. The language is simple and there is flow in the narration. Like many other writers of his school he resorted to direct criticism of the evils and recommended social reforms.

He was honoured with 'Padma Bhushan' by the President of India in 1962 and received the honorary degree of 'Sahitya Vachaspati' from All India Hindi Sahitya Sammelan in 1970. He was also given the degree of D.Litt (honoris causa) by Magadh University in 1969.

His works include: Short stories: Galpa kusumanjali (1911-12), Gandhi topi (1938), Savni saman (1938); Novels: Ram-Rahim (1936), Purusha aur nari (1939), Surdas (1942), Chumban aur chanta (1957); Memoirs: Tuta tara (1941).

S.S.G.

RAFI, PONJIKKARA (Malayalam; b. 1924) was born in the island of Ponjikkara. After attending St. Albert's High School at Ernakulam for a couple of years, he joined a vocational school to get trained in carpentry, according to the wishes of his father who was himself a carpenter, but his interests lay elsewhere. He began to contribute short stories to periodicals and later became the co-editor of some weeklies. In 1962, he was appointed in the Sahitya Pravarthaka Co-operative Society, Kottayam. In 1966, he became the Secretary of Sahitya Parishat.

Rafi is a short-story writer, novelist and playwright and has to his credit about twenty published works belonging to the different genres. He is a progressive writer handling mainly three types of themes, viz. poverty, predicament of labourers, and the hollowness of religion and religious institutions. His Papikal (The sinners) raised a storm of protest from the Catholics. Even in his proletarian writing there is something of permanent artistic value. Later, he rose to a much higher level of thinking on the basis of experience and imagination. His other works include Karutha blouse (The black blouse). Full-time kamukan (Full-time lover) and Mathai Master (A drama).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.P. Sreedharan, Innatte sahityakaranmar (1914)

K.S.N.

RAG DARBARI (Hindi) is the best known of Shrilal Shukla's novels and was picked up for the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1969. It has since been dramatized and staged also.

The novel, as the title reflects, is a scathing satire on the corruption, the petty politicking and the all-pervading cynicism that have gradually been engulfing the Indian villages since Independence. The hero (if he could be called a hero) of the novel is a young student, who still cherishes a few romantic illusions about the idyllic rural life and is visiting his uncle for a short while. The naked play of greed and violence that he sees here, and the various close encounters with the village hoodlums shatter all his illusions, and he returns to the city a sadder through wiser man.

The novel, which was begun in 1960, was published in 1968, and was immediately hailed by readers and critics as a major study of the decadence of Indian rural life. Although the tone is satirical, the novel is not a mere parody of reality. Shukla makes a clever use of various registers and stylistic variations of speech, from the rural idiom of Kusahar and his son to the mingled speech patterns of the more literate members of the village like the Headmaster. Gandhian phrases too are used copiously, but their clever use by the political leaders and their touts gives them a hollow and pathetic ring. Langad, the little man who challenges the system, dies protesting, and although his unswerving honesty moves us, we also realize that his kind of lonely crusading will bear no results in a set-up like this. Some critics have found the cynicism of the book a little too nihilistic and the satire too subjective, but notwithstanding the occasional harshness of the indictment, the writer's basic concern for his people and his deep longing for a stable and clean system are clearly visible all through, and this is what gives the novel an immediacy and emotional appeal which few can deny.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

M. P.

RAGA VAISHAKHI (Telugu) by Boyi Bhimanna is a poetical work in the form of belles-lettres on the theme of love—a work of its own kind in Telugu. It was first published in 1966 and took its readers by surprise because of the uninhibited expression of love. Some critics even held the book obscene and vulgar.

Bhimanna, however, regarded love as a supreme sentiment and based it on his philosophy of 'Rasadvaita'. He extols woman as the personification of love and compassion. There is no 'shringara' without her, and no 'rasa' without shringara, and no sentience and life without rasa.

The book is divided into ten chapters, and treats love in successive seasons from 'Shravani' onwards to 'Vaisakha'. The description of seasons is beautiful and the treatment of love endearing. The style throughout is quite engaging.

K.R.R.

RAGALE (Kannada) is a fairly well-known 'matra' metre in Kannada in vogue from about the tenth century onwards. Of late the name and origin of this metre have become a matter of discussion.

Ragale and its another form 'raghata' appear as Kannada and Sanskrit forms respectively for the first time in Chhandombudhi, a Kannada work on prosody by Nagavarma (c. 990). But in none of the Sanskrit works on prosody is either the name raghata, or its definitions found, except in Chhandonushasana, a prosodic work by Jayakirti (c. 1050); it is possible that he has taken it from Nagavarma.

Various conjectures have been put forth, for example, raghata is the Sanskritised form of ragale; raghata and ragale are the variations of the Sanskrit word 'araghatta'; raghata and ragale are the variations of 'gharatta' of Sanskrit, meaning the millstone; ragale is the 'tatbhava' (derived) form of the word raghata in the metric form named 'ragada dhruvaka' of the Prakrit origin. But no final decision is possible. However, it may be said that ragale is not any particular verse type, but it is a verse constituent with varied numbers of lines and types of matra-ganas.

The origin of ragale is also a subject of controversy. A doubt had been expressed in the beginning whether this metre belonged to 'amsa' metric type. But when it was noticed that Jayakirti has indicated that raghata is like 'paddhati', a new light was thrown on its origin.

A few scholars also feel that at least a few types of ragales in Kannada literature have either originated from or composed in imitation of similar compositions in folk literature.

A few types of ragale have been used by champu poets like Pampa, Ponna, Ranna, Nagavarma (I), Durgasimha, Shantinatha and Nayasena during the tenth, eleventh and twelfh centuries. For describing the towns, marriage, feminine beauty, etc., as also for praising Jina, ragale is the main vehicle. Imitation of the 'kadavakas' of Apabhramsha and independent contrivances have worked together to make the Kannada ragales more beautiful and lively. Though there is not much of novelty in the subject-matter, in style it blends the profundity of 'marga' and the charm of 'deshi'. This metre with its rhythm has introduced into Kannada the rhythm and resonance of the 'tala vrittas' of Prakrit.

There are examples of various ragales in the champu works of later poets like Nemichandra, Rudrabhatta, Aggala, Achanna, Bandhuvarma, Andayyâ, Janna, Devakavi, Gunavarma (II), Ratta, etc. in the chronological order. These belonged to the period between the twelfth and fourteenth centuries. In the compositions of Nemichandra and Janna the grandeur in the choice of subject and mellifluous texture of words are evident. Bandhuvarma's compositions are mainly noteworthy for their typical construction of 'ganas' and rhymes. All these champu poets have generally used ragale for descriptions, but Bandhuvarma has also used it for narration.

Among the poets of the Middle Kannada period, Harihara is mainly responsible for the wide use of the ragale metre. He stands out by his use of this metre for an entire work. For this reason, he became the founder of a new genre in poetry. Recognizing the peculiar adaptability of ragale for narrative works he made it his chief metre. As a result, more than fifty works were composed by him in ragale, all of them extolling the greatness of Shiva or dealing with the stories of Shaiva devotees.

From the point of view of prosody the ragales of Harihara are of three kinds, viz. utsaha, lalita and mandanila. It was during his time that these three types became distinctive. According to the needs of the subject, the number of lines of the ragales increased indefinitely. The system of using rhymes both at the beginning and at the end became established. In regale, definite scansion of ganas, even to the extent of creating monotony, runs unabated. Knowing, probably, this weakness of the metre, Harihara used the ragale lines throughout the work only when the story was short, while for the longer ones he used both ragale and prose alternately, thus blending them cleverly.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Basavaraja devara ragale, Nambiyannana ragale, Pushpa ragale are some of the popular ragale works of this poet.

After Harihara, a few Virashaiva poets composed short works in regale, imitating him in the subject-matter, language and style. Kereya Padmarasa, Tribhuvana Tata, Palkurike Somanatha, Bhimakavi, Svatantra Siddhalingeshvara and Shankaralinga are some of them. The ragales composed by others are mainly didactic and there is not much poetry in them.

It has to be noticed that ragales are found occasionally in inscriptions also, e.g. Kogali inscriptions, Kurugod inscriptions and Alnavar inscriptions. There is also a lalita ragale in Sanskrit copper plate record found at Koramilli in Andhra Pradesh.

During the early period of the modern age, 'lalita' ragale of Kannada utilised certain metric features of English blank verse and changed itself into 'sarala' ragale. Conventional ragales have also been composed now and then.

T.V.V.S.

RAGATARANGINI (Maithili) is perhaps the most important work on music in medieval Mithila. Its framework is in Sanskrit, but the bulk of the work consists of definitions and illustrations in vernacular. While some of these are given in Brajbhasha (which is described as Madhyadeshabhasha), the more numerous and valuable ones are in Maithili (described as Mithil-apabhramsha bhasha). The author is Lochana Jha (who calls himself a Brahmin poet, named Lochana Sharma) and not Lochana Pandit as some scholars have maintained. He is described in the traditional genealogies as Mahopadhyaya Lochan Kavi, born in a respectable family of Shrotriya Brahmins known as Ekahare Kanhauli of village Ujana. He wrote this work under King Narapati Thakur (1690-1720) of the House of Khandwa. A manuscript of Shriharsha's Sanskrit classic poem Naishadhacharita in his handwriting is extant. It is said, years ago there existed a copy of Ragatarangini dated 1603 Shaka (AD 1681), but it has been lost. Lochana himself says in this work that he wrote another work called Ragasangitasārasangraha, but unfortunately it has not yet been discovered.

Ragatarangini is, therefore, Lochana's single work extant. It contains the history of music in Mithila. Though he uses the works of Bharata, Hanuman and Kavi Kohal, he mainly relies on Jayadeva and Shubhankar's Sangita Damodar which are the bedrock of the Maithil school of Indian music. Lochana's innovation lies in describing the metres used in writing literary songs in the vernacular of the land. He discusses at length the beginning of the Mithila school of music. He traces it to a legendary figure, called Bhavabhuti, from whom Sumati, the Kathak singer, took over the peculiar practices of music in Mithila. His son was Udaya and his grandson was Jayata, who set the lyrics of Vidyapati (c. 1360-1448) to music. Jayata's son Krishna and grandson Harihar further popularised the peculiarities of this school. His son was the illustrious Ghanshyam Mallik who perfected the art—it was at this stage that Lochana made his appearance.

Unfortunately this work was first edited at Bombay (1910) and then at Poona (1918), but the editors omitted its vernacular portions. Indeed, a number of extraneous verses in Sanskrit were added and Kshiti Mohan Sen came to the conclusion that it was written in the reign of King Adisur of Bengal. Suhadra Jha wrote an admirable paper and proved it to the hilt that the interpolations had no place whatsoever in Lochana's authentic work. He based his remarks on the authentic text as published for the first time from Darbhanga by Pandit Baladeva Mishra in 1934. The Dharbhanga edition has been revised twice, once by the University of Poona in 1966 and then by the Maithili Akademi in 1981.

Lochana has divided the work into five parts. The first part consists of Introduction and the Mala ragas; the second part takes up the female raginis; the third describes the Maithila ragas, the fourth gives details of Maithili Sankirna (mixed) ragas; and the fifth discusses the 'swara' and some miscellaneous matters.

The importance of the work lies in revealing the acceptability of Muslim raga in the gamut of classical Indian music, such as Iman which had been introduced by Firdausi. Otherwise, the work is not very deep or profound, but more or less just an introductory one as claimed by Lochana in the beginning of the work.

It is, however, not simply as a work of music that the book has its importance. It is more important as an authentic anthology of Maithili lyrics of Vidyapati (c. 1360-1448) and a number of representative poets who were either his contemporaries or immediate successors up to Lochana (c. 1668-1720). Of particular importance in this context is the curious absence of illustrations from Govindadas.

The work contains 103 Maithili lyrics of 29 poets in all. Of these five are anonymous, fifty-three by Vidyapati, eight by Lochana, five by Sadanand, three by Kumar Bhikham, three by Gajasingh, three by Sinhabhupati, two by Kamsanarayana, two by Govinda, two by Ratanai and one each by Bharaninath, Amritkar, Chandrakala, Lakshminarayan, Nava Kavishekhar (Yoshodhar?), Jivanath, Dashavadhan Thakur, Chaturbhuj, Shyamsundar, Haridas, Gangadhar, Srinivas Malla, Kaviraj Puran Malla, Nripa Pritinath, Chaturanan, Kumudi, Lakhanchand Rae, Jayakrishnan, Dharnidhar and Madhusudan. At least four of these were superior poets, namely Kamsanarayana, Govinda, Amritkar and Chaturbhuja.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It is true that one or two details given by Lochana about these poets have been disputed, such as Chandrakala was Vidyapati's daughter-in-law and Kavishekhar was the pseudonym of Vidyapati, but on the whole the book is reliable and accurate. The work also gives certain details regarding the prosody of songs and lyrics of the age, which cannot be brushed aside, as some latter-day critics have maintained that it was Lochana's concoction for a non-existent system. Both Chanda Jha (1831-1907) and Nagendra Nath Gupta found the text of Vidyapati here very helpful when they were engaged in bringing out a collection of his lyrics.

In conclusion, it may be pointed that it is traditionally recorded that this work was written in Shaka 1607, i.e. in 1685.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Shashinath Jha (ed.), Ragatarangini (Patna, 1981); Srimannarayan Dwivedi, 'Sangit—Damodarkar Shubhankar tatha Mithila' in Sammelan patrika (Allahabad, Vol LV, No. 1); Jayakanta Mishra, History of Maithili Literature.

J.M.

RAGHAVA IYENGAR, M. (Tamil; b. 1878, d. 1960) was born in the village of Ariyakudi in south Tamil Nadu, in a family distinguished for Tamil scholarship. He was appointed lecturer in 1901 at the Madurai Tamil Sangam (Tamil Academy) founded by the renowned patron of Tamil language, Pandithurai Tevar. He worked as assistant editor of the Academy's organ Sentamil under the editorship of his cousin and another distinguished scholar, R. Raghava Iyengar. Subsequently, he assumed editorship of the journal and served for eight years. He made pioneering studies of the historical aspects of the ancient Tamils and wrote numerous scholarly papers, one of the earliest being 'Tamils 1800 years Ago' first presented at the fourth annual convention of the Tamil Academy in 1905. The paper was later translated into English and published in the Royal Asiatic Journal. In 1912, he was appointed on the editorial board of the Tamil Encyclopaedia of Madras University, and subsequently became its editor in 1919. His notable research works are Velir varalaru, Tolkappiya poruladikara araichi, Cheran Chenkuttavan, The Period of Alvars, The Lives of Tamil Poets from Ancient Inscriptions (containing lives of over eighty poets), Some Aspects of Kerala from Tamil Literature, Tamil fostered by Tevars, and studies on the Kalappirar period. He was associated with many research and literary journals and was a member of the Madras Unversity Department of Tamil Studies. From 1944 to 1951, he was Professor of Tamil at Travancore University, later named Kerala University. Honours came to him from far and wide, from academic bodies as well as the public.

A.

RAGHAVA IYENGAR, R. (Tamil; b. 1870, d. 1946) was a scholar, poet and researcher who made substantial contribution to Tamil literature. He was also known as a commentator, teacher, orator, translator, editor and court-poet of the Rajas of Ramanathapuram, and he knew several languages, such as Tamil, Sanskrit and English, besides being familiar in a general way with Arabic, Chinese, Hebrew and Turkish.

He was editor of Sentamil, the literary and research journal of Madurai Tamil Sangam, and also head of the Tamil Research Section, Annamalai University. He gave several lectures on cultural, historical, linguistic, literary and religious topics on many occasions. A noteworthy series was when Vivekananda was guest at Ramanathapuram on his return from America. He collected, edited and published many old palm-leaf and paper manuscripts in Tamil. Among these, Aintinai aimpatu, Akananuru and Muttollayiram deserve special attention.

His poem Pari kotai (The story of Pari, 1937), with a complete prose commentary, is modelled on the Sangam poetic tradition. He also wrote some short poems, and several occasional pieces. He wrote four hundred verses in praise of the king of Ramnad and many complete, incomplete, and fragmentary writings, which have not been published so far. His prose works are Sentunatum Tamilum (1924), Vanchi Manokar (1932), Nalli-p-pulamai Melliyalarkal (Women poets, 1933), Tamil varalaru (History of Tamil), Tettan (a chieftain), and Kosar (a warrior clan). He translated Kalidasa's Shakuntala (1938). Bhagavat Gita (in verse, unpublished), Bhallata shataka (only 50 verses), and many religious and didactic verses. He also wrote for children a famous nursery rhyme 'Sankuchakkarachami' (The lord of the conch and the discus). In short, he was a multi-faceted personality.

As an editor, he edited old manuscripts, such as Akananuru (a Sangam anthology of 400 love poems), Tolkappiyam with Nachchinarkiniyar's commentary (a work of Tamil grammar), Muttollayiram (Fragment of literary composition picked up from an old anthology), Kuruntokai (An acute commentary on 110 verses out of a total of 401 of the Sangam anthology) and some others of lesser interest.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Rajamanikkanar, Pantinattu-p- perumpullavar (Madras, 1953); Mahavidvan R.Raghava Iyengar Centenary Souvenir (Madras, 1970).

P.N.A.

RAGHAVAN PILLAI, EDAPPALLY (Malayalam; b. 1909, d. 1936) was a native of Edappally, near Cochin. He was one of the twin poets, the other being Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, who were staunch champions and life-long practitioners of the romantic trend in Malayalam poetry. He was a gifted poet with little to boast of by way of higher education or social position. He fell in love with a woman beyond his reach and, realising that his desire was impossible to fulfil, he committed suicide in her house at the tender age of twenty-six.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

There are two collections of poems, Tusharaharam and Navasaurabham, to his credit, and these have been reprinted as a single volume, incorporating three more poems, the best known of which is 'Maninadam', written in the form of a farewell to the unkind world. All his poems are short and lyrical. They deal with social evils such as hypocrisy, poverty, squalor and the feudal system, which he found highly aggravated in the wake of the First World War. Simplicity of language, sweetness of sounds, directness of expression and topicality of themes made the poems very popular, especially among the youth of the time. 'Maninadam' has been translated into English.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Chengarappalli Narayanan Potti, Malayala sahitya sarvaswam; T.M. Chummar, Padya sahitya charitram; Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram, Vol. V.

K.S.N

RAGHAVAN PILLAI, K. (Malayalam; b. 1920. d. 1987), a native of Puliyoor in Chengannur taluk in South Kerala, took his postgraduate degree in Sanskrit from the University College, Trivandrum, in 1944. In his research and also in his official career he was associated with a number of institutions both within Kerala and outside India. He worked as lecturer in the University of London from where he got his Ph.D. degree, and at the University College, Trivandrum (1951-1956). He also worked at the American Academy of Asian Studies, San Fransisco, as Professor of Sanskrit (1956-1958). Later, he became Curator, Kerala Government Manuscripts Library (1958-1966) and finally its first Director (1966-1980) when the library was converted into the Oriental Research Institute and Manuscripts Library and brought under the University of Kerala. In 1955, he visited China, on being nominated as a member of a high-level educational committee. Even after his retirement from service in 1980, he was associated with a number of government and non-government committees and commissions.

Scholar and researcher, critic and editor, speaker and writer, Raghavan Pillai was a multi-faceted personality. His literary and critical output is not voluminous, but his writings show the extraordinary depth of his erudition and the rather limited nature of his interests. Apart from his studies in Bharthrihari's Vakyapadiya (his Ph.D. thesis), there are five more works to his credit. Of these, Arthathinte atirukal (Limits of meaning), Kriti, oru krishibhoomi (A literary work, a cultivable plot) and Samipanangal, samanvayangal (Approaches, syntheses) are concerned with literary criticism, while Ente London jivitam (My life in London) is a travelogue dealing with his experiences in London. Sartrinte astitvadarshanam (Sartre's existentialism), the best known of his works, dwells at length on Sartre's vision of life.

Raghavan Pillai was a good translator also. His translation of Mooshikavamsham, a Sanskrit mahakavya dealing with the history of Kerala, is worth mentioning. He has also translated a few poems and stories from Malayalam into English.

In addition to all this, a number of works, both Malayalam and Sanskrit, in manuscripts were edited and brought out under the guidance of Pillai when he was Director of the Manuscripts Library. They bear the stamp of his scholarship and emendatory acumen.

P.V.V.P.

RAGHAVANKA (Kannada; b. 13th c.) was a noted medieval poet who pioneered the 'shatpadi' form of composition in Kannada. Harishchandra charitra, Sidharama charitra, Somanatha charitra and Viresha charita are the four available works of the poet. Hariharamahatva (Sarabhacharite?), the other work attributed to him, is yet to be traced.

As Raghavanka has mentioned nothing about his date, scholars place him between 1165 and 1300. Mahadevabhatta and Rudrani, a Shaivite couple, were his parents. He was probably a native of Pampakshetra and remained unmarried. Rudrani is referred to as the sister of poet Harihara, who was also his preceptor.

One account says that Devaraja, king of Pampakshetra, honoured Raghavanka's scholarship and art of poetry and rewarded him for his Harishchandra kavya. With the spread of the poet's fame, Hoysala Ballala's minister Kereya Padmarasa desired to see him. Some works give us an account of his visit to the court of Prataparudra of Orangal, the recitation of his Viresha charite and his triumph over the court poets. The poet had several titles like Ubhayakavi Sarabha Bherunda, Ubhayakavi Kamalaravi, etc.

The works attributed to Raghavanka in the order of composition are Somanatha charita, Viresha charite, Siddharama charita and Harishchandra kavya.

Somanatha charita is in vardhaka shatpadi, a six-lined metre. It gives an account of Adaya, a staunch devotee of Lord Shiva. The work bears testimony to the poet's dramatic skill, and also contains lovely descriptions. Unfortunately, the poet seems to conform to the demands of the conventional epic (like weaving eighteen kinds of descriptions into the narration), and this makes the poem a second-rate work.

Viresha charite is a small work rendered in uddanda shatpadi, a form of vardhaka shatpadi itself. This narrates the story of destruction of Daksha's sacrifice by Virabhadra, born out of Shiva's wrath. Raudra rasa (sentiment of wrath) runs through the poem, often reaching out to the domain of sublimity. The poet's conscious object of establishing the supremacy of Lord Shiva affects the quality of the work.

Siddharama charita contains nine 'sandhis' or chapters in vardhaka shatpadi. This gives an account of Sidharama, a devotee of Lord Shiva. Siddharama of Sonnalige was a contemporary of Basaveshwara and composed vachanas. The poet has sketched him as an extraordinary man performing super-human deeds, and stresses his love of mankind and Karmayoga. We do not witness the evolution of the hero's character; at the very outset he appears like a Siddha, a man with utmost purity and holiness, and endowed with supernatural powers. He constructs several tanks and temples and uplifts a number of sinners and mortals destined to suffer in hell. Siddharama charita is rendered both as a poem and as a purana. If the puranic elements were not so predominant, it could have undoubtedly been a better poem. Raghavanka's art of narration seems more mature here than in his earlier works. As in his other works, Raghavanka's art of blending drama and poetry is evident here also.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His best known composition, however, is Harishchandra kavya, discussed at length in the Encylopaedia, Vol. II.

C.P.K.

RAGHU ARAKHITA (Oriya; b. 16th c.) was a great devotee of Lord Jagannath. Reference to this devotee occurs in Madalapanji, the chronicle of the temple of Lord Jagannath, and in a few other ancient literary works. It is probable that he lived during the reign of Prataprudra Deb (1497-1540), the Gajapati king of Orissa, and was perhaps a contemporary of Sri Chaitanya. Rama Das (18th c.) in his Dadhyata bhakti, a popular biographical work in verse, has elaborately written about the life of this devotee.

He was born to rich parents in a village situated on the north-eastern border of Orissa adjacent to Bengal. He was married when yet a boy. He lost his parents and fortune early and became a destitute. For this he was known as Raghu Arakhita, i.e. Raghu, the destitute. He left his ancestral house, became a Vaishnava sanyasi and went to Puri, where he lived almost as a beggar. The later part of the story narrates how Raghu Arakhita, by the grace of Lord Jagannath, was re-united with his wife, and how they both lived in a monastery at Puri leading a life of dedication to the Lord.

Except a few small poetical compositions, very few literary works of this Vaishnava poet have so far come to light. There are two 'chautisas', that is, typical poetical compositions of thirty-four stanzas written according to the Oriya alphabetic sequence of consonants, beginning from 'ka' to 'kshya'. These two chautisas are Shakuntala chautisa and Jnana ude chautisa. The former deals with the romantic episode of Dusmanta and Shakuntala, and the latter is a philosophic discourse. In addition, he wrote Gochar sidhi Gita and a number of devotional and lyrical compositions on the Radha-Krishna theme. The language is simple and the compositions are musical and full of the poet's intensity of love and devotion.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.C. Sahu, Prachin kavya dhara (Cuttack); Rama Das, Dadhyata bhakti; Sachidanand Mishra (ed.), Chautisa bichitra.

J.B.M.

RAGHUNATH (Hindi; b. 1740), a bard in the court of Bariband Singh, a chieftain of Kashi, lived at village Chaura, which his patron gifted to him for his poetic genius. His son Gokulnath and grandson Gopinath too were poets and earned a name for themselves. His four works are available. Of them Rasikmohan deals with figures of speech, in which he defines and illustrates various figures. His illustrative verses are, however, mostly confined to erotic sentiment. The aim of the author, besides offering a lucid exposition of figures, is to sing panegyrics, praising the various qualities of his patron. Another notable feature of this work is that all the four feet of the verse illustrate the figure of speech referred to. In his work Kavya kaladhar, he presents an exhaustive classification of emotions, sentiments, heroes and heroines. Like other poets of the age, Raghunath too is more of a poet than a theorist and poetician. In Jagat Mohan he describes the daily schedule of Krishna's activities during twelve hours. Ishka mahotsava is a work of erotic verses. It gives an elaborate account of love-sports in a language which is a blending of both Khariboli and Persian words. Chronologically, it was written before Bodha's Ishkanama, and is written in simple language and racy metres.

Gov.R.

RAGHUNATH PARICHHA (Oriya; b. 1802, d.1872) was born at the village of Lahuri near Parlakhemundi. His ancestors had received the title to Parichha for their service to Lord Gopinath of Lahuri. Not much is known about the life of Raghunath Parichha, and what is known is mainly hearsay. It is said that Raghunath attained 'siddhi' (exceptional power) by the blessings of a saint and, as a result, his poetic talent blossomed. He became famous when he demonstrated his scholarship before an assembly of pandits at Puri, and he came to be known as Kavichandra. He was a poet, a scholar, a devotee and a musician.

Raghunath was proficient in Sanskrit, Oriya, Telugu, Bengali and Hindi. Only three of his published works are available to us. They are Gopinath ballav natak kabya, Lakshana chandrodaya and Raghunath-vilas kabya. From these three works it appears that Raghunath was a follower of the Gaudiya Vaishnava School, and his writings mainly centred around the story of Radha-

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Krishna. In order to popularise Vaishnavism, he made use of music and lilas. But instead of following the lyricism of Vaishnava poets like Dinakrushna, he imitated the rhetoric of poets like Upendra Bhanja. Besides, he also applied the 'gana' principle of the Sanskrit metres to Oriya songs. His style is one found in Sanskrit and may be regarded as part of a later development of the medieval literary tradition.

Gopinath ballav is regarded by some critics as the first Oriya drama. The romance of Radha-Krishna is the central theme of the play. A portion of the Rasa-lila is presented in the form of a dance-drama. The abundance of Oriya songs and shlokas in Sanskrit metres and the highly rhetorical prose dialogues show this as a developed lila, a type of dance-drama on the pattern of south Orissan opera. It almost appears like a 'champu drama', an admixture of prose and poetry.

Apart from the three published texts, Raghunath has also a number of unpublished manuscripts to his credit. They are Sangita Rama-lila, Sangita Krishna-lila, Niti shataka, Sangita-ratnakar, Vasudeva nataka, Krishnachandra nataka, Mukta-natika, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gourikumar Brahma, Chinta o chetana; Natabar Samantaray, Odia sahityara itihas (1964); Raghunath Parichha, Gopinath ballav natak (Orissa Sahitya Academy, Bhubaneswar).

A.P.

RAGHUNATH RUPAK GITAN RO (Rajasthani) by Manchh or Mansaram Kuwara is an authentic work on the prosody of Rajasthani 'gitas' as is evident from its title. Mansaram was the son of Bakshiram, a Parashara Brahmin. He was born in 1766, composed this work in 1806 and expired in 1840. He was honoured by Maharaja Mansingh of Jodhpur for his poem composed in praise of Nathji, the religious teacher of the Maharaja, and was granted a village, named Unta-vadia, and an allowance of rupees two per day to him and to his descendants, which they received till 1877. Manasaram composed this work on prosody giving illustrations from the story of the Ramayana. He has enumerated therein the definitions and varieties of gita metres, methods of their composition, rhetoric, and merits and demerits in compositions.

The work has been divided into nine 'vilasas' (chapters), beginning with definitions and varieties of short and long letters, signs used to represent them, various ganas (syllabic feet), Dagdhaksharas, Akshar-tyag, Phalaphala, Vayan Sagai, flaws in the composition, Akharota, various kinds of final alliterations, Ukti and its varieties, poetic sentiments and their definitions (chapters 1-2).

Chapters 3 to 9 give defintions of 74 types of gita metres along with illustrations from the Ramayana. Though the story of the Ramayana has been narrated in brief, the composition is captivating and beautiful, and the sentiments, emotions, figures of speech, etc. have been treated with masterly skill.

B.M.J.

RAGHUNATHA NAYAKA/RAGHUNATHARAYALU (Kannada)
See under NAYAKA RAGHUNATHA

RAGHUNATHAN, CHIDAMBARA (Tamil; b. 1923), also known as Thiruchitrambalakavirayar, was born in a family of Tamil scholars in Tirunelveli which at that time was one of the centres of intense literary activity in Tamilnadu. Raghunathan's early years are marked by close association with leftist leaders and also eminent writers like Pudumaipittan whose biography Raghunathan wrote soon after Pudumaippittan's death in 1948. His novel Panjum pasiyum (Cotton and hunger), when it came out in 1953, was hailed as a model of Tamil socialist realism. Raghunathan wrote a number of short stories, poems and critical essays and a few of his important books are Raghunathan kathaigal (Stories of Raghunathan, 1950), Raghunathan kavithaigal (Poems of Raghunathan, 1957), Pudumaipittan varalaru (A biography of Pudumaipittan,1951) and Bharatiyum Shelleyum (A critical study of the two poets Bharati and Shelley, 1964).He has translated into Tamil several Soviet writers and is celebrated for his translation of the poetry of Vladimir Mayakovsky and the novel Mother by Maxim Gorky. He has been an activist in several literary and cultural organizations and has twice won the Soviet Land Nehru Award and visited Soviet Union.He won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1983 for his book Bharati: kalamum karuthum which is an interpretation of the poet Subramania Bharati in the context of the liberation struggle in South India in the early part of the twentieth century. The book also won the Madras Ilakkia Chintanai Award for 1982. A number of Raghunathan's works including his novel Panjum pasiyum have been translated and published in the socialist countries.

A.

RAGHUVAMSHA (Sanskrit), an ornate court epic consisting of nineteen cantos, is commonly regarded as the best flower of the creative genius of Kalidasa (c. 4th c. AD). The story of the Ramayana has been brilliantly retold by the poet. The graceful poetic treatment has proved to be the zenith of perfection in the area of aesthetic sensibility and a never-ending feast for the connoisseurs of literary art. As the title signifies, this epic of art narrates the uncommon history of the scions of Raghu. The wonderful life and achievement of Rama, of course, occupies the centre stage; but the poet carefully builds the epic edifice with feats of Rama's numerous predecessors and successors. Kalidasa was, perhaps, at his best in the Raghuvamsha, hence the work attained great heights in popularity among the readers as well as the rhetoricians of varying shades of opinion. Therefore, we come across no less than twenty commentaries on the epic, while the aspirant poets of later centuries sought to draw inspiration from this inimitable work.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

From a close analysis of the Raghuvaṁsha, one becomes aware of a commendable unity of design and unique treatment of a series of themes. The first nine cantos revolve around four famous predecessors of Rama, viz. Dilipa, Raghu, Aja and Dasharatha. The next seven unfold the peerless career of Rama, the roof and crown of not only the solar race, but all human beings. The 'Moon among men' ('Narachandrama'), envisaged by Valmiki, has been further idealised by Kalidasa. However, the tale of the Ramayana has been faithfully adhered to; the neat abridgement has been carefully planned and executed. Nevertheless, Kalidasa sets the classical tone of the epic of art through stylised, yet subtle, description of changing moods of life and nature in the drama of existence.

The Raghuvaṁsha with its several protagonists and multiple actions, seems to be the manifesto of all-encompassing epic imagination, proclaiming the range of its grasp over the known world as well as the domain of myths. Kalidasa is always in control whether he follows in the footsteps of Valmiki or chisels out a new path of his own—always choosing to affect either limitation and restriction, or expansion and freedom of his art. The reader moves in a superhuman world along with Dilīpa and Sudakshinā at the outset, and then with Raghu. However, one cannot but feel the immensity of human potential when the pangs of childlessness are vividly described. Besides, the delicate and suggestive treatment of the multifoliate emotions of love and pathos has generated rare moments of flamboyant poetry. The tender episode of Aja and Indumati, unfolded between the sixth and eighth canto, is indeed one of the priceless gems of Sanskrit literature.

Obviously, the high drama in the life of Rama and Sita has engaged the attention of the poet to an unlimited extent. Even though Kalidasa has a high regard for Valmiki, the mega-bard of the Rama-tradition, his originality in the Raghuvaṁsha is revealed through the creative innovation in form and content as well as reinterpretation of elements drawn from the cultural legacy of the country. Kalidasa's style, imagery, characterisation, ideas and delineation of plot speak of the emergence of a new poetic weltanschauung (world-view). Kalidasa's unique craftsmanship is evident in his marvellously rapid but picturesque condensation of the Ramayana in a few cantos. The thirteenth canto is particularly noteworthy for its inherent tenderness and depth in which Rama recollects his joys and sorrows in the course of an aerial journey from Lanka to Ayodhya. The next two cantos, as it were, unveil a new Rama who is perhaps more heroic in his silent suffering.

Even though the account of Kusha does not quite come up to the mark, there are moments of excellent artistic merit in the latter cantos. However, the successors of Rama are only briefly described in three cantos beginning with the sixteenth. It seems that Kalidasa draws the curtain rather abruptly at the nineteenth canto in which the account of the scions of Raghu is closed with the story of voluptuous Agnivarna who met a premature death. Some scholars have argued that the great poet has thereby suggested a moral, and not without a broad hint at the celebrated Gupta dynasty.

The Raghuvaṁsha presents a galaxy of idealised characters; nevertheless they appeal to us as distinguished individuals. The innate romanticism in Kalidasa's art has transformed the classical epic-universe altogether. The poet has not simply codified his ideal, he has also carefully maintained a human sequence. In this epic of art, glorification does not necessarily mean abstractions, and in order to be eternal, the poet has not allowed his art to sink into a stereotyped world of make-believe. That is why the Raghuvamsha has been popular with the commentators as well as the editors and critics in India and Europe.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A Hillebrandt, Kalidasa (Calcutta, 1971); Maurice Winternitz, History of Indian Literature, Vol. III (Delhi, 1985); Ramji Upadhyaya, Sanskrit and Prakrit Mahakavyas (University of Saugar, 1962); S.K. Dey, History of Sanskrit Literature (Calcutta, 1947).

Ta.B.

RAGHUVANSHA (Hindi; b. 1921), teacher and critic, took his M.A. and M.Phil degree from Allahabad, joined the faculty and retired as Professor of Hindi in 1981.

An author of great talent, he is mainly known as a critic. Besides writing on ancient dramaturgy, he has assiduously written on modern literature, especially modern poetry. He translated Bharata's Natyashastra and his book Natya-kala (1961) presents a history of the development of stage in India.

He is credited with bringing new trends in Hindi criticism. In his book Samsamyikta aur adhunik Hindi kavita (1972), after defining contemporaneity, he underlines contemporary contexts in modern Hindi poetry and tries to explain the varied sentiments and moods of modern poetry. His work Adhunikta aur srijanshilata is a collection of sixteen essays in which he expressed his views on modernity, creativity, language, poetic sensibility and individual freedom. He is of the view that modernity is a continuous process in the creative activity. A few essays are on folk literature, especially folk-songs. In these, he discusses the nature of folk-songs, their emotive content and their importance as a treasure of regional culture. Distinguishing between standard literature and folk literature, he says that if the former is creative, the latter gives expression to the process and style of life. In his opinion, it is sympathy with mankind rather than a doctrinaire approach, that makes literature progressive. In Bharati ka kavya (1980), he maintains that Bharati is essentially a romantic poet. Raghuvansha has been associated with a number of journals concerned mainly with criticism–Alochana, Parimal and Ka-kha-ga. He was co-editor of the monumental work, Hindi sahitya kosh, an encyclopaedia of Hindi literature.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His other works are: Criticism: Prakriti aur kavya (Thesis, 1960), Sahitya ka naya pariprekshya (1963); Novels: Chhayatap (1947), Arthahin (1962) and Tantujal (1974).

Gov. R.

RAGHUVAR JAS PRAKASH (Rajasthani) by Adha Kisna is an outstanding work on Rajasthani prosody written about 1824. It consists of five chapters. The opening verse of the first chapter is an invocation to goddess Sarasvati and other deities for the successful completion of the book. Then he explains gana and agana, phala and aphala, mitra and shatru, devatas, doshas and adoshas, as also dagdhaksharas, guru and laghu aksharas, and the various types of pratyayas.

The second chapter deals with the definitions of the matrik metres and their illustrations. He discusses the rules of prose-writing and gives illustrations of chitrabandh kavyas. The third chapter enumerates the varna vrittas and their varieties, while chapter four deals with 'Dingala geets', their definition, illustrations and flaws. The fifth chapter explains the different types of nisanis with their sub-divisions. While explaining the metres, the author narrates the story of the Ramayana, revealing his devotion to Lord Rama.

Adha Kisna was the guru of prince Jawan Singh of Mewad, and Maharana Bhim Singh granted him the freehold jagir of Sisoda village. He also helped Col. Tod in the collection of manuscripts and other historical documents.

B.M.J.

RAGHUVIR SINGH, MAHARAJ KUMAR (Hindi; b. 1908) was born in the ruling family of the princely state of Sitamau in Madhya Pradesh, and was gifted with the refined taste of an artist and the erudition of a scholar. He received his education at Baroda, Indore and Agra. From the very beginning he had a deep interest in history and culture, especially that of the Mughal period.

During his travels he saw many ruined structures and monuments—forts, tombs, palaces—which reminded him of the grandeur and power of the Mughal emperors. These ruins touched the chords of his heart and gave an impetus to his imagination. He dreamed of their past glory and brooded over the lost splendour. This sense of nostalgia and rumination formed the basis of his essays collected in the volume Shesh-smritiyan, a memorable piece of literature which is the very basis of Raghuvir Singh's reputation as a writer.

The subjects of these essays are Fatehpur Sikri (the capital of Akbar for a short period), Shahjahan's Tajmahal and Red Fort, and the graves of Jahangir and Nurjahan.

Raghuvir Singh is noted for his style. When the ruins of the Mughal empire arouse the sad memories of the past, the author writes about them surcharged with strong emotion. Though there are passages which give graphic pictures of ruined places and people in a picturesque style studded with figures of speech, he is best-known for the emotive content of his essays. These pictorial descriptions are as effective as pieces of romantic poetry. Intensity of feeling, imagination sharpened by deep emotion, figurative language and unique style, all make his essays prose-poems.

The University of Agra conferred on him the degree of D.Litt. (honoris causa) and the Hindi world recognised his services by electing him President of Hindi Sahitya Sammelan (Bihar). His Shesh smritiyan has been translated into Malayalam and Gujarati.

His other works are Bikhare phul, Jivan kana, Jivan dhuli, Nari kya ek paheli, Purab aur pashchim, Haveli aur jhonpari, Dev aur danav, Ve aur hum, Dharma aur marma, Tab aur ab. Besides, he has written on historical and political subjects in English also.

S.S.G.

RAGHUVIRA (Hindi; b.1902,d.1963), an eminent Sanskrit and Hindi scholar, was born at Rawalpindi (Pakistan). His father Munshi Ram was an ordinary middle-class man. After receiving early education in his home town, he moved to Lahore for higher studies from where he took his M.A. degree. He pursued his studies further and got a Ph.D. from London and a D.Litt. from Utrecht University.

He started his career as a Sanskrit teacher at Lahore, but he was not satisfied with his teaching job and therefore devoted himself to research. His field of research was ancient Indian culture, and in pursuit of his studies he went to Mongolia, Thailand and Indonesia. As an editor he earned a name by editing twenty volumes of Atharvaveda of Paipaldas. He completed this gigantic work in four years (1936-1940), and edited some other Sanskrit classics too.

Raghuvira is better known as a lexicographer. Towards the end of his life he devoted himself wholeheartedly to editing, compiling and preparing dictionaries. His contribution towards the translation of English words and phrases into Hindi will be long remembered, since it was the first attempt of its kind in free India. For his scholarship and contribution to the field of lexicography he was honoured by the government of India, and he was nominated to the Rajya Sabha. He founded the International Academy of Indian Culture.

His important works are Atharvaveda, Vol IXX (1936-1940), Sanskrit-Tibetan-Mongolian Abecedatrian

CC-0. In Public Domain.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(1941), Consolidated English-Hindi Dictionary (1951), Comprehensive English-Hindi Dictionary (1955), Mongolian-Sanskrit Dictionary (1958), Hindi-English Dictionary of Technical Terms.

S.S.G.

RAHA, ASHOKBIJAY (Bengali; b. 1910, d.1990), poet and orator, was born in a cultured family in the district of Sylhet, which is now in Bangladesh. He spent his early life in the countryside of Cachar in the valley of the Barak in south Assam. He graduated in Philosophy from Calcutta University in the Year 1933, but later in 1947, did his M.A. in Bengali. He started as a teacher at Pyarimohan Academy, a Swadeshi school in Sylhet, of which he was also a founder. After the partition of India, he joined Karimganj College, Karimganj (Assam) as a lecturer in Bengali. In 1951, he left Karimganj and joined the Viswa Bharati, Santiniketan, as Rabindra Adhyapak (Tagore Professor). He worked there till he retired in 1974.

Inspired by the poems of Satyendranath Datta, Ashokbijay began to write poems when he was in his teens. They appeared in Kamala, a literary magazine of Sylhet. In 1941 appeared the collection, Diang nadir banke. This was followed by Rudrabasanta in the same year, Bhanumatir math (1942), Jal-dambarupahar (1945), Rakta-sandhya (1945), Shesh chuda (1945), Udo chithir jhank (1945), Jetha ei chaitrer shalban (1961), Ghanta baje : parda sare jai (1981) and Paushphasal (1981). His other works include Banishilpi Abanindranath (1973), a critical study of the works of Abanindranath Tagore, and Patrashtak (1981), a collection of eight letters he wrote to a friend. Many of his poems were translated into Hindi, English, French and Spanish. The Enchanted Tree, edited by Leela Roy, contains the English translation of his poem, 'Mayataru'.

Ashokbijay was essentially a romantic poet. In him, he tells us, there is an intimate and natural coalescence of three souls yearning for love, truth and beauty: the first, primitive, pre-literate and sylvan; the second, rural and unsophisticated; and the third, urban and informed. Indeed, his poems, urban in their innovativeness, have the lustiness of the primitive and the simplicity of the rural. On the canvas of reality he creates and recreates images which oscillate between the three worlds he speaks of. Sometimes he endows these images with a quality of strange other-worldliness. At other times they are in consonance with the reality around, and as harsh and grating as reality itself. But always there is the yearning and the dream.

Ashokbijay is richly sensuous, but he is also able to transcend at will the limit of the sensuous world he revels in creating. He draws his images and metaphors from both countryside and city; exquisite nature images exist side by side with those culled from the harsh urban life. But they all fall in and get fused as Ashokbijay builds his many-coloured cone, his poem.

T.K.D.

RAHASYA MANJARI (Oriya) is a fine musical kavya on the love legend of Krishna and Radha in twenty-four chhandas (cantos) by Devadurlabha Das, who is said to have belonged to the sixteenth century. The Bhakti movement in this century led to a spurt of literary activities in Oriya literature and Rahasya manjari is one such ambitious kavya. 'Prema bhakti' and 'Madhurya lila' are the two related aspects of this work. Besides projecting the philosophy of Vaishnavism, it also unfolds the mystic love of Radha-Krishna and gopis, and brings out the literary vigour and creative potentiality of medieval Oriya poetry.

Rahasya manjari records the most thrilling moments of romance and separation in the lives of Radha, Krishna, Rukmini and gopis. The poem is divided into twenty-four chhandas showing the supremacy of Radha's love over that of Rukmini. Rukmini is the heroine and Sri Krishna the hero. Besides the sublimity of Radha's love, the supremacy of Vrindavan lila over that of Dwaraka is protrayed in the book. While the doctrine of absolute love and devotion was rooted in Radha, the school of 'Jnan' (knowledge) flourished with the worship of Lord Jagannath of Puri. Rahasya manjari is based on an approach to the theme of Radha and Krishna from the doctrine of 'Jnan bhakti' as practised by the Oriya saint-poet Jagannath Das (16th c.) and his contemporaries.

The first chhanda of Rahasya manjari is devoted to a description of Lord Jagannath who is acknowledged as the supreme 'Jogi'. The successive chhandas, worked out in different metres relate to Krishna's agony in Dwaraka despite royal splendour and comforts, Rukmini's anxiety and her request to Krishna to disclose his grief, Krishna's revelation of his love for Radha and gopis, the jealousy of Rukmini and the other consorts of Krishna, the intense longing of Radha to be united with Krishna, Krishna's journey to Vrindavan, the creation of mystery by the Lord and his playing on the flute, the sudden awakening of Shiva and the entire nature springing to life, Radha's awakening from her dream, the eight queens of Krishna including Rukmini feeling ashamed at the sight of Radha, and the poet's faith that Radha and Rukmini are inseparable and indivisible.

A glance at the various characters as depicted in Rahasya manjari reveals some interesting aspects of their personalities. Shrikrishna, as the protagonist, is both real and divine and is described as the fountainhead of all-pervading love. Similarly, Garuda, Krishna's conveier, is presented as a 'jogi' besides being an ardent devotee. Rukmini, the heroine, born out of Mahalaxmi, the symbol of splendour (eishwarya), is the most devoted consort of Krishna, and also an embodiment of tolerance. The most remarkable character in the poem, however, is the exquisite, sparklingly youthful Radha, always full of charm and grace. She is the most powerful phenomenon in Vrindavan lila, not comparable with any other beloved of Krishna, and in fact the main motive in Rahasya manjari. In this book Krishna is identified with 'Shruti', Radha with love (Priti) and Rukmini with erotic passion. At the same time it can be said that the poet has shown Krishna and Radha as divine characters in a social environment, and many of their traits are borrowed from the prevailing folk-traditions in a more or less secular ethos.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rahasya manjari, apart from its thematic innovations, stands out as a piece of distinguished medieval poetry. In it the poet concentrates on his own conviction as a devotee and his role as an artist of social perception. Though built up in the tradition of Vaishnavite romance of Krishna and Radha, the book is a fine example of inspiration and innovation, and true to its title it is full of varied emotions (rasas) which only a discerning mind can appreciate.

G.M.

RAHI, ABDUL RAHMAN (Kashmiri; b. 1925) is a poet and aritia. He"had jis ecrly qchooning kn Jaomu ald Srknagap. Afver wmrkine as c clepk in"the R.W.D, he joined the daily Khidmat as an assistant editor. He did his M.A. in Persian in 1952 and M.A. in English in 1962, and taught at many colleges till he joined the Department of Persian, Kashmir University, as lecturer in 1964, and the Department of Kashmiri as Senior Fellow in 1975. He was General Secretary, Cultural Conference (1954-58) and co-editor in 1952 of Kongposh, the official organ of the Progressive Writers' Association. He also remained on the Board of editors of the Urdu Ajkal (Delhi, 1953-55). Some national leftist leaders' support to Urdu as the language of Kashmir caused his disenchantment with their politics, though he held that the 'Marxist interpretation of history and literature is very significant'. Although Rahi's earlier Urdu poems like 'Qahqaha-e-zaharfishan' (The venomous laughter) and 'Faisla' (Decision) were appreciated by the progressive critics, he chose to switch over to Kashmiri in 1951-52 as a mark of deep conviction. His first anthology Navroz-e-saba (The spring zephyr, 1958), comprising his Kashmiri poems with a progressive bias, established him as a promising Kashmiri poet and won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1961. But poems like Swanalanki pyath (Musings on the Swanlank, 1956) in which the poet expressed his fears in the face of all-pervading death, indicate a departure from the trodden path. His poems have, since then, voiced the human predicament in the modern context of alienation. Rahi's critical essays in Kahwat (The touchstone, 1980) are considered to have developed an indigenous critical idiom for Kashmiri. The State Cultural Academy awarded this book the first prize in 1980. For his services to Kashmiri literature the Academy presented him a 'Robe of Honour' in 1975. After Lal Ded and other Kashmiri mystic poets, Rahi accepted the influence of the modern Persian poetess Furugh-i-Farrukhazad and Kashmiri poet Nadim, whose thought and poetry, he said, "I felt sometimes like imitating."

Ratt. S

RAHI, MASUM RAZA (Hindi; b. 1927), prominent Hindi-Urdu poet and novelist, was born in a reputed Muslim Shia family of Ghazipur in Uttar Pradesh. For his higher studies he joined the Aligarh Muslim University and obtained his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in Urdu from there. The subject of his Ph.D. thesis was 'Indian personality in Urdu Literature'. For some time he worked as a lecturer in the Urdu department at the University, but soon he resigned and went to Bombay and started writing stories and dialogues for films. Now he has settled there and writes both for the T.V. serials and the silver screen.

He started his career as an Urdu poet and published several collections of poems such as Naya sal, Mauje gul, Mauje saba, Raksemaye ajnabi raste and Attharah sau sattavan, the last being a long narrative poem (later published in Hindi too). Soon he turned towards Hindi, and is now recognized as an established creative writer. As a poet, he could not gain much recognition in Hindi, partly because he has only one anthology of 56 poems in Hindi, Mein ek pheriwala (1976), to his credit, and partly because his poems in their style and spirit have close kinship with Urdu poetry. However, these Hindi poems have the same sincerity; warmth and closeness to life as their Urdu counterparts.

In Hindi, Rahi is better known for his novels. His first novel Adha gaon (1966) won him laurels overnight and he was soon acclaimed as a writer of regional novels. The novel presents a true picture of the life of the Shia Muslims in the context of the partition of the country in 1947. The story centres round the Muharram celebrations in village Gangoli of Uttar Pradesh and brings out the amity and cooperation prevailing among ordinary Hindus and Muslims, while the minds of the educated and well-to-do people of both the communities are poisoned with communal virus. The sympathy of the writer is with the common men, Hindus and Muslims alike, who were against partition and who suffered in its aftermath. According to the novelist, the feudal structure in India broke down both on account of the abolition of the Zamindari system and the decadent and corrupt life of the landlords themselves. The novelist has called this novel the 'story of time'. His concept of time is circular and, as he sees it, man fights a losing battle against it.

The stories of his other novels, Himmat Jaunpuri (1969), Topi Shukla (1969), Os ki bund (1970), Dil ek sada kagaz (1973), Scene 75 (1977), Katra bi arzu (1978), differ from one another, but the theme is the same struggle of man against time and his ultimate defeat. They apparently deal with contemporary social, political, economic, cultural and communal problems, but the underlying theme is the same man and his eternal struggle with the odds of time. The events and characters transcend the problems and become symbols of his philosophy embedded in them.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In the art of story-telling and keeping the suspense till the end, Rahi may be compared with Amritlal Nagar and Yashpal. He directly communicates with his readers and takes them into confidence, and in this his humanism, his satire, and his use of colloquial dialect help him a good deal. His novels are aptly described as authentic documents of the Indian Muslim life during the partition and post-Independence of India.

H.

RAHI, VED (Dogri; b. 1933) is an eminent short story writer and film maker. He was born in a family of journalists and his father, Lala Mulk Raj Saraf, was the doyen of newspaper proprietors and editors in the state of Jammu and Kashmir. Ved Rahi grew up among the scribes, imbibing words and the smell of ink, and started his career as an editor of Yojana, a journal published from Jammu. But he left the job soon and migrated to Bombay to work in the films. Equally fluent in Urdu (The official language of Jammu and Kashmir and the language of his father's paper, Ranbir), Hindi and Dogri, his works include a book in Urdu dealing with Dogri poets and their poetry of the renaissance, several short stories and a novel in Hindi, and a number of works in Dogri—three novels, two collections of short stories, a play and some ghazals and poems in other forms. Dogri literature and writing in Dogri have been his first love, and he has been a consistent contributor to Dogri literature. Most of his literary creations are woven with the strands of life in Duggar. The themes dealt with by him are social evils, exploitation of the poor, sufferings of women and weaker sections of society. However, his forte has all along been the short story. He has written some excellent short stories in Hindi and Dogri. His second collection of Dogri short stories Aale was picked up for the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1983, and many of his short stories have been translated into a good few Indian and foreign languages.

Pad.S.

RAHIM (Hindi; b. 1556, d. 1627), the poet, was buried in the tomb of his wife, built by himself, situated beside the tomb of Humayun in Delhi. His full name was Mirza Abdur Rahim Khan-e-Khana ibne Bairam. He was the son of Bairam Khan, Akbar's tutor and guardian. Rahim's mother, Sultana Begum, was the younger sister-in-law of Humayun. He was brought up by Akbar as his own son and educated in accordance with the lofty ideals of liberty, fraternity and secularism as embodied in Din-e-Elahi.

Akbar arranged the marriage of Rahim with Mahabanu from whom he had four sons and one daughter. He lost his wife and all his sons one after the other. He lost his son-in-law, Daniel, and endured the brutal murder of his grandsons. Jahangir was instrumental in causing him great torture; for instance, he presented him his son Darab's chopped-off head on a plate. Rahim faced all these cruelties with great patience and fortitude.

Rahim possessed a magnetic and versatile personality. Even his enemies admired his physical and mental qualities and Akbar loved him and elevated him to the highest rank in his court.

Rahim was a lover of music and literature. Besides, he was deeply devoted to the rich Indian culture and civilization. He can be classed among the pioneers of the concepts of secularism and social integeration in Indian history and as an exponent of the ideals followed by Akbar in politics.

An outstanding poet and scholar, Rahim is renowned for his magnanimity and large heartedness and for his knowledge of many languages such as Arabic, Persian, Turkish and Sanskrit. His works include Khet kautukam, a work on astrology containing 124 verses composed about 1569 in a language that draws freely on Sanskrit and Persian; Madan ashtaka, a collection of eight verses, which describes the divine love between Krishna and gopi; Nagar shobha, a collection of 142 verses probably inspired by the famous Meena Bazar set up by the Mughal Emperor, describing seventy different types of heroines on the basis of their castes and regions they belonged to—a work full of enchanting word pictures in Braj bhasha, interspersed with Arabic and Persian words and colloquial idioms; Barvai nayika bhed, work in 116 couplets in Avadhi in barvai metre depicting different types of heroes and heroines; Barvai sangrah, another Avadhi work in 105 couplets in the same metre, written mostly in Persian dealing in the main with the theme of spiritual love; Rahim dohavali, consisting of some 300 couplets in Braj bhasha, showing the poet's deep knowledge and understanding of Hindu scriptures, deities, festivals and Hindu way of life. It is said that the last work is a part of Rahim satsai, a work in 700 dohas of which some 400 have been lost. Besides these works, he wrote some stray verses—padas, savaiyas, ghanaksharis and chhappayas which deal with devotional and moral themes. Among these miscellaneous verses may be included six sorathas ascribed to the poet that are known as 'Shringar soratha'. Rahim was, no doubt, a genius. The main theme of his poetry is love, often elavated to spiritual heights.

There is a wonderful variety of language, style, metre and subject-matter in Rahim's works. He is a master of all the literary 'languages' of Hindi in use up to his time, namely Braj, Avadhi and Hindavi (Khariboli), and his poems reveal a wide spectrum of experience of life.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Amar Bahadur Singh, Abdur Rahim Khan-e-Khana (Jhansi, 1961); Balkrishna Akinchan, Rahim ka niti kavya (Delhi, 1972); Brijrattan Das (ed.), Rahiman vilas (Allahabad, 1948); R.P. Masani, Court Poets of India and Iran (Bombay, 1938).

D.L.S.

RAHMAN, DAR (Kashmiri; d. 1897) was an eminent Kashmiri mystic poet, contemporary of Mahmood Gami. Nothing is known for certain about his life. Only a few of his poems have been preserved, which signify his eminence as a poet. His famous poem, Shashrang, reveals his art and craft. The poem is an allegorical expression of a complex mystic experience, displaying an amazing technical artistry. Manch tular (Honey bee) is another allegorical poem in which two impersonal characters, a fly and a honey bee, confront each other, and through their dialogues expose the mysteries of nature and thus reveal the eternal conflict between 'nafs' (self) and 'fikr' (consciousness). The poet also intervenes and comments on the relative worth of the arguments of the two characters in the poem. In his other poems written in the lyrical form, Rahman Dar seems to be obsessed with the question relating to the human predicament caused by his estrangement from the real, and his craving for the reunion. His poetry displays a beautiful synthesis of Persian sufi terms and pure Kashmiri words.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Amin Kamil, Sufi shairi (Srinagar, 1964).

Sh.S.

RAI, ACHCHHA 'RASIK' (Nepali; b. 1928, d. 1952), novelist, essayist, short-story writer, critic and poet, was born at Dhobi Talao village in Darjeeling. The village has since been named after him as Rasikgram. His first humorous article 'Sankarlai prashna' (Question of Sankar) appeared in Gorkha, a popular literary periodical, in 1946. Even earlier, as a young student he had written articles in handwritten magazines like Chandrama and Kamal, which he also edited.

His short stories are absorbing and deal mostly with the social evils and economic deprivation of the lower middle class of the Nepali society. For example, his short story 'Kanchhi' (Second wife) contains a deep sarcasm against the prevailing practice of polygamy. In 'Chaprasi' (Peon) he gives a picture of a peon, exploited by his official for domestic service.

Rasik's essays were equally provocative. They also contained equally biting satire and doses of humour. In 'Bhudi' (Stomach) he exposes social and economic disparities. In 'Lobhi bahun' the target of attack is the priestly class, while in 'Mapai' the target is an egoist. He is also an adept at exposing the self-seeking politicians. Some of his equally engaging essays are 'Anuhar' (Face), 'Kun pahila—anda ki kukhura' (Chicken-egg controversy), 'Jawab' (Reply), 'Hindi cinema ra hami' (We and Hindi cinema) and 'Nari samasya ko hal' (Solution to women's problems). Saptakoshi (Seven rivers, 1955) is a collection of his seven popular essays.

His two novels Lagan (Auspicious time of wedding, 1955) and Dobhan (Confluence, 1964), published posthumously, also deal with social problems. Rasik rachanavali, a collection of his works, except the novels, compiled and edited by Ramlal Adhikari, came out in 1982.

What surprises many critics is the precocious development of Rasik as a writer. His keen observation, sharp intellect, lively imagination and deep sympathy with the downtrodden have baffled many. His literary output mainly came in six years, 1947-52. He was also an untiring organiser of literary activities and was instrumental in founding the Nepali Sampadak Parishad in 1947 and the Pragatishil Nepali Sahitya Parishad in 1949. He was actively associated with the All India Gorkha League under the late Dambar Singh Gurung and for a time assisted in editing its mouthpiece, Gorkha.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gorkha, Rasik Special Number. Vol. VIII, No. 37; Ramlal Adhikari (ed.), Rasik rachanavali.

M.D.R.
M.P.La.

RAI, DILUSINGH (Nepali; b. 1865, d. 1954), a prose writer, poet and translator, was born at Dhargaun of Rajbari Basti, Darjeeling. He did not get an opportunity for regular schooling, but was a self-educated person, well-conversant with the Vedas, the Upanishads and Sanskrit Vyakarana (grammar). He also knew six major philosophies (kshatdarshan) and the English language. He was honoured for his profound knowledge of the Sanskrit language and also for his study of many philosophies.

One of his important works, a 'sawai' (lyrical ballad), entitled Vikram sambat chhapan saalko pahirako sawai, was the result of a profound tragedy he had undergone owing to loss of life and property, caused by land slides in the Darjeeling area in 1899. The sawai comprises 218 stanzas and is written in 'sardula vikridita' metre.

Other original works of the author are: Suddartha, published by the author in 1941 and its second edition by Jagat Chhetri, published by Arya Samaj, Darjeeling, in 1969, and Bal siksha a children's book by the author published posthumously in 1969. His last work Kirathar-uko utpati is still a manuscript awaiting publication.

His translations into Nepali are: Satyartha prakash by Swami Dayanand Saraswati, Vaiseshik darshana by Rishi Kanad, and Sanskar bidhi by Swami Dayanand, enshrining 'mantras' from the Vedas and the Manu smriti. Rai's translations are in a simple and lucid Nepali language.

Rai was a teacher in a school located at Darjeeling and run by Arya Samaj, and his main aim was to build up good moral character and develop the intellect of the youth through his works.

CC-0. In Public Domain.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sa.R.

RAI, HARIPRASAD 'GORKHA' (Nepali; b. 1919), distinguished Nepali writer, was born in Kohima, Nagaland. An M.A. in Philosophy and Assamese literature from Gauhati University, he started his career as a teacher. Later, he served the All India Radio at Gauhati and Cuttack as Assistant Director. He has a good command of the Assamese, Hindi, English, Oriya and Bengali languages and can read and write several Naga dialects. He started writing early at the age of 17, and has written poems, novels, short stories and essays which appeared in noted Nepali periodicals like Himadri, Gorkha sewak, Diyalo, Gorkha, Bharati, Katha bharati, Utthan and Udaya.

His two anthologies of poems Babri (1974) and Manchariko boli (The voice of the mind, 1977) were acclaimed for their simplicity and lucid narration. One of the most popular of his poems is 'Camp uthyo' (The camp is over) which depicts life in army camps with great skill. His short stint in the Second World War as an Education Officer gave him a first-hand opportunity to experience the brutalities and vicissitudes of war.

His short stories finally got a concrete shape when his collection Yaha badnam hunchhu (I am defamed here, 1974) was published. He has been a good story teller, drawing mostly the sad facets of human life. He has also written a novel Himadri.

He has written one-act plays as well, mainly to cater to the needs of the radio. Among them,'Savitri Satyavan', 'Ek tukra roti', 'Madan','Shiv Parbati', 'Pery Sahab ko diary', 'Bank pass book','Din ra rāt' and 'Santavana' are widely acclaimed. Hariprasad has written in Assamese also, mainly in such periodicals as Awahan, Banhi, Ramdhenu, Manideep, Akan, Jeuti, Pakhila, Soumar jyoti, etc. He also co-authored Assamer janojati, edited by Pramod Bhattacharji.

His proficiency in the Naga dialects helped him co-author such books as Kabui-Hindi dictionary, Maring-Hindi shabda kosh, Garo-Hindi shabda kosh, Mikir-Hindi shabda kosh and Miri songs, published by the Hindi Bhasha Parishad of Nagaland.

The credit for starting and nurturing the Uttaranchal Anusthan in 1957, a popular Nepali radio programme, goes to him. The Government of Assam recently honoured him by including him among the ten recipients of literary pension.

J.N.
M.P.La.

RAI, INDRA BAHADUR (Nepali; b. 1927) is a short story writer, novelist and critic. He has many literary works to his credit. He was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Award in Nepali literature in 1976 for his book Nepali upanyaska adharharu (The basis of Nepali novels), a critical study of the theoretical basis of Nepali novels. Here he takes up a few writers of merit, analyses some of their works and classifies them into different philosophical or ideological categories.

Bipana katipaya (1961) is a collection of his popular short stories. Some of the impressive stories in this volume are 'Raat bhari huri chalyo' (Nightlong storm), 'Jar: bhaekai euta katha' (The paramour: a story that happened) and 'Ghosh Babu'.

His novel, Aja ramita chha (There is a fair today, 1964), is remarkable for its presentation of reality and characterisation. It not only tries to reveal the hollowness in the life of the Nepali middle class of Darjeeling, but conveys a deeper and universal meaning also—the absurdity of existence itself.

His essays are an artistic blend of his intellect and perception. 'Tipeka tippeniharu' (Picked commentaries, 1966), is a collection of his critical essays, containing some self-searching essays like 'Mero janma' (My birth) and 'Mritharuko bichma' (Among the dead).

Regarded as the chief architect of the Ayamik (Dimensional) Movement, Rai along with his friend Bairagi Kaila, shook the Nepali literary world in the sixties, with the 'claim' of creating 'Tesro ayam' (The third dimension). Rai wrote that the new literature would aim at 'uplifting man in his totality'. Many critics initially thought that dimensional writing was no more than a literary fad or an attempt to negate life and its values. But the idea, as argued by Kumar Pradhan, has a theoretical base which does not make it a pretension but aims at realism in writing. Rai himself, in an interview with Pradhan (1967), said, 'the third dimension is the climax of modernism.' According to him, it is another name of depth. It is not in understanding but in experiencing life that we find its real form. His Kathastha (1972) carries his ayamik dimension to his short stories.

His other works include Sandarbha ma Ishwar Ballav ka kavita (1976), a study of a long poem 'Euta saharko kinarama' by Ishwar Ballav; Sahityako apaharan (1983), a short treatise of a polemical nature; Darjeelingma Nepali natakko ardha satabdi (1984), history of Nepali stage and theatre at Darjeeling; and Kathputaliko man (1989), a collection of his latest short stories.

Rai steered vigorously the All India Nepali Bhasha Samiti Movement for the recognition of Nepali language and was a member of the Sahitya Akademi for many years.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ashesh Malla, Tesro ayam; Lakhi Devi Sundas (ed.), Vivechan; Uttam Kuwar, Srashta ra sahitya (Kathmandu, 1967).

M.D.R.
M.P.La.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RAI, SHIVAKUMAR (Nepali). A prominent Nepali short story writer and novelist, Shivakumar Rai was born at Rhenock in Sikkim. After graduation from St. Xavier's College, Calcutta, in 1941, he took to teaching for some time. He was one of the most active founding members of the All-India Gorkha League (1943), and later joined the West Bengal Ministry as Deputy Minister (Labour). Presently, he is the editor of the Nepali daily, Himalchuli.

The first collection of his short stories, Frontier, was published in 1951. It at once rocketed him to great popularity. Next came his second collection, Yatri (1961), which, to his own owning, contains some of his best stories. Then came his third collection, Khahare (1976), which won him the reputed Sahitya Akademi Award in 1978. Bada Dirner (1988) is his fourth collection. He has a novel, Dak Bangala (1957), and a minor epic, Daphe Chari, too to his credit.

Shivakumar Rai depicts the day-to-day lives and problems of the common people and depicts them extremely well. Often there is a predominance of plot in his stories, but they always evince subtle psychological analysis. Some of his stories are manifestly satirical and make readers think. He has also penned several beautiful stories which, though they may not be historical, have varied historical backdrops.

Bh.P.

RAI, VIVEKI (Hindi; b. 1927) was born in village Arauli, district Ballia, Uttar Pradesh. He was brought up by his mother's parents as his father had died before his birth. He struggled his way up in life and did his M.A. in 1964 as a private candidate from Kashi Vidyapith. In 1970 he earned his Ph.D. degree and joined a college at Ghazipur as lecturer in Hindi.

Viveki Rai is known for his sense of dedication to the common people. He aroused the conscience of his readers towards the pitiable condition of the rural people and depicted the spectrum of life in the fast changing villages of northern India since Independence. Besides being a poet, he has attempted almost all the genres of prose literature—novel, short story, essay, diary, sketches, reportage and criticism. However, his reputation rests mainly on his works of fiction and essays. In all his works he has focussed on the transformation of life and values in rural life as a result of the impact of modern civilization. Besides writing in Khariboli, he has written in the Bhojpuri dialect also.

Viveki Rai is still remembered for his weekly column 'Manbodh master ki diary' in the famous journal Aaj published from Varanasi. He regularly wrote this column from 1957 to 1970. Even in this column he wrote about regional problems, bringing out the gradual changes taking place in the life-style and values of the village folk.

Viveki Rai is essentially a farmer. He has not only seen the anomalies of life—social, economic, political and cultural—from close quarters, but has himself suffered in the welter of upheavals. Rooted in the soil, he has great faith in the old traditional values and simple unostentatious life of rural India. He is deeply pained when he observes that every new experiment and every new economic plan announced in the name of development benefit only the influential and rich sections of society. The common people hear only slogans and false promises. This disheartens the writer, creating a sense of helplessness and disilusionment in all his writings.

His works are known for their local colour and regional touch, but if we look at them a bit more closely we find that the problems touched are not merely local or of limited importance but they affect the villagers throughout the country and have wider implications. As a matter of fact, Viveki Rai belongs to the school of Premchand, and through his works he echoes the sentiments, the hopes and the aspirations of rural India.

His works include, Novel: Baul, Purush purana, Lok rin, Shwet patra, Sona mati; Short stories: Jivan-paridhi Nayi koyal, Gunga jahaz, Bete ki bikri, Kalatit, Viveki Rai ki shreshtha kahaniyan; Essays: Kisanon ka desh, Gaon ki duniya, Tridhara, Phir baitalva dar par, Naya gaonama; Reportage and Sketches: Julus ruka hai, Gavain gandha gulab; Criticism: Hindi upanyas: uttarshati ki uplabdhiyan, Swatantrottar Hindi katha sahitya aur gramjivan.

Ra.T.

RAICHOUDHURI,AMBIKAGIRI (Assamese; b.1885, d.1967) came of a Kayastha family and claimed his ancestry to a cousin of Shankaradeva. He was born at Barpeta, the holy town consecrated by long association with Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva. He read up to the eighth standard of the secondary school and bade goodbye to formal education. He went to Gauhati in quest of fortune but there he became associated with a few revolutionaries with their faith in armed rebellion against the British. He was soon arrested. In 1905 he was kept in detention within the town of Barpeta. Later, he became a member of the Indian National Congress wihch had already been established, and plunged into the Non-co-operation Movement of 1920-21. He was arrested and imprisoned. Dissatisfied with the indifference of the Congress leaders to the peculiar problems of Assam, Raichoudhuri founded a new organisation known as Asam Samrakshini Sabha in 1926. The sole concern of this organisation was to protect the interests of the indigenous people of Assam without opposing the struggle for independence launched by the Indian National Congress. This Samrakshini Sabha was renamed in 1933 as Asam Jatiya Mahasabha. The rift between Ambikagiri and the Congress widened which led to a complete severence of his connection with the Congress. Although Ambikagiri fought all his life for the protection of the identity and

CC-0. In Public Domain.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

interests of the Assamese people, he was not anti-India nor did he think of a separate Assam outside India.

Ambikagiri was a poet of considerable merit. There are six collections of his poems and a bunch of songs which were sung on different occasions. These collections are Vina (1912), Tumi (1925), Anubhuti (1954), Sthapan kar, sthapan kar (1958), Vandoki chandere (1958) and Vedanar ulka (1964). The last won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966. Desi Bhagavan (My country is my God, 1965) is a collection of his songs.

The poetry of Ambikagiri may be broadly classified into four categories. They are (1) patriotic lyrics surcharged with emotion calling upon the countrymen to work for the motherland; (2) love poems expressing his passion for an imaginary beloved; (3) poems of sublime love attaining mystic heights as in Tumi; and (4) poems which express a contempt for the life of ease and lethargy, and praise honest endeavour of men who are free from conceit, discrimination and hypocrisy.

Ambikagiri wrote three plays in his early life. These plays, Jayadratha badha, (1962), Kalyanamayi (1912) and Bhakta-gaurava, though not of a high order, were able to divert the fascination of the audience under the spell of translated Bengali plays. The plays were published towards the end of the sixties. Ambikagiri was also a powerful prose writer. His style reveals his personality, his patriotism, his revolutionary zeal and his passionate disposition.

His essays are collected in his Deka-dekerir Ved (The Veda of the youths and maidens, 1942) and Ahuti (1953).

S.S.
H.S.

RAIDHU (Prakrit/Apabhramsha; 15th c.), an eminent poet of the medieval age, came of a Jaina community. His parents were Harisimha and Vijausri, and wife, Savitri. Gwalior was the main scene of his literary activities. The idol of Adinatha, 57 ft. in height, in the fort of Gwalior, is said to have been consecrated by him. He had high praise for Gwalior (Gopachala nagara), the Tomar dynasty and King Dungarasimha who was a great patron of Jainism. Raidhu received patronage from Dungarsimha and his son Kirtisimha, as well as from another contemporary ruler, Rudrapratapa Chuahana.

The Apabhramsha used by Raidhu has a special significance and stands as a landmark between the Middle Indo-Aryan and the New Indo-Aryan languages. Actually, Raidhu was a narrative poet and wrote minor epics as well as stories in an artistic way as is evident from the motifs used in his works. Morevoer, he made a liberal use of proverbs and maxims. He added some Sanskrit verses also to Apabhramsha. In fact, he was a master of several languages, and used in his literary works words from four languages—Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha and Hindi. Some Prakrit verses are also found in his book Siddhathasara.

Raidhu is said to have written some 28 works, but the manuscripts of some of them have not come to light as yet. His works extant may be put in the following six categories:

(1) Puranic epics: Harivamaspurana, Parsvapurana, Mahapurana and Adipurana; (2) Narrative poems: Anathamikatha, Samyak sammatta kaumudikaha, Punnyasravakaha and Ravivratakatha; (3) Charita kavyas: Sukosala charita, Megheshwar charita, Dhanyakumar charita, Samnati charita, Jivandhar charita, Padma charita, Sripala charita, Yashodhara charita and Shantinatha; (4) Doctrinal and ethical works: Siddhanta sara and Vratasara; (5) Hymns & Jaimala: Sohamthudi, Adma Sammbodha kavya dashlakshana jaimala, Sodashkarana jaimala; (6) Muktaka: Anupreksha.

Some of the seminal words used in modern Indo-Aryan languages have been found in his works, e.g. patwari, gaddi, kothi, achau, ache (to be), atbhana (athai in Braja, Bundeli, Awadhi, Bhojpuri), ikkalla (ikkla), ekalli (akeli), kakkara (kamkara), kadahi, kisanu (kisan), kuddalu (kudal), kuhadi (kulhadi), lada, gumpha, etc.

Raidhu occupies a very significant place in Apabhramsha, as he is one of the few poets through whom we know about the later Apabhramsha language and its literary tendencies. He has employed in his epics all the important rasas and figures of speech and metres. For example, in Pasanahachariu alone he has used shringara, veera, raudra, and shanta rasas.

D.S.

RAIGADALA JEWHA JAG YETE (Marathi) is an extremely popular historical play by Vasant Kanetkar written in 1962 and staged at Bharatiya Vidyabhavan, Bombay, the same year. It has run into more than a thousand performances on the stage and has been translated into several Indian languages. The play has eight characters, the main ones being Shivaji and his son Sambhaji, Soyarabai, the step-mother of Sambhaji, ministers Hambirarao and Moropant. In the long appendix entitled 'Background', the well-known playwright explains the theme: 'The events of this play are spread from November 1676 to July 1680. I have imagined a two-year gap between the first and the second acts, and a year's gap between the second and the third.'

There are seven events which have historical veracity: Shivaji's invasion of Karnataka towards the end of 1678, appointing Shambhuraje (Sambhaji) as the chief of district Prabhavati; Shambhu escapes on 13 December 1678 and joins Dilerkhan in the Mughal camp; Shambhu returns to Panhalgarh at the end of 1679 and the father and the son meet-father giving the charge of the fort to the son, but asking Hambirarao to keep an eye on him; Rajaram's

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'thread' ceremony (1680) followed by his marriage, Shambhu attending both these functions; Shivaji's illness in March 1680 and subsequent death; Shambhu's absence from the last rites of his father; Rajaram's enthronement, followed by the arrest of Annaji and Moropant, organised by Hambirarao who reinstates Shambhu.

Some moot questions surface before the playwright. Why did Shambhu run away from his father? Did Shivaji neglect him or was he too strict, or did the son fall in bad company? Why and how did Shambhu return home? Did the Mughals treat him badly, or was he repentant? The author probes deeper into the feelings of Shambhu who felt alienated because his mother had died when he was only two years old. Jijamata, mother of Shivaji, brought him up till his fifteenth year. Shivaji married again and had a son Rajaram from his second wife. Busy as he was with his military campaigns, Shivaji had no time to look after his son. The playwright analyses the stepmother's character and the court-intrigues which tried to create a rift between the father and the son.

As drama, it is a compact play with effective and life-like characterization. The language is true to the times and the author has studied historical records to advantage. However, in treating Shivaji as an intensely human character and in analysing the cause of the generation-gap between the father and the son the play goes beyond history and tends to have a larger appeal. One of the most popular plays of the seventies, it is considered a tour de force in Marathi drama.

P.M.

RAINO PARVAT (Gujarati), a play by Ramanbhai Nilkanth, was published in 1914. Nanalal Kavi's play Jaya-Jayant was also published about the same time. The two plays, though divergent in form, are classics in the field of Gujarati drama.

Raino parvat is a play in which the tradition of Sanskrit drama is combined with the Shakespearean technique of playwriting. Its theme is drawn from a folk tale in Lalji Maniar's Bhavai sangrah. The whole play develops from a well-known 'doha', though some scholars trace its root to Kathasaritsagara. The doha reads like this:

> Everything is done by God, nothing by us,
> He alone can make a mountain out of a mustard seed.

The author's moral sense pervades the play. Apart from the moral order ordained by God, the author includes in his vision respect for women and reform in the institution of marriage.

The play is in seven acts and 35 scenes. The first act introduces king Parvatrai, Jalka, and Rai the hero of the play. In the second act, the married life of Kalyankam and Savitri is described. By introducing the character of Pushpasen, the background for the forthcoming love marriage of Durgesh and Kamla is prepared. The wounded Rai seeks protection in Kalyankam's house and gets affectionate reception from the minister and his wife, and creates a good impression by his nobility of character. There is also a suggestion of the future friendship between Durgesh and Rai.

In the third act, Rai goes out to have a look at the city with his friend Durgesh and Kamla disguised as a man. Rai succeeds in knowing the reaction of the people to old Parvatrai's attempt to regain his youth. As he goes about the city, he learns about the sad plight of women. The plot tends to be somewhat loose in this act, but it picks up in the next one. Before Rai is passed on as Parvatrai, Shital Singh takes him to Lilavati's house at Jalka's instance, but the latter's designs do not succeed. Rai shudders at the thought of impersonating as Parvatrai, since that would make him Lilavati's husband. There is a conflict in his mind, and he decides to follow the path of virtue and of honour.

In the fifth act, Rai in the guise of Parvatrai meets Lilavati. Jalka's manoeuvring proves futile, and the stage is set for the climax. The sixth act introduces the character of Vinavati and the beginning of love between her and Rai. In the seventh, Queen Lilavati offers the throne to Rai and also gives her consent to his marriage with Vinavati.

The last two acts are, perhaps, superfluous except that they show the author's concern for social reform and widow remarriage.

The structural looseness of the play is, however, made up by characterisation. Rai, Jalka, Kalyankam, Durgesh, Lilavati, Vanjul are well delineated characters. If Jalka reminds us of Lady Macbeth, Vanjul reminds us of the Vidushaka in Sanskrit plays. The handling of dramatic situations, art of characterization, dialogues, and depiction of lofty sentiments make this play a classical work.

Ra. J.

RAJA (Bengali) is a play by Rabindranath Tagore, written in 1910. It was translated into English as The King of the Dark Chamber (1914). There is also an abridged version of the play, named Arup ratan written in 1920.

The theme of the play derives from the 'Story of Kusa' which occurs in Mahavastu-avadana, edited by Rajendralal Mitra in the series 'The Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepal'.

Prince Kusa was born ugly. His father tried to disinherit him but failed. When he came of age, his mother arranged his marriage. The consort was the beautiful princess, Sudarshana. The nuptials were celebrated by proxy. The mother was apprehensive of the violent reaction of her daughter-in-law when she would see her hideous son. She, therefore, built an underground chamber where the young couple could unite. No light could enter the dark chamber, but Sudarshana longed to see her husband in daylight. So, impatience led to misery and humiliation.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The inner meaning of the story underwent a sea-change in Rabindranath's play. It assumed a new dimension and became an allegory of man's spiritual adventure. God is beauty and love. But can His beauty be seen in outward manifestation? Is His love all softness and bliss? Rabindranath's own realisation has been expressed in his essay, Amar dharma (My religion). The ultimate goal of spiritual consciousness, according to him, is Shantam Shivam Advaitam, but one must pass through Mahadbhayam vajramudyatam.

Queen Sudarshana sought God, her King, in beauty, but she found him in suffering. On the banner of her King is painted a thunderbolt within a lotus. Herein is the symbol of the central meaning of the drama. The dark chamber symbolizes the 'dark night of the soul', while the way is the way of pilgrimage. The principal characters Queen Sudarshana, Surangama her attendant, and Thakurda (the grandfather) are the symbols of the madhura, dasya and sakhya bhava respectively of the Vaishnava bhakti cult. But Raja, the play itself, is neither Buddhist nor Vaishnavite in spirit. It bears the stamp of originality and perfection of Rabindranath's art in the allegorical genre of dramatic literature.

J.B.

RAJA, K.K. (Malayalam; b. 1889, d. 1968) was an eminent Malayalam poet. Born in a feudal Kshatriya family, he studied Sanskrit in the traditional way and passed as a private candidate the 'Vidvan' examination of the University of Madras. He worked as a teacher of Malayalam at Kottayam and Ernakulam, but resigned his job during the Non-cooperation movement. Later, he joined St. Thomas College High School, Trichur, as teacher of Malayalam where he worked till his retirement in 1963. In his formative years, Raja had ample opportunities to come into close contact with poets and scholars like Kunjikuttan Tampuran, Appan Tampuran and Attur Krishna Pisharati. Even his earlier poems were marked by a perfection of form and philosophical content. He established himself as a major poet by his third published work Bashpanjali, an excellent elegy on his departed friend. In later works he emerged as a nature mystic, and wrote some of the formally perfect sonnets in Malayalam. A devotee of goddess Shakti, he sang in his later years moving paeans to his chosen deity, who manifested Herself in the beauty of nature, in perfectly constructed verses in long Sanskrit metres. His works are: Poetry: Kavanakusumanjali (1921), Tulasidamam (1932), Vellittoni (1934), Harshanjali (1939), Ashlesham (1947), Mannum vinnum (1956), Malanattil (1957), Muktavali (1960), Vananthasancharam (1964), Natakkatte nan (1967), Tirthatakan (1965); Elegy: Bashpanijali (1931); Essays : Uthirmanikal (1952); Autobiography: Smritimadhuryam (1954); Stray verses: Bhashamuktakangal (1955). He also edited, with notes, classics like Krishnagatha (1938), Chandrotsavam (1950) and Nalacharitam attakkatha (1950).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Leelavathy, Malayala kavita sahitya charitram (Trichur, 1980); T.M. Chummar, Padya sahitya charitram (Kottayam, 1973).

N.V.K.W.

RAJA NIRBANSIA (Hindi) is the first collection of Kamaleshwar's short stories, published in February 1957.

Despite its being his first collection, all the nineteen stories in the volume show a mature grasp of subject and a sensitive ear for the spoken idiom of the small towns in north India. In the preface to the volume, Kamaleshwar claims that the short story ought not be a source of mere entertainment, but it should shake the reader's conscience and force him to think. It must talk of today's problems in today's language.

The stories in the collection depict the dark, poverty-stricken and oppressive lives led by the common folk in the suburbs and small towns in India. Cities with dirty open drains, dilapidated buildings, stinking lanes and unimaginably seamy dwelling places, come to life in these dark stories, and reveal the suffering and warm fellow-feeling of human beings who crowd here.

'Deva ki maa' (Deva's mother) is a story about a family of weavers, the weavers of cotton carpets. The husband, who is a station-master, like most Indian fathers believes in being a darkly threatening presence, full of authority. The son, Deva, rebels. Between the two stands the gentle, suffering and affectionate Deva's mother, who gets the worst of the confrontation. The father moves away, the son is jailed and comes home to find his mother waiting for him as ever. Word comes that the father is ill. Deva, torn by filial pity, asks if they should go and see him. Deva's mother utters her firm negative: 'No.' She will not go, and he is not to go either.

'Bhatke hue log' (The displaced people) is an equally piognant story about the refugees, and 'Dhul ud jati hai' presents the subtly-drawn characters of Naseeban and Jumman Sain. 'Bimar admi' (The sick man), is a half-humorous, half-sarcastic story about Prakash, a young unemployed writer and Sahai Saheb, the archetypal bureaucrat with minor literary pretensions.

Two of the most moving stories of the collection are: one, ' Raja nirbansia' (The king who hath no children), a story about a seamy triangle between two men and a woman. Poiganant with misunderstandings and lost opportunities, which is choreographed as a parallel to a folk tale, which, though similar, ends on a happy note with the listeners offering flowers to the memory of the woman, whereas the story of Chanda and her two men ends tragically with a suicide. Two, the well-known story 'Kasbe ka admi', a story about one Chhote Maharaj, the archetypal small town never-do-well, and his only companion, a dumb parrot called Santu.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Raja Nirbansia with its easy command over a mellifluous and colloquial Hindi, its acutely descriptive details and unforgettable galaxy of characters, established Kamaleshwar as one of the most promising short story writers of the post-Independence period.

M.P.

RAJA RAO (English; b. 1909) was born in a Brahmin family which traces its ancestry to the illustrious Advaita philosopher Vidyaranya. He went to Hyderabad for his schooling at Madrasa-e-Aliya, and matriculated from Aligarh University. After graduating from Nizam's College in 1928 with History and English, he proceeded to France on a scholarship and studied at the University of Montpellier and the Sorbonne. He married Camille Mouly in 1931 who inspired him to become a writer. Having a streak of the spiritual recluse in him, he returned to India and visited the ashrams of Sri Aurobindo, Pandit Taranath and Ramana Maharshi. His first English novel Kanthapura was published in 1938. He was briefly associated with the underground movement of socialist leaders during 1942, edited Tomorrow for two years and worked for the revival of Indian culture through the Chetana organisation. In 1943 he met Atmananda Guru of Trivandrum and became his disciple. He returned to France after the Guru's passing away. Since 1965 he has divided his time between France, India and the United States. As Professor of Philosophy he teaches one semester a year at the University of Texas, Austin. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award for his novel The Serpent and the Rope in 1964, and was honoured with Padma Bhushan by the President of India in 1969.

Raja Rao's first published work was in Kannada, but he switched over to writing in English soon after. The short stories he wrote in the 1930s and early 40s have been collected in The Cow of the Barricades and Other Stories (1947). As a college student he drew inspiration from Gandhi's My Experiments with Truth which appeared in Young India as a serial, and later there was his involvement with Gandhi's Quit India Movement in 1942. The title story is an evocation of the conditions in rural India influenced by the Gandhian advent. The non-violent movement of Gandhi quite often became violent, and the silent sufferers were the dumb millions of the nation, strikingly symbolised by the cow, Gauri. The mythopoeic way in which Gandhism percolated to the most backward parts of our land becomes the subject of 'Narsiga'. The stories also contain several brilliant portraits of rural people. Javni, Akkayya, Sata and old Venkamma are familiar to us in our everyday life. Stories published after 1947, however, have tended to move away from the elegant simplicity of the earlier phase, and have given way to idea-stuffing and quaint fantasy as seen in the new tales in the collection, The Policeman and the Rose (1978). But they are engaging experiments with 'Sanskritic English'.

Kanthapura (1938) has a puranic quality about it and established Raja Rao as a unique stylist when it was published. He refers to the problems faced by an Indian wielding a foreign language in the course of a thought-provoking preface: 'We cannot write like the English. We should not. We cannot write only as Indians. We have grown to look at the large world as part of us.' Stripping English of all sophistication, Raja Rao made it transmute the speech-rhythms of the idiom-rich Indian language into an expressive tool. The story is told by a Brahmin widow, and the tale is about the eternal struggle between good and evil, here personified by Gandhi and the Gandhians on the one hand, pitted against the British Raj on the other. Kanthapura is a typical self-sufficient village at peace with the world. The educated youth of the village respond to the Gandhian call for non-cooperation and Harijan uplift. The age-old tradition-bound society of the village is shaken to the foundations. Police violence leads to shameful deeds and silent heroism. The non-violent hero, Moorthy, is jailed, and the Gandhians are driven out of the village. Social customs, the beauty and harshness of rural life, the moral myopia of the middle classes, the soul-destroying poverty of the working class and the essential nobility of human beings under stress are admirably sketched in this 'veritable Grammar of the Gandhian myth'. The long-winding sentences flow like the river Hymavathy, evoking the old-world atmosphere, giving the novel a poetic articulation.

More than two decades elapsed before Raja Rao's second novel, The Serpent and the Rope (1960), came out. It was hailed as a literary event. Drawing generously on his student years in France and with a definite autobiographical framework, the novel is about Rama, the Brahmin from Mysore, his research, love-life and spiritual quest. Intellect intrudes in the storytelling which lacks a single focus as in Kanthapura. Exasperating, yet the novel conveys well the problems of a sensitive Indian intellectual caught between the past and the present, the East and the West.

The Cat and Shakespeare (1965) is certainly a riddle in the form of a novel and the author himself has called it 'a metaphysical comedy'. The adventures in advaitic consciousness found in the earlier novel are given a further lease of life with the Mother Cat as a symbol of Grace in the person of the Guru. The story is about a revenue office clerk and his extra-marital affair, his philosopher-neighbour Govindan Nair and the problems and pains of red-tapism which makes the acquisition of a ration card a Himalayan task. A barrage of queries and patches of description are presented in a panting style termed 'Upanishadic' by a critic.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Comrade Kirillov (1976) is about Padmanabhan Iyer who becomes a communist, takes the name of Kirillov, marries a Czech woman and lives in the west for twenty years. But the pull of Indian roots is very strong. As his cousin says, 'I told you Kirillov was an Indian—and his Indianhood will break through every communist chain.' An Indian may go where he likes, but his soul will ultimately pull him back to India, and between an Indian and a westerner there can never be a union of souls. Irene realises this at last and knows that one day he will be lost to her; and try as she might, she cannot respond to India as he will like her to. The novel has its clear affiliations with The Serpent and the Rope.

Taken together, Raja Rao's writings present a rich experience of Indian life at many levels, and he is certainly a major Indo-Anglian movelist.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.D. Narasimhaiah, Raja Rao (New Delhi, 1973); K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, Indian Writing in English (Bombay, 1973); M.K. Naik, Raja Rao (New York, 1972).

P.N.

RAJAB ALI BEG (Urdu)
See Under 'SUROOR'

RAJABALI (Bengali), published in 1808, was written by Mrityunjay Vidyalankar (c.1762-1819), who tried to give an account of the kings ruling India before the British. The introductory chapter of the book deals with physical geography: the earth, the distribution of land water, the solar system, etc. His geography is largely based on the puranas. The neighbouring countries of India have been shown as Avanti, Simhala, Konkan, Kaveri, Lanka, etc., which are not always correct. Kaveri, for example, is not a country or a state; it is a river; similarly Lanka and Simhala are not two different countries. Mrityunjay mentions many kings in his book, belonging to the Mahabharata and the Ramayana age. He provides a long list of the kings of the Gautama and Nanda dynasties: of them many are legendary. He mentions the name of a legendary king, Vikramaditya, but not of Kalidasa. Mrityunjay provides an account of the Muslim kings also. The book is a curious mixture of facts and fiction.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Banerjee, Sahitya sadhak charitamala, Vol.1 (1940); Sajanikanta Das, Bangla gadya sahityer itihas (1946); S.K.Das, Early Bengali Prose : Carey to Vidyasagar (1966).

Na. S.

RAJAGOPAL, K.V. (Kannada; b. 1924) is a poet, researcher and short story writer. An M.A. of Karnatak University, he served as lecturer and later as Principal of M.S.S. College, Bangalore, whereafter he joined the Department of Drama, Dance and Music at Bangalore University. A Navya poet and short story writer, Rajagopal has in recent years evinced deep interest in drama and has raised interesting and stimulating issues both in his poems and in his stories, and is alive to the harsh realities of life. An iconoclast, he can recognize what deserves respect. Among his works are: Poetry: Anjura, Nadiya melina gali; Stories: Ragajayanthi, Enisada hana, Ardha tereda bagilu; Plays: Naalku raido natakagalu and Bedagina binnana. He has also translated Shakespeare's Coriolanus into Kannada.

L.S.S.R.

RAJAGOPALACHARI, CHAKRAVARTI (English/Tamil; b. 1878, d.1972), popularly known as Rajaji, lawyer, statesman, man of letters, India's last Governor-General, was one of the makers of modern India. Born in a family of modest means (his father was a village munsif or headman), he had his education at Hosur, Bangalore and Madras, and started practice as a lawyer at Salem in 1900 and quickly reached the front rank in his profession. He was early drawn into politics and social reform and as Chairman of the Salem Muncipality took active steps towards the uplift of the untouchables (Harijans as they were to be called later). He shifted to Madras in 1919, and next year joined Mahatma Gandhi's Non-cooperation Movement. During the next three years, he was very close to Gandhi and was acknowledged as an authoritative interpreter of the Gandhian theory and practice of satyagraha and as a constructive and fearless upholder of Gandhian values and verities in public life. In 1924-30, Rajagopalachari established the Gandhi- Ashram at Tiruchengodu, and the main thrust of his activities was the eradication of drink and untouchability, and the promotion of village industries and rural uplift and self-reliance. He returned to active politics in 1930 at the time of Gandhi's Salt Satyagraha Movement, and led the march to the Vedaranyam salt pans. As earlier in 1921, he was jailed agian; coming out of it he helped shape the Yeravada Pact in 1932 and vigorously advocated the admission of Harijans into Hindu temples. With the coming of provincial autonomy in 1937, Rajagopalachari became Premier of the Madras province, and gave a clean, efficient and progressive administration for two years before he resigned along with the other Congress premiers. He did not see eye to eye with Gandhi on the 'Quit India' Movement, but after the second World War, he joined the interim Government at New Delhi in 1946. On the coming of Independence on 15 August 1947, he became Governor of West Bengal, and next year, Governor-General of India, retiring in January 1950. He returned to the central government later in the year, and became Chief Minister of Madras again in 1952 and restored political stability to the state. During the last decade and a half of his life, he became a forceful critic of the policies of the Congress government, founded the Swatantra Party in 1959, carried on a campaign against nuclear proliferation in an evangelical spirit, met President J.F. Kennedy to elicit his support for the cause, and generally stood in the vanguard of public life as an exemplar of probity, courage and foresight.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Alongside his extraordinary career as a leader in politics and social reform, Rajagopalachari was also a tireless man of letters who wrote with uncommon ease and power in Tamil as well as in English. He edited journals in Tamil and English (including Gandhi's Young India in 1922), and during the last two decades of his life contributed regularly to the columns of Swarajya in English and Kalki in Tamil. He popularized science in Tamil and gave lucid expositions of Socrates, Marcus Aurelius, Tiruvalluvar, Torumoolar, Nammalvar, the Upanishads and the Gita, and he retold the Ramayana and the Mahabharata in the idiom of the modern age. These recitals of the ancient epics are not only miracles of condensation but carry their own stamp of distinction. Rajagopalachari was a fabulist and short-story writer, too, who could make the art of imaginative fiction serve the cause of the ideal of good life. Rajagopalachari's was a difficult and combative life, yet also a purposive and glorious one. Every letter in the alphabet of his long life was legible and living and meaningful, and the many honours that came to him also honoured themselves in the process. Rajagopalachari was verily a Titan of modern times, 'good, great and joyous, beautiful and free', and his life was crowned with 'joy, empire and victory'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. Rajagopalachari, A Jain Diary (1941); The Mahabharata, The Ramayana, and other Works (Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan); Satyameva Jayate, 3 Volumes (Bharatan Publications, Madras), Rajaji (Bharatan Publications, 1971); Masti Venkatesa Iyengar, Rajaji, 2 Volumes (1975); Monica Felton, I Meet Rajaji (1962); Rajmohan Gandhi, The Rajaji Story, Vol. I. 'A Warrior from the South' (Bharatan Publications, 1978).

K.R.S.I.

TAMIL: Like Mahatma Gandhi, Rajaji had a moral dimension to all his activities and an unswerving personal conviction. This attitude governed his literary works also for which he found time while in jail or during retirement or self-exile from politics. He took to writing not with any notion of contributing to literature but with an avowed purpose of carrying a message.

Early in the twenties, he started an Ashram at Tiruchengodu in his native Salem district, and as part of his Ashram activities, he started a magazine, Vimochanam (Liberation). This was where his writing career started and Vimochanam carried his stories. The message included the evils of drinking and untouchability. The stories were not in a blatant, propagandist vein: they were quiet in tone, never loud, though a slice of life would certainly emerge and characters would not be dry abstractions, but related to contemporary life and the moral confrontation in that setting. Consequently, the moral issues faced in the world too became his concern. There is a beautiful Panchanatra-like tale on the need for unilateral disarmament of nuclear weapons which he was then seriously advocating, but mercifully without the last paragraph telling the moral of the story. In another story he has his dig at the omniscient elders, saying, 'the children will understand this story, but not the elders. The grown-ups will think this is about the German question.'

Some of his stories invite a serious consideration from literary critics. Some were reviewed in literary journals like Manikkodi (an avant-garde literary journal of the thirties). Pudumaipittan has this to say about Rajaji's stories: 'All of Rajaji's stories are without exception propagadist, no doubt. But they don't lose their literary charm, however, because of this intent. There may be some exceptions to this. But the story value and their literary merit are not marred by this.' Some of Rajaji's successful stories are 'Devanai', 'Rayappan,' 'Seetharamaiah', 'The Minister,' etc. Rajaji took strong objection to Pudumaipittan's handling of the stories in the epics, the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, in order to lend his perception to them and question them. This in Rajaji's view amounted to distortion and tampering with their sanctity.

Rajaji considered the epics sacrosanct and felt that they must be accepted as they were handed down to us, even with all later interpolations and accretions. He was also fully aware of the variations in handling differing perceptions and the differing needs of the age, between Valmiki's in Sanskrit and Kamban's in Tamil.

When he withdrew from politics for a short while during the Quit India Movement, he devoted his spare time to retelling the Ramayana for children in the form of a string of stories. And again in 1953-54, soon after quitting the Chief Ministership of Madras, he took to retelling the Mahabharata in the same fashion.

For several years, Rajaji contributed to the children's magazine Kannan. His writing was lucid, with an easy flow. His diction was simple and precise, with minimum of words. He had practised and perfected this style right through. It is amazing that a man of so incisive an intellect as Rajaji could take to children as his audience and fashion such a simple, lucid and precise style. And he would stop at places in the narrative to explain why such noble characters and some of them gods in human form erred, and what the purpose of Valmiki or Vyasa was in depiciting such shades in those characters. And again at other places he would pause to tell what these would mean in terms of our contemporary life.

The retelling of these two epics had been a tremendous success both in Tamil and in their English translation. In Rajaji's view, 'the writing of these two books is, in my opinion, the best service I have rendered to my people.' The sincerity of this statement is transparent and is evidenced by the attitude that governed his writing throughout.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

One of his stories, 'Thikkatra Parvati', was filmed in the late seventies, after his death. Though it turned out to be a very good film in Tamil, aesthetically satisfying, one couldn't be sure if it would have met with his approval, since his antipathy to films was only too well-known.

Rajaji's works include stories, parables, tales, mini stories in various collections like Rajaji kutti kathaigal, Niranthara selvam, Karpanai kadu, Atma chintanai (Marcus Aurelius' Meditations), Socrathar (of Socrates), Upanishada palahani (Upanishads), Ramakrishna Upanishadam (Upanishadic teachings of Sri Ramakrishna), Kannan kattia vashi (rendering of Bhagavadgita), Thozhamai yoham (St Laurence's teachings), Chakravarti Thirumagan (Ramayana retold), Vyasar virundu (Mahabharata retold) and selections from Kamban's epic Ramayana in English verses for UNESCO. Chakravarti Thirumagan won the Sahitya Akademi Award for literature in 1958.

Rajaji's tales are not to be measured by the yardstick of our modern concept of short story as a literary form. If the Panchatantra tales and the stories of Kathasagar and Hitopadesha have an enduring value, then Rajaji's tales are also of abiding merit. The vastness of his experience and the incisive insight of his long life have been distilled in his stories and it is life itself that emerges from them.

Ve.S.

RAJAGOPALAN, K.P. (Tamil; b.1901, d.1944) is one of the two great Tamil short story writers of the pre-Independence era, the other being Pudumaippittan. During a major part of his life, 'Ku.Pa.Ra', as he was popularly called, had to fight for a living. For a short spell, he suffered loss of eye-sight. For a while, immediately prior to his demise, he edited Girama uliyana, a semi-monthly devoted to Tamil literature, published from Turaiyur, Thanjavur district. Even the loss of eye-sight did not deter him from writing. Besides short stories, he wrote one-act plays, free verses, an uncompleted novel (Verottam), literary criticism, social, psychological and political essays, and essays on music and films. He also translated Tolstoy, Bankimchandra Chatterjee and R.L Stevenson into Tamil.

Ku. Pa. Ra. had an intuitive sense for the form of the short story. He could sketch in bare, essential details, without having recourse to interpretative incursions, and establish effective communication by understatement. He was a pioneer in tackling sex themes, notably man-woman relationships, in their full spectrum of warm and cold hues. 'Arramai', (Unbearable),'Chiridu velichcham' (A bolt of light), 'Kuralum padilum' (The response), 'Tay' (The mother), 'Kanakambaram' (Bright fragrance-less flower), 'Pudir' (Puzzle), 'Vishalakshi', 'Iyarkiyin verri' (Nature is victorious), 'Puriyum kadai' (On the surface), 'Enna dairiyam' (What courage?), 'Enna vendum' (What do you want?) are some of his popular stories. His portrayals of characters caught in embarrassing situations are like minitature paintings, the delicacy and tact of which would evoke envy in any diplomat.

Ku. Pa. Ra's views on the eternal mismatch between love and life are reflected in his short stories, 'Nur Unnisa', 'Kadal nilai' (The high point of love), 'Kamuvin kadai'(Story of Kamu), and his essay 'Chadaipparrarra kadal' (Non-physical love).

Ku. Pa. Ra. was sensitive to the emerging voice of women for independence and dignity, and gave expression to it in 'Sita', 'Tay', 'Yar mel pisagu '(She is to blame), 'Dhanabhagyattin tolil' (Dhanabhagyam's means of livelihood), and 'Ahaligai' (Ahalya). The story, 'Mahabodham', probably reveals Ku.Pa.Ra.'s philosophy of life. Pain and sorrow are inseparable from birth and death. Pleasure, unsullied by pain or sorrow, is non-existent. The way to lead a life is by coming to terms with suffering. In his essay, 'Pudu eluttu' (New writing), Ku.Pa.Ra. reveals his penchant for waging a long struggle in life where emotions grow in intensity, if confronted by sorrow, poverty, or decline; joys, sorrows and frustrations are inseparable parts of life. Of the many carefully sculpted short stories, 'Vidiyuma?' (Awaiting the dawn) is probably the finest and most-imitated, with all the characteristics of a great short story: pregnant beginning, tersely worded sentences which portray the desired ambience, intensity, tautness, external-internal nexus, and release of tension. The story lends itself admirably to philosophical interpretation: the continuing human attempts against fate, vainly looking for silver linings in the enveloping gloom. C.S. Chelleppa, Tamil writer and critic,in his Tamilil ilakkiya vimarshanam (Literary criticism in Tamil) hails 'Vidiyuma?' as a perpetual literary delight. Another remarkable story is 'Uyirin alaippu' (The alluring life). While Pudumaippittan's voice is resounding, Ku.Pa.Ra.'s is a mild whisper. Ku.Pa.Ra. succeeds more by understatement than by vivid descriptions of repressed emotions and extramarital excursions. Pudumaippittan, on the other hand, portrays the nature of stark desire with astounding realism. Both have a balanced outlook resulting from their long experience of handling a variety of themes to distinguish sex from obscenity, realism from reportage, and the eternal from the ephemeral.

His other works include Kannan en kavi (Kannan, my poet), Kanchanamalai (The garland of gold), Punar janmam (Rebirth), Chiridu velichcham (A bolt of light, literary miscellany, 1969). His translations are Devi Chaudhurani and Durgeshanandini (from Bengali), Irattai manitan (Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde), Tolstay kadaigal (Stories of Tolstoy).

BIBLIOGRAPHY; C.S. Chellappa, Tamilil ilakkiya vimarshanam (Madras, 1974); Kalaikkalanchiyam, Tamil valarchik kalakam (Madras, 1954-1968); M. Ramalingam, Irupadam nurrandut Tamil ilakkiyam (Madras, 1973); Madhu S. Vimalanandam, Tamil ilakkiya

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

varalaru (Madurai,1979); S. Vijayalakshmi, Vallikkannan: kalattin kural (Tirunelveli, 1980).

K.Su.

RAJALAKSHMI N. RAO (Kannada; b. 1934) is a lesser known writer of short stories who wrote in the early fifties. Her work is limited to Sangama (1956), a single collection of twelve stories, which was not easily available till it was reprinted in 1985.

Rajalakshmi is the grand-daughter of the well-known writer B.M. Srikantaiah. She graduated from Mysore University and later acquired a post-graduate degree in English literature.

Rajalakshmi started writing at a time when the Navya literary movement in Kannada was gaining ground. She was deeply influenced by the pioneers of the movement like Adiga and Ramachandra Sharma. Accordingly in her work, traits like complexity of thought and expression, the less obvious links between a story and its title, the use of original and shocking images and metaphors, erudition that comes through in her choice of themes, symbols and quotations, and depiction of the innermost conflicts of the human mind which typify Navya writing are discernible. However, the freshness and power of her writing are striking even today after the Navya movement has seen its last glory.

Rajalakshmi's work becomes all the more significant when we attempt to place her in the context of the writing of women writers. In terms of both content and expression, her work stands out as most daring and original, without losing the sensitivity and authenticity of the feminine consciousness.

Va. V.

RAJAM IYER, B.R. (Tamil; b.1872, d.1898). By a strict critical yardstick, B.R. Rajam Iyer's Kamalambal charitram (1893) should be considered the first Tamil novel, though it is customary to give the credit to Vedanayagam Pillai's Pratapa Mudaliar charitram (1879) since it was the first long tale in prose.

Rajam Iyer was just twenty-one years of age when he started writing the novel Kamalabal charitram as a serial in a monthly magazine Vivekachoodamani from 1893-1895, and though there were a few, just a few, other prose works written earlier, he had nothing to go by, if we take the literary qualities of his writing into account. He was born in a small village, Vathalakundu, in Madurai district, where he had his early education. He then came to Madras, graduated in History and took a Law Degree as well. He was a very studious man, given to voracious reading, and well equipped in European history, English literature and European classics. He was well up in Tamil and Sanskrit classics too, and in Tamil his favourites were the Bhakti poets Kamban and Thayumanvar. He was conversant with French and Russian writings through English but did not have much of a liking for French.

But then, by the time he started writing his first novel, in fact the first novel in Tamil language, his interests had crossed the literary confines and started traversing the Vedantic world. All the Upanishads (not merely the familiar and principal Upanishads), Shankara and Bhagwad Gita claimed his interest. And yet, he was writing a serial, Kamalambal charitram, an untraversed territory so far, with a proclaimed confession that he was not interested in telling a story. For after all, he said, literature was only a wayside resting place for a traveller seeking the Unknown.

He explained his attitude to literature thus: 'God's creation is a vast ocean. Its waves beat on the shores and throw up so much bubbles of foam. One looks into a single bubble and then again concentrates on only a single atom of that bubble. One sees Him in that atom. That is wonderous excitement; I dance and sing in joyous abandon... My writings are that joyous abandon... The soul of the man born on earth undergoes endless sufferings, but at the end of it all, it attains a state of unblemished bliss. Unfolding this truth is the purpose of my writing this story... While writing this story, I have not been at peace. My mind has often been disturbed and endlessly assailed and that has marred my effort.'

He did not attach any significance to literature: yet his was a pioneering achievement in the Tamil novel. He was often seen lost in meditation, uncommunicative and yet there was so much humour, so much amused enjoyment of the individual characteristics, idiosyncracies and mannerisms of men and matters of life around which abound in his novel and even philosophical writings. Towards the end of 1897, a few months before his death, he lost all interest in even philosophical writings, saying that all writing was pointless and that time should better be utilised in meditation. And yet he started writing, of all things, another novel, Vasudeva Sastri or True Greatness, in English.

His writing career lasted just about seven years from 1892 to 1898, most of which period was spent in meditation or in discourses or in prolonged illness. All this, however, qualitatively affected the writing of his novel, but the 600 pages or so of his philosophical or religious writings, which he did in two years time when he was Editor of Prabhudda Bharata (1896-1898), were filled almost by himself under various pseudonyms. He was chosen at the age of twenty-four to be its editor by none else than Swami Vivekananda himself.

The first half of Kamalambal charitram shows Rajam Iyer as a superb artist, a writer of the first order laying down, as it were, literary norms for all creative works to come thereafter. With a very facile pen he could give a realistic portrayal of a situation and characters. Such an achievement was possible for the first time in Tamil fiction. The rhythm and mores of life around him in those years came alive which we would not have otherwise known. Right from the beginning, in his literary preferences his bias was towards poetry both in English and in Tamil, and this showed in his prose which he handled with great creative imagination and poetic flavour. Such felicity and deftness in the craft of fiction writing became visible again in the Tamil novel only in the forties.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

However, the second half of the novel is all crowded up with events, with an extraordinary contrivance in the sequence of their happenings, though the events by themselves, in their isolation, are credible. It looks as though Rajam Iyer became impatient and wanted to get the unbearable burden off his chest as fast and as abruptly as possible.

Rajam Iyer's critical perception surfaced with his first critical study in English of Kachchi kalambagam, a work of devotional poetry in Tamil for his Presidency College magazine in 1890 when he was just 19. This was soon followed by another study on Manonmaniyam, a contemporary work of Tamil drama in verse.

Rambles in Vedanta, which is a 600-page collection of his writings in English on philosophy and religion, gives ample evidence of his almost encyclopaedic knowledge of philosophy, both eastern and western, knowledge of continental literatures, Sanskrit and Tamil literary and religious classics, and current affairs.

Even in his philosophical writings, his sense of humour had its own way of making its presence, enlivening and flavouring his thought and style. He would describe his idea of destroying the separate identity of self in the process of merging itself with the Supreme as 'suicide' and wrote a long essay entitled 'Glories of Suicide'. In another, he described 'ahankaram' (ego) as an emperor, the human body as his empire and 'Vedanta' as a seditious thought out to destroy any mighty emperor and his empire with a sure enough power and potential. The whole long article, 'Vedanta and the Emperor of Emperors' was replete with expressions like 'sedition, overthrow of government, rebellion, subversion, mutiny, grave political blunder', etc.

During all these nine decades after Rajam Iyer's death, only Tamil literary world knows him and that too as just one of the early novelists. This hardly does justice to the fullness of his varied talents.

Ve.S.

RAJAM KRISHNAN (Tamil; b.1925) is one of the leading novelists in Tamil. Her father, a school master, encouraged her literary talents even from her younger days. She studied only up to the fifth form at the local High School, but was a self-taught person and read by herself the famous English novelists like Dickens and Jane Austen. Among the Tamil novelists she was influenced by Matavaiya and Venkataramani. From 1946 onwards her short stories were published in many popular Tamil journals. Her novel Pen kural depicts the struggle of a married girl in a Hindu joint family. Her Malarkal (Flowers, 1945) portrays the life of a girl who moves in the realms of the conscious as well as the subconscious.

Rajam Krishnan studied the life of the hill tribe, called Badagas. Their simple life slowly coming under the influence of modern civilization has been depicted in her novel Kurinchitten (Honey of the mountain, 1963). Many critics acclaimed this novel as unique and it has been translated into many Indian languages.

Dr. Rangachari (1965), her one actual biographical study, ranks among the best biographies in Tamil. Observing the social changes among field workers, labourers and technicians on the site of the Kundah Hydel Project, she painted their life in her novel Amutamaki varuka (1966). The political upsurge in other parts of India too attracted her. Her novel Valaikkaram has for its setting Goa's struggle for freedom from the Portuguese.

With rare courage she travelled in the dacoit-infested regions of North India and wrote her famous novel Mullum malarntatu (Even a cactus blooms, 1974), describing the human side of the dacoits. She visited the southern coastal areas of Tamil Nadu and other industrial areas, and produced her realistic novels like Alaivaykkariyil (1978), Karippu manikal (1979) and Kuttukkunchukal (1980), portraying the sufferings of the fishermen, saltpan workers and child labourers.

After visiting the USSR she highlighted the Soviet woman's position and status in Annaiyar pumi (1978).

Her recent novels show her at her best in form and organisation of material and in lucidity. And she has a definite outlook on life. Even her fantasies are symbolic and never meaningless. Symbolism is a dangerous weapon except in the hands of a true artist. With her it is never too obtrusive. Her literary style, on the whole, is attractive and because of her experience with varied cultural and linguistic communities, she has a wide range of themes.

Rajam Krishnan has received several awards and recognitions for her novels and short stories. Her story 'Uchiyum unarvum' (Needle and sensibility) got the first prize in the international short story contest held in 1952 by The New York Herald Tribune. Her novel Pen kural (Voice of a woman) won the Narayanachami Aiyar Prize in Kalaimagal Novel contest in 1953. Some other short stories like 'Katichikal' (Visions) and 'Osaikal' (Sounds) also won prizes. She received the Sahitya Akademi Award for her novel Verukku nir (Water for roots) in 1973, and the first prize in the Ananda Vikatan Novel Competition for Malargal (Flowers). Her Valaikkaram received the Soviet Land Nehru Award.

Her other major works are: Anbuk kadal (The vast expanse of love, 1954), Mayachchulal (The enchanting swirl, 1959), Bhanuvin kadalan (Bhanu's fiance, 1959), Malaiyaruvi (The mountain stream, 1960), Nilar kolam

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(The patterns in shadow, 1967), Vidiyu mun (Before the dawn, 1969), Vilangukal (Beats, 1975), Rojaitalkal (Rose petals, 1973), Kudugal (Nests, 1974), Mullum malarntadu (The thorn too has blossomed, 1974), Chalangal (Movements, 1977), Vidu (The house, 1977), Alaivayk karaiyil (Along the shore, 1978), Annaiyar bhumi (The mother's land, 1978), Karippu manigal (Bitter beads, 1979), KLuttuk kunchukal (The hand-held lamp, 1959), Alaigal (Waves, 1965), Kattukkaval (Wellguarded, 1970), Irudiyum todakkamum (The end and the beginning, 1971), Alaikadalil (In the seas, 1972). Pavittira (1973), Manidanum jotiyum (The mand and the spark, 1980); stories: Nittiya malligai (Jasmine, 1958), Malai roja (The rose from the mountains, 1958), Alli (Lily, 1958), Pachchaik kodi (The green flag, 1958), Vadikal (The safety valve, 1976), Uyirpuu (The sap, 1978); Non-fiction: Pudiya gitam ichaikkinrar (They are singing anew, 1978).

V. Ve.

RAJAN, BALACHANDRA (English; b. 1920) is an eminent Indo-English novelist, poet, editor and scholar. He was educated at Presidency College, Madras, and at Cambridge University, from where he secured First Class Tripos in both Economics and English. He was the recipient of the first Fellowship in English to be awarded by Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1946, he was awarded the Ph.D. degree in English by Cambridge University. He was Director of Studies in English, Trinity College, 1945-46, and gave lectures on Modern Poetry in Cambridge University during that period.

Rajan joined the Indian Foreign Service in 1948. He represented India on several international bodies, and worked as Chairman, Children's Fund, for a brief spell before taking over as Head of the English Department, Delhi University. He also worked as Visiting Professor at the Institute of Research in the Humanities, University of Wisconsin, Madison (USA), and was Senior Professor of English, University of Ontario, Canada.

His works include Paradise Lost and the Seventeenth Century Reader (1947), T.S. Eliot: A Study of His Writings by Several Hands (ed. 1949), Modern American Poetry (ed. 1950), The Dark Dancer (1957), Paradise Lost: A Tricentenary Tribute (1960), Too Long in the West (1961), Paradise Lost (ed. 1964), W.B. Yeats: A Critical Introduction (1965), The Lofty Rhyme (1970). Earlier, Rajan's poems appeared as a collection in Monsoon (1945). They were also published in The Atlantic Monthly and New World Writing.

Rajan's novel The Dark Dancer was a Book Society choice and was translated into German and Swedish. As a novelist he has been taken note of by critics like Meenakshi Mukherjee (The Twice-born Fiction, 1972) and Raji Narasimhan (Sensibility under Stress, 1975), but a full length critical work on the novelist is still a desirable intellectual venture. East-West encounter is a major theme in his novels. His characters, exposed to Western culture, find it difficult to adjust to Indian society. He seems to laugh at everything—sentiments, tradition, education, revolution, reconstruction. He feels that the English language has met the challenge in being an expression of external landscape and interior vision. His poems reveal a variety of subjects and felicity of style. He was the founder and editor of Focus, a miscellany in book form devoted to various aspects of contemporary writing.

As a scholar of English literature, Rajan's work on Paradise Lost is considered a vital source-material on Milton. Besides his Milton studies, he has given new dimension to scholarly pursuits on Eliot and Yeats, and his critical works have been highly acclaimed both in the east and in the west and have won wide recognition for his scholarship and insight.

B. R. N.

RAJANIKANTHA RAO, BALANTHRAPU (Telugu; b. 1920) is the son of Balanthrapu Venkata Rao, one of the illustrious twin poets, Venkata Parvateesa Kavulu. He established himself as a successful poet and transcreator. He was also a musicologist and composer of great eminence. His Satapatra sundari, a collection of songs, and Vishwa veena, a collection of operas, have a unique place in Telugu literature. His exhaustive and comprehensive study Andhra vaggeyakara chitramu (History of Andhra musicologists), which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1961, is the most definite and authoritative work so far in Telugu.

Rajanikantha Rao has written hundreds of musical plays for All India Radio. He joined the Madras All India Radio, and rose steadily till he became its Director. His musical radio play From the Mountain to the Sea, depicting the course of the majestic river Godavari across the Indian peninsula, won him an international award.

Rajanikanta Rao is also a scholar in Telugu and Sanskrit. He won several State awards and the Sahitya Akademi Award, as well as the prestigious Japan Radio Prize for his musical play on the river Godavari in 1977. He also won the Akashavani Award for his Sanskrit opera Meghasandesham in 1977. An honorary degree of Doctor of Letters, 'Kala Prapurna', was conferred on him in 1980 by Andhra University, Waltair.

Sh. M.A.

RAJAPUROHIT, JAYATEERTHA SESHACHAR (Kannada; b. 1925, d. 1986), novelist and short-story writer, was born in Kanakagiri in Raichur district in an orthodox Vedic family and educated in Sanskrit and the Vedas.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Against the wishes of his parents and with great difficulty, he acquired modern education. He worked as a High School teacher, and participated in the freedom struggle and, in Hyderabad, in the struggle against the Razakars. Afterwards he joined the Revenue Department of Hyderabad Government, and later entered the I.A.S. He became the first Registrar of the new Gulbarga University. In addition to Kannada and English, he was proficient in Hindi and Urdu also.

His works are: Short-story collections: Paravvana panchayathi, Rohini, Moulyagalu, Shithila shile; Operas: Thungeyangaladall Kumara Vyasa; Novels: Halu-jenu, Suligali; Translations: The Sea Wolf, with the title Kadala tola.

In his stories and novels Rajapurohit is a realist, interested in the changing values and attitudes of society. Suligali, which won the Karnarataka Sahitya Academy Award, deals with the historical police action in Hyderabad State and the Razakar terrorism which led to it, and the disintegration of aristocracy which paved the way for both.

Rajapurohit's Kannada teerpugalu (Judgements in Kannada) published by Mysore University, 1976, was the first work of its kind in Kannada, and was widely welcomed. A felicitation volume, Jayateertha, was presented to him in 1980.

His other works include Jaya Bangla (Drama); Kanakagiri (History); Jagannathadasaru Ramatirtha (Biography); British alikeya arthika talapaya (Tr.); Tunga taranga, Pampa sampada, Racheri kaipidi (Edn.).

V.H.

RAJARAJA VARMA, A.R. (Malayalam; b. 1863, d. 1918) was a famous grammarian, literary theorist, poet and educationist. His monumental efforts in the field of Malayalam grammar earned him the honorific title 'Kerala Panini' (Panini of Kerala).

Rajaraja Varma was born in the house of a ruling chief which had traditional marriage relationship with the royal dynasty of the erstwhile state of Travancore.

He had had his early education with tutors at home. An important part of his education was under his uncle Kerala Varma Valia Koil Tampuran (1845-1914), a great Sanskrit and Malayalam scholar and doyen of literature. Rajaraja Varma had his college education partly privately and partly at Maharaja's College, Trivandrum. He graduated from Madras University and took his M.A. in Sanskrit from the same University.

In 1894 he became the head of the Sanskrit College at Trivandrum. In 1889 he was appointed Superintendent of Vernacular Studies at Maharaja's College, his own alma mater. He was appointed the first Professor of Sanskrit and Dravidian Languages at this college in 1910.

Rajaraja Varma's lasting fame rests on his monumental contribution in the fields of language and literature. He was the first to produce scholarly textbooks in Malayalam grammar, poetics, prosody and prose. The need for such works he felt as a teacher prompted him to fill the lacunae by writing them himself. Thus was written the Kerala Paniniyam (A grammar of Malayalam on Panini's lines, 1896. A revised edition appeared in 1917. Kerala Paniniyam, as its name indicates, is written on the model of Panini's analytical methods. In the first edition the author even used the sutras as Panini did. These were replaced in the second work by pithy verses. Kerala Paniniyam presents a complete analysis of Malayalam, its phonology, morphology and syntax. The author has used a synthesis of Panini's methods with modern grammatical ideas. There is a lengthy Introduction which is a brilliant study of the history of the language in the context of the Dravidian family of languages.

Rajaraja Varma also wrote three primers for use in schools. These are Shabdashodhini (A study of grammar, 1902), Madhyama vyakaranam (Intermediate grammar, 1907) and Prathama vyakaranam (A primer of grammar, 1906).

Rajaraja Varma was also a considerable scholar in Sanskrit. In fact, his earlier works were mostly in Sanskrit. His Laghu Paniniyam (Panini simplified, 1910) is a rearrangement and explanation of the sutras of Panini's Ashtadhyayi. He re-edited this great work on Sanskrit grammar and reduced the number of sutras from 2978 to 1959. The work is highly useful as a text-book in Sanskrit grammar and has been considered by scholars more useful as a textbook than the famous Siddhanta kaumudi of Bhattoji Dikshita. He also published a volume on the Vedic section of Panini's grammar in 1912.

The contribution of Rajaraja Varma was not exclusively in the field of grammar either. He was aware of the need of a set of technical works in literary study. His Bhashabhusanam (An ornament to language, 1902) is a study on poetics following the scheme of Kuvalayananda, a Sanskrit text on the subject. In Vrittamanjari (A study of metres, 1905), he discusses metres in the context of Malayalam. In Sahitya sahyam (An aid to literature, 1911) he makes a study of the requirements of good Malayalam prose. Rajaraja Varma was also a poet in Sanskrit and Malayalam, and a fine translator. His early poems were all in Sanskrit. His most important creative work in Sanskrit is Angalasamrajam (The British empire, 1900). This is a mahakavya in twenty-three cantos written in connection with the Silver Jubilee of the reign of Queen Victoria.

He was excellent as a translator of Sanskrit literary works into Malayalam verse. The language of these tanslations was not loaded with Sanskrit words. Rajaraja Varma used everyday words to a great extent. He translated Kalidasa's Meghaduta in 1894, Kumarasambhava in 1897, Shakuntala in 1912 and Malavikagnimitra in 1916. In 1917 he published Bhasa's Charudatta and in 1918 Svapnavasavadatta. His Uddalacharitam was an early work (1898) which was an adaptation of Shakespeare's Othello in Sanskrit prose.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As original Malayalam poetry he wrote a lyric Malayavilasam (1895). Prasadamala Kantaratarakan (1905) is his Malayalam commentary on Nalacharita, a Kathakali work by Unnayi Variar. Rajaraja Varma has a distinct place as an inaugurator and inspirer of modernity in Malayalam literature. He was the leader of movement in the early decades of this century, advocating new norms for literature. He stood for liberalisation in the selection of poetical themes. He was not keen on scrupulously observing such prosodic restrictions as the same sound occurring in the second syllable in all the four lines of verse (dvitiyaksharaprasa). Where there ensued a controversy on this subject he supported and led the movement for dvitiyaksharaprasa, even though the other faction was led by no less a person than his uncle Kerala Varma, the dominant leader and arbiter of literary taste of those times. Rajaraja Varma also encouraged literary men who took to new patterns of literary expression. One such writer was Kumaran Asan, a distinguished poet of the renaissance in Malayalam.

Rajaraja Varma was thus a multi-faceted personality– a distinguished grammarian in two languages, a pioneer in language and literature, a bi-lingual poet of excellence and a leader of the renaissance in Malayalam.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bhagirathi Amma Tampuran and M.Raghava Varma, A.R. Rajaraja Varma, 3 vols (1953, 1961, and 1963); K.M. George, A.R. Rajaraja Varma (in English, Delhi, 1978); P. Anantan Pillai, Kerala Panini (Trivandrum, 1934); Ullur Parameswara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram, Vol.V (1957).

K.R.P.

RAJARAJA VARMA, M. (Malayalam; b.1871, d. 1959) had most of his schooling in his native place, Mavelikkara, but passed the E.S.L.C. examination from a school in Trivandrum. He took his B.A. degree in Philosophy in 1891, and a few years later was awarded the M.A. degree for his thesis, 'The Evolution Hindu Philosophy'. He took a degree in law as well (1905). He started his career as a clerk in the Huzur Office (present Secretariat) at Trivandrum in 1894. He also worked in various capacities such as School Inspector, Dewan Peshkar, officiating Chief Secretary and finally as the first Commissioner of Devaswom Department, formed in 1922. A little before superannuation he retired from government service (1925).

Rajaraja Varma's literary taste flowered partly under the influence of such stalwarts as Kerala Varma Valiya Koil Tampuran and A.R. Rajaraja Varma, with both of whom he was in close contact while in Trivandrum. His first literary contribution appeared in the periodical Bhasha poshini. His literary works, belonging to different genres, both in prose and in poetry, number over thirty. About thirteen of them are concerned with physical, biological, political and social sciences and four with history. Indiayile mahanmar (Great men of India) is a collection of biographical sketches translated from English, while Suyodhanan is an original biographical work. Pancharatram and Pratima natakam are dramas translated from Sanskrit. Priyavilapam is an elegy and Garuda sandesha, a 'dutakavya'. There are a few collections of essays also. He was also editor of a series known as 'Padyamalika'. In addition to all this, he encouraged writers by writing introductions to their works. Of his two English books, one is a collection of essays and the other a biography of A.R. Rajaraja Varma.

Rajaraja Varma's prose is strong, vigorous and lucid. He is sure to be remembered as one who contributed a number of books on the sciences.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Pallippattu Kunjikrishnan, Mahacharita sangraha sagaram (1975).

K.S.N.

RAJARAJA VARMA, P.K. (Malayalam; b. 1907) is one of the most popular authors of humorous literature in contemporary Malayalam. Born in the princely family of Palyakkara near Tiruvalla in central Kerala, Rajaraja Varma had a successful educational career at the end of which he received a post-graduate degree in Mathematics from the University of Madras. After that he worked as an officer in the Postal Audit Department for a long time at different places in India and Burma. Finally, he served F.A.C.T., Alwaye, Kerala, as its Asst. Financial Manager.

Rajaraja Varma is the author of more than twenty literary works consisting mainly of humorous novels, stories and essays. Many of the novels and stories depict a variety of fascinating events in the lives of certain imaginary characters like Panchu Menon and Kunchi Amma who have been made memorable by the manner in which the author presents them. Their peculiar behaviours which, in fact, reflect in an exaggerated manner the weaknesses and follies of various types of ordinary people in their day-to-day life form the source of humour. Their portrayal has been made extremely vivid, convincing and fascinating by the author's mode of narration which is direct, simple and natural. Some of the themes and characters as well as the author's style remind us of the works of the English humorist, P.G. Wodehouse. He has also written two plays and two travelogues.

His major works include: Fiction: Panchumenonum Kunchiyammayum (6 vols), Kashantisamhari, Gurutvakketu, Shuppu Shuppu; Humorous essays: Laghubhakshanam, President Kunchi, Srimati Kunchi, Eruvum puliyum; Travelogues: Oru vinodayatra, Vijayakaramaya pinmattam.

K.S.N.P.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RAJARAJA VARMA, VADAKKUMKUR (Malayalam; b. 1891, d. 1970) was a well-known scholar of Sanskrit and also a writer in Malayalam. He studied Sanskrit privately and joined an English school in order to have some knowledge of that language. He worked as editor of the Cochin Bhasha Parishkarana Committee (Cochin language reform committee) and scholar in charge of editing classics in the Puratana grantha prasidhikarana samiti (Committee for publishing ancient classics).

Rajaraja Varma was a prolific writer, having about fifty books to his credit including poetry, criticism, translations, annotated editions of classics, grammar, literary studies and histories of literature. His biography of poet Ullur (Ullur mahakavi, 1955) and his work on Ullur's literary contributions (Ullur sahityam, 1968) are valuable studies of the great poet. Of his poems, two are mahakavyas, Uttarabharatam (Later Bharata, 1952) describing the story of the Mahabharata after the great war, and Raghavabhyudayam (Rama's ascent) describing the Ramayana story from the 'yajna' of Vishvamitra to the meeting of Parashurama and Sri Rama. Though these works are an exceptional phenomenon at a time when poets had almost given up writing full-fledged mahakavyas, they have not been acclaimed by critics as works of high literary quality.

Rajaraja Varma's most valuable contributions are his histories of literature. He has published six volumes of Keraliya samskrita sahityacharitram (History of Kerala's contribution to Sanskrit literature, six volumes (1938-65). This is not only an account of the contribution of Kerala to Sanskrit literature, but also an authentic record of the cultural and linguistic interaction between Sanskrit and Malayalam. The author describes how the language and literature of Kerala as also its fine arts and culture have been enriched by Sanskrit and also how Kerala, in turn, has enriched the Sanskritic forms of art. Another history of literature is Kerala sahitya charitram—charchayum puranavum in two parts (1967-68) which is a discussion on the monumental work of Ullur S.Paramesvara Iyer, entitled Kerala sahitya charitram. Here the author corrects some errors in the book and also fills up the blanks left by him.

Rajaraja Varma was one of the few scholars who believed that Sanskrit was the mother of Malayalam. He tried to substantiate his theory in his literary essays, histories of literature and writings on grammar and poetics.

RAJARAM, MADHURANTAKAM (Telugu; b. 1930); a school teacher, is a prolific writer in Telugu. His short stories, about 300, were published in several periodicals and later in several volumes - Pranadata, Varshinchina megham, Kalyana kinkini, Kammatemmera, Punarnavam, Tanu veliginchina dipalu, Vinodapradarshanam, Repathi prapancham (Sahitya Akademi Award winner) and Vakragatulu. Trisankudi svargam and Chinna prapancham - Sirivada, which were translated into Russian, are novels, while Avasesham and Karanabhutudu are novelettes. Patalatota, Andalapapa and Puvvulu puttagane parimalam are written for children. Jivagitam (Jagasilpian) and Chitrasundari are translations from Tamil into Telugu. He also wrote the history of literature of Chittoor district. His short stories were translated into Tamil, Kannada, Hindi and English. A well-known writer, Rajaram is deeply committed to humanism.

G.S.R.

RAJARATNAM, G.P. (Kannada; b. 1908, d. 1979) was a Kannada poet, critic and prose writer, who often used the pseudonym 'Ratna'. After his M.A. in Kannada from Mysore University he entered the Kannada Department of the University in 1938 and retired as Professor in 1964. An immensely popular and highly revered teacher, he was also a scholar in Kannada literature, and Buddhist and Gandhian lore. In addition to Kannada, he knew Sanskrit, Tamil, English, Urdu and Pali.

He first shot into prominence by his Ratnana padagalu. His Chinadeshada bouddha yatrikaru (The pilgrims from China) won him recognition both as a student of Buddhism and as a powerful prose writer. The book was awarded the Devaraja Bahadur Prize. In 1940 he brought out Mahakavi Purusha Saraswathi–a poem which defies classification. It was provoked by a controversy, fierce but often lost in sterile scholarship, over the correct form of the word Karnataka. It is a hilarious satire. Rajaratanam forged an idiom of his own, combining with extraordinary felicity Kannada, English and Urdu words and particles. Hathu varsha was an autobiographical narration covering a stretch of ten years, and established his reputation as the master of a vivid, clear and virile prose style. His powerful play, Gandugodali (1932), centring around the story of the tyrant Karaveerarjuna and Parashurama, was a thinly veiled call to the youth to rebel against the British rule.

Rajaratnam called himself a 'Sahitya Paricharaka' (one who serves the food of literature to people) and devoted much time and labour to the task of bringing poets to the common man; his writings in this field range from prose expositions of classics (like the epics of Pampa and Ranna) to explications of poems of contemporaries like D.V. Gundappa.

Rajaratnam's is one of the most illustrious names in the field of children's literature. Some of the most popular nursery rhymes and children's poems (collections like Tutturi and Kadale puri) came from his pen. He also wrote stories for children. His books for children exceed fifty.

One of the most prolific writers that modern Kannada has seen, Rajaratnam wrote extensively on Gandhiji, Buddha and his own Guru, Satya Sai Baba. He also wrote a number of books on subjects like the national flag and the national anthem to promote well-informed patriotism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rajaratnam spotted and encouraged literary talent. He invited writings from his students and arranged for the publication of the best among them. He also instituted programmes like lectures under the auspices of learned bodies, and donated several thousands of rupees for the purpose. His love of his country and his language expressed itself in several concrete programmes to promote understanding and judgment.

One of the most powerful speakers in recent decades, Rajaratnam could hold his audience spell bound. He could make children listen with rapt attention. His was a many-sided personality, characterized by power, firmness and concrete action. He was the moving spirit of the Gandhi Sahitya Sangha which he founded in 1942.

Rajaratnam won the Deveraja Bahadur Prize twice, and his students presented a felicitation volume, Rajaratnam, in 1957. Another felicitation volume came out in 1969, when he reached 60. Both the Karnataka Sahitya Academy and the State Government honoured him with awards. He received the D. Litt Degree of Mysore University (1977) and presided over the All India Kannada Sahitya Sammelana (1979) in Delhi.

Power was synonymous with Rajaratnam's style. Whatever he wrote was characterized by power, clarity, and scholarship which was never obtrusive.

Rajaratnam wrote more than 350 works. The more important are listed. Poetry (including satire): Ratnana padagalu, Nagana padagalu, Shanthi, Purusha saraswathi; Short stories: Hanigalu; Drama: Gandugo dali, Kambli seve Sri Bahubali vijayam; Autobiography and Reminiscences: Hathu varsha; Biography: Ashoka Maurya, Gauthama Buddha, Yesu Christa; Introductions to writers: Nakkala thayi pampabharatha sara, Rannana rasaghatti, Srikaviratna, Srikavipapama, Kavi Govinda Pai, Kailasam kathana, Kailasama avara Keechaka; Children's Literature: Kadalepari, Tutturi, Kathegala Dutti, Gulaganji, Nariya Dalal, Snehada kathegalu; Miscellaneous: Mahatmara marana mathu ithara upanyasagalu, Professor Venkannayya smarakopanyasagalu, Chinadeshada Bauddha yatrikaru, Jataka kathegalu, Dharmadani Buddha, Dharma sahityarsihti, Bhagavan Buddha Bhagavan Mahaviraswamy, Sri Gomateshwara, Kasturi thilakam, Gandhi shaktiya moola, Devara sakshi: Gandhiji, Atmarathi—deharatha, Islam dharmada parimala, Purushottama yoga, Gurupurnima, Sri Sayi chintana, Vichara taranga, Vichara rashmi.

L.S.S.R.

RAJASEKHARA SATAVADHANI (Telugu; b. 1888, d. 1957), whose real name was Durbhaka Kalahastrayya, was a Telugu poet and an 'Avadhani'. After passing his Matriculation examination, he joined the Christian College, Madras, but discontinued his studies. He was a clerk at the District Munsiff's Court, Proddutur, for several years but gave up his job in response to the Freedom Movement.

Rajasekharakavi studied Sanskrit and Telugu literature under the guidance of Kandala Dasacharyulu and Janamanchi Shesadrisharma. With Gadiyaram Venkatasehashatri, under the twin-name 'Rajashekhara-Venkatakavulu', he gave numerous 'avadhanamulu'. Avadhanasaramu (The essence of avadhana) is the fruit of this joint effort.

Rajasekharakavi's first work is Viramati charitra, a historical poem. Rana Pratapasimhacharitra (1932), Chandanripala charitra (1934), Pushpavati (1949) and Amarsimha charitra (1951) are his other works in verse. But the most outstanding one is Rana Pratapasimha charitra, based on the Rana of Mewar, regarded as an important work in modern Telugu historical poetry.

Padmavati vijayamu (1926), Sitapaharanamu (1934) Sitakalyanamu, Vilayamadhuryamu (1934), Vriddhimula samvadamu (1951) are some of his plays. Tarabai is a novel.

His other works are Anaghudu, Gadanamu, Rajasimha, Rani Samyukta (Harikatha), Sharannavaratra padyavali, Svayamvaramu, Tod charitramu (unpub.), Rani Samyukta (unpub.), Tarabai (unpub.), Kameshvari strotramala (in Sanskrit) and Heroines of Hindustan. Uttara Raghuvamsha is an unfinished work.

Most of his works reflect themes—both historical and patriotic—written with a nationalist's fervour. Viragathavidhata and Charitraka Kavitacharya were titles conferred on him.

RAJASHEKHARA (Prakrit/Sanskrit; c. 855-930 AD) is never too modest to speak of himself, and from his works we learn a great deal about his ancestors, his wife, (Avantisundari), his learning, his travels, his faith and his patrons. His family originated from Maharashtra (perhaps Vidarbha), and he came of a Brahmin (according to some, Kshatriya) family of the Yayavaras in which were born poets and scholars like Surananda, Tarala, Kaviraja and Akalajalada (his great-grandfather, famed in the anthologies). His father Duhika (or Durduka) held the rank of chief minister and his mother was Shilavati. He must have spent much of his life as preceptor of king Mahendrapala and his son Mahipala of Mahodaya (Kanauj), and for some time as a protege of the Kalachuri ruler of Tripuri. The poet's wife, Avantisundari, was an accomplished Kshatriya lady of the Chahamana family, whom he quotes with respect in his Kavya-mimamsa and at whose behest the premier performance of the Prakrit play Karpuramanjari was staged for the delight of the contemporary elite. He had a thorough grounding and knowledge of the various branches of learning, including the shastras. In addition to these he had thoroughly mastered the classical works of his eminent predecessors like Kalidasa, Shriharsha, Bana and Bhavabhuti. He had, however, specialised in poetics and Prakrit including Apabhramsha to entitle himself to the claim of 'proficiency in all languages'. He had travelled widely visiting countries in the south, west and north. He was a Shaiva, but no bigot, as can be seen from his praise of Vishnu in his Kavya-mimamsa.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Unlike his father, Rajashekhara opted for a literary career in the tradition of the family and wrote six 'prabandhas' which earned him the title of a 'Balakavi'. In the royal court of Mahendrapala, he wrote Balaramayana, Haravilasa and Karpuramanjari. Following the death of Mahendrapala in AD 910, and the exile of Mahipala, he left Kanauj and sought the patronage of the Kalachuri king Yuvarajadeva at Tripuri where he wrote his Viddhashalabhanjika. He returned to Kanauj after the restoration of Mahipala to the throne (c. AD 914). He gave a stage performance of his Balabharata or Prachandapandava to the distinguished audience of this city, with king Mahipala presiding. The drama must have been presented in a complete form, but unfortunately we have only two acts extant. It was at Kanauj that he wrote his Kavya-mimamsa and the Bhuvanakosha in his fifties or sixties. The undertaking of Kavya-mimamsa marks a fitting close to his creativity. Of the various works composed by Rajashekhara, Shatprabandhah (six compositions), Haravilasa (an epic), and Bhuvanakosha (dealing with the topic of general geography) are irretrievably lost.

(For Karpuramanjari see Volume III).

V.M.K.

RAJASHEKHARA'S CONTRIBUTION TO POETICS: Kavya Mimamsa (Investigation of literature) is Rajashekhara's major work in literary criticism. This ambitious work was planned in eighteen books, covering a vast range of diverse topics related to poetics. Of the eighteen books, only the first one is extant. From the first chapter of this book available to us, we can have a rough idea of the content of the seventeen books lost. The first book, named 'kavirahasya' deals with various topics of general interest, such as the origin of belles lettres and the poet's creative world in eighteen chapters. The subsequent books were to deal with ukti (poetic expression), riti (style), anuprasa (alliteration), yamaka (chime), shlesha (pun), ubhayalankaras (expression relating to two figures), vainodika (entertainments), rupaka (metaphor), rasa (aesthetic enjoyment), dosha (blemishes), guna (poetic qualities) and aupanishadika (conclusion).

With a gusto to restore the scattered traditions of various branches of rhetoric, Rajashekhara has ardently imitated the model of Kautilya and Vatsyayana so that 'sahityavidya' could enjoy the status of a 'shastra' complete in itself, and treated on a par with Dharmashastra or Vedanta. Naturally, at the very outset, he attributes the origin of poetics to the Supreme Being.

Even in the very meagre part of his stupendous work that is available to us, we can detect the sparks of Rajashekhara's original thinking and freshness of approach. As for the creative process, he does not subscribe to the view that 'shakti' and 'pratibha' are identical. Shakti, according to him, is the source of poetry, akin to the intuitive power, while samadhi (concentration of the psyche) and abhyasa (practice) activate and stimulate it. As a result, pratibha, the creative power acquires 'vyutpatti' which, to Rajashekhara, is not mere erudition and learning but also the power of perception, observation, and even retention. Pratibha, acquired through 'shakti', is further classified by Rajashekhara into 'karayitri' and 'bhavayitri', belonging respectively to a poet and a connoisseur.

Rajashekhara has given extensive treatment to the subjects generally outside the purview of Alamkarashastra (Rhetoric). A number of chapters have been devoted to plagiarism, and equally novel is his treatment of 'Kavyapaka', the vision of an appropriate word leading to maturity of meaning. Rajashekhara is the first author in Sanskrit to treat the concept of poetic licence and poetic conventions extensively, both combined in the theory of 'Kavisamaya'. He is also the first authentic writer to deal with 'Kavishiksha', a branch of rhetoric comprising maxims and guidelines for litterateurs for their professional survival and career. Rajashekhara presents a remarkable picture of the vigorous literary activities of his time and derives, or quotes profusely, from several known and unknown rhetoricians and poets, including his own wife, Avantisundari.

R.T.

RAJATARANGINI (Sanskrit), literally the stream of the stories of kings, is written by the Kashmiri poet, Kalhana. Divided into eight books, the work is a sustained chronicle, even if not a critical one, of Kashmir.

The author appears to have undertaken the work at the instance of his patron, Alakadatta. From the work we learn that during his time, Jayasimha (AD 1127-59) was the ruler of Kashmir. The poem, commenced in 1148-49, was completed in the following year.

Like a true historian Kalhan mentions the earlier sources consulted by him. These comprise eleven works of which only Nilamatapurana has survived. It is a work of the 'Mahatmya' type, and glorifies the holy places of Kashmir, incidentally narrating stories about them. He has mentioned some Rajakathas, which are lost, as well as Kshemendra's Nripavali which is a chronicle of kings. Besides, he states that he drew material from the works of Helaraja and Chavillakara of whom, or of whose works, we know nothing. Though relying on the current tradition about the history of Kashmir, he also accepted the evidence furnished by inscriptions, grants, coins and various other works.

From the historical point of view, Rajatarangini can be broadly divided into two parts, legend and history. In the former the author has related the story of fifty-two legendary kings from Gonanda onwards. In the historical portion Ashoka is mentioned merely by name. There is meagre material about Hushka, Jushka and Kanishka. The Hun kings, Mihirakula (or Mihiragula) and Toramana, have been mentioned. But mixing of fact with fancy has detracted considerably from the historical value of the account covering the first three books. Real history commences with the account of the Karkota kings starting from AD 600 in the fourth book. This dynasty was put to an end by Avantivarman, son of Sukhavarman and grandson of Utpala. Even in the account of the kings of this dynasty there is considerable imaginary and traditional matter. With the description of the reign of Avantivarman in the fifth book we reach properly the terra firma so far as historicity is concerned. In the sixth book the poet narrates the events up to the death (1003) of the ill-reputed Queen Didda. The seventh book contains the history of the period from the establishment of the Lohara dynasty to the assassination of Harsha (1101). The eighth and the last book, which alone comprises 3,449 stanzas, describes contemporary events, that is, events from the enthronement of Uchchala onwards.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A study of the work reveals that, though the poet indulges in fancy and depends on tradition in the account of the earlier times, the account of the later times, particularly of contemporary events, is dependable. In fact, Rajatarangini is invaluable, nay indispensable, for the reconstruction of the history of Kashmir. Such a factual work was never composed before Kalhana nor, perhaps, after him. Generally, Sanskrit poems with historical themes, such as the Vikramankadeva charita of Bilhana and the Ramacharita of Sandhyakaranandin, deal with a particular king or a particular period, but Kalhana's work spans hundreds of years, and this adds to its unique character. The history of some royal dynasties is based on facts, and the events and related dates have been accurately stated. As a chronicle it is excellent, but a chronicler is not a historian in the truest sense of the term. Real history, which attempts at scientific appraisal and analysis and contains philosophy, is lacking in the work. Its historicity has been marred to a great extent by the introduction of fatalism, miracles and belief in the influence of gods and demons on human life.

The work contains much that has sociological importance. It depicts vividly political feuds, conspiracy, treachery, partisan spirit, murder, war, vices of kings and landlords, dishonesty of teachers, intrigues of priests, misbehaviour of soldiers and of women gone astray. Thus, a clear picture of society and culture emerges. Besides, it contains much material about the geography, literary activities and architectural achievements of Kashmiris.

As history, it is true the work suffers from many defects, but we should not forget that Kalhana was writing a poetical work and not sober history. Like Thucydides or Strabo or Al-Biruni, his object was to present history through poetry and not to embellish the body of history with the ornamentation of kavya.

As kavya, the work reveals commendable originality in the author. He deserves praise for departing from the beaten track of writing on hackneyed themes. From certain verses it is clear that he was endowed with no mean ability as a poet. He regrets (i.6) that his theme and big canvas leave him little scope for poetic descriptions and use of figures. Even so, the subject-matter has given the work a distinctive character.

His comparative freedom in avoiding the excessive use of verbal figures like puns, the introduction of irrelevant matters, the distorted language and a laboured style which usually disfigure the poetical works of the decadant period, has added to the excellence of the work.

Some portions of Rajatarangini are didactic and may appear out of place in a historical work as the reader would like to relish poetic flavour and has no need for moral precepts or homilies. But a little thinking will make it clear that the poet resented the misconduct of contemporary kings and political unrest, and so the ethical precepts, perhaps, came from the poet in spite of himself.

Though the common 'shloka' metre prevails, other metres have diversified the composition, and in places even insipid prosaic verses appear. They, however, do not betray the poet's inability, because the subject-matter he has chosen for himself is largely responsible for it, as his regret referred to in the book suggests.

Sat.B.

RAJAVALI KATHA (Kannada) is a prose work written in 1838 by Devachandra (1779-1841), a Jaina poet. The author was in the royal court of Krishnaraja Wodeyar III of Mysore to whom he dedicated this work. The work relates the stories of some kings and poets and matters relating to Jainism. It also traces the genealogy of the Mysore royal family.

Rajavali katha is a work of considerable historical importance, since it throws light on some poets who lived prior to the author. But the authenticity of information available in this work is doubted by modern scholars owing to contradictions in details. The work includes many anecdotes and legends which affect its authoritativeness. For example, a contest between the poets Nagavarma and Nagachandra is narrated, while in reality they were separated by two centuries. There is another identical story of a contest between Nagachandra and Kanthi. The work is representative of the prose at the end of the nineteenth century, and there is an intermingling of the old and the new here.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R. Narasimhachar, Karnataka kavi charitre, Vol III (Bangalore, 1974); R.S. Mugali, Kannada sahitya charitre (Mysore, 1971).

P.S.S.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

RAJAVELU, KU. (Tamil; b. 1920). A patriot and freedom-fighter who has been to prison twice, a senior bureaucrat, a litterateur, a creative novelist, a Tamil scholar–these reflect the range of interests and achievements of Ku. Rajavelu.

He left his formal studies after matriculation to enter active politics. Later, he joined the 'Vidvan' class in Tiruvaiyaru and learnt both Sanskrit and Tamil. He had written short stories as a young boy, but it was during his incarceration in jail that he started writing in earnest. He was then twenty-two, and the novel he wrote secretly was entitled 1942. It was published when he came out of prison.

Rajavelu then did his M.A. in Tamil and joined government service as lecturer. In 1955 he was elevated to the post of Director of Information and Publicity. Now retired, he divides his time between his two primary interests— politics and literature.

His first novel, 1942, was largely based on his own experiences in prison. The next one, Kadal toongukiratu, was awarded a prestigious prize and is his best known work. His style of expression, enriched by deep literary scholarship without dry pedantry, has received much praise from critics. In all he has written eleven novels.

He wrote a play, besides two other works, on the theme of the legendary philanthropy of ancient Tamil kings. His deep and abiding sympathy for the underprivileged, which made him a devoted socialist in politics informed and enriched all his writing. He is currently engaged in writing the most ambitious novel of his life on the revolutionary movement of the early decades of this century involving daring and selfless nationalist youths.

Rajavelu feels strongly that good fiction should improve man's moral personality and elevate him. According to him, love is the basic sentiment of life but it should not be allowed to get debased into mere sensuality.

A.V.S.

RAJCHANDRA SHRIMAD (Gujarati; b. 1867, d. 1901) was a jeweller by profession but a man of great spiritual depth. Gandhiji wrote thus about him in his autobiography:

> He was not above twentyfive then, but my first meeting with him convinced me that he was a man of great character and learning. He was also known as Shatavadhani (one having the faculty of remembering or attending to a hundred things simultaneously) and Mehta recommended to me to see some of his memory feats. I exhausted my vocabulary of all the European tongues I knew, and asked the poet to repeat the words. He did so in the precise order in which I had given them. The thing that did cast his spell over me was his wide knowledge of scriptures, his spotless character, and his burning passion for self-realisation.

Rajchandrabhai's commercial transactions were endless. He was a connoisseur of pearls and diamonds. Business and creativity, in fact, went hand in hand with him. He used to write poems from an early age. In Mokshamala (1884), the collection of his poems, he explains the basic tenets of Jainism in a simple style. His language is simple which makes the abstract easily comprehensible. We also find touches of the colloquial in his writings. His contribution to the philosophical literature in Gujarati is remarkably significant. His other book Bhavanabodh (1886) explains the concepts of spiritualism, and his Atmasiddhisastra (1896) deals with the abstract subject of the emancipation of human soul. Pushpamala, Namirag and Subodh sangraha, again, are collections of poems dealing with different aspects of spiritual life.

C.M.

RAJE (Gujarati, b. 18th c.). Though a Muslim by birth, he was a devotee of Krishna and heartily sang of the sports of the Lord, making use of all forms of poetry in vogue during his days. He is regarded as an earnest Bhakti poet in Gujarati by all critics. Most of his poems are in the lyrical form in which he sings of the various phases, moods and emotions of love. In his Raspanchadhayi he gives picturesque descriptions of the 'Rās' (dance) of Krishna with the gopis. In his Gokul-lila he describes the various love pranks of Krishna in a fascinating way. He has made use of the prevalent forms like mahina (months), tithi (dates) and vars (days) according to the Vikram calender of the Hindus. He describes the pangs of separation undergone by Radha and gopis, as well as their love sports with Krishna. In one of his popular lyrics he depicts how Radha marries Krishna in her dream and relates the dream sequence to her mother in order to detract her from arranging her marriage with anyone else. All his poems reveal his deep love of Krishna.

C.M.

RAJENDRA PRASAD (Hindi; b.1884, d.1963), the first President of Independent India, was born at Ziradei in district Siwan, Bihar. He started his early education with Hindi and Sanskrit, but later studied Urdu and Persian also up to the Intermediate level. He did his M.A. in English in 1907 and took a degree in Law in 1910. Throughout his career, he was an extraordinarily bright student, topping the list in all examinations. He studied mostly in Calcutta where he came into contact with eminent Hindi writers like Balmukund Gupta and Padam Singh Sharma. His association with Hindi Bhasha Parishad created in him a life-long interest in the Hindi language and literature. At the first session of the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan (1910) at Kashi, he came in touch with Purushottam Das Tandon. In the same year, his first article 'Samaj sanshodhan' was published in the magazine, Bharatodaya. He was twice President of the Hindi Sahitya

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sammelan, in 1924 and 1936, and championed the cause of the Hindi language and literature avidly. Gandhi's visit to Champaran (1917) brought Prasad close to him, and he became committed to Gandhian thought and ideology.

In 1918 he started an English daily, The Searchlight, from Patna. In 1920, he took part in the Khilafat and the Non-cooperation movements. In order to enthuse the masses with patriotism, he started a Hindi weekly, Desh, in 1920 from Patna. Under Gandhi's inspiration, he took keen interest in popularising Hindi in South India. The Dakshin Bharat Hindi Prachar Sabha was established in 1918, and Rajendra Babu became one of its office-bearers. He was also associated with the Hindustani Prachar Sabha and the Nagari Pracharini Sabha, and encouraged the monumental work Hindi sahitya ka brihat itihas and wrote a foreward to it.

Rajendra Babu contributed to Hindi prose in a number of ways. His autobiography, Atmakatha (1940), is one of the best autobiographies written in Hindi. The objectivity and lucidity of its style served as a model for later writers. The book reveals Rajendra Babu as a great humantarian and visionary, and shows his keen perception of the Indian scene, his awareness of the socio-political reality and the grinding poverty and suffering of the masses which needed immediate redressal. A scholar, a seer and a dedicated freedom fighter, he peeps through the murky corridors of power and politics, and goes though a process of self-analysis in the Atmarkatha. The book is a living record of the contemporary political and social scenario. For its intimate understanding of men and events, its objective analysis, its grasp of Gandhian philosophy, and its simple, unembellished language, the book is considered a landmark in autobiographical writing in Hindi. It was picked up for the Mangalaprasad Paritoshik (Award) of Nagari Pracharini Sabha.

Rajendra Prasad's commitment to Gandhian thought led him to produce another excellent work in Hindi, Bapu ke kadamon mein. Again, his Champaran mein Mahatma Gandhi brings into focus the misery of the Indian farmer. The socio-economic scene of India under the colonial rule and Gandhi's Satyagraha Movement are documented here. Further, his book Mere Europe ke anubhav is based on his experiences of travels in Europe in 1928. His other important works are Sanskrit ka adhyayan, Bharatiya shiksha, Sahitya, shiksha aur sanskriti, Gandhiji ki den. Most of his works are compilations of lectures delivered by him on different occasions, which are acclaimed for their originality of thought and treatment of subject-matter.

Most of Rajendra Babu's major writings are in Hindi except for India Divided, which has been translated as Khandit Bharat into Hindi. Throughout his life, his political career was linked with Congress. But what is most comspicuous about him is the Indianness of his personality and conduct. Neither in his life nor in his writings is there anything which could be called non-Indian. He was well-versed in English language and literature, history, economics and law, but all Western learning became integrated to the deeply ingrained Indian tradition in his personality. Recently, Valmiki Choudhary, formerly Secretary to Rajendra Babu, has been engaged in editing the hitherto unpublished writings, correspondence, diary and other works of his mentor, and so far fourteen volumes have come out which throw open a floodgate of light on this great son of India.

K.D.P

RAJGURU, SATYANARAYAN (Oriya; b.1903) eminent historian, epigraphist and researcher, was born in the celebrated Rajguru family of Paralakhemundi in Orissa. He had no college education, but because of his own untiring efforts he learnt Sanskrit classics, philosophy, phonetics, history and epigraphy. He came to fame in 1928 with his research article, 'The Korashand Copper-Plate Grant of Visakhavarma', published in the journal of Bihar and Orissa Research Society. Since then he has contributed hundreds of scholarly articles to many English and Oriya journals.

As Curator (1950-1962) and Epigraphist (1963-1967) of the government of Orissa he edited the Inscriptions of Orissa in several volumes which throw light on the history and culture of Orissa. His research articles in both English and Oriya have a wide range, covering such subjects as archaeology, art and architecture of Orissa, Odissi music, the inscriptions of Lingraj temple and poet Jayadev. Many of his original researches have found place in the Bibliothica Indica of Netherlands.

Rajguru also wrote plays which include Radhabhisheka nataka, Rana Chanda, Hambira and Kharabela, a novel called Karmakshetra, and a kavya called Manorama. He also discovered and edited a Sanskrit drama Chandrakala by Viswanath Kaviraj, the celebrated rhetorician. His scholarly introduction to this work fixes the time of Viswanath, thereby enabling scholars to ascertain the period of many important Sanskrit authors.

In 1974 the President of India awarded him 'Padmashri' for his contribution to historical and epigraphic scholarship, and the University of Behrampur conferred on him the degree of D. Litt. (honoris causa), while various literary and cultural organizations such as Orissa Sahitya Academy, Kalinga Sahitya Samaj and Utkal Hitaishini Samaj honoured him for his scholarship.

His other important works include Naga itihasa, Odisa itihasa, Kalingara atmakatha, Odia lipira kramabikasa and Odia upabhasa, besides Prastaba chintamani (edn.) and The Indian Epigraphy (tr.).

P.P.

RAJGURU, SHYAMASUNDAR (Oriya; b. 1866, d.1909)

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation

was born in the famous Rajguru family of erstwhile Paralakhemundi and evinced enormous potentiality. Unfortunately, he died too young with promises unfulfilled.

Shyamasundar had his early education in Oriya and Sanskrit, and later on learnt English. In the year 1892, he became the first graduate of the Ganjam district. He was appointed tutor to the second prince of the royal house of Paralakhemundi and induced the family to work for the cause of education, literature and culture. It was through his efforts that two associations, Bhasha Bibardhini Samaj and Utkal Hitaishini Samaj, were formed. These two associations of South Orissa did a lot for the improvement of Oriya literature and generated a sense of unity among the people.

Shyamasundar represented Orissa at the conferences of the All India National Congress in Madras (1894), in Poona (1895) and in Amaravati (1897). In 1902 he became the President of the National Conference of the Oriya-speaking people of Ganjam. This conference afterwards became the Utkal Sammelani which played an important role in the unification of the Oriya-speaking people and in the formation of the state of Orissa. It was through his efforts that the first permanent stage and theatre of Orissa, Padmanabh Rangalaya, was built at Paralakhemundi. He also founded the Gajapati printing press at Paralakhemundi which came to play a vital role in spreading Oriya literature and culture. The weekly, Ganjam News, which he edited, created a sensation in those days in Orissa. Shyamasundar also published many research articles on ancient Oriya poets and their works. His critical essays on the Oriya language and literature have been a source of valuable information for research scholars in this field. These literary writings were published posthumously in a collection entitled Prabandhabali.

P.P.

RAJIYAI RA SORATHA (Rajasthani) by Kriparam Khidiya (1743-1833) is one of the popular works of the 19th century Rajasthani literature. It is said that the verses (sorathas) were addressed by the poet to his personal attendant Rajiya. The style conforms to the convention of addressing verses to real or fictitious persons such as Jethawa, Nagaji, Motiya. A collection of Rajiyai ra soratha was first published in 1894. Thereafter, it has appeared in a number of editions. One such attempt was made by Manohar Sharma in Marubharati. The number of verses given therein is 161 only. The work, however, has been loaded with interpolations, bringing the number to about five hundred. Some of the scholars are of the opinion that the original number was five hundred out of which only 159 are available. Most of the couplets are didactic and ethical in nature. Maharaja Mansingh of Jodhpur (1803-1843) offered the most deserving compliment to the book when he said that these couplets are like golden ornaments studded with gems which have endeared the poet even to the kings. Written in a simple language and rich in worldly wisdom, these couplets are still quite popular.

V.V.S.

RAJJAB (Rajasthani; 16th-17th c.) and Sundardas, two disciples of Dadu, are conspicuous for their devotion, knowledge, and scholarship. The only difference between them was that Rajjab acquired knowledge by his own experience, while the younger Sundardas excelled in literary acquisition. Impressed by the genius and dignity of Rajjab, a number of saints became his disciples even during the time of Dadu, but his life and lineage are a matter of guess. He was born at Sanganer (Jaipur). His father was a Pathan soldier. When he was going to Amer for his marriage along with the marriage party, he stopped on the way to pay respects to Dadu. Rajjab, dressed as a bridegroom, was much impressed by the saint and was converted to his sect. Dadu asked him to keep himself dressed permanently as a bridegroom which he did all his life. His fiancee was married to his younger brother. This event is supposed to have occurred about 1587. It is popularly believed that he lived for 122 years (1567-1689). Medieval saint-writers like Raghodas (in his Bhaktamal). Jangopal (in his Dadu janmalila parachai), and the disciples of Dadu, such as Chaindas, Ramdas, Khemdas, Mohandas, as well as Ramcharandas, the promotor of the Ramsnehi sect of Shahapura, have mentioned Rajjab with due respect. His two works, Vani and Sarvangi, consist of the devotional sayings of various saints, including those by himself. Besides them, Rajjab gave a regular form to Dadu vani, having classified it under different heads. Rajjab vani is mostly related to the devotion of the 'Nirguna' (formless) God. He wrote with emotional depth on various subjects, such as spiritual enlightenment, good conduct, devotional practice, salvation, truth, self-control, importance of recounting the name of the Lord, etc. The Vani has been composed in various metres like sakhi (doha), pad, chappaya, tribhangi, soratha, chaupai, arilla, sawaiya, kavita. There are 200 padas, 5352 (doha, chaupai, etc.), 117 sawaiyas, 33 tribhangis, 82 arillas, 89 chappayas, etc. Sarvangi is in no way inferior in this respect. Rajjab has reproduced here his Vani under 142 heads, besides presenting an anthology of the sayings of over ninety saints. They are mostly concerned with the devotion to the Supreme Soul and various related subjects. The work is helpful in preserving the names and sayings of many poets who are either obscure or are less known. Both these works by Rajjab are highly important, but need proper editing. Rajjab's language is mainly Rajasthani, but he has also composed in Pingal (Braj bhasha mixed with Rajasthani).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajalal Varma, Sant kavi Rajjab (Jodhpur, 1965); Dadupanth parichaya, Part I (Jaipur, 1978); Harinarayan Purohit, Sundar granthavali (Calcutta, 1931); Rajasthan (Quarterly), Vol, 2. No. 3 (Calcutta, 1935); Rajjab-vani (Kanpur, 1963); Sarvangi of the Dadu-panthi Rajjab (New Delhi, 1978); Sri Rajjab vani (Ajmer, 1967).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Hi.M.

RAJKHOWA, BENUDHAR (Assamese; b. 1872, d. 1955), playwright, lyricist and lexicographer, had the good fortune of acquiring higher education at Calcutta. After his graduation from Ripon College in 1896, he was admitted to M.A. and B.L. classes of the Calcutta University, but soon he gave up his studies and became a sub-Deputy Collector in 1899. Later, he joined the Assam Civil Service, and after serving in various capacities retired as officiating Deputy Commissioner of Sibsagar in 1931.

Benudhar appeared on the literary scene as a writer of promise even when he had been a college student in Calcutta. He became the editor of an epoch-making Assamese journal Bijuli (1890). It was at this time that he appeared before the reading public as a writer of both prose and poetry. He wrote one book after another: Niti path (Moral essays, 1889), Sahitya prabesh (An introduction to literature), Pancha kavita (Five poems,1895) and a highly popular series of Lara puthi (Children's primers). He then took to writing songs and lyrics which came out in a series of anthologies: Saru larar gan (Songs for children, 1899), Dash-git (Ten songs, 1899), Asamiya bhai (1901) and Banhi (The Flute, 1908).

Benudhar was also one of the pioneering playwrights in modern Assamese. Though he wrote a few tragedies, his more enduring contribution was a series of farces. Some of these lashed at social evils while the others aimed at producing fun through portrayal of incongruities. His tragedies are: Seuti kiron (1894), Duryodhanar urubhanga (1903) and Daksha yajan (1908). His farces are: Kurishatikar sabhyata (The twentieth century civilisation, 1908), Ashiksita ghaini (The illiterate wife, 1912), Durbar (The court, 1912), Tini ghaini (1928), Chorar srishtri (The handiwork of thieves, 1931), Yamapuri (The abode of death, 1931) and Topanir parinam (The consequence of sleep, 1932).

Benudhar's major contribution to Assamese language is his Khanda bakyakosh (1917), a dictionary of Assamese phrases and idioms. He also translated some old Assamese masterpieces into English. They include Vipra Damodar (1918), Holy Namaghosa (1919), Kankhowa (1919) and Gunmala (1923).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dimbeswar Neog, New Light on the History of Asamiya Literature (Gauhati, 1962); Satyendra Nath Sarma, Asamiya sahityar samikshatmak itibrtta (Gauhati,1981).

Pu.S

RAJKHOWA, SAILADHAR (Assamese; b. 1892, d. 1962), poet and playwright, popularly known as Nijara kavi, is noted for his sonorous style. Although he wrote on a variety of themes, his fame rests particularly on patriotic poems like 'Pashan pratima' and 'Barpeta' which are remarkable for their cadence and beauty of conception. A few elegiac poems written by him have also these distinctive qualities. Niraja (Brook 1935) is the only collection of his poems. Sailadhar has to his credit two plays, Bidyavati (1918) and Swargadeo Pratap Simha (1953). The first is based on a story regarding the Sanskrit poet, Kalidasa, and the second is a historical play based on the conflict between the Muslims and the Ahoms during the reign of King Pratap Simha. A few plays written by him are still unpublished. Ranjit Singh, an adaptation of Shakespeare's Othello is one of them. In his autobiography Atitar sovarani (Reminiscences of the past) Sailadhar narrates even the minor incidents of his life in an interesting manner.

S.B.

RAJKUMAR MADHUBIR SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1942) is a young poet of contemporary Manipuri. After attending local schools and colleges, he passed the M.A. examination in English from Gorakhpur University and the B.Ed. examination from Utkal University, and now works as Lecturer in English at Government Higher Secondary School, Manipur. His first book of poems, Machu machugi atiya (The many-splendoured sky) was published in 1967, followed in 1970 by Kairaba murti uraga (Seeing the broken image), another book of poems. Miyat tarba phadok (The condemned prisoner), also a book of poems, was published in 1974, followed by a book of poems in English called, The H. Hour Patient and Other Poems in 1982. Leading a Bohemian life with unorthodox views, he is associated with many literary and cultural organisations of Manipur. He was General Secretary of the Naharol Sahitya Premi Samiti, a literary and cultural organisation of young writers of Manipur from 1970 to 1971, and was editor of Wakhal (1974-76), a literary and cultural quarterly owned and published by the Naharol Sahitya Premi Samiti. His poetry is marked by an honest feeling, expressed with candour which may sometimes verge on obscenity and unorthodoxy in outlook. He shows the influence of T.S. Eliot on his art and craft, and is interested in the aimless wanderings of individual human beings who otherwise live restrained by so many social customs and practices.

I.R.B.S.

RAJKUMAR SHITALJIT SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1914), born at Kangabam Leikai (Imphal) was a pioneer novelist, short story writer and poet of the early decades of modern Manipuri literature. He passed the B.A. (Hons.) examination of Calcutta University in 1936 and joined the Ramlal Paul High School as a teacher. After serving several other schools in different capacities he came back to Ramlal Paul High School as Head Master from where he retired. His first novel Thadokpa (Renunciation) was published in 1941, which was followed by Ima (Mother) in 1947, Rohini in 1948 and Nungshi wakheiba (Love's end) in 1950. A pioneer short story writer in Manipuri who published two collections of short stories, Leikonnungda (In the Garden) in 1946 and Leinungshi (Dear flower) in 1947. Ketaki, a book of poems, was published in 1945 and Valmiki, another book of poems, in 1947. Now in his old age, he devotes a good deal of his time to the study of Hindu texts and books on religion. He has translated the Gita, Srimadbhagavatam and Chaitanya charitamrita into Manipuri. Associated with several literary and cultural organisations of Manipur, he was editor of Lalit manjuri patrika, Tarun Manipur and several other daily papers in Manipuri. He was also a reporter of Amrita Bazar Patrika, The Statesman, The Associated Press and The Ananda Bazar Patrika. Deeply religious, he was a member of the now defunct Nikhil Manipur Hindu Mahasabha, a socio-political organisation of Manipur in the thirties and forties of the century. His literary outlook is distinguished by the Vaishnavite philosophy and belief. In all the four novels he wrote, a particular Vaishnava rasa predominates. His language is simple without being too ornate and literary, but all the same poetic and imaginatively powerful. He received the best teacher award of the Government of India in 1967, declined the 'Sahitya Ratna' award of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad, and was made a fellow of the Manipur State Kala Academy in 1982. He is one of the most respected writers in Manipuri, profound, unassuming and modest.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation

I.R.B.S.

RAJKUMAR SURENDRAJIT SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1925, d. 1982) was born at Khoyathong in Imphal, studied at Visva Bharati (Santiniketan) and passed the B.A. examination of Gauhati University. In his student days he was actively associated with the Indian independence movement and spent some years at the Aurobindo Ashram, Pondicherry, and later at Rishikesh. Coming back home he joined the D.M. College, Imphal, as a teacher, from where he went to Cachar College, Silchar (Assam), teaching Manipuri till the end. A sensitive poet, his publications include Shatningbi (Eager to bloom, 1947), Sahitya leichan (Literary miscellany, 1954), Madhuryagya (Lyrics and songs, 1955), Sahitya apomba (New literature, 1961), Ayukki khonjel (Voice of the downtrodden, a collection of poems, 1968), Chhandbina (a book on Manipuri prosody, 1969), Lairemmana mapam Khongdaba (The visit of the goddess to her paternal home, a book of songs, 1975) and Vasantagi bansi (The vernal flute, a book of poems, 1978). His poetry is marked by an intense feeling of romantic agony expressed in a musical language. In his poems one can see the throbbing sensibility and rich feeling of the poet. Associated with several literary and cultural organisations of Manipur, he was member of the Executive Committee of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad, President of the Naharol Sahitya Premme Samiti (1961-62), and founder-Secretary of Uddipani, a cultural organisation. He was founder-President of the Assam Manipuri Sahitya Parishad and Chairman of the Assam Manipuri Kala Academy. He got the Jamini Sundar Memorial Gold Medal of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad in 1980 for his book of poems, Vasantagi bansi.

I.R.B.S.

RAJPUROHIT NARASINGH (Rajasthani; b. 1924), was born at village Khandap, district Badmer, in Rajasthan and is an M.A. in Hindi. He served as a school teacher and was honoured by the State Government and the Centre for his meritorious services in the field of education. He did his Ph.D. from the University of Jodhpur on 'Bharatiya swantantra sangam mein Rajasthani kaviyon ka yogdan' (Contribution of Rajasthani poets to Freedom struggle). He is a story writer of the first rank with a number of publications to his credit, Purana ro kam (The righteous act), Ratvaso (Story for the night), Manchali Malawai (The march of famine-stricken people towards Malawai), Amar chunadi (The ever-auspicious scarf) and Prabhatiyo taro (The morning star) are some of his important works. Amar chunadi and Parbhatiyo taro have been highly acclaimed. The Soviet Land Nehru Award was given to him for his translation of stories from Tolstoy. He has also translated some other prose works and stories in Rajasthani, such as Katha bharati, Sanskriti ra sur, Minakphan ro mol and Ramraj. Prominent books edited by him are Hansyan Hari milai and Rajasthani kahani sangrah.

K.S.Sh.

RAJSIMHA (Bengali) by Bankimchandra Chatterjee was serialised in the Bengali journal Bangadarshan (1878-79). In book form, the first edition, consisting of eighty-three pages only, came out in 1882. The enlarged edition came in 1893 containing 434 pages.

The story runs as follows: Once an aged picture-seller went to the harem of Rupnagar to sell some portraits. Chanchalkumari, the princess of Rupnagar, was fascinated by the portrait of Rajsimha, Rana of Udaipur, and fell in love with him. She was shown the portrait of Aurangzeb also but she kicked it, and it broke into pieces. The news reached Aurangzeb whose fury knew no bounds. He at once wrote to Bikramsimha to surrender his daughter Chanchalkumari to the Mughal harem, and sent two thousand soldiers under the command of Mubarak, one of his lieutenants, to bring her to Delhi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bikramsimha was ready to comply but Chanchalkumari refused. She sent a priest to Rajsimha, explaining the grave situation, and requested him to abduct her as Lord Krishna had done in the Mahabharat. The priest started on his journey to Udaipur but was robbed on the way. One of the dacoits, Maniklal, seized Chanchalkumari's letter and wanted to exploit the situation. As the story proceeds, it gets involved with a number of exploits and court intrigues. In the final analysis the Mughal army under Aurangzeb is trapped in a mountain pass and the emperor is compelled to surrender.

Rajsimha is an historical novel. Some critics, however, are of the opinion that it is an epic novel. It is certainly designed in a grand style. Bankimchandra collected the material for his novel from James Tod's Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan, but the historical facts are enlivened by the superb imagination of the novelist. Bankimchandra also tried to create in Rajsimha a protagonist like lord Krishna. He had attempted this in his three former novels Anandamath, Devi Choudhurani and Sitaram also, but with little success. Only in Rajsimha, Bankimchandra succeded in projecting an exceptional character who could fight for the Dharma. The hopes and aspirations of the nineteenth-century Bengal are enshrined in him. The war scenes are presented artistically and the heroic fight is depicted in an ideal manner. The romantic fervour of a nation is also idealised in the book.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bijit Kumar Dutta, Bangla sahitye aitihasik upanyas; Pramathanath Bisi, Bankim smarani; Srikumar Banerjee, Banga sahitye upanyaser dhara.

Bij. D.

RAJWADE LEKHSANGRAHA (Marathi). Of the voluminous writings of V.K. Rajwade (1864-1927) on various historical and social subjects, four Lekhsangrahas (Collections of writings) are available today. It appears that he was inspired to undertake painstaking research in history out of his deep-rooted love and pride in his country, religion, language and culture. During the years 1897-1926 he was able to compile and publish 22 volumes of relevant material on Maratha history, entitled Marathyanchya itihasachi sadhane. In addition, six more volumes of his papers were published posthumously.

Lekhsangraha I contains some of his prefaces to his volumes referred to above, and is aptly titled Historical prefaces. In one of his prefaces, he assails the English historian, Grant Duff, who had written the History of Marathas. He firmly believes that 'Indian history must be written by our own people'. In another preface he deals with the norms of history writing. In yet another, he examines the validity of historical evidence, with special reference to the times of Shivaji. The reasoned conclusions drawn by him are given in the preface to the fourth volume, which serves as a valuable guide to historical research. Rajwade describes many personal experiences of his wanderings in search of historical material, approaching princely rulers and feudal chiefs, and visiting mutts and temples. At times he had to encounter hostile or unpredictable people. Some of the other topics dealt with in these prefaces relate to Panipat, Brahmendraswami, Shahji and Shivaji, the Peshwas, the emergence of Marathas, the influence of Persian on Marathi, printing of old manuscripts, etc.

Lekhsangraha II contains Rajwade's articles on current social and political subjects such as Vedokta, Swadeshi, Home-rule, etc., perhaps not of much relevance today. But they reveal his personal traits, like unflinching faith in nationalism and uncompromising outspokenness. Certain other articles relate to the grammar of Dnyaneshwari, riddles in Sanskrit, lexicography and punctuation marks in Marathi. These articles laid the foundation of the historical grammar of Marathi language. One would, indeed, ill-afford to ignore Rajwade's contribution to linguistics.

Lekhsangraha III and IV bear testimony to the fact that Rajwade never lost sight of literary, cultural and social problems. While writing on historical subjects he always kept in mind the prevailing social conditions. During Rajwade's time sociology was a new discipline for Indians. Rajwade did not write an exclusive book on the subject, but he covered it appropriately in all his writings. He stoutly defended 'Chaturvarnya' and 'Jatisanstha' by expounding their role in the functioning of society as a whole. While the Muslims and Europeans allowed assimilation of outsiders individually into their fold, the Hindus accepted the outsiders such as the Shakas and Hunas collectively as separate groups in their social structure. In his articles entitled. 'The varna (colour) of Aryans in India' 'Our mythology and new discoveries in Assyria', 'Who is Mug (Brahmin)', 'Magadha', and 'Nat and nichhavi', Rajwade outlines the structure of the ancient Indian society from the historical point of view. He also examines the linguistic, racial and social institutions in such essays as 'Maharashtrachi vasahat ani Konkanchi vasahat' (Migrants in Maharashtra and north Konkan).

In Rajwade lekhasangrah, edited by Laxmanshastri Joshi and published by Sahitya Akademi, we come across several interesting essays. For example, the essay on the history of Prakrit languages and literature in Maharashtra points out that prior to writing a history of literature, one must come to terms with five basic subjects, such as Kosh, Nirukta, Vyakaran, Adeshprakriya and Vakyetihas.

In his essay on 'Ramdas' he expounds the need of 'Maharashtra dharma', as envisaged in Dasbodha, for nation building—a task achieved to a certain extent by Shivaji. Similarly, his essay on 'Kadambari' (Novel) classifies fiction under two broad heads, realistic and imaginative novels.

The most important essay, perhaps, is on the evolution of the expression of passion and thought ('Vikarvichar pradarshan sadhananchi utkranti'). Here he dwells on the imaginative and thinking power of man which works freely in the fields of both art and religion. Just as man's imagination shapes the world of fine arts and crafts, so also does it create the mysterious world of gods and demons, heaven and hell. These ideas have taken a strong hold of human mind all over the world, without exception. According to Rajwade illusion is at the root of the idea of God. Rajwade who writes thus without reservations must be treated as a totally rational and pragmatic man.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj

One can see from Rajwade's writings that he was a nationalist dedicated to the study of history, linguistics and sociology. He brought to light historical material scattered all over Maharashtra, sometimes in inaccessible areas. He had both originality and versatility, and was competent to marshal and evaluate the material at his command. One may or may not agree with his views and inferences but one cannot dispute the power of his mind.

H.S.Sh.

RAJWADE, VISHWANATH KASHINATH (Marathi; b. 1864, d. 1927), a grammarian and historian, has to his credit twenty-two volumes of Marathyanchya itihasachi sadhane (Sources of Maratha history) which more than justifies the title. His was the zeal of a missionary when it came to history. It took him to places as far removed as Thanjavur in the south and Kabul in Afghanistan. It is impossible to understand him unless one places him in the historical context. He was a product of the anti-imperialist struggle, extremely proud of India and her history but at the same time a modernist in outlook with broad intellectual concerns. History was an obsession with him, but he was as much a grammarian and no minor literary critic. Intellectual activity for his generation of writers was part of an anti-imperialist struggle. Literature was politics, and they believed, like Foucault, that politics was war conducted by means other than fighting. An enslaved society was perpetually at war.

Modern Indian historiography has ignored this aspect of the thought of our 'extremist' nationalists. Tilak is a major victim of our 'unhistorical' historiography, and Rajwade was no less. He was branded as a reactionary Hindu. Unfortunately, modernity and tradition are not as clearly separable in the thought and writings of people like Rajwade as indeed they were in the politics of the 'Extremists' and the 'Moderates' within the Congress. In our enthusiasm for modernising the liberals of the nineteenth century like Bal Gangadhar Shastri Jambhekar and Gopal Ganesh Agarkar who, in terms of thought, were pale imitators of Mill and Spencer, we have completely ignored modernity in the thought of some of our early intellectuals like Rajwade. His Bharatiya vivahsansthecha itihas was a pioneering book. Here was an alleged conservative, undoubtedly a traditional intellectual, digging out some unpalatable truths from ancient Indian history. No revivalist would write a book of that kind. S.A. Dange rightly argued that had Engels had the data of this book at his disposal, The Origins of Private Property, Family and State would have been a richer book. The simple point is that the fierce nationalism of people like Rajwade was and had to be modern, for they were opposing a power which looked so attractive and appeared to many almost irresistible. Rajwade had, therefore, to locate the points of strength in modern Europe and at the same time assert that a nationalist Indian can also aspire to possess them in his own way.

Rajwade's essay on novel shows Rajwade doing that at his best. His analysis of H.N. Apte's work shows the encyclopaedic range of his reading besides a sympathetic and yet penetrating criticism of Apte's fiction. In that effort he has summarised the history of the narrative form as a whole. He sees continuities in narrative forms and obviously does not share the latter-day Lukacs' view of novel as a form typical of the bourgeois epoch. He regrets the fact that the Marathi authors do not know the world beyond that of the English fiction—a regret which Mardhekar was to express a few decades later in relation to Marathi literature in general and poetry in particular.

Rajwade is merciless in his criticism of the imitators of Reynolds (although he is willing to grant Apte some status) and other 'society-authors'. He accuses the novelists of ignorance of the Russian and French fiction. Marathi novelists either did not know Zola, Balzac, Dumas, Tolstoy, Dostoevski and others, or did not have the vision to see their greatness.

He dismisses the majority of novelists as incapable of seeing the distinction between realism and naturalism. Although he does not use the term himself, the argument in Kadambari (1902) anticipates a lot of what Mardhekar was to argue in his essay on 'Vangmayin mahanata' (Literary greatness) some four decades later. Mardhekar, of course, does not see any socio-political relationship in our response to English fiction.

That is also the reason why unlike Mardhekar the avantgardist, Rajwade sees clear relationship between social history and literary forms. Kadambari was the first essay written (at least in Marathi) which saw literary forms as socio-historical forms. Rajwade's analysis of realism has to be understood in those terms. The essay has been misconstrued by some as an attack on 'realism'. It definitely attacks those who in the name of being realistic would reduce literature to flat naturalism or newspaper reportage. But he does not underestimate the realist mode. As a traditional intellectual, may be, he is keen to establish that experimentation in form, in our country, cannot be seperated from the history of the form. He explains the conditions under which the realistic mode arose in Europe and clearly takes the view that such conditions are yet to emerge in Maharashtra.

Rajwade's fervent defence of 'fantasy' as a legitimate literary mode deserves special mention. It would be a good reading for those who subscribe to the view that socialist realism is still a valid doctrine. Also, it may suggest that the 'magical realism' has strong roots in literary history.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kadambari as an essay is thus full of promise. Here is an anti-imperialist, traditional intellectual trying to look at the world of modern letters and giving us insights which the liberal modernists of the time were unable to. Anyway, the British did see the subversive quality of Rajwade's thought. Sir Valentine Chirole who branded Tilak as the father of Indian discontent thought that Rajwade was preaching treason by other means. In saying so Sir Valentine underlined a fact of our colonial history. Traditional intellectuals have written and articulated more subversive ideas than the modernists or the organic intellectuals. Rajwade's writing provides enough examples of the same. Kadambari is one of the great examples of that subversive power.

G.P.D.

RAKESH, MOHAN (Hindi; b.1925, d. 1972) was born in Amritsar, Punjab. After receiving his Master's degree he taught for sometime and then moved to Bombay as the editor of Sarika. Soon he resigned from there, did some free-lance writing and entered the literary scene with short-story writing as his chosen genre. His complete short stories are available in four volumes. He died young, leaving incomplete his research project on dramatic diction for which he had reecived a Nehru fellowship. He is equally well-known for his plays Ashadh ka ek din (1958), Aadhe adhure (1959) and Laharon ke rajhans (1963) which are creative depictions of deep human tragedy in dramatic circumstances. Ashadh depicts the times and milieu of Kalidas. The theme develops out of both internal and external conflicts which begin on a day in Ashadh, and end, again, on a day in Ashadh. In between the long interval of time, Kalidas and Mallika (his love and source of inspiration), are both subjected to suffering. This lends intensity to the conflict and the play ends in romantic agony. In Laharon ke rajhans, a deeper insight is revealed. The plot is based on Ashvaghosh's Saundernand. The prince of Kapilavastu and step-brother of Gautam Buddha is the main character who suffers spiritual agony in his attraction towards Buddha's teachings on the one hand and his love for his beautiful wife Sundari on the other. Sundari's confidence in the powers of her tremendous physical attraction is shattered and her ego deflated when finally Nand appears as a clean-shaven sadhu. This play attempts to shake off the excessive sentimentalism of the previous one. The third play Aadhe adhure brings out the sense of emptiness and disorientation in modern life, and the dramatist points out that we are all incomplete, fragmentary pieces in society. He tries to probe the cause of this vacuity and the resultant stress. The tension is acutely discernible, while internal conflicts reach breaking points. The tone of satire is extremely sharp in the dialogues representing the younger generation.

The author's grasp of the contemporary situation is equally sharp in his novel Andhere bund kamare wherein he tries to depict the alienation of modern man living a life of indecision and rootlessness. Over-mechanisation in the post-war period and the existentialist agony that followed have eroded the simple piety of Indian society. According to Rakesh there is no permanent value called love, as personal ambition invariably overrides all romantic considerations. His other novel Na aanewala kal also touches the pulse of contemporary life.

His works include: Plays: Paer tale ki zamin (completed by Kamaleshwar and published posthumously); Novels: Antaraal; Short stories: Complete short stories (1972); Reminiscences and Belles lettres: Parivesh (1967).

R.L.

RAKSHABANDHAN (Hindi) is a historical drama which established Harikrishna 'Premi' (b. 1908, d. 1974) as a major Hindi dramatist of the post-Prasad period. Premi belongs to the class of writers who chose historical episodes and characters for their works to project through them contemporary problems facing the nation.

The story of Rakshabandhan (1934) is woven with the yarns of history, legend and imagination. It revolves around the famous historical event of the invasion of Udaipur by Bahadurshah of Gujarat. Karmvati, wife of Maharana Sanga of Udaipur, sends 'rakhi' (golden thread tied on the wrist of a brother by a sister seeking his love and protection) to the Mughal emperor Humayun. Humayun decides to help her even against the counsel of his ministers, and his forces march to Udaipur, but before they reach, Karmvati and hundreds of other women have already leapt into the fire to save their honour. Humayun repents for the delay which caused the death of his 'sister' and brought about a great human tragedy.

The main events as well as the principal characters of the play are historical, while the minor characters like Dhan Das, Mauji Ram and Maya, and a few episodes are the creation of the author's imagination, though on purpose. He has created them either to exhort the people to imbibe national feelings and the spirit of communal amity or to give a touch of humour to the otherwise serious theme.

When Premi wrote this play, he was faced with the problem of countering the challenge of communal hatred. The historical relationship established between Humayun and Karmvati by virtue of her rakhi was a pivot, good enough to hold the plot. The sentiments expressed in the dialogues clearly indicate the dramatist's intention: 'Those who wield sword and shed blood in the name of religion insult the faith and are a fraud.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The songs, like the songs in Prasad's dramas, are full of the spirit of nationalism and inspire the readers to rise from slumber and fight for freedom.

Rakshabandhan can be staged with success. Its language, dialogues, scene-setting and stage-directions, all point out that the author wrote it with an eye on the stage.

S.S.G.

RAKSHIT, HARAN CHANDRA (Bengali; b.1864, d.1924). A well-known journalist and novelist, he edited Bangabasi, the Bengali weekly. He translated some of the plays of Shakespeare into Bengali, though not very faithfully. He wrote several novels such as Rani Bhawani, Banger sesh vir, Jyotirmoyee, Kamini o kanchan, Pratibha sundari. Two of them were historical. His literary reviews like Yuge Bangla sahitya and Sahitya sadhana won him fame and recognition.

During the Swadeshi Movement, his Banger sesh vir (The last fighter of Bengal) was dramatised and staged in a public theatre in Calcutta. There was another drama of his on the exploits of the same hero, Pratapaditya of Jessore. Haran Chandra was made a Rai Sahib by the British Raj in 1903, probably for his much publicised treatise, Victoriayuge Bangla sahitya.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bijit Kumar Datta, Bangla aitihasik upanyasa; Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahityar itihas, Vol.2.

Sur.Mo.

RAKTAKARABI (Bengali) by Rabindranath Tagore was first published in 1924 in the monthly Prabasi. The book was first written in 1923 with the title Jaksapuri. The poet translated the play into English for the Visva Bharati Quarterly, Vol. II, No. 11 (1924) as Red Oleanders. The play belongs to the allegorical-symbolical genre. The plot of the play is very interesting and presents the problem of modern life in the machine age. Bahurupi, the theatre group in Calcutta, staged the play as a unique production, and its significance as a drama of life and contemporary civilization registered successfully on the audience.

There is a powerful king in Jaksapuri. He rules it with the help of his followers, the Governor, the Deputy Governor, the professor and the priest. All labourers are afraid to protest. The powerful king has accumulated vast wealth, and is mad with hoarding it. He has lost his good sense and fallen into a trap woven by himself. In the play the king and his followers are on one side and the labourers on the other. Between them comes Nandini, a beautiful girl with fresh air and light from outside. Clashes begin. Nandini brings joy and life to Jaksapuri. She wants to save the king from the abnormal world into which he has unwittingly fallen. She speaks to the king who has created terror in his state; but he is tired, and gripped by a feeling of emptiness within himself. He is afraid of Nandini who has aroused a conflict in him. He is fascinated by the beauty of her eyes, lips and black hair. Nandini's lover Ranjan arrives at the scene at the ripe moment to help her. The king gradually becomes envious of Ranjan and tries to win her. At last the network is torn asunder and the dead body of Ranjan is seen, still holding in his hand a red oleander, the gift he had from Nandini. The king comes to his senses and it is presumed that he will get back his joyous simple life and will be saved. This is the story of the drama.

The king is the symbol of power, greed and heartlessness of modern civilization. About Nandini, Rabindranath says, 'She is not an abstraction, but is pursued by an abstraction, like one tormented by a ghost.' But she seems also to be an allegory of love, beauty and joy. The network stands as a symbol of alienation of a king—alientation , not only from his followers but from others also. Red oleanders are a symbol of painful love, joy and freedom. Jaksapuri is the symbol of modern industrialism. It is an underworld where money is made from lumps of gold. Bisu and Kisore help Nandini in her mission. Raktakarabi may be called a drama of emancipation to save man from the abnormalities and morbidities of life and to bring him back to his natural self. With Bisu's help and Ranjan's inspiration, Nandini saved the king and his subjects. Ranjan is a unique creation of the dramatist. He is not seen anywhere in the drama, but his benign presence is marvellously made to be felt. In another sense, he is the best side of the king. Outwardly the king, Ranjan and Nandini are different characters, but in their essence they are one. The king has lost Ranjan and Nandini, but only through Nandini or love will he get back his good sense. Apparently half-mad, Bisu seems to be wise. He knows full well that with the arrival of Nandini, Ranjan is sure to come to Jaksapuri and the danger created by the underworld will be eliminated. The play has many layers of meaning. There is mal-administration and extoration, but the revolution of the downtrodden establishes equal status for the king and his subjects in a capitalistic country. People yearn for freedom and struggle to create a perfect world with the harmonization of knowledge, love and power to satisfy their souls.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bholanath Sen, Raktakarabir marma katha; Durgashankar Mukherjee, Rabindra sahityer samiksha: Rupaksanketik; Niharranjan Roy, Rabindra sahityer bhumika; P.N. Bisi, Rabindra natya parbaha; Santikumar Dasgupta, Rupak natya; Upendranath Bhattacharya, Rabindra natya parikrama.

Du.M.

RAM LALL (Urdu; b.1923) is a well-known modern Urdu fiction writer. He appreciates the traditional elements of fiction and shuns the psychological treatment or innovative technique. He has a strong grip on the story element which makes his fiction very readable. Strikingly unpretentious, he knows his limitations and seldom ventures beyond.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His writings are greatly influenced by Premchand. He also admits of the influence of Krishan Chander, Manto, Bedi, Maupassant, Chekhov, Flaubert and Joyce. Three events shaped many of his attitudes and moulded his work, viz., his mother's early death, his escape from his native place Mianwali to Lahore and India's partition.

Essentially a short story writer, Ram Lall has made impressive contribution to Urdu fiction. Most of his 300 stories, rooted in Indian soil and ethos, are ruthless exposure of the real life. For selection of themes for his stories, only Premchand appears to be his inspiration. Ram Lall is one of the most articulate defenders of man's inherent dignity and goodness. A glorious aspect of his fictional approach is artistic portrayal of the middle-age sex behaviour. Though not unusually exposed or probed, his characters seem to fit flawlessly into the entire pattern of his work.

Some of his moving stories are silhouetted against the carnage of the partition of the country. For depicting the trauma of partition, delineating the anguish of the afflicted people, and revealing the gradual erosion of the Punjabi consciousness as also for depicting the communal frenzy in its worst aspect, these stories are remarkable. The finest story on the Delhi carnage of November 1984, 'The burning tyre', is also his creation.

Out of his five published novels, Neel dhara (The blue current) and Muthi bhar dhoop (A handful of sunshine) won him fame. He has also written plays, film stories and columns.

Drawn by wander-lust, he has toured India extensively and visited foreign countries several times. His three travelogues, written with the narrative verve of fiction, have added a new dimension to Urdu travel-writing.

Ram Lall, as Chairman of All India Urdu Committee, convened two All India Urdu Conferences at Lucknow. He underlined the magnificient role Urdu has played in our Freedom Movement and national integration.

A prolific writer, he has published more than thirty books. Some of these have been published abroad and translated into Indian and foreign langauges. His honours include the Punjab Government Shiromani Sahitkar Award, Ghalib Award, Sarshar Award, Best Urdu Fiction Awards of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar Urdu Akademis and Bulleh Shah Literary Award (Denmark).

His principal works include : Short stories : Nai dharti purane geet (New earth and old songs, 1958), Ukhre hue log (The uprooted people, 1972), Aine (The mirrors), Inqilab ane tak (Till the revolution arrives) and Dubta ubharta aadmi (Drowning, emerging man); Travelogue: Zard patton ki bahar (The spring of yellow leaves); Criticism: Urdu afsane ki nai takhliqi faza (New creative climate in Urdu short story).

R.S.V.

RAM NAVAMI (Assamese) by Gunabhiram Barua (1837-1894) is said to be the first modern play in Assamese, written in 1857. It marked a sharp departure from the medieval 'ankiya nats' of the Vaishnava playwrights. In place of mythological themes those plays dealt with, this play took up a contemporary social problem. In its form it followed the Western drama.

1858 saw the enactment of the Widow Marriage Act after a prolonged campaign by Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar. Gunabhiram, who lived in Calcutta at that time, wholly supported the movement. He sympathised so much with the cause of the widows that after the death of his first wife he himself married a widow. In Ram-navami he depicts one aspect of the problem, pleading for widow re-marriage.

The story of Ram-navami is that of an illicit relationship between a young widow called Navami and a young man named Ramchandra. Navami becomes pregnant and for this her family is ostracised. Navami tries in her desperation to persuade Ram to marry her. But so abhorrent is the idea of marrying a widow that Ram not only refuses but advises her to commit suicide. At the end, both die together.

The work was meant to plead a cause. The plot is loosely-knit, the characterization is weak and the dialogue insipid in as much as it is artificial. The sole merit of the play rests on its being the first play in the western form and structure, dealing with a real social problem.

H.S

RAM-RAHIM (Hindi), the famous novel by Raja Radhikaraman Prasad Sinha was written in 1935 and published in 1936. Those were the days when India's struggle for freedom was at its highest pitch and national leaders under Gandhi emphasized the importance of Hindu-Muslim unity and eradication of untouchability. Also, Gandhi advocated the use of Hindustani instead of pure Sanskritised Hindi. It is against this backdrop that the novel Ram-Rahim was written by the writer.

Rajasaheb got his inspiration for writing the novel from a film on Thackeray's Vanity Fair. As Vanity Fair is a novel without a hero, Ram-Rahim is also without one. Rather, we have here the stories of two heroines, Bela and Bijli, the former a young daughter of a poor Brahmin farmer and the latter a rich modern girl trained to a sophisticated life style by her affluent father. Bela was married young and got a baby at the age of fourteen who died soon after birth. A few months later her husband also died of some serious ailment. Thus Bela became a widow at a very young age and had to bear the wrath of the entire household for being highly inauspicious for the family. She fell a prey to the designs of her late husband's younger brother and as ill-luck would have it bacame pregnant also. To avoid ignominy she left home for some unknown destination. And then follows her tale of suffering and humiliation.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Side by side runs the story of Bijli. She visits the club regularly with her rich father against the wishes of her homely mother, and one day elopes with Salim, a young Muslim. In a hotel, far away from home, where she lived with her lover, she came into contact with an elderly but rich nawab who lured her by spending money lavishly on her. Very soon Salim became a pauper and deserted Bijli. Nawab Saheb was very happy at the turn of events but Bijli soon found another hotelmate, Amin, who was also very rich. With his help she managed to run away from the hotel and the designs of the Nawab. As she drove in a taxi through a village, she saw a lady lying unconscious on the middle of the road. She was none else but Bela.

Being homeless, both decided to go to a red light area in Varanasi. They made some money in the profession but were unhappy. Bijli finally married Amin and courted Islam, but Bela was not ready to marry Amin's younger brother and be a Muslim. She renounced every thing and settled down in a hut near the bank of the river Ganga.

The book has a simple plot. It is a tale of two women, juxtaposed against each other and patterned on the models of Thackeray's Amelia and Becky Sharp. Interwoven in the fabric of the novel are the social problems of the day and the writer's simplistic philosophy of life. Notwithstanding the ramblings of the two principal characters, the novel makes an interesting reading and the characters on the whole, though stereotyped, are well-cast. The language of the novel has crispness of spoken idiom—a distinct charm, indeed.

U.R.S.

RAM RASAU (Rajasthani), a narrative poem on epic scale, was written by Madhodas Dadhawadia around 1595. It consists of 1034 verses on Rama's life. The majority of the metres are Gaha, Doha, Chaupai, Paddhadi, Kavitta, Jhulana, Moti dam, Beakkhari, Geet, etc. The story is mainly based on the Ramayana of Valmiki, but the poet seems to be influenced by other works also, such as Adhyatma Ramayan, Anand Ramayan, Vichitra Ramayan and the episodes of Ram katha occurring in the Mahabharat and the Bhagavat. Though a number of manuscripts of this work are available, no properly edited text has so far been published. The story begins with the birth of Rama and ends with his enthronement at Ayodhya, preceded by the death of Ravana. The poet aims at telling the story in a simple way. He has accordingly concentrated on the original story itself and avoided unnecessary descriptions. However, some major events outside Valmiki's Ramayana, which are related to the story of Rama, have also been included. It is a heroic and devotional poem written in a composite form of the first order. Here Rama has been portrayed as a hero and a saviour of his devotees. Besides describing vividly various heroic incidents right from the beginning up to Rama's crossing the sea, the heroic battle beginning with Angad's return from Ravana's court up to the latter's death has been described in about 330 stanzas of superb power and effect. Other heroic characters, too, have been vividly portrayed. Jatayu regrets his inability to defend Sita from Ravana, and the dying Bali reproaches Rama for killing him by guile. Hanuman does not beg Sursa to allow him to go to Lanka, but fights with her to make his way to the island. When Lakshaman loses consciousness, Rama immediately challenges Ravana to fight. He has thus considerably departed from tradition in his characterisation of Rama. At a number of places Rama's natural feelings have also been depicted with poignancy. Looking at the vastness of the sea every monkey-warrior encourages the other to cross the waters bravely. Rama is highly overwhelmed at the death of Jatayu. Folk traditions and beliefs have also been referred to here and there. There are also a few anachronisms in this work. For instance, Sugriva says that the army will attack Lanka after Dusserah was celebrated as a mark of Rama's victory over Ravana. In the language of the book there is a mixture of literary and colloquial Rajasthani. The figure of speech known as 'vainsagai' has also been used frequently. At some places the description is quite picturesque. The dialogues are brief, relevant and befitting. Ram Rasau is a mature work in the tradition of 'Rama katha' in Rajasthani.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hiralal Maheshwari, Rajasthani bhasa aur sahitya (Calcutta, 1960) and History of Rajasthani Literature (New Delhi, 1980); Motilal Menariya, Rajasthani bhasa aur sahitya (Prayag, 1978).

Hi.M.

RAMA PANIVADA (Sanskrit/Prakrit) was a poet and scholar of Kerala of the eighteenth century AD. He belonged to the community of Nambiars. Nambiars played a small drum called milavu at recitals. The word Panivada means one who plays an instrument with the hands (pani). Rama Panivada was born at Killikurisisi in south Malabar where his father was a priest in the famous Shiva temple. Rama Panivada himself was a distinguished scholar in the court of the Kerala kings and of some other chieftains of the period. He wrote his major works under the patronage of one or the other.

His long poems (mahakavyas), plays, hymns (stotras) and scientific works are in Sanskrit and Prakrit. The most important is Raghaviya, a mahakavya in 20 cantos and 1572 verses, dealing with the Ramayana story except the Uttarakanda. He has also written Vishnuvilasa, a mahakavya in eight cantos; Sitaraghava, a play in seven acts; Chandrikavithi and Lilavati, one-act plays of the 'vithi' type; Madanaketucharita, a play of the 'Prahasana' type; Muknudashataka, a hymn in 107 verses; Suryashtaka, a hymn in eight verses; Ambaranadistotra, a hymn in 112 verses; Bhagatachampu, a mixed prose-verse work; Vrittamatrika, a work on prosody; and Talaprastarakavya, a work on 'tala'. Rama Panivada was a distinguished writer of commentaries also. He wrote a commentary on his Raghaviya (and perhaps also on Vishnuvilasa), besides commentaries on works of some other Kerala writers. His contribution to Prakrit is also important. There are two kavyas, Kamsavaho (four cantos), Ushaniruddham (four cantos) and a commentary on Vararuchi's Prakritaprakasha, a scientific work on Prakrit to his credit. Some scholars have also assigned to him the authorship of a few other works, which is doubtful. The identification of Rama Panivada with Kunchan Nambiar, celebrated Malayalam author of works called 'Tullal', is also controversial.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

K.R.P.

RAMA VARIER, KAIKULANGARA (Malayalam; b. 1832, d. 1896), a great at Sanskrit scholar of his day, was born in Talappally Taluk in the erstwhile princely state of Cochin. He began his Sanskrit studies under his learned father, Kaithakottu Bhattathiri, and continued under the guidance of several eminent scholars. He became proficient in several branches of Sanskrit studies. He did not stick to a single plan but learnt and taught, staying at several places for short periods. Privation and poverty made the fag end of his life extremely miserable.

Varier's contribution to Malayalam rests mainly with his Malayalam commentaries on about forty Sanskrit texts. His other works deal with Ayurveda, Astrology, Vedanta, Vyakarana, Tarka, etc. There are also three long original Sanskrit poems to his credit, viz. Vagananda lahari, Vamadeva stavam and Vidyunmalastuti. He has contributed practically nothing original in Malayalam, but it was he who, most probably for the first time, corrected the textual errors that had crept into Ezhuttacchan's Malayalam classics, the Adhyatma Ramayanam and the Mahabharatam.

K.S.N.

RAMABHADRA DIKSHITA (Sanskrit; 17th c.), a devotional poet and dramatist, belonged to a period when literary embellishments, elegance of style, technical excellence, pedantic diction and jugglery of form were considered great virtues. His own writings are not free from these weaknesses, but he was able to make a name for himself because of his ingenuity and poetic excellence.

He hailed from the family of the 'ghaturvedayayajvans' in the village of Kandramanikyam near Kumbakonam. His brother, himself a poet, was the author of Keralabharanachampu. He was a pupil of Balakrishna and Chokkanatha, and a close associate of Nilakantha Dikshita whose poetry inspired him in his early years. He was a protege of king Shahji of Tanjore and an ardent devotee of Rama. The sobriquet 'Ayya' was conferred upon him and he was popularly called Ayya Dikshita.

His works are Ramashtaprasha, Ramachapastava, Ramabanastava, Varnamalastotra, Janakiparinaya, Shringaratilaka, Patanjalicharita, Prasadstava, Vishnugarbhastava, Paryayoktinishyandana, Tunirastava, and Ramabhadrashataka—a commentary on Siradeva's Paribhashavritti.

Ramashtaprasha is a hymn to Rama, comprising 116 verses in 'shardulavikridita' metre. Ramachapastava is a hymn to Rama's bow, comprising 111 verses in shardulavikridita metre. Ramachapastava is a hymn to Rama's arrow, comprising 108 verses in 'sragdhara' metre. Varnamalastotra is a hymn to Rama, comprising 51 verses arranged alphabetically.

Janakiparinaya, a seven-act play on the theme of Ramayana, is a popular Sanskrit 'comedy of errors', wherein two sets of characters, one genuine and the other disguised, are brought together into action causing confusion. The style of the book is learned, though amusing. The poetry is not intricate, and the whole story of the Ramayana moves with rapidity.

Shringaratilaka, also known as Ayyabhana, is a bhana (i.e. one-act erotic monologue) depicting the love of Bhujangashekhara, while Patanjalicharita is a verse biography of Patanjali, the illustrious commentator of Panini's aphorisms on Sanskrit grammar, which also presents narratives on the lives of the early exponents of Patanjali's Mahabhasya, such as Chandragupta, Vararuchi, Bhartrihari, etc.

Bik.B.

RAMABHADRAMBA (Sanskrit; 17th c.), was a queen of Raghunatha Nayaka, king of Tanjore, who ruled in the first quarter of the seventeenth century. She is a poetess of considerable merit. Her work, Raghunathabhyudaya, is an epic (Mahakavya) in twelve cantos, which compares well with Madhura vijaya of Gangadevi. This kavya (Raghunathabhyudaya) gains importance from the fact that the incidents narrated therein are historical and the exploits of Raghunatha Nayaka are its main subject. Ramabhadramba considers her husband Raghunatha Nayaka an incarnation of Lord Rama. So, she tries in her poem a comparison of his battles and deeds with those of Lord Rama.

From the colophons of Raghunathabhyudaya, it becomes evident that Ramabhadramba was proficient in eight languages. From a Telugu work called Rajagopalavilasa it is also known that this poetess could compose one hundred stanzas within a 'ghatika' (24 minutes). Raghunathabhyudaya was published by the University of Madras in 1934.

H.V.N.R.

RAMABIBHA (Oriya), a sixteenth century Oriya poem by Arjuna Dasa, has the distinction of being the first Oriya

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

kavya (poetical work divided into cantos) discovered so far. It deals with that part of the Ramayana story which begins with Vishvamitra's invitation to Rama to protect the sages from the demons and ends with Rama's return to Ayodhya after his marriage with Sita. It also includes some episodes from the Sarala Mahabharata. Ramabibha (The marriage of Rama) is written in the usual puranic style of a dialogue between sage Markandeya and Yudhisthira as found in the Sarala Mahabharata. The poet shows remarkable skill in selecting from the extensive narratives of the two great epics such material as is relevant to the theme of his poem. The treatment is puranic and there is no conscious effort to produce any literary effect mentioned in Sanskrit poetics though he uses a few commonplace similes and metaphors.

Ramabibha stands out as the first work of its kind and lays down the standard structural pattern of Oriya kavya once and for all. The work is divided into twelve sections known as 'chhandas' (cantos) of varying length. Each chhanda consists of a number of 'padas' (verses) akin to the 'shlokas' in Sanskrit kavyas. Each pada contains two or more lines called 'charanas'. Thus, for example, in Canto I of Ramabibha there are 97 padas each having two charanas of 14 'aksharas' (syllables) each, but in Canto IX there are 32 padas, each pada containing four charanas of varying numbers of aksharas, i.e. 29, 29, 9, and 13 respectively. Further, for standard musical recitation the places of pause (yati) are also fixed differently for different syllabic arrangements in a particular pada. These prosodial details are indicated at the head of each chhanda by mentioning the technical name of the 'raga'. Besides, there is also a mention, more often than not, of a 'vani' (a popular earlier tune) as an illustration of the poet's idea regarding the exact musical note to be sung. These formal peculiarities initiated in Ramabibha were followed without exception in the Oriya kavyas throughout the medieval period.

In the first 21 padas of Canto I the poet depicts in detail the various rites in the daily worship of Lord Jagannath of Puri with great religious fervour. But in the process he integrates into Ramabibha the customary beginning known as Mangalacharana (divine invocation). At the close of each chhanda he mentions his name. Curiously enough, this became the pattern for all subsequent kavyas.

The popularity of this unique work and its influence over the succeeding generations are evident in the profuse references, by most later poets, to the first lines of Ramabibha's chhandas as their 'vanis'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sudarshan Acharya, Srashta o srishti (Vijaya Book Store, 1972).

G.C.U.

RAMACHANDRA (Sanskrit; 12th c.), pupil of Jaina Hemachandra and known as 'Prabandha shaakarta' (author of a hundred works), wrote many plays and devotional poems. Some of his plays are Nala vilasa, Raghu vilasa, Yadu vilasa, Yadavabhyudaya, Raghavabhyudaya, Vana mala, Kaumudi mitrananda, Mallika makaranda, Rohini mriganka, Nirbhaya Bhima and Satya-Harishchandra. He also wrote a nyasa work, Haima brihad vritti nyasa. With Gunachandra, one of his fellow-students, he wrote Dravyalankara and Natyadarpana. The first is a work on Jaina logic, dealing in three chapters with Dravya, Guna and Paryaya. Their magnum opus is, however, Natyadarpana, a treatise on dramaturgy in 207 'karikas' divided into four chapters, with their own commentary on it. Natyadarpana adds 'Natika' and 'Prakarani' to the usual ten varieties of 'Rupaka'. Ramachandra seems to belong to Bhatta Lollata's tradition, as he defines Rasa as the developed, permanent emotion, and 'sukha-duhkhatmaka', bearing both pleasure and pain. Among the works quoted in Natyadarpana and now lost, one Devichandragupta by Vishakhadatta is interesting for throwing light on a forgotten chapter in the life of the great Gupta king, Chandragupta Vikramaditya.

Natyadarpana closely follows Abhinavabharati as far as the treatment of the plot goes. His treatment of 'bhava' is comprehensive and convincing.

R.N.

RAMACHANDRA KAVI, MAREPALLI (Telugu; b.1874, d.1951) was a multi-faceted personality–poet, playwright, actor, drama producer, lexicographer, social reformer, freedom fighter and teacher. Popularly known as 'Kavigaru', he was held in great esteem.

Born in a family of noted Vedic scholars in Gannavaram taluk, Krishna district, he completed his studies in Kakinada and Visakhapatnam, where he settled for the rest of his life. He worked for a brief period of six months as a clerk in the Munsiff's court (1894), but later resigned and opted for a life dedicated to the service of his country and his language. Subsequently, he served as a Telugu pandit at the Hindu College and the mission school for over a decade, and was hailed as an ideal and uncompromising teacher. Later, he also started several schools for adults, backward classes and women.

Ramachandra developed into an accomplished poet even when he was a student at Kakinada, and was awarded the title of 'kavi' by the then Principal, P.T. Srinivasa Ayyangar. He composed sixteen poems in all—Paschattapa mahattvamu (an adaptation of Paradise Lost, 1892), Rigveda samhita (selected hymns from the Rigveda rendered into Telugu, 1909), Rama shatakamu (1925) and so on. He composed and produced twenty-seven plays, Nalanatakamu (1891), Kiratarjuniyamu (1895), Parijatapaharanamu (1902), Sitasandeshamu (1911), etc. He played the roles of Krishna, Arjuna, Dharmaraja, etc. with distinction, and was the leading light of several dramatic associations like Kalabhilashaka

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Nataka Samajamu (1895-1901) and Sangita Manini Samajamu (1902-1912).

His residence became the centre of all progressive activities. He was the founder-president of Kavita Samiti (1926), which later produced the greatest living Telugu poet Srirangam Srinivasaravu. The Haindava Hitasabha founded by him in 1913 functioned as a Hindu Mission, trying to stem the tide of westernisation by the spread of Upanishadic teachings.

As Vice-president and President of the Visakhapatnam District Congress Committee he spearheaded the nationalist movement in the district. A passionate lover of Telugu language, he believed that the native Telugu vocabulary, without the help of loan words from other languages including Sanskrit, was capable of expressing all the subtle nuances. He compiled an etymological lexicon of native Telugu words, entitled Nudi kadali (Ocean of words), which is yet to see the light of day.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jayanti Subbaravu, Kavigari manugada (1935).

RAMACHANDRA, KOTTALGI (Kannada; b. 1918, d.1975) is a noted novelist who lived a life subjected to all sorts of worries and anxieties that afflict a middle-class Indian. He served for some time as a store-keeper in the Public Works Department.

He started his career as a short-story writer, writing stories which have an indefinable vividness of outline and details. Later, he took to writing novels and has written in all four novels of which only Deepa hattitu (The lamp was lighted, 1956) deserves critical attention. Deepa hattitu is an ambitious work which succeeds in depicting the life of three generations. It is interesting that each of the three heroes has a beloved other than the wife, and this rather morally dubious relationship represents the values of life, both personal and social. The story moves from village to town and back, until Vishwas, the hero, lights the lamp on the wall of his ancestral house, after wounding his father —a symbolic act of patricide that ends on a note of hope.

His other works include Pipasa (1951), Geechu gere (collection of short stories, 1953); Deepa nirvana (Novel, 1955); Nanu Balya Joshi (Novel); Vilapika (Novel).

K.D.K.

RAMACHANDRA SHARMA (Kannada; b. 1925) is a poet, short story writer and dramatist. A graduate of Mysore University and a Ph. D of London University in Psychology, he taught in Ethiopia and England, Subsequently, he was Head of Psychological Serivce in the Ministry of Education, Zambia, and UNESCO Advisor in Malavi, in Africa. He has now retired and settled in Bangalore.

Sharma entered literature as a poet with his Hridaya gita (1952), a collection of poems in the Romantic vein. Later, when Gopalakrishna Adiga pioneered the Navya movement, he became one of its prominent members. His later collections are Elu suttina kote (1953), Buvi needida spoorthi (1956), Hesaragathe (1969), Brahmana huduga (1978), Matu-mata (1984) and Deehalige banda hosa varsha (1988). In the early Navya poems Sharma's dominant concern was sex; later, psychological interest deepened. In more recent poems the themes of growing up and the process of poetic creation have engaged his attention. With T.S. Eliot he believes that poetry is a raid on the inarticulate; his composition is dense with imagery, and his more recent poems show a tendency to achieve the utmost in economy of expression. His latest collection shows that the creative power is still at work fruitfully. Sharma is also one of the important writers of the short story, and has written 38 stories. Here again the same interest in adolescence and the pain of digesting experience is in evidence. He creates symbols to reach out to embody complex exeperiences. Both in his poetry and in his stories Sharma (who was away from India for more than three decades) is also concerned with the experience of alienation. His collections are Mandara kusuma (1952), Elaneya jeeva (1956), Bilgayithu (1972) and Kathagarana katha (1985).

Sharma is also a dramatist. As far back as 1954 he won a prize for his radio play, Seragina kenda, a highly innovative work.

In 1982 Sharma published Ee shatamanada nooru Engli kavanagalau—a collection of adaptations of a hundred English poems of this century; the first poet is Thomas Hardy and the last, Louis Macniece. It contains some excellent adaptations. Sharma has also been keenly interested in issues connected with the translation and adaptation of poetry.

Among his publications are Gestures (1979), a collection of English poems, Prelible sandarolane, interviews with eminent writers, and Karanji (1986), a collection of articles.

Ramachandra Sharma has received the Karnataka Government Prize for his play Neralu and the Karnataka Sahitya Academy Award for his contribution to Kannada literature.

L.S.S.R.

RAMACHANDRA, TIRUMALA (Telugu; b. 1913), a versatile writer and scholar in Telugu, was born in an erudite Vaishnava family. He studied Sanskrit first under two eminent traditional scholars, Tirumala Narasimhacharyulu, his own grandfather, and Ambalam Vembaru Ramacharyulu, the court poet of Anegonde Samsthanam. He had his formal education at Venkateswara Sanskrit College, Tirupati, and at Mylapore Sanskrit College, Madras, and passed the Vidvan (Sanskrit and Telugu) examination. While studying for Sahitya Shiromani in Madras, he participated in the freedom struggle and was arrested and sent to Vellore jail (1932). Later, he got the degrees of Prabhakar (Punjab University) and Ayurvedabhushana (Ayurveda Vidyapith, Aligarh).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A linguist conversant in seven languages, Telugu, Sanskrit, Prakrit, Kannada, Hindi, Tamil and English, he is known for his research publications like Manalipi puttu purvottaralu (Our script and its development,1957), Nudi -nannudi (Word and idiom, a work on Dravidian philology,1959), Sahiti sugatuni svagatam (A collection of thirty critical essays, 1968), which won the State Sahitya Akademi Award for literary criticism (1970), and Gatha saptashatilo Telugu padalu (Telugu words in Gatha saptashati, 1978) which too received the State Sahitya Akademi Award (1980). He has to his credit sixteen original works and scores of translations from English, Hindi, Sanskrit, Kannada, Tamil and so on. He was one of the two founder-editors of Parishodhana (1950-54), a reputed bi-monthly research journal. The Varanasi Akhila Bharata Sanskrit Vidya Parishad conferred the degree of Mahamahopadhyaya (honoris causa) on him in 1978.

Ramachandra made a mark in the field of journalism as well. He worked on the editorial staff of Telugu dailies like Telangana patrika, Mijan (1944-47), Andhra prabha (1947-1959) and Andhra patrika (1960-1971). He also worked as a Hindi reporter to the Hindi News Agency Hindustan samachar (1978). The Calcutta Nagari Pracharini Sabha honoured him with the title Patrakara Shiromani (1971).

He worked as a member on several advisory bodies, promoted the cause of Prakrit Akademi in Hyderabad, and engaged himself in preparing an elaborate commentary in Telugu on Gatha saptashati.

B.V.S.

RAMACHANDRACHARITAPURANA (Kannada), also called Pampa Ramayana, is an important poetical work in Kannada composed in the champu form by Nagachandra, a Jaina poet of the early twelfth century. It is the story of the Ramayana retold in the strictly Jaina tradition, which stretches back to Vimalasuri's Paumachariya of the third century and Ravisena's Padmapurana of the seventh century. It comprises sixteen cantos and 3243 stanzas. Pampa Ramayana departs from the story of Valmiki's Ramayana in many respects. Here there is no mention of Dasharatha performing the 'putrakameshti yaga', and no mention of the rishis like Vishwamitra, Valmiki and Vashishta. Hanuman reaches Lanka in a 'vimana' and not by leaping over the ocean. It is not Rama but Laxmana who kills Ravana. Vali, the aggressive and cantakerous brother of Sugriva, renounces all earthly possessions and turns into an ascetic, and the episode of the rather unchivalrous killing of Vali by Rama is completely left out. But the most important departure in Pampa Ramayana is the transfiguration of the character of Ravana. He is virtuous, heroic and magnanimous. When Ravana captures the kingdom of Nalakoobara, the latter's queen who had been long languishing in love of Ravana, sends him her maid with a message of love. She even offers to help Ravana take the city surreptitiously. But Ravana refuses to fall in for her; he secretly summons her, admonishes her and counsels her to the path of virtue and righteous conduct. 'Thou art born of the worthy parentage of Kushadwaja and Madhukante. Remember thy true heritage, and treasure it unsullied. Besides, thou art my teacher, since I have learnt from thou the secrets of warcraft. Thou shalt not stray from the path of loyalty to thine lord, but live in fidelity to him.' He makes peace with the vanquished king and restores him the conquered kingdom. But this Ravana, the supreme master of passions and self-governance, loses his equanimity, when he beholds Sita, standing behind Balabhadra (Rama), like a zigzag fork of lightning closely following a dry thunderbolt. His self-control forsakes him and the bewitching beauty of Janaki disturbs Ravana and his mind is 'unsteadied, like a drop of water quivering on a lotus leaf.' He then becomes impervious to all reason and wise counsel, abducts Sita and imprisons her in Lanka. When his repeated advances to her are in vain and when his threats to kill Rama shock her into a swoon, he pities, relents and grows contrite. But these human stirrings in him are overwhelmed by his wounded pride and frustrated love. Undeterred, he moves on to his doom on the battlefield.

Thus we find that Nagachandra's Ravana rises to the heights of a tragic hero. And this warrior of many battles, the monarch of self-restraint, lapses into a pitiful victim of venal passions on seeing Sita. The poet seems to think that the fall of Ravana is due to the irony of fate. Even the mighty ocean might transgress its bounds when Time wills it, says the poet.

This 'tragic sense' of the Kannada poets like Pampa, Ranna, Nagachandra and Kumaravyasa has inspired the Western-oriented, modern writers in Kannada into refreshing revaluations and creative thinking.

H.K.R.M.

RAMACHANDRIKA (Hindi) was composed by Keshavdas in AD 1600. Though basically a devotional epic, Ramachandrika comprises topics related to Philosophy, Ayurveda (medicine), Astrology and Poetics. In addition, the description of nature reveals the poet's knowledge of the locale.

Ramachandrika contains as many as one hundred and sixteen varieties of verse compositions. Some of these verse structures are the original creations of Keshavdas. It is for this reason that the book has occasionally been described as a veritable museum of versification. These verses have been composed in praise of Rama. There are indeed one hundred and twenty-four verses based on a number of syllables as well as fifty-eight verses based on rhymes. Some of the verses, found only in poetics, may be seen mentioned in Ramachandrika, if not anywhere else. Still all these verses have a smooth flow. Besides, there is a close relationship between the language of the verses and the feelings expressed therein that makes Ramchandrika come alive as a vibrant poem. The influence of Sanskrit poets is obvious and the verses are in conformity with emotions and 'rasa'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

When Keshavdas was writing, the practice of creating rhyming couplets was prevalent in Hindi, Marathi, Gujarti, Punjabi, Bengali and Persian literatures. The one adverse result of the use of different kinds of verses in Ramachandrika is that while there is a continuing impression of novelty, there is also an intrusion of a sense of diffusion and a feeling that the poem lacks cohesiveness.

Ramachandrika has been composed in a highly intellectualised and sophisticated language. This use of a highly stylised and esoteric style makes Ramachandrika a memorable, though difficult, work. The poet has used a large number of literary images, sometimes as an end in itself. As a result there is an accentuation in the treatment of nature, character, sentiment and style. Indeed, Keshavdas's command of the nuances of language is unsurpassed.

The dialogues in Ramachandrika are attractive and express a wide range of feelings. The description of the beauty of human form is also one of its main subjects, and the portrayal of relationship between man and woman is often erotic and literary. It is not a chronological biography of Rama's life. The poem is actually a selective narration, containing those aspects and events of Rama's life which appeal to the poet's psyche.

The final impression on a perusal of the text of Ramachandrika is that the poet's intention is not as much the portrayal of Rama's life as the writing of a memorable book of verse. Indeed, the poetic craft appears to be an end in itself and the life of Rama has been used as a suitable infrastructure. A major achievement of the poem, nevertheless, lies in presenting the social, political and cultural life of the time.

The principles of poetics which were till then enumerated and observed in Sanskrit literature were ushered into the precincts of a language spoken by the common, people in Ramachandrika. It is, indeed, a confluence of poetics, philosophy and theology, and adds a new dimension to the already existing literature based on Rama's life.

M.Jy.

RAMACHARITAM (Malayalam) is a monumental example of pattu school in ancient Malayalam. The term 'pattu' is a synonym for song and once it had specific characteristics as a literary term. According to Gundert, Ramacharitam is the oldest specimen of Malayalam poetry in existence and exhibits the earliest phase of the language. However, Ramacharitam was a subject of much misunderstanding and controversy in the study of early Malayalam.

Ramacharitam strictly follows the pattu school in phonology, rhyme and prosody. Some scholars are of the view that it cannot be the earliest work in Malayalam for we have works like Darukavadham belonging to the pure Malayalam school, to which an earlier date can be assigned. K.M. George undoubtedly believes that Ramacharitam is written in a language which is mainly an artificial mixture of Malayalam and Tamil, but Ullur S. Parameshwara Iyer and some other prominent scholars argue that the poetic language used in Ramacharitam is written in pure Malayalam prevalent in that period.

Concrete evidence regarding the authorship and date of this work is yet to be discovered. Kovunni Nedungadi, the author of Kerala kaumudi, asserts that the author of Ramacharitam was a ruler of Travancore. Considering the internal evidence in this literary work we can believe that Chiraman was the name of the poet. (Ramacharitam, XIV II). Ulloor thinks that Chiraman is king Veera Rama Varma (1195-1208) who reigned Venad, as revealed by stone inscriptions. To him the name Chiraman is the 'tadbhava' form of Srirama. R. Narayana Panikker observed that Chiraman and Shivaraman refer to the same person. Hence he tries to confer the authorship of Ramacharitam on Shivaraman. According to P.V. Krishnan Nair, the poet Chiraman belongs to Maniyam Nair family in North Malabar. However, what one can say with some definiteness is that Ramacharitam was written by one Chiraman and the date of its composition must have been about the twelfth or thirteenth century.

Ramacharitam tells the Ramayana story in general and the 'Yuddha kanda' in particular, as narrated by Valmiki. The work is intended for the common people of the period. This is one of the reasons why the poet chose a simple language, which would appeal to everyone. The work consists of 164 'patalas' and 1814 'pattus'.

The Bhakti school in pattu literature was inaugurated by Chirama kavi. His poetic skill is equally commendable.

T.G.R.P.

RAMACHARITMANAS (Hindi). An author of more than a dozen poetic works, Tulsidas's popularity among the Indian masses and his reputation as a world poet rest on his magnum opus Ramacharitmanas. He commenced writing the epic on Tuesday, 9th Chaitra samvat 1631 (AD 1574-75) at Ayodhya and completed it at Varanasi in 1579. He made a definite departure from Valmiki and other poets who had narrated the story of Lord Rama earlier. The character of the Manas is multi-dimensional. The integration of its various components—narrative, religion, philosophy, morality, and art—has made it a work of great power.

Although well-versed in philosophy, Tulsi did not propound a system of philosophy in his epic. His main aim was to propagate the efficacy of devotion. The path of knowledge, he felt, was difficult to know and hard to practise. The two cardinal principles of the cult of devotion, equality and tolerance, alone can bring calm of mind to man, and cohesion and harmony to society. Tulsi showed reverence to both Rama and Shiva in his epic and tried to lift people from the esoteric practices of Tantra and the mystic experience of the yogis. His cult of devotion laid stress on righteous conduct as illustrated in Bharat's sense of duty, Lakshman's self-effacing love, Sita's faithful devotion, and Hanuman's complete dedication. Through its insistence on righteous action, the Manas projects ethical culture and impeccable social norms.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Basically an idealist, Tulsi had a keen perception of social reality as well. The disparities of life and its pain and suffering are well reflected in the Manas, e.g. in the description of Kaliyuga. Based on his own experience, his denunication of the curse of poverty has an immediacy of effect.

Tulsi's penetrating insight lays bare the dark and deep recesses of the psyche, yet he does not mock at man's weaknesses but tries to understand them with great compassion. His ideals helped man find succour and relief in a world of suffering and malaise. W.Doughlas P.Hill rightly pointed out: 'The poem not only presents the ideals of chivalry, tenderness and love; it also promises salvation to the humblest outcast.'

Tulsi always had a social order in mind. He tried to bring together the scattered energies of the community through a coordination of conflicting views and ways of life. Throughout Ramacharitmanas there is a synthesis of practical wisdom and scriptural mandate, domestic life and asceticism, devotion and knowledge, the Absolute Brahma and the personal Lord, emotion and detachment. By striving to harmonise the divergent facets of Hindu life, Tulsi wanted to revitalise every aspect of Hindu society and culture. Though he declares that he was writing the epic for self-gratification, he was, in fact, no self-centred poet.

Tulsidas has discussed all the important aspects of poetry and their theoretical implications. His views on poetic talent, creative process, freedom of the poet, relationship between word and meaning are not only in conformity with the tenets of Sanskrit poetics but also with those of modern Western poetics. He declares that a poem cannot be conceived through sensory organs; it requires a vision, an insight. When the poet dives deep, his mind becomes clear; his heart is filled with emotion, and the overflow of the creative mind acquires the form of poetry. He proclaims the freedom of the poet and censures those who barter their gift for mercenary gain. His organic theory of poetry accounts for his views on poetic language.

Tulsi is a poet of both the masses and the elite. He composed his epic in the common man's dialect, used a direct and colloquial language, exploited the folk-techniques of narration and artistic devices employed in popular ballads to communicate with the common people. At the same time he was a conscientious artist and a scholar-poet who knew his tools and their use. In his racy idiomatic language, popular maxims and phrases form an alchemy with polished compounds and figures of speech. Powerful plot, range of characters, sublimity of style, loftiness of ideals, profundity of philosophy, portrayal of life in its fullness, and aesthetic quality of a high order, all unite to make Ramacharitmanas a classical epic.

Tulsi covers in the Manas a vast canvas of human life in all its phases and portrays a wide spectrum of passions at different levels of intensity. Whether it is the delineation of love or valour, sorrow or indignation, humility or remorse, there is always a certain sophistication in his expression. The poet is nowhere crude or narrow or vulgar. He presents varied emotions, desires and thoughts not in the raw but in a sublimated form. He excels particularly when he depicts martial spirit in Lakshman, brute strength and vengeance in Ravana, passion in Kaikeyi and Parushuram, hatred in the Rakshasas, and indomitable self-will in Ravana and Meghnath. The poet has dwelt, with the sure touch of an artist, on the most heroic and the most touching incidents in Rama's life—all described with intensity of feeling and superb artistry.

We find all types of characters in the Manas. They come from all walks of life, belong to all age groups, and have varied temperaments. It is a protrait gallery of human life in all its phases. The poet has drawn his characters with a definite purpose: they serve a well-conceived design. They live and move with all the primeval passions or dignity of a heroic age. Owing to the lofty stature of the protagonist and the high ideals of the characters close to him, the epic offers a code of conduct to humanity.

Another special feature of Tulsi's characterisation is that no two characters are identical. They are all distinct from one another, with varying impulses, conflicts and motives of action.

High seriousness marks the epic. Tulsi has propounded lofty values of life in two ways—through portrayals of characters and through philosophical disquisitions. Usually, he blends the two which imparts a tone of high seriousness to the epic. His exposition of subtle philosophical and spiritual concepts in a language of the people is so masterly that the basic postulates can be comprehended even by the uneducated masses. The portrayal of an eternal, timeless war between the good and the evil—and the triumph of the former over the latter makes the Manas a work of universal appeal.

The artistic quality of the Manas has a universal appeal. Its aesthetic relevance transcends the bounds of time and space. While reading the epic a reader goes through a pattern of experiences—imaginative, emotional and intellectual. An epic makes a direct appeal by its verbal and rhythmic music in which an infinite variety of sound patterns are artistically woven together. Its imagery appeals to the imagination. Tulsi has culled his images from different sources of life—peasant life, court life, priestly environment, literary classics and folk-literature. Thus the book is a vast gallery of images, ranging from exquisite miniature paintings to large frescoes. Its emotive content evokes rich psychological responses and the thought element stimulates our intellect. Tulsi's style too has all the embellishments of a master craftsman. He excels in the use of onomatopoeia, sustained metaphors and similes which he took direct from the book of Nature and not from his predecessors.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Tulsi has displayed his skill in the weaving of plot, arrangement of incidents, presentation of dialogues, and delineation of thoughts and sentiments. The plot of the Manas is quite compact. The main plot and the sub-plots are closely knit together. The beginning, the middle and the end of the narrative are so devised as to produce an artistic synthesis of its various constituents. Except for the prologue, the epilogue, the invocations, and the didactic and reflective verses scattered in the work, there is a planned development of the narrative which gives an organic structure to the Manas.

The Manas is both a work of artistic excellence and an expression of persuasive sermon. Tulsi drew on the ballad form of the folk tradition meant for singing, and distilled his literary content in that format. His knowledge of the classics and scriptures refined the folk tradition. The ingenuity of Tulsi lies in bringing about a synthesis between the objective structure of the epic and the subjective pattern of devotional poetry. This synthesis is unprecedented in world literature. Another salient feature of the format of the Manas is the dexterity with which the poet has combined the narrative and dramatic styles and has re-structured the story of Rama in an organic whole. One is stuck by the skill with which he has woven the threads of the story narrated through the dialogues of four different pairs of narrators and listeners—Yajnavalkya and Bharadwaj, Shiva and Parvati, Kakabhushundi and Garuda, and Tulsi and the assembly of saints.

The Manas has two types of dialogue structures—that of the narrators and that of the characters. The former is the outer envelope that encapsulates the cognitive experience and describes events as occurrences from the point of view and judgment of the narrator, while the latter is the representation of an action in which the characters themselves participate. Tulsi had an eye on dramatic action too because he was the first to organise Ramlilas (open air dramatic performance of Rama's story before the masses) at Banaras. For this purpose he employed 'dramatic' events. Here the language used is suited best to drama, characters are motivated for the display of an action, and motifs are assimilated to drive the action forward. A few significant dramatic events are confrontations between pairs of characters: Lakshman-Parashuram, Kaikeyi-Manthara, Kaikeyi-Dashrath, Kevat-Rama, and Angad-Ravana. Their dialogues have potentiality for effective dramatic performance. Here the poet is not merely a narrator but a dramatist par excellence. Thus in its format the Manas is not merely a narrative epic which is read but one which is meant for recital and dramatic performance too.

The Manas is a monumental epic, a great work of devotional poetry and a moral guide to practical life. It attempts to lift life beyond the mundane. Its message goes deep down to the readers as it appeals to their heart and mind and affects their sensibility. Like the Aeneid, the Manas too has been a 'set book' for centuries of scholars, students and laymen. It evokes admiration and respect from all quarters. It occupies a pride of place in world literature since it transcends spatio-temporal dimensions in its power and influence.

S.S.G.

POETIC FORM: Opinions are divided on the exact nature of the poetic form of Tulsidas's Ramacharitmanas. It is not quite an epic (mahakavya) of the classical style, nor is it a purana. Again, it is entirely different in its pattern from the pseudo-Persian form of the allegorical narratives of the sufi mystics. It has, indeed, a close resemblance to the style of the Apabhramsha prabandha-kavyas, and Tulsidas seems to have deliberately followed the poetic pattern of the Apabhramsha 'chariu' or 'charita' kavyas (i.e. biographical poems) like the Paumchariu. Yet the difference between them is also not negligible. Actually, the poetic form of the Manas, like its subject matter and underlying philosophy, is so 'synthetic' in its composition that it is not possible to be categorical about it. Just as in its content, the Advaita, the Dvaita and the Visishtadvaita, Jnana and Bhakti, philosophy and mythology are all blended together, so, in its form also the mahakavya and the purana forms of Sanskrit and the poetic conventions and verse combinations of Apabhramsha narratives are cast in a composite pattern which in its totality does not agree with any one traditional form. Yet, broadly speaking the Ramacharitmanas is an epic, with all its essential elements, viz. great events, sublime personae, powerful style, universality of outlook and lofty ideals.

As a work of poetic craft, the Manas evinces a rare genius. The story flows from the lips of several narrators who besides describing the material events in Rama's life answer all religious queries that arise from time to time and thus keep the spiritual character of the story intact. This manifold narration makes the plot a little complicated but the poet has woven them so dexterously that the movement is not disturbed. The poet is so inspired by the divine frenzy that the tiny metre of 16 syllables flows on irresistibly with great tempo. His speech is not unadorned, but the ornaments form an integral part of the speech and nowhere divert the stream of poetry which moves on steady and serene.

It is difficult to compare the Ramacharitmanas with any classic of the West—there is hardly any work in

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Indian literature either of a similar character. The epics of Homer and Virgil are much too secular in their outlook, the Divinia Comedia is primarily an allegory over-emphasizing the inner aspect of life. Milton's Paradise Lost is an epic of great power but that power comes not from faith but from revolt. Similarly, Valmiki's Ramayana with its vaster canvas and more secular attitude is a different work—and the stark realism of the great Mahabharata could never find favour with the author of the Manas. The Raghuvamsha is the epic-composition of an aesthete with an emphasis on the lyrical side of life. In the modern age, the Kamayani of Prasad is again an epic of the psyche essentially. Thus, in this great galaxy of Indian and Western classics, the Ramacharitmanas shines all apart by virtue of its peculiar synthesis of the material and the spiritual, of knowledge and faith, of the internal and the external life, of the subjective and the objective attitudes, and, finally of the good and the beautiful.

N.

RAMADAS (Marathi; b.1608, d.1681), popularly known as Samartha Ramadas, was born at Jamb in district Jalna of Maharashtra. His real name was Narayan Thosar. The family had inherited the tradition of sun-worship, besides the office of Kulkarni (revenue clerkship) of the village. Deeply religious, the boy Narayan fled from home and lived an ascetic life at Takli, near Nasik, for twelve years, seeking spiritual illumination. He studied the Vedas, the Upanishads and Sanskrit and Prakrit books on religion and philosophy. He copied Valmiki's Ramayana in his own hand which is still preserved at the Samartha Vagdevata Mandir at Dhulia. The intense yearning and agony of his soul are reflected in his famous songs Karunashtake. He tells us that he experienced during his 'sadhana' the mystical vision of Lord Rama, and called himself Ramadas, a devotee of Rama.

In the year 1632, he began his pilgrimage, visiting the whole of India from the east to the west, and from the Himalayas to Kanyakumari. He was distressed to see the sufferings of the people, which found an expression in his famous poems, 'Asmani sultani' and 'Parachakranirupana'. He worked for the resurgence of the ancient Vedic ideals of life.

A crusader with the sensitivity of a poet, and a saint with the spirit of a solider, he inspired thousands of people from all walks of life, the most well-known among them being Kalyan, Uddhava, Diwakar, Venabai, Akkabai, and Ambikabai. The renowned group, known as 'Dasapanchayatan', included Jayaramswami Vadgaonkar, Ranganathswami Nigadikar, Keshavaswami Bhaganagarkar and Anandmurti Brahmanalkar. It must also be noted that Shivaji himself received the blessings of Ramadas. In 'Anandavana Bhuvan', one of his poems, Ramadas wrote about his concept of 'Ramarajya' which he thought Shivaji could make a reality. Swami Ramadas was proficient in several languages such as Sanskrit, Hindi, Urdu, and Marathi. He even used Persian and Arabic words, wherever necessary, in his poems. He modified the traditional forms and improvised new ones to suit his purpose.

Dasabodha, his famous composition, expresses his vision and philosophy of life. It consists of 20 'dashakas' (i.e. 200 'samasas') with 7751 stanzas. The work is philosophical in nature, but the style is conversational—the Guru and the disciple being in dialogue with each other.

Next to follow was Atmaram on the subject of 'Maya' and 'Atman' and their relationship. The language and the exposition of the subject prove it to be a later composition. It shows the saint-poet's deep experience and profound philosophical knowledge.

Ramadas believed that Atmaram and Dasabodha convey intensely the inner world of his personal experience.

Another highly popular composition by Ramadas is Manache shloka or Manobodhana addressed to the mind. It has 205 shlokas in 'bhujangaprayat' metre which is easy for recitation. Belsare calls it 'an Upanishad in Marathi philosophical literature'. Karunashtake is another sensitive composition by him, which expresses his yearning for divine compassion. The various phases of a sadhaka seeking union with the Supreme self are expressed here with intense poetic fervour. In addition, Ramadas has written two cantos of the Ramayana, namely 'Sunderkand' and 'Yuddhakand'.

Ramadas composed padas also which are literally innumerable. More than seven hundred of these lyrics are included in the Shri Samarthanchigatha, edited by Anantdas Ramadasi. Some others are in Dasavishramadhama. Besides, there are hundreds of padas, unpublished but preserved at Dhulia. Because of their lyrical quality, emotional fervour and music, Ramadas used them for 'kirtana'. They are also distinguished for their picturesqueness and dramatic quality.

Ramadas composed padas in Hindi also. They appear to be a natural expression of his dynamic personality and played an important role in the national and cultural life of India.

Ramadas had a passionate love of music. He composed all his padas in various ragas, prevalent in his time. He used more than fifty ragas, the important ones being Asavari, Kalyan, Kafee, Jog and Pahadi.

Besides these, Ramadas composed thousands of abhangas which have been edited by Anantdas Ramadasi. He also wrote more than a hundred 'bharuds', a kind of Marathi folk song, a form rarely handled by the poets. His 'artees' (songs of worship) are sung even today on various religious occasions.

Ramadas was, indeed, a revered philosopher and poet. The movement he initiated came to be known as 'Samartha sampradaya' which spread far and wide in

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

India. He emphasized the creed of dnyan (knowledge) and its strict observance in everyday life, and left a deep and lasting impact on the culture and literature of Maharashtra in particular and of India in general.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.V. Belsare (ed.), Sartha manache shloka (Satara, 1980) ; N.R. Phatak, Ramadas vangmaya ani karya (Bombay, 1970) ; S.S. Dev, Shri Samartha charitra, Vols I, II, III (Bombay) ; V.K. Rajwade, Shri Samartha Ramadas (Satara, 1926).

RAMADAS (Rajasthani; b. 1726, d. 1798) came of a farmer's family of Bikamkor village. His father's name was Shardul and his mother's Anabhidevi. He was initiated by Hariramdas who belonged to the Ramasnehi sect of Sinthala and propagated the cult of Rama worship by travelling far and wide in Mewad, Malwa and Marwad. In 1763 he established his seat at Khedapa (Jodhpur). Although this seat is considered to be a branch of the Sinthal peeth, its tradition is different from that of the peeth. Ramadasji was a householder. After his death his son and disciple Dayaludas led the sect. Fifty-two distinguished disciples of Ramadasji set up 'Ramdvaras' (centres for the worship of Rama) at various sites.

Ramadasji's preachings include over 1,700 sakhis in the doha style, 72 harjas (songs in praise of God) and 24 granths on religious subjects. The subjects of his preachings are moral principles, worship of the 'formless' God and related subjects, while in pursuit of the divine goal, devotion to Rama and Sabadyog are emphasised. Recitation of the name of Rama is considered the best means of attaining 'mukti' (salvation) from the cycle of birth and death. Avoiding the extreme paths of worldliness and abstinence, Ramadasji chose the middle path. He attacked blind faith, religious orthodoxy and show of pomp, and taught observance of virtue. Besides the doha, he has employed other metres like soratha, kavitt, chaupai, nisani, jhulana, chandrayana, chhapaya, udhor, ardhnabhujangi and kundalyan. His preachings have been published. One may infer about his life from the work, entitled Parchi, by his disciple and from the other works in his tradition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Guru prakaran parchi (Bikaner, 1936); Hiralal Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature (New Delhi, 1980); Ramsnehdharma Prakash, Anubhavgiraoot (Bikaner, 1930); Ramsnehi, Shri Ramadasji Maharaj ki vani (Khedapa, 1961).

RAMADAS, BELLAMKONDA (Telugu; b.1923, d.1971), poet and playwright, was born at Narasaraopet. His father, Bellamkonda Raghava Rao, was a famous Sanskrit scholar who introduced his son to Telugu and Sanskrit classics. A keen student, Ramadas studied the Western classics by himself. The family, having lost the ancestral property, had to suffer a great deal and Ramadas had to struggle for livelihood.

Ramadas joined the Progressive Writer's Movement when it was in full swing. He was one of the three poets who wrote Nayagara, the first anthology of progressive poetry, the other two poets being Kundurthi Anjaneyulu and Yelchuri Subrahmanyam. They were also inspired by the Indian freedom movement and wrote poems in memory of Alluri Sitarama Raju, Bhagat Singh and Thakur Chandra Singh, the heroes who fought against the British and lost their lives during the struggle. The 'Nayagara' poets believed that the Communist Manifesto was the greatest literature in the world. Their own book, Nayagara, was first published in 1934 and created a stir in the Telugu world.

Ramadas also wrote a revolutionary play entitled Punarjanma (Rebirth) in which he took the cause of a callgirl, who was forced into debauchery when betrayed by her cunning lover. The playwright deals with her problem with great sensitivity, and the play can be considered one of the most significant plays in Telugu literature. Ramadas wrote another play, Masterjee, which was adapted from Gogol's famous play Inspector General. It was put up on the stage hundreds of times and is still a popular play. In his another Akasa Ramanna, he highlighted the social evils of the present-day society and introduced the character of a C.I.D. officer who terrorised the evildoers. This play was also a great success and drew packed houses.

Ramadas's poems Na gitam (My poem), Cherasala (Prison), Asoka vriksham (Ashoka tree) and Nishkramanam (Exit) are also praiseworthy from any literary standard. He believed that 'Life is a cross and every man a Christ'.

Ramadas had worked as a sub-editor in Andhra prabha, a Telugu daily. He also translated Tagore and many classics from Russian literature. His translation of Gitanjali was highly acclaimed in literary circles.

K.R.R.

RAMADASA AYYANGAR, NELATURU (Telugu; b.1891, d.1973) did his M.A. in both Sanskrit and History from Madras University, and taught the two subjects at V.R. College, Nellore. He was a well-known critic and commentator. He was a close disciple of Sri Vedam Venkataraya Sastry, the doyen of critics and commentators in the last quarter of the nineteenth and the first quarter of the twentieth century. In the literary polemics of his times, he championed the views of his preceptor on various aspects of Telugu literature and language. His critical articles, such as 'Kalagati talapotalu', 'Telugu-juttina-togudu', 'Bhishma brahmacharyamu', 'Ratnavali vyasamulu', etc. were published in the leading literary journals of the day.

Ramadasa Ayyangar's glosses and commentaries in Telugu on the Abhijnana Shakuntala of Kalidasa, Uttaramacharita of Bhavabhuti, and Mudrarakshasa of

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Vishakhadatta are widely known, and won him great acclaim. For the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi, he edited the Telugu classic, Amukta malyada by Srikrishnadevaraya, with a critical introduction.

Ramadasa Ayyangar was also a talented actor. He played very ably many a role in the plays of his teacher, Vedam Venkataraya Sastry, and was particularly praised for playing the roles of Bussy in Bobbili yuddhamu and Chekumuki in Prataparudriyamu.

C.V.R.R.

RAMADASI SAHITYA (Marathi) denotes the writings of the followers of Samartha Ramadas. The term 'followers' however, includes not only the direct disciples of Ramadas such as Kalyana and Uddhava but all those writers who belong to the cult of Ramadas. Interpreted thus, even modern scholars like V.K. Rajawade and Shankararav Deva have contributed to this literature. The latter was a devotee of Ramadas, while the former was responsible for giving a systematic interpretation to the life and writings of Ramadas.

Ramadasi Sahitya is vast in its expanse and it is only through the scholarly efforts of such persons as Shankararav Dev that a large number of Ramadasi writings have seen the light of the day, and a huge collection of manuscripts is available for study.

Notwithstanding its bulk, much of Ramadasi literature, with the exception the profound works of the Guru himself, lacks depth and emotional appeal. Another exception is Devadas of Dadegaon. Lacking the social and political awareness of Ramadas, these works lapsed into traditional spiritual-devotional poetry, often of a mediocre kind. As S.M. Mate has remarked, Ramadas was defeated by his own followers: such is the disparity between the literature of Ramadas and that of his followers.

The phenomenon of lapse, interestingly enough, began in the hands of the direct disciples of Ramadas himself. Uddhava, Kalyana and Annappa can be looked upon as test cases. They did write on Vedanta, bhakti and some episodes from the puranas and the Ramayana, but hardly made any significant contribution to Bhakti literature.

One of the important features of Ramadasi writings is biographical literature on Ramadas. This literature begins with Bhimaswami of Tanjavar (1642-1742), whose Laghucharitra was written soon after the demise of the master. Another biography of Ramadas comes from Giridhar (1653-1729), the author of Samarthapratapa who gives a fairly detailed description of the Guru and his times. There are forty works to Giridhar's credit, including four that try to explain and interpret Dasabodha. Giridhar also wrote seven different Ramayanas out of which five are available. The deeds of Lord Krishna were also described by him in his Harilila and *Krishnakathatarang*a.

Uddhvasuta (later 18th c.) wrote Samarthacharitra in Ovi form, whereas Bhimaswami had written his in 'abhanga' form. His Bhaktalilamrita begins with the life of Ramadas and describes it in 121 abhangas. In addition, he gives an account of thirty-seven other saints also in this book. Meruswami too includes Ramadas's life in his Ramaschala which shows the influence of Jnaneshwara as well. Then we have Hanumantaswamichi bakhar, said to have been written by Hanumant though some critics maintain that it was prepared for him by one Rango Medhe.

Atmaram Ekkehalikar's Dasavishramadhama is a class in itself, an 'Encyclopaedia Ramadasica' consisting of 121 chapters and more than sixteen thousand ovis, written during 1903-1908. The work is however prosaic, though it contains a good deal of information.

There are some philosophical-cum devotional works also written by the Ramadasis. One such work is Svanubhava Dinakar by Dinakar Gosavi (1628-1703). This work in 6750 ovis is divided into sixteen 'kalapas', further divided into eighty-one 'kiranas', and presents a good synthesis of Vedanta and devotion to Rama.

Haribhau Bhondave (1708-1777) is a rare combination of two different streams, Varakari and Ramadasi. His abhangas betray the influence of Tukaram. His Haribodha, consisting of two thousand ovis, is a dialogue between a teacher and a disciple. Dnyansagar is his another important work consisting of eighteen thousand ovis. However, the most astonishing aspect of Bhondave is his rational approach which is quite remarkable in eighteenth century India.

The Ramadasi tradition continued even during the nineteenth century, with Naraharidas writing his Abhanga Ramayana and Narasoba some captivating abhangas.

One may recall that even women were admitted to the fold of Ramadás, some of whom wrote good poems. One Venabai wrote Sitasvayamvara and the Ramayana in five kandas, while Ambabai and Bayabai wrote some touching poems.

Further, there is a group called 'Ramadasa Panchayatan' including the Guru and four of his contemporaries who are said to have been his followers. They are Jayaramaswami Vadagavkar, Ranganathaswami Nigadikar, Anandamurti Brahmanalkar and Keshavasvami Bhaganagarakar. These five are collectively known as Dasa-Panchayatan. If this group is accepted, one may include even their works in Ramadasi Sahitya.

In our times scholars like Rajawade, Dev, Bhat and Alatekar have made significant contribution to the study of Ramadasi literature.

Sa. Mo.

RAMAIYA, B.S. (Tamil; b. 1905) joined Manikkodi, a Tamil journal, founded by K. Srinivasan and popularized by Va. Rajagopalan (Va. Ra). Under his editorship,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Manikkodi served as an excellent forum for Pudumaippittan, Ku. Pa. Rajagopalan, N. Pichamurtti, Mauni, C.S. Chellappa, Chidambara Subramanyan and P.G. Sundararajan who explored the range and power of the new literary form of the short story. Ramaiya is a prolific writer with a wide range and outstanding narrative skills. He is a humanist, not overtly bothered with techniques. The folk story form is supple enough for him as seen in 'Sivasakti nirutyam', 'Edirkkatchi', and 'Kanchikkalaiyam'. All his writings are sculpted around well-chosen plots and exude social sensibility. 'Malarum manamum', with which Ramaiya made his debut, deals with the problems of widow remarriage, a subject which Va. Ra. had taken up in most of his writings.

Pirema haram, a novel, pleads for the creation of a society in which women and men, of all castes and religions, are equal and in which reason reigns supreme.

Polygamy, another social evil, is the theme in 'Ennotu majik kanavan' (My former husband). His 'Nakshattirakkulandai' (The child of star) is an artistic exploration of a child's mind.

The theatre cast its spell on Ramaiya. He started with a puranic play, Terottiyin makan (The charioteer's son, 1957). This won him a prize from the government of Tamil Nadu. The prestigious S.V. Sahasranamam's Seva Stage performed it as well as his later plays, Panchali shapatam (The vow of Panchali, adaptation of C. Subrahmania Bharati's minor epic with the same title, 1961), Malliyam mangalam (1950), Poliskaran magal (Policeman's daughter, 1962), Pu vilangu (Shackles made of flowers, 1963), President Panjaksharam, a play based on Gogol's Inspector General, 1957). President Panjaksharam deals with the shady transactions rampant in contemporary personal and public lives, with special reference to local government administration. In 1980, he published his Manikkodi kalam, reminiscences of his association with Manikkodi, invaluable for the students of Tamil literary history, criticism and journalism. His works include Cinema (On the production and direction of films, 1943), Nada vilakku (The eternal lamp, novel, 1955), Radionatakam elutuvadu eppadi? (How to write a radio play, 1955), Tinai vidaittavan (The one who has performed a good deed, novel, 1961), Kungumappottu Kumarasami (Kumarasami with 'tilak' on his forehead, short stories, 1963), Puvum ponnum (Auspicious and opulent, short stories, 2nd ed. 1963).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Ramalingam, Irupadam nurrandut Tamil ilakkiyam (Madras, 1973); P.G. Sundararajan, 'The Novel and the Short story in Tamil' in Proceedings of the Fifth International Conference-Seminar of Tamil Studies, Vol. 2 .(Madurai, January 1981).

K. Su.

RAMAKRISHNA KAVI, MANAVALLI (Telugu; b.1866, d.1957) was born in Numgambakkam, Madras. He studied B.A. with History as his main subject and did his M.A. in Sanskrit later. When he was twenty, he was already proficient in five languages, namely Sanskrit, Telugu, English, Tamil and Kannada. Later, he became acquainted with eighteen languages.

Ramakrishna Kavi was interested in research even from his early age and collected several oriental manuscripts. He became private secretary to Vanaparthi Samsthanadhishwara in 1904, and found many ancient manuscripts in the library of the Samsthanam. He brought out a publication called Vismruta kavulu (Forgotten poets), thus bringing many ancient works to light. Several books like Sriranga mahatmyamu by Bhairavakavi, Kridabhiramamu by Srinatha, Kumarasambhavam by Nannechoda, Nitishastra muktavali by Bhadra Bhupala, Paratattva rasayanamu by Phani Bhatt, Tripurantakodaharanamu by Tipparaju, Anargha Raghavamu by Thimma Bhupala, besides Prabandha manibhushanam, Udayanodayam, Iravatacharitram, Dimdima prahasanam, Raghunatha-Ramayanam, Sambopakhyanam, Mudramatyam and Sakala niti sammatam were edited and published by him. He supplied some manuscripts like Varahapuranam to Sri Kandukuri Veeresalingam Pantulu and got them published by him.

While at Vanaparthi, he collected some Kakatiya inscriptions. He also published The Lithic Records of Hyderabad.

After working at Vanaparthi for ten years, he was appointed at the Oriental Manuscripts Library in Madras. He toured Andhra along with Veturi Prabhakara Sastri for collecting Sanskrit and Telugu palm leaf manuscripts. He also toured Kerala to collect Sanskrit manuscripts, and published in the 'Dakshina Bharata' series, Chaturbhani, Tapasavatsa Rajam, Kundamala and plays like Kaumudi mahotsavam. He could get hold of Bharata's Natyashastra and Abhinava Bharati in his tours. Three volumes of his work came out during his life time through the Baroda Oriental Research Institute. The fourth volume was published after his death. His commentary on Natyashastra brought him worldwide reputation. Further, he got the rare manuscripts in Tanjavur library separated from the rest of books. He also toured Rayalaseema districts and Northern Circars for collection of manuscripts.

He wrote articles in English as well, published under the title, Literary Gleanings on Sanskrit Literature. He was also commissioned by Madras University to render the Mackenzie Volumes (in Telugu) into English. Later, he was appointed Education Officer under the Tirumala Tirupati Devasthanam. He set up a journal for Oriental research and published a number of articles in it. In 1940 he was appointed Head of the Sanskrit section at Sri Venkateswara Oriental Research Institute, and worked there for about fourteen years.

He was given the title of 'Kavi' at an early age. He wrote Mrigavati and Vasantavilasam in the classic prabhandha style. He also used a pseudonym, Kalankaka-

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

vi. He wrote a novel, Samtapa savatsanjam, for the benefit of students, and rendered into Telugu thirteen plays of Bhasa. Two of them, including Karnabhara, were printed. His own play Kalingasena is available up to three acts. At the age of sixty-nine he published his most important work on Sanskrit Natyashastra under the title Bharata kalasam. He published many essays on literature in Sanskrit, Telugu and English.

J.V.S.

RAMAKRISHNA PILLAI, K. (Malayalam; b. 1879, d. 1916) is an unforgettable name in the field of journalism in Malayalam. Better known as 'Swadeshabhimani', which in fact was the name of the paper he edited, he set an example of devotion, sacrifice and fearless editing in the field of Malayalam journalism.

Even during his student days, the rebel in Ramakrishna Pillai revolted against corruption in administration and injustice and inequity in society. He developed early interest in journalism, and started writing a column, 'Letters from Neyyattinkara' in some of the papers of the day. Strength of conviction, idealism and uprightness were the main qualities of his mind reflected in these columns.

He took up the editorship of the journal Kerala darpanam in his student days (1900) and for that venture he was thrown out of his house by his uncle. However, he opened a new vista in the profession through his editorship. Later, he accepted the editorship of Malayali also. The next year he was requested to take charge of a new magazine called Keralapanchika which he edited till 1903.

Ramakrishna Pillai started his career as a journalist at a time when the Indian press, as a whole, was at the threshold of a change. Because of the growing influence of the national liberation movement, the Indian press was becoming more and more aggressive and dynamic. There was widespread opposition to the stringent press laws, and Ramakrishna Pillai took up the leadership of such patriots in Travancore. He started a publication of his own, namely Keralam, which laid equal stress on social reformation and administrative reforms.

In 1905 the famous Swadeshabhimani came into existence. First published from Vakkom, it was shifted to Trivandrum later. It was one of the foremost publications in the State which raised effective resistance against the notorious press laws. Through his writings Ramakrishna Pillai exposed the true nature of palace politics and corruption and favouritism rampant in the corridors of power.

During this period he found time enough to continue his legal studies and also edit two other periodicals namely Vidyarthi and Sarada (the only women's magazine of the time). He used the columns of his paper to launch an attack on authorities who indulged in anti-social activities.

"Very intelligent people like Achary dwindle like blades of grass in breeze. In such circumstances they depend on legislations which are framed with the intention of strangling people's liberty. But such excesses of administrators could be countered by the opposition of the people."—so ran an editorial in Swadeshabhimani on the then Dewan of the state, P.Rajagopalachary. As a reaction to this, a royal proclamation was issued on 26 September 1910 deporting Ramakrishna Pillai from Travancore and confiscating his press and paper—a martyrdom for a righteous journalist in the service of his countrymen.

The action of the government was severely criticised by national papers, and the Malayali Association of Malaysia presented Ramakrishna Pillai a gold medal with the word 'Swadeshabhimani' inscribed on it.

Ramakrishna Pillai is also remembered as a writer, critic and social reformer. He enriched the Malayalam language with varied contributions to biography, history, literary criticism, etc. He spoke out, loud and clear and at times with virulence, on the authors he criticised. His criticism of the novels of C.V. Raman Pillai and Balakalesavadam are examples. The short biography of Karl Marx written by him is the first Marxist document in Malayalam. He also wrote books on Socrates, Columbus, Franklin and Mahatma Gandhi. His book on Gandhi is the first biography of the great national leader in any Indian language. Perhaps his most important work is Vrittantapatra pravartanam (1912), a dissertation which elucidates the functions and techniques of journalism.

T.R.R.N.

RAMAKRISHNA RAO, ABBURI (Telugu; b. 1896, d.1979) was born in Krishna district and became a poet early in his life. He wrote his first poem 'Jalanjali' in 1909, which was published in 1914 when he was still a student. He studied Sanskrit at Maharaja's College, Mysore. Early in his life he came into contact with the great freedom fighter Pattabhi Sitaramaiah and an eminent poet Challapilla Venkata Sastri who left his impression on his thought.

One of his early works is 'Mallikamba', a tragic love story in verse. During 1917-1919 he lived at Santiniketan and was inspired by Rabindranath Tagore. He learned Bengali and studied the political and philosophical writings of Sri Aurobindo. He wrote 'Oohaganamu', a poem that reveals his imagination and fine poetic technique. On his return from Santiniketan, he contributed his essay 'Abhinava kavita prasamsa' to the first literary supplement of Andhra patrika. Coming under the impact of the Indian freedom struggle he wrote a Burra katha (a ballad) on the tragedy of Jalianwala Bagh which was immediately banned by the British government. Another poem by him, 'Suryaraju kathalu', published in the cultural weekly

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Krishna patrika, became equally popular. He also wrote 'Nadisundari' during this phase, and it is acclaimed as one of his best poems. And, for a change, he wrote a detective novel Mangalasutram.

Ramakrishna Rao was appointed the first Telugu lecturer at the newly established Andhra University in 1926. Later, he became the University librarian. He now read many classics of world literature and sensitively grasped the literary trends in several languages. He was the first Andhra poet who read the Manifesto of the Progressive Writers Association based in London, and encouraged Sri Sri to study it himself. He was one of the founders of the Indian Progressive Writers' Association. He studied Marxism and was attracted towards it. He also read the books and articles of M.N.Roy and was thoroughly impressed with his ideas. In 1939 he founded the 'Indian Renaissance Association' along with M.N.Roy, Tarkatirtha Lakshmana Sastri Joshi and Agyeya, the Hindi writer. His connection with the doctrinaire communism was, however, short-lived.

Ramakrishna Rao was a guiding spirit for many modern poets. He was equally a good actor and producer of plays, introducing many modern techniques in dramatic production. His poetic output is meagre but rich in content. He was a fine craftsman and master technician, besides being an intellectual who tried to enrich human values through his writings. His other well-known poems are 'Thetagiti', 'Dwipada' and 'Mutyalasaram'.

K.R.R.

RAMAKRISHNA SASTRY, MALLADI (Telugu; b. 1905, d. 1965) was a short story writer. Graduating from Machilipatnam, he proceeded to Madras to take his M.A. degree and later settled there. His interests were wide and varied, from the Vedas and puranas down to folklore and western cinema. He was proficient in a number of languages—English, Telugu, Sanskrit, Hindi, Gujarati, Kannada, Urdu, Pali, Marathi and Bengali. He was one of those who defended the Devadasi system when others condemned the institution and sought to abolish it altogether. He held that the devadasis were not just fallen women but preservers and promoters of fine arts who had dedicated their lives to bhakti and shringara. To him art was not merely enjoyment, but also creation. And enjoyment did not have to be defilement, it was aesthetic pleasure. He was an exponent of 'Amalina shringara' (Platonic love). He went to Tanjore to transcribe the works of Muddupalani et al, and was instrumental in bringing out critical editions of such books as Hamsavimshati through the Sringar Kavya-grantha Mandali of Machilipatnam. He wrote for films too, though he devoted a lot of time to writing stories, poems and literary essays.

Ramakrishna Sastry has some two hundred stories and an equal number of literary essays to his credit. Some of his short stories are collected and published in ten volumes: Alloneredu (1957), Muni goranta (1957), Rasamanjari (1957), Mattakokila (1960), Kamunipurnami (1960), Chengalva (1960), Chitrashala (1960), Rangavalli, Dodammi and Swara mela. There are others yet to be collected. His stories stand apart as masterpieces of literary art. They are full of variety. Sastry evokes a fairy tale atmosphere with his flowery classical style as in 'Kamunipurnami' and a 'Chengalva'. He can be sarcastic and sardonic as in Ardha nari. In Tatayya kathalu (Grandfather's tales), he creates a character called Tatayya (grandfather) in his own image to represent what is best in our tradition. He can humanise a dumb animal as in 'Kanukali' and evoke pathos. As a writer of prose, he ranks very high. His style is subtle, sonorous and allusive. Sastry wrote some beautiful lyrics too. Had he confined himself only to lyrical poetry, he would have been an excellent romantic poet.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Arudra, Mahaniyulu (Madras, 1979).

G. Sr.

RAMAKRISHNA, TENALI (Telugu; c. 1485-1575). The first efflorescence of Romanticism in Telugu literature took place in the 16th century, and Tenali Ramakrishna occupies a high position among the poets who vied with one another in enriching literature in that age. His original surname was 'Garlapati', but he acquired the new surname because of his association with the town of Tenali. He is believed to have been one of the eight great poets—Ashtadiggajas—who adorned the court of the Vijayanagara emperor Krishnadevaraya. His gift of repartee and love of fun and pranks made him some kind of a folk hero in South India, with the result that the power and originality of his poetical works and the rare felicity of his phrasing remained largely unknown to the general public even among the Telugu people.

Three of his narrative poems have survived, and his Panduranga-mahatmyamu is rightly regarded as one of the pancha-kavyas in Telugu, whose study is a must for those who aspire to be sound scholars in the language. He was intially a Shaivite, and his name appears as Tenali Ramalinga Kavi in his first poem Udbhataradhyacharitramu. He appears to have embraced Vaishnavism subsequently, perhaps because of his association with the Vijayanagara court. He extols Bhattaru Chikkacharya as his guru in Panduranga-mahatmyamu, a work intended to glorify a Vaishnavite place of pilgrimage. The last poem Ghatikachala-mahatmyamu also deals with the sanctity of another Vaishnavite pilgrimage centre.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Udbhataradhya-charitramu, a poem in three cantos, is based on an episode in Palakuriki Somanatha's Basava-puranamu, and deals with the Shaivite preceptor Udbhata, and incidentally with the sanctifying quality of the holy city of Kashi (Varanasi). A laudatory verse on Vishnu in the invocation to the gods at the beginning of the work shows that the poet was free from religious bigotry.

Panduranga-mahatmyamu, a poem in five cantos, reveals the flowering of Ramakrishna's poetic genius, and belongs to the class of poems known as kshetra-mahatmya-kavyas which are intended to describe the glory of some place of pilgrimage. These poems narrate the story of despicable sinners who are freed at once from the taint of sin by merely visiting a place of pilgrimage. The greatness of Panduranga and his kshetra is brought out through nine stories in the poem, but easily the most notable among them is the account of the rake Nigama Sarma who is redeemed by a visit to the holy place. The poet's presentation of a middle class household and his portrayal of Nigama Sarma's sister, who is fond of her wayward brother and tries to persuade him to mend his ways and give up his profligacy, are memorable. The felicity of the poet's narration and his deft phrasing have added to the beauty of the work.

Ghatikachala-mahatmyamu, a poem in three cantos, is also a Vaishnavite work, intended to sing the praise of Yoga-Lakshmi-nrisimha, and His shrine on Ghatikachala. Ramakrishna wrote the narrative part of the poem, but the exordium appears to have remained unfinished when he passed away, and the poem was subsequently dedicated by his grandson to the Maharashtrian ruler Khandoji.

A.R.R.

RAMAKRISHNAIAH, KORADA (Telugu; b. 1891, d. 1961) was a scholar of Sanskrit, Telugu and English. In his early years he composed short poems on patriotic themes but his main talent found expression in the field of Telugu linguistic studies, poetics and literary criticism. He was the author of Andhrabharata kavitavimarashanamu, Kalidasuni kavita pratibhalu and other literary essays. He read several scholarly papers at the sessions of All India Oriental Conferences. Sandhi, Dravidian Philology, Dravidian Cognates are among his works of importance.

He worked as lecturer at Maharaja's College, Vijayanagaram, and as Head of the Department of Telugu in Madras University. At the Madras University he infused a new critical outlook in the study of Telugu language and literature. His first publication was a critique on the Andhra Mahabharata (Andhrabharata kavitavimarshanamu), the earliest extant work in Telugu. It was a new approach to the study and appreciation of literature. He also published numerous literary essays and works like Kalidasuni kalapratibhalu (Mind and art of Kalidasa), expounding the substance and technique of literary criticism. After the publication of the critique on Bharata, Ramakrishnaiah was drawn more to comparative Dravidian philology to which he made some important contributions. He published Studies in Dravidian Philology (1935) explaining the agglutinative character of the Dravidian languages, and Dravidian Cognates (1945), a collection of cognate vocabulary in the major Dravidian languages with linguistic notes and a valuable introduction. In the numerous research articles which he published, he brought out a wealth of material on comparative Dravidian Philology and the development of the Telugu language. Some of them are 'Dravidian Languages and Prakrits', 'Dravidian Phonetics' (I to III), 'Antasthas in Dravidian' Languages'; 'Dravidian Inflexion', etc.

The book Sandhi (1935) deals with the principles of euphonic combination in Telugu from a historical point of view. Here Ramakrishnaiah says, "Most of the grammars of the Telugu Language are merely of prescriptive nature. The Telugu grammarians, and for the matter of that, all Indian grammarians, have in the analysis of their vernaculars followed the principles which the grammarian Panini has adopted in his analysis of the Sanskrit language. He mentioned the differences between the old Vedic and later Sanskrit by drawing a distinction between them as 'chhandas' and 'bhasha'. But the Telugu grammarians were generally very conservative in recognising the changes due to the growth of language."

Ramakrishnaiah felt that a complete study of the grammar of a language requires an intercomparison of the grammatical facts of closely allied languages and hence he made an attempt to introduce the historical method into the field of Telugu grammatical studies. Sandhi proved to be a stepping stone for tracing further the history and development of the Telugu language.

Another scholarly book, Dakshina desha bhasha saraswatamulu, was published in the year 1949. In this book he made an attempt to deal with the various aspects of 'deshi' language with a view to getting at the common literary and prosodial tradition, underlying the development of the indigenous forms of literature in South India. The object of this work was to rouse the interest of the students in a comparative study of a Dravidian prosody and of forms of indigenous literature of South India. While Korada Ramakrishnaiah was working as lecturer at Maharaja's College, Vijayanagaram, he gave lectures on the history of Telugu literature and its growth, and later published Bhashotpatti kramamu bhasha charitamu. The books Bhasha charitra vyasamulu and Andhra bharata kavita vimarshanamu show the depth of his scholarship and his keen analysing faculty.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Besides original works, he edited a number of classical Telugu works for the Madras University, namely Vishnupuranamu, Vishnumayanatakamu, Navanatha charitramu, Paratattvarasayanamu, Vallabhabhyudayamu, and Kumarasambhavamu.

He presided over the Telugu section of the All India Oriental Conference at Tirupati in 1944 and over the Dravidian Culture section at Dharbhanga in 1947. He was the recipient of a State Award in 1949-50 for his Telugu Language : Its Origin and History.

K.M. Sa.
Sh. M.A.

RAMAKRISHNAMACHARYULU, DHARMAVARAM (Telugu; b.1853, d.1912), one of the most well-known modern dramatists of Andhra, was born at Dharmavaram, a town in Anantapur district. His father settled down at Bellary as a Telugu Pandit in a local college.

A prodigy who could recite and reproduce Amarakosha at the age of three, Ramakrishnamacharyulu became proficient in Sanskrit, Telugu and English at a very early age. After passing the Pleader's examination, he settled down as a lawyer at Bellary. The Kannada Yakshagana performances in the town inspired him to playwriting. He wrote Swapnaniruddham (1886) in Kannada which was a great success on the stage when performed by his own troupe, Sarasa Vinodini Sabha.

Dharmavaram then ventured to write a play Chitra naleeyam (1887) in Telugu, which brought fame both to the Sabha that performed it and to the director-cum-actor-writer. Following the success of this venture, Dharmavaram wrote twenty-nine plays, out of which fourteen were published. Two of his Kannada plays Swapna Aniruddha natakamu and Upendravijaya, and thirteen Telugu plays still remain unpublished. Among the thirteen plays in Telugu, manuscripts of only five plays are available with his sons at Bellary.

Among the published plays, Chitranaleeyamu (1887) was the first. Then followed Savitri chitraswamu (1889), Vishada sarangadharamu (1889), Chirakari (1891), Brihannala (1896), Varudhini (1896), Paduka pattabhishekamu (1905), Prameelarjuneeyamu (1905), Prahalada muktavali (1915), Abhignana manimanta natakamu (1916), Panchali swayamvaramu (1918), Mohini Rukmangada (1920) and Roshanara Sivaji (1922).

In all these plays, Dharmavaram blended the Indian and Western modes of dramatic writing. He divided the plays into acts and scenes and retained the convention of Nandi Prastavana. In some he included even a Purvaranga (prologue) and an Uttara ranga (epilogue). His Vishada sarangadharamu is the first tragic play in Telugu and he continued the genre in Ajamila (an unpublished play) and Paduka pattabhishekamu, in which the tragic flaw in the protagonist led to his fall. All his plays, except Varudhini, are five-act plays.

As the director of all his productions, Dharmavaram introduced a new trend in Telugu theatrical presentations by making his actors 'sing' both the poems and the songs. Thus he became the originator of a strong Telugu theatrical tradition - the musical drama.

His Vishada sarangadharamu is the first Telugu tragedy. In an extensive introduction to the play, Dharmavaram maintains that Rajanarendra, father of Sarangadhara (in this partly mythical, partly imaginative play), is the protagonist of the play. Due to an overbearing 'kama' (desire), the king succumbs, and hence the tragic end.

Dharmavaram also constructed a theatre exclusively for his own dramatic troupe. He performed his plays not only in the major towns of Andhra, but also in Madras, Mysore and Hyderabad. His influence on Telugu drama was so marked that he was given the title 'Andhra nataka pitamaha'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D.V.Avadhani, Andhra nataka pitamahudu (Hyderabad, 1968); P.S.R. Appa Rao, Telugu nataka vikasamu (Hyderabad, 1969); Dharmavaram ramakrishnamacharyulu (A.P. Sangeetha Nataka Akademi, 1975).

M.N.S.

RAMAKRISHNAN, KATAMMANITTA (Malayalam; b. 1935) was born in the village Katammanitta near Pathanamthitta. He took his degree in 1957 and was in Calcutta in search of a job in the following year. In 1959 he left for Madras where he became an employee of the Postal Department. Eight years later he was transferred to Trivandrum which has been his home since.

Ramakrishnan's poetic personality is the complex product of the influence of his devout maternal grandfather, Marxian thought, Gandhian philosophy and the diverse life-styles he saw in different parts of Calcutta. He is a modern poet in the sense that he has broken away from the traditional metrical composition and romantic sensibility. But metrical verse is not alien to him. His poems have the musical quality of Changampuzha Krishna Pillai. Like many others of the times he is a rebel advocating new values of life and a new sensibility in art. His poems abound in social sarcasm and irony. 'Purushasuktam', 'Kiratavrittam', 'Manavajivitam', 'Dasaparinamam', etc. are some of his better known poems. These have been collected and published. He was awarded the Kayikkara Kumaran Asan Prize in 1984.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

P.V.V.P.

RAMAKRISHNAN, MALAYATTOR (Malayalam; b. 1927). K.V. Ramakrishna Iyer, popularly known as Malayattoor Ramakrishnan, is a native of Kalpathi, a town situated in the district of Palghat. He had his schooling at different places in the erstwhile state of Travancore. He graduated in 1946 and took his law degree three years later. Until 1955 when he was appointed a Magistrate, he had worked as tutor, cartoonist, lawyer and sub-editor for short periods. In 1956 he joined the Indian Administrative Service from which he resigned in 1981. After this he was chairman of the State Lalit Kala Akademi for a few years. Now he is a freelance writer.

A prolific writer, Ramakrishnan has to his credit sixteen works of fiction including three detective novels, eleven collections of short stories, a book of memoirs and another one dealing with the Indian Penal Code. He is remarkable for his capacity to identify the problems confronting himself and his contemporaries and for the sense of humour and realism that characterise his writings. The novel Verukal (The roots), which is full of intimate autobiographical touches, won him the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966. Yantram is a voluminous novel for which he was presented with the prestigious Vayalar Award in 1979. It graphically describes the life of the I.A.S. fraternity with all its intricacies. The theme of Amritam tedi (In search of ambrosia) is the freedom struggle of 1857.

P.V.V.P.

RAMAKRISHNAYYA, MOCHERLA (Telugu;b.1904, d.1983) took his B.A. and LL.B. degrees from Madras University, and practised law at Nellore. A descendant of Mocherla Dattappa, a Telugu poet of the eighteenth century, known for his satirical and impromptu verses, Ramakrishnayya too was a gifted poet. He learnt the poetic art as a disciple of Durbha Subrahmanya Sarma of Nellore. His poetry is characterised by verve and vivacity and is couched in elegant diction. He has more than twenty poetical works to his credit, besides one or two works in prose. His works are Maruti shatakamu, Ramanandalahari, Girija kalyanamu (in prose, adapted from Kalidasa's Kumarasambhava), Ganga lahari, Atmabodhamu, Prachanda bhargavamu (a drama with Parashurama as hero), Tyagamahima, Amritakalashamu, Premalila, Chhatrapati Shivaji, Sharada prasadamu, Telugu rachayitrulu (in prose), Abhijnana Shakuntalamu (a Telugu rendering, adapted for the the stage), Anargha bhargavamu, Dhruva rupakamu, Guru shishyulu, Svatmarpanam, Ratnaharamu, Gurudeva, Premachihnamu, Hamsasandeshamu and Amaragauravamu.

Of these works, Amritakalashamu is considered the best for poetic excellence. The mellifluous quality of his poetry earned him the title of 'Sarasakavi'. There is a lone poetical work by him called Sharadaprasadam which proves his mettle as a poet in Sanskrit also.

C.V.V.R.

RAMAKRISHNAYYA, POLUGUNDLA (Telugu; b. 1911) was born at Darbhalamitla Khandriga in Nellore district in a family of agriculturists and Sanskrit scholars. He had his early education in Sanskrit and later studied at Nellore.

Ramakrishnayya is a playwright, well-known for his popular one-act play, Tupanu (Storm; actually a storm in a tea-cup). Tupanu is a humorous play with a theme that revolves around adolescent love between a boy and a girl of two Reddi families, which is unknowingly approved by the boy's domineering father. The sustained humour of the play, which regales the audience with laughter, is inherent in its dialogues, spoken with an accent peculiar to a Telugu dialect. In 1948, the play was awarded the best script prize by the Nataka Kala Parishad, Vijayawada. In 1953, the Andhra Vaijnanika Mahasabha, Vijayawada, awarded it a prize for the best drama.

Besides being a playwright, Ramakrishnayya is an actor of considerable histrionic talents. Though the play Tupanu brought him into the lime-light, it was not his first play; earlier, he had written Talavani talampu (A thought unintended). His other dramatic compositions are Indira, Vapas (Refund), Vimukti (Emancipation) and Gandhi balyamu (The childhood of Gandhi). The theme of Vimukti is Harijan uplift, and the play was enacted several times.

A playwright and actor, Ramakrishnayya was also a writer of short stories and songs, which have for their theme the social problems of the day. His latest work is a Telugu version of Kalidasa's Abhijnanashakuntala.

C.V.R.R.

RAMAKRISHNAYYA, PUNDLA (Telugu; b. 1860, d. 1904) was a Telugu critic and founder and editor of an important Telugu literary journal, Amudritagrantha chintamani, devoted to the collection and critical study of the ancient works, besides criticism of modern works, in Telugu. A self-educated man, without formal schooling, he rose steadily to a literary career. He founded 'Ananda-

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

dayini', a theatre group which staged Madalasa and Satyaharishchandra. He published Prabandharaja Venkateshvara vilasamu (by Gannavarapu Venkatakavi), Harishchandra-Nalopakhyayanamu (by Ramaraja Bhushana), Mitravindaparinayamu (by Kundurti Venkatachalakavi), Chandrangada charitramu (by Paidimarri Venkatapati), Yadava Raghavapandaviyamu (by Nellur Viraraghavakavi), Vaijayantivilasamu (by Sarangu Tammayya) in Amudritagrantha chintamani. 'Mayukhamu', 'Syamantaka', 'Shabdavicharamu', 'Vatu shabdaprayogamu', 'Parikha, parigha shabdaprayogamu', 'Bilveshvariyakriti' are some of his well-known essays. Mandapaka Parvatishvarashastrigari jivitasangrahamu is a biography.

Regarded as the father of Telugu literary journalism, Ramakrishnayya enjoyed the respect of many literary giants of his time.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gurram Venkatasubbayya, 'Pundla Ramakrishnayya' in Vijnanasarvasvamu, Vol. 5; Madhunapantula Satyanarayana, Andhra rachayitalu (1950).

RAMALINGA REDDI, KATTAMANCHI (Telugu; b. 1880, d. 1951) was a multi-faceted personality—a poet, critic, epigrammatist, orator, patriot, parliamentarian, educationist, economist, philosopher and philanthropist. Above all, he was an independent thinker, unfettered by narrow considerations of any political party, caste or creed. He lives in the memory of the people as the architect of Andhra University and as the author of Kavitvatatva vicharam, his most significant work.

Ramalinga Reddi was born in a learned family in Kattamanchi, a village near Chittoor. He had a brilliant career at Christian College (Madras) and at St. John's College (Cambridge) where he had studied on a government scholarship, winning several distinctions.

Ramalinga Reddi started his career as a poet with the Telugu poem, 'Musalamma maranam', based on an incident of self-sacrifice by a Muslim young lady in order to save the village from the ravages of a flooded tank. This poem won him recognition and a prize.

After completing his studies, he returned to India, where he succeeded the great Sri Aurobindo as Vice-Principal of the Baroda College. He travelled widely, and his experiences helped him lay down broad educational policies. As Principal of Maharaja's College, Mysore, and as Inspector-General of Education in Mysore, Reddi established new records. He also served as founder Vice-Chancellor of Andhra University (1926-1931) and Pro-Chancellor of Mysore University (1949-1951). He was also Chairman of the Inter-University Board for some time.

Reddi is considered as much an authority in Economics as in literature. The University of Madras honoured him for his Arthashastra published in two volumes in Telugu. The Andhra University published his Essays and Addresses (1966) in English and Telugu as well as his critical and evaluative forewords to various Telugu works (e.g. Vyasa manjari and Panchami). It also published a commemoration volume on him on the completion of his sixtieth birthday.

B.P.

RAMALINGA SWAMI (Tamil; b. 1823, d. 1874) was an illustrious Tamil saint. At a comparatively young age, he developed a keen interest in the hymns of Samayacharyas and in their way of life. He seems to have had a vision of Muruga at Tiruttani and subsequently of the deities at Kandakkottam and Tiruvottiyur which prompted him to follow the path of spiritual devotion. Before he was ten Ramalinga was seen lecturing to people on spiritual and religious matters. He also composed his earlier verses Teivamanimalai and Charanampattu at a very young age.

From 1825 to 1858 Ramalinga lived in Madras, reading and writing, teaching and lecturing. He studied Sanskrit and probed the meaning of words. He led a life of austerity. The poems he wrote comprised the first four Tirumurais. He also edited three books, Olivil odukkam, Tondamandalachathakam, and Chinmaya teepikai between 1851 and 1857. His important prose work on Manumuraikantavachakam was also published during this phase of his life.

The next period in his life commenced in 1858, when he moved to Karunkuli and lived there till 1867, making pilgrimages to Shaivite temples, delivering discourses to crowded audience wherever he went. In 1864 Ramalinga shifted to Vadaloor, a dreary uninhabited place nearby but surrounded by Shaiva shrines and rivers. Later, he went to his solitary abode at Siddivilakam and probably died there. Varalaru, as he was affectionately called, was essentially a saint, seeking spiritual illumination, and what he wrote was guided by the light of the soul.

R.B.

RAMALINGAM PILLAI, NAMAKKAL V. (Tamil; b. 1888, d. 1944), the famous poet of Tamilnadu, was a man of many parts —a freedom fighter, a composer of songs, a portrait-painter and a biographer.

He had great love for theatre and never missed any show of the roving theatre companies that camped in and around his native town. The plays were operatic in form those days and he knew by heart all songs in vogue then. Soon he became a familiar figure in the theatre circles and was called upon to compose songs for them. Those who contracted him to write songs for their plays included the troupe of the legendary S.G. Kittappa and brothers. The songs he composed ran into several hundreds. He did not know then, in those early days, much of the grammar of music and structure of the ragas, but he composed his songs, closely following the pattern already popular on the stage.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The partition of Bengal by Lord Curzon in 1915 that fired the national sentiments throughout the country turned Ramalingam Pillai, then a college student, into a freedom fighter.

The song he composed for the marchers to Vedaranyam in the Salt Satyagraha, led by C. Rajagopalachari at the time Gandhi led his march to Dandi, made Ramalingam Pillai famous throughout Tamilnadu. The song 'Kathi inri ratham inri yuddham onru varuhudu...' (here comes a war, without sword, without bloodshed) was a clarion call for the battle of non-violence, which kept beat to the rhythm of marchers' foot stumping.

Ramalingam Pillai has a large output of nationalist songs, simple in diction. The passing decades have robbed the fervour and appeal of his poetry somewhat. Besides these songs he has a long work, Avalum avanum (He and she) to his credit. At Rajaji's bidding, he translated Adi Sankara's 'Bhaja Govindam' in Tamil. He also wrote a novel Malai kallan, which was later made into a popular film; of this a Hindi version also appeared later. He has to his credit a commentary in easy contemporary Tamil of the classic , Thirukkural, which is reputed to be the most authentic, though terse and difficult, requiring another commentary to understand.

Of all Ramalingam Pillai's works, the most significant seems to be his En kathai (My story), an autobiography of sorts, an episodic stringing together of incidents and remembrances. It is neither chronological nor complete. He chose, according to his own admission, only those incidents which would be of absorbing interest. In this work, he has, to the extent he chose to cover, brought to life certain vignettes of the life and times of his generation, and some very remarkable and moving characters, whom we would not have known as they ware ordinary men and women who existed only in his memory. It is remarkable that Ramalingam Pillai chose to be frank and uninhibited about certain personal traits and incidents in his life which were a matter of shame and unending embarrassment, not bothering what they would do to his public image. It is in this work that Ramalingam Pillai is seen to have given his creative best.

Ve.S.

RAMALINGAM PILLAI, T. (Malayalam; b.1880, d. 1968), the noted lexicographer and linguist, belonged to Trivandrum. He took his M.A. degree and then joined service as a clerk in the High Court of Travancore. Gradually, by his distinguished work and eminence he rose to the position of Head Translator to the Government. Pillai's interest in language and literature was very keen. He received prizes in some all India competitions. He wrote six books in English, four in Tamil and eight in Malayalam. His best work is the English-English-Malayalam Dictionary (2 vols) which is considered to be the most authoritative work of its kind. His works in Malayalam are : Malayalam sait nighantu, Lekhana manjari, Pantrantu striratnangal, Chintashakalangal, Aryabhattante ganitam, etc. Pillai's dévoted work, deep interests, scientific outlook and unmistakable presentation made him unforgettable in the field of the language and literature of Kerala.

V.S.S.

RAMAMRITHAM, L.S. (Tamil; b.1916) is an eminent novelist and short story writer. He was influenced by Tolstoy, Hemingway, Saroyan and Ramakrishna Paramahansa. He commenced writing in the 1940's and carved a niche for himself among the Tamil stalwarts of the stream of consciousness technique such as Ka.Naa. Subramanyan and C.S. Chellappa. He uses symbols to probe the depths of human behaviour in a style which is unique and which changes in consonance with the mood and theme. Verily, he is a wizard with words, able to arrest the flow of events and present to the readers any desired instant. His novels Putra and Apita are fine examples of the use of the psychological technique, with unique, occasionally bizarre, symbolism.

R.Chaudamani, in her evaluation of the outstanding Tamil short story of 1977 included as preface to Tirvu, cites Ramamritham's Darishanam for its incomparable portrayal of an unusual state of mind of an elderly man, who as a youth had fallen in love with Kanyakumari without even seeing her. The sixteen-year old Kanyakumari, with small budding breasts, suddenly turns into a stern, distant Tapasvini Kashayini during an anointing ceremony. The grandeur and continuous flashes of lightning in the style defy any comparison. Ramamritham, along with N.Pichamurti, has been a vigorous advocate of the use of colloquial language in belles lettres for its spontaneity, power and natural grace.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLOGRAPHY: C.S.Chellappa, Tamilil ilakkiya vimarshanam (Madras, 1974); M.Ramalingam, Irupadam nurrandut Tamil ilakkiyam (Madras, 1973); P.G. Sundararajan, 'The Novel and the Short Story in Tamil' in Proceedings of the Fifth International Conference-Seminar of Tamil Studies, Vol.2 (Madurai, January 1981).

K.Su.

RAMAN MENON, PUTHEZHATH (Malayalam; b. 1889, d. 1973), popularly known as 'Puttezham', was born at Trichur in Kerala. After an educational career he joined the court as a government lawyer. In 1940 he was appointed by the king of the erstwhile Cochin State as Sarvadhikaryakar (Palace Governor). In 1942 he was raised to the post of district Judge; he also acted as a representative of tenants in the Cochin Legislative Assembly for some time.

After retirement from Government Service, Raman Menon activated his literary career. He was associated with various cultural organizations in different capacities and wrote a number of books on different subjects. In recognition of his contribution he was nominated as the first Director of a literary camp organised by the State Government. He was also the third President of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi.

There are eighty odd publications to Puttezham's credit. He also wrote hundreds of articles including book-reviews and humorous essays. Menon translated some writings of Rabindranath Tagore also. He wrote a monumental biography of the late Shaktan Tampuran of the Cochin royal family. He had varied literary interests and contributed widely to the field of literary studies. Though the best among his works is Shaktan Tampuran, his translations from Tagore and his humorous essays are also commendable. His light essays remind one of Western writers like Charles Lamb. As a mark of respect to his literary calibre and noted contribution to the literary and cultural life of the state, the Maharaja of Cochin honoured him with the titles of Sahitya Nipunan and Sahitya Kusalan. His major works include: Shaktan Tampuran, Tagore kathakal, Tagore kanta India, Neram pokku, Sahitya abhiruchi, Hasa sahityam, Swarna haram, Kalavilasam, Manushyane ariyuka, Veekshanavilasam.

V.S.S.

RAMAN NAIR, VETTOOR (Malayalam; b. 1919). A member of the Vettoor family near Palai in Kottayam district, Raman Nair had his entire formal education at a few local schools. He was an active participant in the political agitation in 1938 as part of the national struggle for India's independence. Later, he quit politics and determined to devote himself fully to educational and social activities. He is one of the few who were closely connected with the inception of the Granthasala Sangham and the Sahitya Pravartaka Co-operative Society, and in both he held several important positions. He had a three-year stint as a journalist also. At present he is working as editor of a humorous journal, Pakkanar.

It was as a poet that Raman Nair started his literary career but he soon switched over to the short story and established himself in this genre. While almost all the other short story writers of the time exposed the brutality of the capitalist and highlighted the agony of the labourer, Vettoor championed the cause of the mute middle-class in his stories by depicting the suffering of the average man from a psychological point of view. Again, it was he who first wrote stories on military life.

Ragarashmi and Ulsavam are collections of poems written by him; there are a dozen-odd collections of short stories, notably Tazhvarakal (Valleys), Vishappum dahavum (Hunger and thirst) and Terenjedutha kathakal (40 selected stories).

Jivikkan marannupoya stree (A woman who forgot to live) is a well-known novel, which has been filmed. The other novel is Oru verum premakatha (A mere love-story) which reveals some significant autobiographical glimpses of the author. There is also a travelogue to his credit. It recounts the experiences he had during his all-India tour in 1955 and is acclaimed as one of the best books of the kind in Malayalam.

Vettoor's technique is essentially narrative. Some of his writings are flavoured with light humour. He has won several prizes including the Kerala Sahitya Akademi' Award for short stories in 1987.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Chengarappalli Narayanan Potti, Malayalam sahitya sarvaswam; C.P. Sreedharan, Innathe sahityakaranmar; M. Mukundan, Cherukatha : innale, innu.

P.V.V.P.

RAMAN, PALLATHU (Malayalam; b. 1892, d. 1950), a member of Pallathu House, was born in Trichur. Though he could not proceed beyond the secondary level in his studies, he was appointed first as a primary school teacher and later as a lecturer in Malayalam in a college outside Kerala in recognition of the position he had secured by then as a creative writer and poet. He retired from Victoria College, Palghat. He also served as a member of some academic committees and boards.

Pallathu Raman is remembered today chiefly as a poet with over a dozen poems to his credit. Udayarashmi, Kaithiri, Kattupookkal and Satyakanti are four of his significant poetic contributions. He was a strong champion of the poor and the downtrodden and the backward classes in particular, and some of his poems are characterized by his sympathy for such people. He also propagated the message of Narayana Guru through some of his poems and writings.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Raman was a noted novelist and playwright too. Of his two novels, Amritapulinam and Rajasthan pushpam, the former is popular. Chitra Asokan and Ravanaputran are two of his plays, which show the author's progressive ideas and outlook.

He received the title 'Kavithilaka' and a gold medal from the Maharaja of Cochin in 1946 besides some awards from different organizations.

K.S.N.

RAMAN PILLAI, C.V. (Malayalam; b. 1858, d. 1922), a native of Trivandrum, grew up under the care of his uncle, who encouraged him to study English. He graduated in 1881 from the University of Madras. Even in his school days, C.V., as he was more popularly known, was immensely interested in reading English novels, especially those by Walter Scott, and in watching Kathakali performances. This two-fold interest, combined with an exposure to Tamil-dominated southern parts of Kerala and travels all over South India, stood him in good stead from the beginning of his literary career, which started soon after his graduation. He was associated with Malayali as its founder-editor and with a few other Malayalam and English dailies or periodicals as a contributor. His first play, Chandramukhivilasam (published posthumously in 1984), was a great success on the stage. This was followed by another work of the same kind, Mattavilasa. He also established a new school of dramatic literature known as 'prahasana'. In 1890 his first historical novel, Marthanda Varma, was published by Edison Company, Madras. This, according to a review in the Hindu, 'is a book written by a graduate of our University after the manner of the historical romance. The author is careful to keep the reader in suspense making incidents lead to unexpected intricacies and complications with a veil of mystery thrown over them.' As a matter of fact, the book is regarded not only as the first original historical novel in Malayalam but also as one of the best of C.V.'s three works of the same kind.

C.V's Marthanda Varma is the first of the three historical novels he wrote, glorifying the memorable yet critical period in the history of Travancore, the region of Anizham Thirunal Marthanda Varma, the founder of the State, and his successor Dharma Raja. The novel relates the story of Marthanda Varma's victory over his enemies with the help of his loyal followers and the territorial expansion and consolidation of the state. Woven round it and forming an integral part of it is the story of love between the hero Anantapadmanabhan and the heroine Parukutty, two unforgettable characters created by the novelist.

Dharma Raja, the novel in the triology, appeared only in 1913, that is, after about twenty-two years. Its background is the biography of the illustrious Dewan of Travancore, Raja Kesava Das, a great grandfather of his uncle. Ramarajabahadur, the next and last, was published in 1920. This was widely appreciated by the reading public and is still regarded as C.V's best novel. The biography of the Dewan continues in this novel too. It deals mainly with the invasion of the State by Tipu Sultan and his expulsion. The novel is full of varied events, like the despatch of spies by the Sultan and their confrontation with the royalists headed by the Dewan, and a love story involving two generations. The novelist has handled the different strands so deftly that they form a unified piece in the novel's fabric.

C.V's fourth work is Premamritham (1916), a social novel. He is, however, chiefly remembered as the author of the other three novels and because of their historical character has been called the Walter Scott of Kerala. It is also noteworthy that he has created about a hundred unforgettable characters ranging from rulers to beggars, some speaking even Tamil. The majority of them are drawn from the elite patriotic Nair families.

C.V's style is an expression of his capacious mind. Sometimes it is simple and straightforward, using only ordinary words and short sentences; sometimes it is complex, with long sentences and highly Sanskritised diction, picturesque descriptions, evocative epithets, apt quotations and suggestive allusions. His dialogues are particularly remarkable and suited to the characters he depicts. The Maharaja of Cochin conferred on him the title, 'Sahitya kusalan'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P.K. Parameswaran Nair, C.V. Raman Pillai; T.M. Chummar, Bhasha gadya sahitya charitram; Ullur S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram (Vol. V).

M.A.

RAMANA REDDI, K.V. (Telugu ; b.1928) was born at Rebala in Nellore district, and did his B.A (Hons) in History from Andhra University and M.A. in Political Science from Banaras Hindu University. He worked as Lecturer at Jawahar Bharati (Kavali) and was also a member of the Progressive Writers' Association and the Revolutionary Writers' Association. He has been the editor of Aruna tara (Red star) from 1978 and a frequent contributor to Andhra jyoti and Andhra prabha (Telugu dailies), and Frontier (English weekly, Calcutta).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ramanna Reddi's collections of Telugu poems are Adavi (1951), Bhuvana ghosha (1955), Angara vallari (1959), Erra pidikili (1972) and Jallu kokila (1977), which express the poet's revolutionary zeal.

He has also written playlets Rajeevam (1960), Padma vyuham (1960) and Enda mavulu (1960), and a play Annapurna (1961), dealing with social problems.

His political tracts are Hungary poorva prastutalu (Hungary: past and present,1956), Kampuchea (1980), Vietnam vyavaharam (Story of Vietnam,1980), Russia bhallookapu pattulo Afghanistan (Afghanistan in Russia's stranglehold, 1980). His other works are Bhava viplavam (Revolution in thought,1972), Bharata swatantrya poratalu (India's freedom struggle, 1975), Detenu diary (1978) and Gudi dopidi (Exploitation of temples,1981).

He also wrote biography-cum-literary criticism, namely Gurazada velugu jada (1963) and Mahodayam, both on Gurazada Appa Rao, Kavi kokila Duvvuri Rami Reddi (1965) and Sarat Babu (1968). Besides, his songs and poems for children are compiled in Gajjelu gantalu (Anklets and bells,1956). His translations include Mana dhanulu (Howard Fast's Unvanquished,1956) and Karmika swargamulo katha priyudu (Tagore's stories,1967).

R.M.C.

RAMANAGARI (Marathi) is the autobiography of Ram Nagarkar, an artist and active worker of the theatre wing of Rashtra Seva Dal, a socialist youth organisation. His political inclinations and his barber caste provide clues for an understanding of his creative impulses. Nagarkar is a 'Songadya' actor, an improviser of the Marathi folk theatre 'tamasha'. Like all folk arts, the tamasha draws on the community's sense of harmony. The Songadya, like the Shakespearean all-licensed fool, offers choral comments on the dramatic action, which thrives on his humour, which is ribald and often lewd because it is primal. Nagarkar's autobiography has all the qualities of a Songadya performance in real life, including colloquialism of its verbal structure, which is a deviation from the accepted literary Marathi of the day. The book is a significant achievement in Marathi autobiography in that it aims at the almost Brechtian detachment of the reader's identification with the narrative. Whatever the author narrates has a local habitation and name, framed within the structure of a social system based on caste distinctions.

In the caste hierarchy the barber, though not an untouchable, is rated fairly low, and many a discomfiture of the clown-hero arise from people mistaking him for a brahmin. To Nagarkar, the human scene appears as burlesque, parody and caricature. No character, neither his father, mother, wife or friend escapes his caustic comments. He shows an ever-ready, irrepressible and ebullient sense of humour which is often broad , ribald and coarse. The spontaneity and the zest of life that it betrays save it from being vulgar or smutty.

As a raconteur, Nagarkar spins his yarn, spicing it with all the varieties of the comic. He begins in a mock-heroic fashion with a myth, narrated by his grandfather to show how the barber caste is superior to the brahmin. Where the latter professes dependence on god Vishnu for his livelihood, the barber, borrowing the Lord's 'Sudarshan chakra', gives him a clean shave. Unlike the brahmin, he refuses to beg and so earns the caste name Nabhik.

A hilarious description of events before his birth follows.As it was his mother's fourth pregnancy, the grandfather insisted on her being sent to her parents. The father objects, words lead to a resounding blow by the grandfather, and precisely at this 'stroke', from inside the house the birth of a son is announced. A fire too breaks out in the neighbourhood and thus the new born is considered ill-fated.

Farcical scenes about the staging of a drama by the father's troupe follow, interspersed occasionally by pathetic scenes also. The narrator's elder sister, who has fever, was suspected to be 'possessed' by a ghost and is mercilessly beaten by the witch-hunter until she dies.

The narrator begins his schooling and a burlesque scene of an amateur dramatic performance follows. The chief actor, who plays Shivaji, refuses to get up from his throne, because it turns out that he has out of a stage fright spoilt his pyjamas by a sudden defecation. The performance ends in a fiasco.

Throughout the book, the narrator does not fight shy of making use of some of these natural, bodily functions nor does he shirk from using abusive words. The height of comic self-laugh is reached during the first railway journey of Nagarkar and his wife from Pune to Bombay by the prestigious Deccan Queen. Caste distinctions are levelled by a train journey and yet cultural traits cannot be hidden. The wife gets up and announces loudly for the hearing of the entire compartment that she was going to ease herself. Earlier, during their wedding, an elaborate ceremonial ritual is described when the bridegroom, along with the bride, goes to answer the call of nature accompanied by the music of the band. In another scene, the author is truly grieved by his mother's death, but has the practical sense of having a full meal in the nearest restaurant before he gives vent to his grief.

The author has many a weapon in his repertory. He rises to be a postman but being an expert drum (dholaki) player, a singer and quick at repartee, he begins acting in tamashas with a political slant. He achieves social prestige, performs before Prime Minister Nehru and earns his praise.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

And yet caste distinctions dog his footsteps. In a Bombay tenement, the family is looked down upon and ostracized for their caste, but later the 'highbrows' cultivate him as he becomes a celebrity. In Pune, he finds it difficult to get a rented house in a brahmin locality. In his own flat the maid servants, who belong to a superior caste, refuse to serve him.

The serious, thoughtful vein of the narrator's character is often blurred by his professional wit as a Songadya and also by his inability to rise above the commonplace norms of being accepted by the upper caste. These appear to be the only flaws of an otherwise engaging autobiography.

A.K.B.

RAMANAN (Malayalam) is a dramatic pastoral elegy in verse by Changampuzha Krishna Pillai on the premature death of his friend and fellow-poet, Edapplly Raghavan Pillai, under tragic circumstances. The book, published in 1936, became the most popular poem in Malayalam. Seven years after its publication, its sales suddenly picked up. In 1944, five impressions were brought out; in the next year six impressions came out, totalling 13,000 copies. Barely twenty-three years old, the poet was still in the formative period of his poetic life when he wrote Ramanan. One of the reasons for the unusual popularity of the work was that it was based on a real tragedy—the tragedy of love which led the poet's close friend to an act of suicide. Both the deceased and the mourner were the most colourful personalities in Malayalam literature. Their lives, like their poetry, were full of romantic adventures, and their deaths, dramatic and premature, remind one of the nineteenth century English poets, Keats and Shelley.

The hero of the poem is Ramanan, a shepherd who wanders with his friend Madanan (here, the author himself) in the picturesque countryside of Kerala. He accidentally comes into contact with a city-bred, smart girl, Chandrika, from a rich family. The contact soon blossoms into love. The hero at first tries to dissuade her on the basis of their social disparity, but she vows to honour her commitment at any cost and garlands him at a lovely place on a moon-lit night. Her father, unmindful of his daughter's wishes, fixes her marriage to a youth who is her equal in status. On the day of the marriage, Ramanan commits suicide.

The story was made into a poetic drama, a tragedy and an elegy combined. Changampuzha does not seem to have entirely copied this form from any western source, though he was influenced by Spenser's Shepherd's Calender, Milton's Lycidas and Shelley's Adonais. One feature which marks out Ramanan from their western models is that it involves a social problem—the wide gulf that separated the lovers in respect of their wealth and social status.

In presenting the hero as a shepherd, the poet has obviously borrowed from the Greek pastoral poetry, but he has also blended with it the concept of the romantic cow-herd, Krishna, who plays his enchanting flute. He introduces the chorus (gayakasangham), appearing in the prologues of the first two parts. The pastoral background in the play is derived from the beautiful Kerala village with its rivers, fields and hills. Some of the lines describing the beauty of nature are the most musical in Malayalam poetry.

There are picturesque descriptions of the village scene in the poem: 'Tender leaves, flowers, plants, shades and meadows cool/Birds which fly in groups hither and thither/Streams which play veena on the strings of silver waves/Hills standing in rows, still as in a picture/Valleys thick with vegetation/paddy fields with stalks wearing ears of pearls/Streams flowing to the tune of shepherd's notes/And lotus ponds.'

Ramanan is divided into three parts: the first two are divided into five scenes and a prologue. The first part portrays the development of love between the hero and the heroine; the second ends with the betrayal of the heroine; the last consisting of four scenes portrays the suicide of the hero and the emotional outburst of his companion.

Ramanan represents the best aspects of Changampuzha's poetry. His verse is sheer melody; the words are the simplest; the metres the most musical, used with a rare sense of rhythm. His diction shows immense flexibility. At a time when poet Vallattol and his younger contemporary, Sankara Kurup held undisputed sway over Malayalam poetry, Changampuzha's poem gained wide popularity and recognition. There was not a single young poet in the thirties and forties who was not influenced by him. There was not even an illiterate Malayalee who could not recite a couplet or two from Ramanan. The popularity of Ramanan was, however, short-lived. There was a sudden decline in the popularity of romantic sensibility in the fifties, but the influence which Changampuzha and his master-piece Ramanan had exercised for a short spell is unparalleled in the history of Malayalam literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Changampuzha smaraka grantham (Edappally, 1950); Changampuzhakkavita (Kottayam, 1956); Joseph Mundasseri, Ramanan (Trichur, 1945); Sukumar Azhicode, Ramananum Malayalakavitayum (Calicut, 1956).

O.M.A.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RAMANAND (Hindi; b. 1299, d. 1410). There is a lot of controversy about Ramanand's dates of birth and death and place of birth. Acharya Ramchandra Shukla places him in the 15th/16th century. Farquhar puts him between 1400 and 1470, whereas the religious texts of the Ramanand sect and Agastya samhita assert that he was born in 1299 and died in 1410. Some scholars hold the view that he was born at Malkota (Mysore), but the more acceptable view is that he was born at Prayag and died at Varanasi. As per Agastya samhita his father's name was Punya Sadan and mother's Sushila, and Swami Raghavanand was his Guru.

Ramanand was the foremost leader of the bhakti movement in north India. He established an independent Sampradaya akin to that of Ramanuj, with headquarters at Kashi. His 'mutt' (monastery) was situated at Panch Gangaghat. He travelled far and wide covering all the holy shrines and places of pilgrimage and spread the message of devotion to Rama and Sita among the masses. Disciples of Ramanand include Kabir, Sursuranand, Sukhanand, Anantanang Padmavati, Bhavanand and Raidas.

Ramanand and his sect were largely responsible for inspiring the production of bhakti literature on Rama. Kabir and Tulsi both owed to him initial motivation for their literary activities. He was also the precursor of that forceful movement which gave a new direction to Indian religious thinking of the middle ages characterised by humanism and universalism. Thus the doors of religious worship were flung open by him for women and 'shudras' also. Most of the liberal undercurrent running through the saint literature in Hindi was due to his influence.

Also, the impact of his thinking brought the Hindu and Muslim saint-poets nearer to each other. Books attributed to him are Shri Vaishnav mataliya bhaskar, Shri Ramarachan paddhati, Geeta bhashya, Upanishad-bhashya, Anand bhashya, Siddhanta patal, Yog chintamani, Vedanta vichar, Ramanand adesh, Gyan lila, Adhyatma Ramayana, and some 'padas'. Only two of his works are considered authentic. They are Shri Vaishnav mataliya bhaskar and Shri Ramarachan paddhati. Both these were edited by Ram Tahal Das and published in 1927 by Vasudev Das of Ayodhya. Ramanand is also credited with composing a few Hindi padas (devotional lyrics). He is certainly the first great preceptor to whom must go the credit of carrying the message of devotion to the masses through a host of Hindi poets who were inspired by him.

Sur.G.

RAMANATAKA KIRTANAIGAL (Tamil) is a unique and pioneering work in Tamil in many respects. It is the first operatic work on a vast scale, rendering the whole epic of the Ramayana in the form of musical compositions. Its author, Arunachala Kavirayar (1711-1779), born in Tillayadi (a village in Thanjavur district), was a scholar of Tamil and his earlier works were more to do with Tamil prosody of minor or no significance rather than with music.

He had studied Tamil classics and also Sanskrit in Grantha script in a Shaivite Mutt, the Dharmapura Adheenam, where he joined at the age of seven, as he lost his parents at that young age. He completed his studies and later taught Tamil classics to students, among whom were Kodandarama Iyer and Venkatarama Iyer.

Under the Marathas, the Thanjavur region was at the peak of its glory and creative endeavour in music and dance, and Thanjavur became the seat of culture not only for Tamilnadu but for the whole of the Southern peninsula. But it also led to the neglect of Tamil language. Telugu was the court language ever since the rise of the Vijayanagar empire and later under the rule of the Naiks, and hence it gained dominance in all fields including the cultural spheres, more so in music, dance and theatre.

Arunachala Kavirayar's Ramanataka kirtanaigal was a major breakthrough in Tamil and a massive one in this respect. The contribution was significant, because his was the first attempt to adapt Tamil to Carnatic music. His massive operatic work had all the structural requirements of an opera though it was not completed as such. It was meant to be a text composed as an aid to musico-religious discourses.

Traditional accounts say that Arunachala Kavirayar was a mere Tamil scholar and versifier and that he was not a man given to music and that his kirtanas were set to music by his students, Kodandarama Iyer and Venkatarama Iyer whose vocation was musico-religious discourses on mythological stories and epics. But then this traditional account does not seem to stand a close scrutiny. Composing a kirtana is possible only with a thorough knowledge of music. Kirtanas in Tamil were just non-existent in his time, and even a first glance at the bulk of his work would reveal the large number of ragas he has handled and the deftness with which he has composed the kirtanas to give expression to the ragas. All these factors presuppose the proficiency of his knowledge of music.

Arunachala Kavirayar's Ramanataka kirtanaigal gained immense popularity. His two disciples took turns as characters as if they were in a theatre, and gave their musical discourses a dramatic form and power. Arunachala Kavirayar was honoured by rich patrons in his time, one of whom was Ananda Rangam Pillai, whose Diaries are a unique historical document, a history of his time and a peep into the prose style obtaining then. He was serving as an interpreter to the French rulers in Pondicherry then. The Maratha King of Tanjore, Tulaja II (1763-1787), honoured him with presents (Kanakabhishekam).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It was under the inspiration of Arunachala Kavirayar's Ramanataka kirtanaigal that Gopalakrishna Bharati (1811-1881) wrote his Nandanar charitra kirtanaigal.

Ramanataka kirtanaigal contains among other categories of compositions, 268 vriddhas (i.e. literary compositions which are sung). Vriddhas carry out various functions in a theatrical form like introduction of a scene, characters, author's explanatory expositions, connecting links, etc. Besides there are 167 kirtanas (musical compositions) and 59 'kannis' (called 'dwipadas' as they were two-lined pieces in folk melody), etc.

While the vriddhas (literary compositions) are in chaste Tamil, conforming to the rules of prosody befitting the Tamil scholar that he was, the kirtanas and kannis are in an easy-flowing colloquial spoken tongue, ungrammatical at many places, which no Tamil scholar would approve of. It must have taken a great daring for Arunachala Kavirayar to have done it, with all his standing as a Tamil classical scholar. But he has done it with a purpose. Wherever he has done it, it adds power and eloquence to the dialogues just as the ragas chosen are expressive of the 'bhavas', the emotions contained in the situation or composition. This colloquial and ungrammatical form of speech was again a rebellion against the norms of the times just as the choice of the Tamil language for his kirtanas was. It is quite possible that Gopalakrishna Bharati, not a Tamil scholar of any small measure, took courage from the example set by a scholar like Arunachala Kavirayar when he took similar liberties and adopted the colloquial spoken form of speech for his compositions. Both were guided by the requirements of a musician rather than those of a scholar.

Sometime in the past, Ramanataka kirtanaigal, in a suitable abridged form, was performed on the stage. But in the present times the work is largely confined to Kathaka lakshepams as it was originally conceived. Some pieces, however, form part of the classical music and dance-concert repertoire today.

Ve.S.

RAMANUJA (Sanskrit; c. 11th-12th c.), was a great Vaishnavite Acharya—a religious preceptor, philosopher and propounder of a particular system of metaphysics, called 'Vishishtadvaitavada'. He was born at Sriperumbhutur, near Madras, and died in the famous temple city of Srirangam. According to one account he lived for 120 years (AD 1017-1137) and his life covered the reigns of three Chola rulers.

As regards the details of Ramanuja's life, two contemporary works by his disciples are worthy of credence: (a) Ramanuja nutrandali by Amudan consisting of 100 stanzas in Tamil; (b) Yatiraja vaibhavam by Vaduhanambi, comprising 114 shlokas in Sanskrit. The first is not really a biography but a panegyric, eulogising the master's success in disputation against great controversialists. The second is a biography ostensibly free from exaggeration and provides relevant facts about Ramanuja's life. We are told that Ramanuja's name at birth was Lakshmana (literally, Rama's younger brother). His parents were Asuri Keshavacharya and Kantimati, and he studied Vedanta under Yadava Prakasha at Kanchipuram.

As directed by the Lord, Ramanuja set out to meet Periyanambi (Mahapurna) for initiation. He was in his early thirties when he had taken 'sanyasa', and soon many disciples gathered around him, hailing him as 'Yatiraja' (prince of ascetics).

Later, he moved to Srirangam and assiduously set about acquiring the mastery of all Vaishnava learning and philosophy. He next mastered the Tiruvaymozhi under the guidance of Tirumalai Andan (Srisalla purna), and also learnt the esoterics of the Ramayana from his maternal uncle at Tirupati. As his fame spread, enmity too was aroused to the extent that attempts were made to assassinate him at Srirangam, from which he providentially escaped.

Next, he travelled north to the 'Sharda pitha' in Kashmir to achieve the 'Bodhayana vritti' which would help him write his famous commentary on the Brahma sutras.

To avoid persecution at the hands of the Shaiva Chola rulers, Ramanuja moved from Srirangam to Mysore where he found favour with the Jaina King, Vishnuvardhana who became a Vaishnavite under his influence. With the king's help the Vishnu temple at Melkota was restored and a new temple at Belur built and consecrated. Traditionally, he is said to have authorised the entry of the Harijans (Tirukkulattari) into the temple at Melkota one day each year for their help to him when his life was in some danger. Years later he returned to Srirangam which was his abode and shrine for the rest of his life.

Ramanuja's major works include: Vedartha sangraha (treatise on the principles of Vishishtadvaita, i.e. qualified Monism and reconciling the conflicting shrutis); Sri Bhashya, commentary on Badarayana's Brahma-sutras; Gita-bhashya (detailed commentary on the Bhagavadgita); Vedanta-dipa and Vedanta-sara (brief commentaries on the Brahma-sutras); Saranagati (gadya) and Shriranga (gadya) on self-surrender; Shri Vaikuntha (gadya), describing Vaikuntha, the primal abode of the Supreme Lord and the state of the liberated); and Nitya-grantha (a short manual intended for the devotees in their daily duties, particularly the worship of the Lord).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Only the three prose works listed above may be classed as literature for their prose which is highly sonorous and ornate. For example,

Svabhimata nityaniravadya
Svaruparupa gunavibhavaishvarya
Siladyanavadhikatisaya
Asamkheya kalyanaguna gana Srivallabha.

Some scholars doubt the authenticity of these prose works on the ground that the principles of self-surrender spelt out in them in detail differ from the path advocated for liberation in his Bhashya and other works. But there is no doubt that the principles are in tune with the earlier teachings of Ramanuja himself. The later Acharyas, of course, accept the gadyas in their entirety. Anyway, the prose in them is superb.

Ramanuja was a saint of great compassion and vision. He propagated the Vaishnava faith through his preachings and writings. His philosophy called 'Ramanuja darshana' or 'Vishishtadvaitavada' inspired the Bhakti movement and was a fountain source of light and life for generations of Vaishnavites.

R.R.

RAMANUJA RAO, DEVULAPALLI (Telugu; b. 1917) was born at Devulapalli in district Warangal, and did his B.A. in Telugu from Madras University and Law from Nagpur University.

He took an active part in politics, worked for the integration of the former princely states of Hyderbad with the rest of India and later fought for the formation of an Andhra state, then generally known as 'Vishalandhra'. He was a member of the Andhra Pradesh Congress Committee (1960-64) and also a member of the Rajya Sabha (1960-62). He has been connected with at least fourteen different educational committees and several literary organisations.

It is true that he is better known as a promoter of literature rather than as a creative writer. However, his own literary achievement is not negligible. Special mention must be made of his book of literary criticism, Saraswata navaneetam (Cream of literature) in which he makes a comparative study of Potana and Srinatha on the one hand, and of the original Bhagavata and Potana's translation on the other. Ramanuja Rao is also a poet in his own right as is demonstrated by his collection of lyrics, Paccha toranam (Green garland).

Among his other fourteen published titles, Sahityopanyasalu (Literary lectures) and Na radio prasangaalu (My radio talks) also deal with literary subjects.

Devulapalli wrote four books for children: Mana desham (Our country), Telugu seema (Andhra country), Jawaharlal Nehru and Gautama Buddhudu. He also edited a pictorial English-Telugu dictionary for children, published by Oxford University Press.

He wrote the Story of Telugu Literature in Urdu, published by Anjuman-Taraoqui-Urdu of Hyderabad and translated Abul Kalam Azad's Urdu book, Ghubare khateer under the title Talapula dumaram (The whirlwind of thoughts), published by Sahitya Akademi. He has also translated from English into Telugu the Sahitya Akademi publication Bankimchandra Chatterjee.

R.M.C.

RAMANUJAN, ATTIPPAT KRISHNASWAMI (English/Kannada; b. 1929) read English at Maharaja's College, Mysore, and Linguistics at Poona. Later, he was a Fulbright scholar at Indiana University during 1960-62. Since 1962, he has been at the University of Chicago where he is now Professor of Dravidian Studies and Linguistics, and a member of the Committee on Social Thought. His works in English include The Striders (1966), Relations (1971) and Selected Poems (1976), besides The Interior Landscape (1967), Speaking of Siva (1972), Samskara (1976) and Hymns for Drowning (1981) which are translations from Kannada and Tamil. The Striders was a Poetry Society Recommendation. He was awarded Padma Shri in 1976, and the MacArthur Prize Fellowship in 1983.

Both The Striders and Relations are the heirs of an anterior tradition, a tradition very much of this subcontinent, the deposits of which may be seen in Kannada and Tamil. Ramanujan's deepest roots are in the Kannada and Tamil past, and he has repossessed that past, in fact made it available, in the English language. This is a significant achievement, one almost without parallel in the history of Indian English verse. He has successfully conveyed in English what, at its subtlest and most incantational, is locked up in another linguistic tradition. The impulse to preserve is at the bottom of his poetry. He follows up a private insight until it completes itself in a poem that is a world in itself. The family is, for him, one of the central metaphors with which he thinks. There are many luminous evocations of family life in The Striders and Relations notably in 'Small-scale Reflections on a Great House' which offers a sort of commentary on the Hindu family with its telescopic relationships.

'Prayers to Lord Murugan', an 'imitation' of the Tirumurukarrupatai (7th c.), examines a tradition gone to seed, and invokes its relevance to our own times. The poem is the first step towards establishing an indigenous tradition of Indian English verse. Ramanujan has an eye for the specific physiognomy of a person, object or situation which he then reveals with telling detail. What sets him apart from other poets is his unique tone of voice and his scrupulous concern with language.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Chirantan Kulshrestha (ed.), Contemporary Indian English Verse: An Evaluation (New Delhi, 1980); R. Parthasarathy, 'How It Strikes a Contemporary : The Poetry of A.K. Ramanujan'. The Literary Criterion, XII, 2-3 (Mysore, 1976).

R.Pa.

KANNADA: Over the last two decades Ramanujan has authored more than fifteen books both in English and in Kannada. Among them are four collections of poems in English and two in Kannada, besides collections of translations from ancient Tamil and Kannada. His translations from Tamil, The Interior Landscape and Poems of Love and War, have been greatly admired all over the English-speaking world. Equally well-known are his translations of the twelfth century vachana sahitya, Speaking of Siva, and U.R. Anantha Murthy's celebrated Kannada novel Samskara.

In Kannada, he has two collections of poems, Hokkulalli huvilla (No lotus in the nave, 1969) and Mattu itara padyagalu (And other poems, 1977). He has also written a number of radio plays, a few short stories and a novel, Mattobbana atmacharitra (Someone else's autobiography). He has translated his wife's novel into Kannada with the title Haladi meenu.

Hokkulalli huvilla caught the immediate attention of critics and readers alike. It was radically different from the high-priest serious poetry being written by the Navya poets. Ramanujan's poetry was refreshingly direct and unpretentious. It had the casualness of a neighbour's conversation. The influence of American poets like William Carlos Williams could be seen in the way poetry was fashioned out of the small things of life. Thematically, the poet seemed to be exploring the significance of his childhood experiences in terms of the changed circumstances of his life without any touch of nostalgia. Basically Imagist, the poems captivate us with their filigree work that has gone into the choice of words and rhythms. Ramanujan's poetry influenced a host of young poets, who were little gifted with his native intelligence and his feel for the language.

There is more than a hint of the cul-de-sac nature of this type of poetry in his second collection Mattu itara padyagalu. There is a de ja vu feeling about them. It is possible that such poetry is more of an aberration, not easily assimilated into the tradition of Kannada poetry.

R.S.

RAMARAJA BAHADUR (Malayalam) is a historical novel by the celebrated novelist C.V. Raman Pillai (1858-1922). It is the third of his three historical novels on the history of the erstwhile state of Travancore. The titles of the three novels mention two kings of Travancore, namely Maharaja Marttanda Varma (1729-1758) and Maharaja Rama Varma (1758-98), known as Dharmaraja. The first novel is Marttanda Varma, the second Dharmaraja and the third Ramaraja Bahadur, a title which the kings of Travancore held. In his novels Raman Pillai describes the strife that raged around the royal throne, the struggle of the kings with powerful feudal chiefs and the threat to the integrity of Travancore from the Sultans of Mysore, Hyder Ali and his son Tipu. There were powerful internal forces in Travancore to help the Mysore Sultans secretly.

In Ramaraja Bahadur, as well as in the earlier Dharmaraja, the ruling king is Dharmaraja. He is aided in Ramaraja Bahadur by his able Dewan (Minister) Kesava Pillai and the local subversion is suppressed and an invasion by Tipu defeated.

Ramaraja Bahadur has a very involved plot. The Sultan of Mysore spreads a network of spies in Travancore, especially in Trivandrum, the capital. His main allies are men with long-standing enmity towards the royal family. Some of them have also personal hostility towards Dewan Kesava Pillai. The most powerful among the king's enemies and allies of Tipu is a person called Kaliyutayan Chandrakkaran endowed with massive strength, great courage and raging passions. In the novel, he is first disguised as a fierce mendicant and spiritual chief bearing the name Kaliprabhava Bhattan and later as Manikya Gaundan, head of a travelling trading group. Of equal importance among Tipu's allies in Travancore is Perinchakkotan Kunchumaitti Pillai, a hostile cousin of Dewan Kesava Pillai. He too has a disguise as Panta, a ferocious untouchable. One of the centres where intrigues and assemblage of soldiers take place is the House of Mankavu, home of the beautiful woman Madhavi. Her son Madhavan was abducted long ago as a child and now he re-appears on the side of intriguers as Ajita Simhan, Prince of Babbala. But this Ajita Simhan is only a double of a real Ajita Simhan, an honoured ally and resident at the Court of Tipu and travelling with him when his camp moves to Travancore.

In this picture of internal subversion and external threat the king continues to be shrewd and strong. His minister is his source of strength. Even a loyal official Unnittan has been tricked to help the enemies unwittingly.

The intriguers' plans to kill the king and his minister fail. Tipu's attempts to invade the State from the north are foiled because of a massive flood which engulfed his military installations. Meanwhile, some of the intriguers are eliminated in one way or another through the wise action of the minister, helped by his intelligence system. Chandrakkaran himself dies in the flood mentioned above, and that too in the midst of his heroic attempts to save the life of Savitri, an honoured prisoner in Tipu's camp.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Into this central historical theme C.V. Raman Pillai has incorporated several subsidiary plots of love, revenge, perfidy and courage. There is the story of Keshavan Unnittan and Minakshi Amma. In Dharmaraja they marry as fond lovers. But the marriage is on the rocks in the later novel. The reason is Unnittan's suspicion that their daughter Savitri is born of his wife's illicit relationship with Dewan Kesava Pillai. The cloud of suspician is lifted in the end, and the man and his wife have a re-union with re-affirmed love.

Another important sub-plot is love between Savitri and Trivikraman, army captain and bodyguard to the Dewan. Unnittan wants to give his daughter in marriage to Ajita Simhan (the double). She is abducted and carried to Tipu's camp, but the Sultan is generous and treats her as an honoured, distinguished guest. She is finally saved from captivity by her own grand uncle, and the couple Savitri and Trivikraman unite in marriage.

Though there are several sub-plots in this complex novel, the author has shown great dexterity in fusing them in an impressive unity of structure. His masterly sense of craft leaves no loose ends and no events unexplained.

Critics have assessed Raman Pillai's talents being at their highest in Ramaraja Bahadur. His powers of characterisation, gift for description, fusion of sub-plots and bridging of generations are at their best in this novel. In its sense of time and space the novel belongs to the category of the chronicle novel. The narrative is largely sequential and the device of the omniscient author is employed.

Raman Pillai's vivid imagination and capacity to penetrate the hearts of the characters endow them with depth. He shows equal skill in drawing massive characters in heroic proportions as well as mean, intriguing, petty characters. Two types of women appear in Raman Pillai's novels, the strong, self-sufficient women and the mild and gentle ones. Savitri and Minakshi Amma respectively represent the two. Ramaraja Bahadur, like the other historical novels of this author, is imbued with loyalty to the king. But this loyalty is wrapped in the concept of love for the land. The king is pictured as defending the integrity of the country.

Raman Pillai's narration has the qualities of the epic novel. The massive will of the author explains his impressive style, sometimes difficult for the untutored reader. Numerous Sanskrit words, long and involved sentences interspersed with short ones, lengthy descriptions and frequent quotations from contemporary and older literature certainly make his style difficult. In addition to this is the realistic speech of some characters in their strange dialects. But the rewards of reading his novels are immense. The drama in action and dialogue has enabled the frequent staging of his novels as plays without much alterations. His wide canvas and his arrangement of a vast and complex body of material in a unified, majestic structure, have won the acclaim of critics. The influence of Walter Scott on his novels has been pointed out by the critics. Nonetheless, he remains one of the greatest novelists till date in Malayalam.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K. Bhaskaran Nair, Daivanitiykku daksinyamilla; P.K. Parameswaran Nair, C.V.Raman Pillai.

K.R.P.

RAMARAJABHUSHANA (Telugu; b. 1510, d. 1580). The poet's actual name is Prabandhankam Bhattu Murti, but he is better konwn as Ramarajabhushana, a title indicative of the fact that he was regarded as an ornament adorning the court of the Vijayanagara ruler, Rama Raja. Critical opinions differ regarding the claim made by some that he too belonged to the galaxy of the eight major poets (ashtadiggajas) in the court of Krishnadevaraya, as his poems were written long after the demise of that mighty emperor. The three extant works of Ramarajabhushana belong to the latter half of the 16th century. His skill in handling the figure of speech 'shlesha' (pun) is exceptional, and he has left his impact on a number of Telugu poets who handled the genre prabandha in subsequent ages.

The first of his works is Kavyalankara-sangrahamu, also known as Narasabhupaliyamu since it was dedicated to Narasa Raja. It is a work on poetics, based on Vidyanatha's Prataparudra-yasubhushanam, and deals with alankaras, rasa, dhvani, and the traditional classification of heroes and heroines. The section on dramaturgy, found in the Sanskrit work, does not find a place in the Telugu poem. Though the book is based on Vidyanatha's treatise, Ramarajabhushana composed original verse to illustrate the principles of poetics and shows his felicity in choosing apt examples to bring out the point under discussion.

His fame, however, rests mainly on Vasucharitramu, a narrative poem based on a minor episode in the Mahabharata, dealing with the love of Vasu Maharaja for Girika and their marriage. A new type of narrative poem called Prabandha with certain set chracteristics like descriptions of eighteen objects made its appearance in Telugu in the 16th century, and Vasucharitramu is universally acclaimed as one of the most outstanding poems in this genre. The story content in it is quite slender, but the poet is able to extend it to over 800 verses by the display of his gifts of description, play on words, and rare artistry in producing euphony by juxtaposing appropriate words for the purpose. The poem is a treasure house of alankaras and memorable phrases.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His last work Harishchandra-Nalopakhyanamu is a 'dvyarthi kavya', a poem with two meanings in which each verse allows itself to be interpreted in two ways, each dealing with a different story. It is an intellectual feat. Ramarajabhushana deals with the stories of Harishchandra and Nala simultaneously in the poem, and displays his supreme command of language, choosing words which can be manipulated to yield meanings at once to recount the tales of two different emperors. This poem, unlike the earlier works, was dedicated to Rama, suggesting a change in the poet's aims and aspirations. In its field it is a monumental work, excelling other such works in the language.

These three works have secured for the poet a pre-eminent position in Telugu literature.

A. R. R.

RAMARAJU, B. (Telugu; b.1925) was born in Devunuru in Warangal district, and studied in Warangal and Hyderabad. He received his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in Telugu literature from Osmania University. As a student he participated in the Freedom Movement in the old Hyderabad state, and later he took active interest, and held important positions in various literary and cultural associations in Andhra Pradesh. He joined the Telugu Department of Osmania University as lecturer in 1952 and retired as Professor and Head in 1983.

Ramaraju's contribution to Telugu literature is noteworthy mainly in two areas: (1) At a time when folk literature was being treated with contempt by most scholars, he did pioneering work in the field and wrote his doctoral thesis on Telugu folksongs, the first systematic study of the subject. Besides publishing a book Telugu Janapada-geya-sahityamu based on his thesis, he published three anthologies of Telugu folk-songs and four books in English on Telugu folklore. (2) He collected several hitherto unpublished palm leaf manuscripts from the villages in the region and published a few classics in Telugu and Sanskrit with critical introductions. One of these is Srinatha's Shivaratri-mahatmyamu which was published in 1968. Till then only the first four cantos of the poem were available to readers. The credit for discovering and bringing to light the hitherto missing fifth and final canto of the poem goes to Ramaraju. The classics he thus edited and published include Prasanna-Raghava-natya-prabandhamu by China Timma Kavi, Raghava-bhyudayamu by Chintalapalli Chayapati and Sakala-jiva-sanjivanamu by Sayapa Venkatadri Nayaka in Telugu. The Sanskrit classics brought to light by him include Vasu-charitra by Kalahasti Kavi, Jambavati parinaya by Krishnadevaraya, Shringara-shekhara-bhana by Vellala Umamaheswra, and Ramayana-sara-tilakam by Madhuravani.

A. R. R.

RAMASARASWATI (Assamese) was a prominent writer of the sixteenth century Assam. He was a contemporary and follower of the great Vaishnava saint, Shankaradeva.

He was born near modern Hajo in an orthodox Brahmin family. Gopinatha Pathak, son of Ramasaraswati, mentions Bhimasena Dvija in Dronaparva, an Assamese version of a part of the Mahabharata, as the father of Ramasaraswati. Ramasaraswati expresses his gratefulness to his elder brother in giving free publicity to his verses. He must have been deeply imbued with the teachings of the Bhagavata-purana and other Vaishnavite puranas. He must also have been acquainted with Sanskrit works, particularly those on poetics, music and erotics. Ramasaraswati speaks of one Mukundadeva as his spiritual preceptor. It was Mukundadeva who conferred on him the titles of Bharatachandra and Kavichandra.

Ramasaraswati's literary talents attracted the attention of Naranarayana, the Koch king, and his brother, Sukladhvaja or Chilaray. Naranarayana requested Ramasaraswati to render the Mahabharata into Assamese verse. It was a great task but Ramasaraswati's attainments were undoubtedly equal to it. The king took great delight in listening to the rendering of the Mahabharata. He called the poet, whose real name was Aniruddha, by the name of Ramasaraswati.

With the help of his son Gopinatha Pathak and poet Kamsari, Ramasaraswati translated the following portions of the Mahabharata: Adi parva, Sabha parva, Vana parva, Virata parva up to Kichaka vadha, Udyog parva, a large part of Bhishma parva and Shanti parva. In doing so he adhered closely to the original Sanskrit text. But abstract and philosophical discourses were abridged to suit the taste of his readers. The Gita part, for instance, was abridged into only forty verses. Thus he was able to reduce his book to one fourth of the length of the original. He achieved this brevity without sacrificing the main arrangement of the book.

Ramasaraswati's works fall under two categories. In one category is the translation of the Mahabharata and a treatise based on the epic. In the other category come the Akhyanas or narratives based on the Mahabharata and the puranas, such as Hansakaki, Yamal sanhita and Shiva-rahasya. These akhyanas are fifteen in number: Vijaya parva, Manichandra Ghosh parva, Puspaharan

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

parva, Kala Kubja Sushok badha, Bhima charita, Baghasura badha, Kulachal badha, Janghasura badha, Jatasura badha, Panchali bibaha, Sindhura parva, Vyasasrama, Ashwakarnar yudha, Khatasura badha and Byanjan parva. Almost all these akhyanas are grouped under the name of Vana parva. This Vana parva, which is rather a collection of books and quite different from the Vana parva of the Mahabharata, became very popular. The life of the Pandavas in exile, as depicted in the Mahabharata, is not eventful. But in the Vana parva of Ramasaraswati, the Pandavas have to overcome numerous difficulties and experience untold hardships. Almost all these narratives tell the story of the destruction of demons, who represent all that is evil. The Pandavas, and Draupadi with them, suffer temporary defeat, but are ultimately victorious because of their unshaken faith in and devotion to Sri Krishna. The Pandavas are described as fulfilling a divine mission: they wage relentless war against tyranny, and oppression. This is why these akhyanas are also known as Badha kavyas. These popular narratives were not written with the express purpose of propagating a cult, but they did play a part in consolidating and strengthening the influence of Vaishnavism in the eastern region of India. Ramasaraswati also wrote Jayadeva-kavya, which is more than a translation of the Gitagovinda. But he is more widely remembered for his poem, Bhima charita.

Ni.B.

RAMASHVAMEDHAM (Kannada) by Nandalike Laksminarayana (sometimes called Muddana) is a prose narrative which describes how Rama's proposed Ashvamedha sacrifice leads to the encounter with Lava and Kusha and ultimately to his reunion with Sita. Long after his coronation and Sita's exile, Rama, after coming to know of the antecedents of Ravana and Kumbhakarna, is filled with remorse for having destroyed them. Sage Agastya suggests a horse-sacrifice as an expiation. The horse that is released roams through various places, and their descriptions with all their associations fill quite a good part of the narrative. The remark that Rama had to use Sita's golden image as a substitute for her brings in the story of her abandonment which from then on claims equal emphasis. Shatrughna's inconclusive fight with Lava and Kusha who stop the horse at Valmiki's hermitage brings Rama on to the scene. Valmiki's intervention and explanation restore the deserted wife and the children to Rama who happily returns to Ayodhya to perform the sacrifice.

Muddana adopts the 'Sesharamayana' version from the Padma purana to ensure a happy ending. The Ramayana story was his favourite as all his three works reveal. Adbhutaramayanam glorifies Sita as the primordial power. Sriramapattabhishekam describes Rama's return from exile and coronation. The present work is a sequel to the second and recounts the developments of the aftermath.

What makes the work unique is not the story which was well-known but the manner in which it is told. It is narrated by an imaginary poet called Muddana (and it is by virtue of this that the pseudonym sticks to him for good) to his young and loving wife Manorama in response to her wish for a tale to tide over the tedium of a wet and rainy afternoon. Within this domestic and intimate framework the narrative proceeds, but is interrupted at calculated intervals and enlivened by felicitous exchanges between the loving pair. These interruptions by Manorama make delightful interludes which serve a double purpose: they provide relief to the narrator and the listener alike and help to keep the story on the main track and prevent it from getting lost in descriptive excesses and digressions. The mythological story told against the background of domestic felicity achieves by contrast added emphasis on the sorrows of Rama and Sita. The roaming of the sacrificial horse gives the poet a chance to describe places, persons, scenes, seasons and encounters with combatants but this part of the narrative is offset by an account of Sita's abandonment, which because of Manorama gets its proper share and ensures emotional appeal. Repeatedly and in the most natural manner she brings him back to the main characters, Rama and Sita, so that the story of the sacrifice becomes the story of their reunion. The arrival of the horse at the hermitage and the twins' involvement in the combat could not but lead to the recognition of their identity and through it to the happy reunion of the separated pair. By so aligning the emphasis in the story, Muddana and Manorama spring to life as subsidiary characters in the structure of the narrative and help to control and direct its emotional appeal.

In addition to the delightful framework, what adds charm to Ramashvamedham is the prose style Muddana had fashioned for himself. Unaffected by the forces that were shaping Kannada prose, he adopted the idiom and manner of the earlier writers, modified however, by a sense of realism which replaced their ornate complexities by simpler sentence structures and freer movement and variation of rhythm. Steeped as he was in classical poets, he could not help being poetical so that his prose stands midway between the two– poetical in concept and idiom but definitely prose in its structure and rhythm. With all its old-world flavour, the work marks a literary transition. It looks back to the past as much as it looks forward to the future.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RAMASWAMI, TRIPURANENI (Telugu; b. 1887, d.1943), Telugu critic, popularly known as Kaviraju, was a barrister, humanist and social reformer. He subjected the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, the Bhagavadgita and the puranas to a thorough critical scrutiny and held the view that these works kept the masses in perpetual ignorance and servitude. He was a satirist of the first order and a free thinker with an incisive wit. He was the first acknowledged rationalist poet in Telugu.

Ramaswami's Suta purana, four volumes (1924-29), exposed the inconsistencies in the lives of Rama and Krishna. He questioned the age-old belief in divine incarnation in his Bhagavadgita (1941), which he adapted to the Palnadu war in Andhra. It was a bold criticism of the tradtitional values of Hindu life and culture. In his first play Kurukshetra sangramam (1911), Kaviraju questioned Krishna's role, and in other plays like Shambuka vadha (1920) and Khuni (1935) he took up cudgels on behalf of Shambuka and Vena, the Shudra chiefs, against brahmin domination. His style was simple but pungent and forceful.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K. Satyanarayana Chowdari, Kaviraju.

G.S.R.

RAMASWAMY SASTRULU, VAVILLA (Telugu; b. 1832, d. 1891) is the most important figure in Telugu publishing. He was well-versed in both Telugu and Sanskrit. He was a lover of Shankara's Advaita philosophy and represented the Pitha of Shringeri in Madras. It is to him that the Telugus owe an easy availability of all the great Telugu classics, as Ramaswamy Sastrulu published a large number of them in thousands. What is more significant, he had even the Sanskrit works printed in the Telugu script.

Ramaswamy Sastrulu invented a type for Telugu printing called the Great Primer in 1860. All the old classics were printed in that type. The famous publishing company, Vavilla Ramaswamy Sastrulu and Sons, was founded by him in 1850. His publications are highly-prized Telugu classics as they were edited by eminent scholars. They include Valmiki's Ramayana, Vyasa's Mahabharata and its translations into Telugu by the poetic trio, the Bhagavatam of Pothana, the Ramayanam of Bhaskara, the Ramayanam of Ranganatha, etc. The firm founded by him continues to flourish under the management of his son Venkateswara Sastry.

J.J.K.B.

RAMAVARMA, VAYALAR (Malayalam; b. 1928, d. 1975) was a popular poet and film lyricist. Born in an orthodox family, Ramavarma in his early boyhood had traditional Sanskrit education. Later, he joined the English High School at Sherthalai, and passed his S.S.L.C. examination. He knew Malayalam, Sanskrit and English, and had a working knowledge of Tamil. In his teens he developed a deep interest in poetry. His early poems show the influence of Mahakavi G. Sankara Kurup and Mahatma Gandhi. Later, he came under the influence of Changampuzha Krishna Pillai whose highly sentimental lyrics were the rage of the day. Vayalar, his native village, was in those days a stronghold of the underground Communist Party, under whose militant leadership there had been a violent popular uprising against the dictatorial rule of Sir C.P. Ramaswamy Iyer, Dewan of Travancore, resulting in a big carnage of innocent people. It was quite natural that the impressionable young poet should come under the spell of the communist ideology and actively participate in the Progressive Writers' Movement. In no time his poems, vibrant with revolutionary fervour, started to charm huge gatherings at political meetings. It was the vision of an equitable society, rather than drab daily politics, that fired his imagination. He also developed a rationalistic strain, and became a sustained critic of religious hypocrisy and age-old superstitions. He was a master of melodious diction, and his simple poems, when properly recited, had an elementary power to sway the masses. It was this musical quality of his poems that gained him easy access to the film world, whereas as a gifted composer of sweet lyrics his position remained unchallenged till his untimely death. More than anybody else, he is responsible for bringing poetry on to the Malayalam screen.

Ramavarma's narrative poem Ayisha (1954), depicting the sad plight of a poor Muslim girl, has been a favourite text with many Kathaprasangam (musical one-man stage-presentation of stories) performers. Sargasangitam (1961), a collection of his lyrics, received an award from the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. As a composer of songs, he grew with the Malayalam film industry, and a large number of his compositions became all-time hits. Four times he won the Kerala State Award for the best film lyricist of the year. In 1974, he also received from the President of India the National Award for the best film lyricist. He has composed more than one thousand songs for Malayalam films, which endeared him to the masses, while his amiable disposition gained for him a large and devoted circle of friends. To commemorate him, his friends and admirers instituted the annual Vayalar Award, which is the most prestigious literary award in Kerala. Two volumes, one containing all his poems and the other almost all his film songs, have also been brought out posthumously.

His published poetic works are: Padamudrakal (1948), Kontayum punulum (1950), Enikku maranamilla, Ayisha (1954), Mulankatu (1955), Oru Judas janikkunnu (1955), Ente mattolikkavitakal (1957), Sargasangitam

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(1961). In addition to these, he has also published two collections of short stories and one travel diary.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Leelavathy, Malayala kavita sahitya charitram (Trichur, 1980); T.M. Chummar, Padya sahitya charitram (Kottayam, 1973).

N.V.K.W.

RAMAVATARACHARIT (Kashmiri) is the first epic in Kashmiri language, composed by Prakash Ram (1819-1885 ?), who happens to be one of the leading poets of the nineteenth century.

Prior to its publication, the epic was so popular that its hand-written copies were purchased at a high price. It is because of its popularity that the manuscripts of this epic written on old Kashmiri paper can be obtained in any part of Kashmir even today.

This epic was seen through the press first in 1910 in the Persio-Arabic script. The subsequent editions of 1915, 1930, 1938 and 1955, too, were published from Srinagar in Nastaliq.

An abridged edition of the epic in Roman letters was published by the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal in 1930. G.A. Grierson, the editor of the Asiatic edition, included the short summary of the full text in English as the second introduction to the book.

The critical edition of this epic (ed. Baljinath Pandit) appeared in 1965 from Srinagar. The name of the critical edition is Kashur Ramayan instead of the original title Ramavataracharit. The critical edition of the epic is obviously superior to all previous editions. Besides a scholarly introduction, the learned compiler has added notes on the margin of each page to explain certain terms and archaic words. There are a few misprints in the text, but the comparative study of various manuscripts has filled a lot of gaps, which were evident in the previous editions of the epic.

Based on the critical edition, Ramavataracharit, along with its Hindi rendering appeared in Devnagari script from Lucknow in 1974 (ed. and tr. S.K. Raina).

Lav Kush charit (The life of Lav and Kush) forms an appendix to all the editions of Ramavataracharit.

The central idea of this epic is to show that Rama is not merely a hero, but an incarnation of Vishnu. The main purpose of the poet in composing this long poem is to prepare the ground for Ramabhakti. In its nature it is more devotional than historical. It is not a translation of any particular book, but it is an adaptation of the material obtained from various sources. In its devotional spirit Ramavataracharit is closer to Ramacharitmanas and Adhyatam Ramayana. Some events in this epic resemble those in the Bengali and Tibetan versions of the Ramayana.

There are, of course, some events in this book which correspond to Valmiki's epic, but so far as the details and treatment are concerned, there is nothing common between the two. While Valmiki is silent over the parentage of Sita, the epic gives two versions of this event. In one version Sita is said to be the daughter of Ravana and Mandodari, and in another she is shown as having been raised from the blood of the rishis (seers). There are other variations also. The fight between Jatayu and Ravana, origin of Lanka, the death of Ahiravan and Mahiravan, Sita's banishment, Rama's Ashvamedha yajna, and some other battle scenes have nothing to do with the original work of Valmiki.

There is one more noteworthy aspect of Ramavataracharit. Though devoted to Ramabhakti, there is a deep influence of Shaivism on the philosophy discussed in it. It has been the effort of the Vaishnava poets to bring Vishnu and Shiva close to each other. Prakash Ram too has contributed his bit towards this end like other Vaishnava poets.

The composition of Ramavataracharit paved the way for the composition of other epics and served as their model. In its flow, diction, simplicity, poetic ornamentation, imagery and descriptive quality, this epic is superior to all other epics in Kashmiri, excepting the Samnama (1874) of Bulbul Nagmi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : A.A. Azad, Kashmiri zaban aur shairi, Vol. 2 (Srinagar, 1962); Baljinath Pandit, Kashur Ramayana (Srinagar, 1965); G.A. Grierson, Ramavataracharit (Calcutta, 1930); J.L. Kaul, Studies in Kashmiri (Srinagar, 1968); O.N. Kaul, Legend of Rama in Kashmiri (Kashur Samachar Delhi, 1978); P.N. Bazaz, The History of Struggle for Freedom in Kashmir (Delhi, 1954); Sunitikumar Chatterjee, The Cultural Heritage of India, Vol. 5 (Calcutta, 1978).

Mo.S.

RAMAVIJAYA (Marathi) is a popular poetic work in Marathi by Shridhara Nazarekar (1658-1730). As the name suggests, it is a poetic biography of Rama. It is, however, not the first work in Marathi on the life of Rama. Ekanath, Mukteshvar and Ramadas were the predecessors of Shridhara in this field. The path was not entirely untrodden, but it is a fact that Shridhara's Ramavijaya is the most popular and widely read work. It is interesting to note that the influence of this work outgrew the boundaries of Maharashtra; e.g. the Gujarati Giridhara Ramayana draws heavily on it.

Ramavijaya is in ovi metre and consists of 9147 ovis. So far as its structure is concerned, it seems to have been patterned on the model Valmiki's Ramayana, since each is divided into seven 'kandas'. However, Shridhara treats 'Yuddha kanda' more elaborately than others.

Shridhara has himself mentioned the sources on which his work is based. He gives the names of nineteen Ramayanas such as Ananada Ramayana, Shiva Ramayana, Brahma Ramayana, Padma Ramayana, etc.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

At the end of each chapter he invariably mentions that his work is based on the 'nataka' (play) of Valmiki, whereby he means Valmiki Ramayana. A famous work, Hanuman nataka is also one of the main sources from which he has drawn his material, and this he calls 'kavya'. This is interesting. While there is nothing wrong in saying that Hanumannataka is kavya, for in the Sanskrit poetic tradition kavya is a generic term applicable to both poetry and drama. However one cannot help wonder how Shridhara, well-versed in the Sanskrit poetic tradition, could call Valmiki's Ramayana a play.

It has been observed that Shridhara bases his work on a number of Sanskrit works. However, one must note that his approach is not that of a scholar or a critic. It is no wonder then if he treated all these sources on a par. There is, thus, no consideration of historicity of events or consistency. The decisive principle operating behind his selection of events from various sources is subjectivity—his desire to enlighten as well as entertain the people. One cannot forget that Shridhara was himself a well-known scholar and orator of his times. He used to perform 'kirtana'. One who performs kirtana cannot afford to neglect the response of the audience. Shridhara seems to keep his audience in mind even while he is writing, and since his works are meant for oral presentation he is quite conscious of it. It is, therefore, only natural that he selects dramatic episodes from all possible sources in order to make his work attractive and engaging. The episode of Ahiravana and Mahiravana, for example, is borrowed from Agni purana. Valmiki does not mention a washerman as a rumour-monger suspecting the fidelity of Sita. Shridhara draws this reference from Padma purana. To put it in his own words, Shridhara has churned the ocean of Ramakatha in order to draw episodic jewels therefrom. His repeated reference to the work of Valmiki, therefore, needs to be taken only formally.

Notwithstanding the popularity enjoyed by Ramavijaya, some scholars think that as a work of art his Harivijaya is superior to Ramavijaya and that it is in the former rather than the latter that Shridhara seems to be more at home. The plausible explanation for this could be that Shridhara was a devotee of Vitthal, the God of Pandharapur, who is believed to be identical with Krishna himself. However, objectively speaking, it is the life of Krishna rather than that of Rama which, because of its multifariousness, offers broader scope for creativity.

Ramavijaya appeared in the print in 1896 chiefly owing to the efforts of Purana Prakashaka Mandal, Bombay. Recently Bhuvana Vani Trust, Lucknow, has brought out a Hindi translation by G.N.Sathe.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.N. Joshi, Shridhara charitra ani kavyavivedhana (Pune, 1951); G.N. Sathe (tr.), Shri Ramavijaya (Lucknow, 1976).

Sa. Mo.

RAMAYANA (Nepali). In Nepali the Ramayana in prose preceded the Ramayana in verse. The first prose work dealing with the Ramayana theme was the Ashvamedha yajna by some unknown writer. Next came the Adhyatma Ramayana (1839) by Sundarananda Bara. It was not a translation; it followed the general line of the Rama story, but not without introducing extraneous episodes and descriptions. Padam Sharma wrote his Adhyatma Ramayana Lankakanda (1839) following the Rama story freely. Then we have Ramdas's Bhaktikand Ramayana. The exact year of its writing is not known, but one manuscript by a copyist dated 1865 is extant. In modern times three significant Nepali Ramayanas in prose made their appearance: the Nepali sankshipta Ramayana (1915) by Chakrapani Chalisey, the Ramacharitmanas, a translation of Tulsidas's work by Kulachandra Gautam, and the Atma Ramayana (1959) by Bhairav Singh Thapa. Except for Thapa's Atma Ramayana which expounds the philosophy of Nirguna Brahma and Chalisey's Nepali sankshipta Ramayana which bases itself on Valmiki's Ramayana, all mainly follow the Adhyatma Ramayana.

The Nepali people in general, however, regard the verse Ramayanas only as the real Ramayanas having religious authority and spiritual power. As though to confirm this belief, the first ever Nepali Ramayana by Raghunath Bhatta (1814-1889) was a very faithful, almost literal verse translation of the Adhyatma Ramayana. Only the 'Sundarkand' published from Banaras in 1888 is extant now, the other six kandas are believed to have been lost. As a literary piece of work it possesses a strange and somewhat rugged beauty of its own, Bhatta having imbibed the Brajabhasha influences too.

Acharya Bhanubhakta's (1814-1868) was the first complete Nepali verse Ramayana to come out of the printing press (1885) and it soon assumed the status of the main Nepali Ramayana. Kumar Pradhan has pointed out, 'If the original (Adhyatma Ramayana) over-emphasizes the divinity or incarnation of Rama, Bhanubhakta's hero is more human.... (The author) often gives local (i.e. Nepali) colour to various anecdotes.'

In time Bhanubhakta's Ramayana was followed by what may be termed as 'religious' Ramayanas, namely, Adbhuta Ramayana (written 1882) by Ramakanta Baral, Ananda Ramayana (1901) by Bhojraj Sharma, translation of Bhavabhuti's Uttara Ramacharit by Kalidas Parajuli, Radheshyam Ramayana (1933) by Kharga Bahadur Shrestha, Agnivesa Ramayana by Revatiraman Neopaniya. The list is not exhaustive.

Then we have a crop of literary Ramayanas, that is, expressly literary works, which have exploited the Ramayana theme.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The first work of this nature was Raghav-vilap by Pandit Taranath Sharma. It gives expression to Rama's grief when Lakshamana was struck down with 'shakti' by Meghanada. Adarsha Raghav (1948) is a prodigious literary work by the great scholar-poet Somanath Sigdel. The work is more respected than read and appreciated by the common run of readers. The Raghavalankar of Kulachandra Gautam (1875-1958) has the Ramayana theme again but harnessed to the study and practice of figures of speech. It is Ramayana (a Rama story) which is equally a treatise on the literary figures of speech. On the surface it looks strange and perplexing that the one and the same book should aspire to be two apparently disjunct works in equal measure. But the writings of this description have had a long and distinguished tradition. To give but one example, 'Bhattikavya' is an illustration of Panini's grammar and at the same time a recount of the Rama story. Lending more weight, however, to the poetic aspect of the work than to the poetics part, Kulachandra has chosen to call Raghavalankar a 'stava-kavya', i.e. poetry in praise of Rama. This again is in the poetic tradition of 'stotras', i.e., poems or songs in praise of deities. The great Lakshmiprasad Deokota (1909-1959) penned in 1946 two short poetical works, Sitaharan and Ravana-Jatayu yuddha, constituting two cantos and one canto respectively. The traditional import is given a go by, and a romantic tenor is let in to infuse the narrative incidents. Lakhi Devi Sundas has rightly observed, 'In Sitaharan, Deokota's Sita is beauty impersonate and Ravana a worshipper of beauty. In Ravana-Jatayu yudhdha Ravana typifies misuse of power while Jatayu stands for resistance against the diabolic use of power by the authority that be.'

M.D.R.

RAMAYANA (Prakrit/Apabhramsha). The Ramayana holds a unique position in India. The influence of this epic had been so deep upon the Indian mind that it was included even in the curriculum of the Jaina system of education some time before the compilation of the Jaina canons. But the introduction of that hybrid education produced a reaction which was not very conducive to the popularity of their own faith. So they modified the epic story. In this mission they did not have to exert much, since the epic tradition had given them a powerful mythology which they utilized with necessary modifications in their own pantheon which popular Jainism had developed owing to the powerful influence of Brahmanism. Thus, almost all the epic gods and goddesses, Gandharvas and Yakshas and a host of mythical figures were assimilated, with modifications, in the Jaina religious beliefs and their writings.

These Jaina works appear from the third or fourth century AD to the seventeenth. Some such charitas are in Prakarit, others in Sanskrit, and a couple in Apabhramsha. The poets of the Jain Ramayana are drawn from the two principal sects of the Jains, Svetambara and Digambara.

Dashratha, the Ikshvaku king, was the ruler of Ayodhya. He had four sons, Rama, Lakshmana, Bharata, and Shatrughana. Janaka, the king of Vidiha had a beautiful daughter, Sita, who was married to Rama. Ravana, the mighty ruler of Lanka, heard of the beauty of Sita and was fascinated. He carried her off by force to Lanka. Hearing of the abduction, Rama was stricken with profound grief.

A 'vanara' prince, Sugriva, who had been deprived of his rightful place in Kishkindha, sought Rama's alliance. Rama and Lakshmana, with Sugriva's army, marched against Lanka. Vibhishana, Ravana's righteous brother, tried to persuade Ravana to return Sita to Rama honourably but his efforts went in vain. In a terrible battle that followed between Rama and Ravana, the latter was killed. Vibhishana was made king of Lanka, and Rama and Sita were reunited.

According to the Jaina tradition, Rama had 8000 queens, among whom Sita and three others were the principal ones. Lakshman had 16000 queens, among whom Prithvisundari and eight others were the principal ones. Rama and Lakshmana deeply loved each other. After the death of Lakshmana, Rama bacame a monk, practised austerities, obtained perfect knowledge, and in due course, attained moksha. Because of his inability to accept the path of the Jinas, Lakshmana sank into hell. For his fall from the code of conduct, Ravana too had to go to hell. After passing through many re-births, both were able to attain liberation. Sita, after her life as an Aryka, was reborn in heaven, but in course of time obtained moksha.

Among the various forms of Jaina epics, Vimalasuri's Paumachariya (c. AD 400) is the oldest. It narrates the story of the Valmiki Ramayana in the Jaina tradition. Though there are many points of difference in details, the general run of the narrative does not show a strong departure from the traditional account of Rama's exploits. The introductory portion of the book is very important as it shows the reaction to Valmiki's Ramayana.

Ravisena's Padmacharita (AD 678) occupies the second place in the chronological order. This work is practically a faithful Sanskrit version of the Prakrit Paumachariya of Vimalasuri. Ravisena imitates Vimalasuri wholesale without acknowledging his indebtedness to the latter. The introductory chapter of Padmacharita shows the same censorious attitude towards the Valmiki Ramayana as does Vimalasuri's work. However, the way this reaction is expressed, reveals the author's anxiety to minimise the popularity of the Valmiki Ramayana among the Jaina laity. It also proves that Valmiki Ramayana was fairly accurately known to the contemporary Jainas and, so far as the accounts of the families of Rama and Ravana were concerned, there was, perhaps, no well-established Jaina tradition to draw upon.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Paumachariu of Svayambhu (AD 700-900) is the third known work on the story of Rama. It is written in Apabhramsha and is divided into five books. Svayambhu has obviously followed Valmiki more closely than his Jaina predecessors. Like Valmiki he has divided his work into five 'kandas' (books) which, with the exception of the first kanda, bear the subtitles in the Valmiki Ramayana. With regard to nomenclature of the first kanda, the author has evidently followed the tradition represented by the earlier Jaina epic authors who tried to absolve the Rakshashas of the Valmiki Ramayana of their abominable Rakshashahood by depicting them as the offspring of the Vidyadhara race.

The Ritthanemicharitu by the same author is another Jaina version of the Brahmanical Harivamshapurana. This work, too, on the analogy of the Rama epic, is divided into four kandas, which are styled as Yadavakanda, Kurukanda, Yuddhakanda and Kadavakas.

The influence of the Valmiki Ramayana is, therefore, present in the Jaina Ramayana, but Jainism disapproves of the Brahamanical way of life. In these works preference was given to stories pertaining to real life, instead of mythological legendary accounts of Brahmanic puranas, and an attempt was made to introduce a rationalistic attitude in the main story.

B.N.D.

RAMAYANA (Sanskrit). The Ramayana, an unparalleled production in literature, purports to be a historical poem composed by Valmiki, a sage contemporary of Rama, the hero of the poem. In his article on Ramayana, contributed to the Encylopaedia of Religion and Ethics, A.A. Macdonell writes correctly that probably no work of world literature secular in origin, has ever produced as profound an influence on the life and thought of a people as the Ramayana. In passion as well as in imagination, undoubtedly, the Ramayana towers over all other poems in Sanskrit literature.

Investigations of scholars have shown that Valmiki was not the creator of the story of Rama. The saga of Rama existed in varied forms among the wandering minstrels and bards under different titles, such as Ramacharita, Sitacharita, Dashamukhavadha. Unfortunately, these are not extant now. The sage Valmiki must have shaped these ballads and folk-songs, especially found in Ikshvaku family, into a unified ornate poem with a remarkable consistency, fascinating coherence and firmness of conception. Hence he is honoured as the Adikavi (the First Poet), and his work, the Ramayana, is acclaimed as the Adikavya, the First Poem.

Regarding the composition of the epic and its transmission, the poem has the following story. After his victorious return to Ayodhya and the coronation, Rama hears whispers about the purity of his queen Sita, who lived for some time in Ravana's kingdom and he abandons her in pregnant state, Sage Valmiki shelters her and she is delivered of her twin sons. Pondering over her poignant fate, the sage sees an innocent Krauncha bird, in felicity with its mate, shot down by a callous hunter.

The sight of the dying male Krauncha and its crying consort moved the heart of the compassionate sage. From the fountain of his pathos-filled heart followed spontaneously in metrical form, an utterance of imprecation on the cruel hunter. Valmiki on this sudden turn of events stood confused. Brahma, the creator appeared and asked Valmiki to compose in the same metre the story of Rama of whom he had already heard from Narada, the divine sage. Accordingly, Valmiki composed the great poem in the anushtubh metre, taught it to the twins and made them sing it before Rama. The twin sons singing the poem gives a clue to the way the texts were transmitted in ancient India.

Ever since the stirring incidents of the Ramayana were first narrated in the glowing style of Valmiki, the Indian heart has cherished for it the deepest love and highest esteem. Consequently, there came into existence institutions of travelling singers, actors, rhapsodists and bards who committed the poem to memory and orally transmitted it to the interested audiences. Those who among them had poetic talents also enriched the repertoire by their own compositions, in response to the mood, nature and interest of the listeners. These additions which were liked by the people were further preserved traditionally and then also formed, thereby, in course of time, integrated consituents of the Ramayana. Probably the Ramayana received a more or less definite form only when writing came in vogue, more or less, because the fluidity still continued. The first compilers and editors who handled the poem did not regard it as their task to view the orally transmitted material critically to distinguish the genuine from the spurious, but on the contrary welcomed everything which presented itself under the title, Ramayana. In this way generations of singers and scribes belonging to separate geographical units popularised, and consequently, preserved their own recensions of the text which are distinguishable from one another. Thus, broadly, we have now three different recensions representing the transmission through three different regions of India, viz. the Southern or Bombay, the North-Eastern or Bengal, and the North-Western or Kashmir.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A comparative study of these recensions conducted by Professor H. Jacobi shows that nearly one-third of the text of each recension does not have corresponding verses in the other two. However, the southern recension is believed to have preserved the text in the oldest form.

In its present form the Ramayana consists of 24,000 couplets or verses, called shlokas, divided into seven books, called the kandas, Bala kanda, Ayodhya kanda, Aranya kanda, Kishkindha kanda, Sundara kanda, Yuddha kanda and Uttara kanda. The orthodox opinion holds that all the seven kandas and all the 24,000 shlokas are genuine. They offer two reasons for their belief: first, the present text itself says that Valmiki composed his Ramayana in seven books of 24,000 shlokas; second, that the sacred Gayatri mantra forms the foundation of the composition of the Ramayana. Gayatri mantra has 24 syllables and at the commencement of each 1,000 shlokas, Valmiki, according to this opinion, placed one letter of Gayatri mantra, in order.

However, this numerical analysis does not prove true to the Ramayana, as we have it now in an over-grown form. The investigations of the numerous research scholars of East as well as West, and especially the investigations of Jacobi have shown that the books II-VI are the only genuine books, while the entire 'Uttara kanda' and most of the 'Bala kanda' are later additions as these abound in contradictions, inconsistencies, the severance of connections, and juxtapositions of new and old ideas, etc.

The probable date of the Ramayana is even today an unresolved complex issue. The orthodox Indian tradition holds that it belongs to Treta-yuga and is as old as nearly nine lakhs of years. Some say that the Ramayana was composed by 3380 BC. But from the foregoing consideration of research, it appears probable that the original work of Valmiki, which was undergoing continuous changes, was substantially reconstructed on the model of the Mahabharata at some particular time, though some more additions and alterations continued at different times. While the original work of Valmiki was certainly post-Vedic and pre-Buddhist, probably belonging to not later than the 8th or 7th century BC, the present edition of the Mahabarata and its date may probably be about first century BC, a date much anterior to Kalidasa, the poet celebrate, who must have had before him the text of the Ramayana as it is essentially today when he wrote his famous Raghuvamsha. One may easily agree with Hunter that while some parts of the Ramayana are earlier than the Mahabharata, the compilation as a whole, belongs to a later date.

The following is the outline of the story of the Ramayana. The old king Dasharatha of Ayodhya had four sons by his three queens. The four sons were exemplary in their conduct as sons, princes, husbands, friends and foes. They all got married in Mithila (Bala kanda). When the coronation of the eldest son, Rama, came up, one of the younger queens, Kaikeyi, wanted her son Bharata to be crowned and Rama to be exiled to the forest for fourteen years. Rama with his wife Sita, and brother Lakshmana went to the forest. But Bharata, who refused to usurp Rama's right, secured Rama's sandals to be placed on the throne as a symbol (Ayodhya kanda). Thereafter, Rama plunged deep south in the forest and encountered the demons which brought him into conflict with their king, Ravana. In disguise, the demon king abducted Sita (Aranya kanda). Rama took the assistance of the monkey chief Sugriva, whom Rama restored to power, killing his elder brother Vali, (Kishkindha kanda). Rama found out the whereabouts of Sita through Sugriva's sagacious minister, Hanuman (Sundara kanda). Thereafter he bridged the sea, found in Vibhishana, the righteous brother of Ravana, an ally, fought and killed Ravana and his hordes. After a fire ordeal in which Sita, recovered from Ravana's custody, proved her chastity, they returned Ayodhya by the aerial car, Pushpaka, and Rama was crowned king. Rama's rule of Ayodhya was exemplary (Yuddha kanda). But Rama hears gossip about the chastity of Sita and abandons her in her pregnant state. Sage Valmiki shelters the discarded queen, brings up her twin sons, composes a poem on the stirring incidents of Rama's life and teaches the boys to sing it. When the poem was sung in the presence of Rama himself, on the occasion of a horse sacrific to which Valmiki was also invited, Rama invites Sita to bear proof of her chastity. The disheartened Sita comes forward and swears that if she is a really pure and chaste queen, Mother Earth would hide her in her womb. In ready response to this fearful invocation of the pure queen, her mother comes out from the bosom of the earth, seizes her darling and disappears. The young princes are then acknowledged by Rama and they console him for the remainder of his life. (Uttara kanda).

The bare outline of the story gives no idea of the life, vision and vicissitudes that are packed into the poem apart from the wealth of episodes and complex incidents. Word and phrase, line and stanza, sarga and kanda hold us in thrall even today. The city of Ayodhya, Kishkindha and Lanka, each different from the other, in the character of its people; the kaleidoscopic variety of forests, mountains, rivers and the sea; epic settings of court and hermitage; the atmosphere of sacrifice and ceremony; numerous myths and legends; panoramic procession of birds and beasts along with men and demons as characters of the story; descriptions of the seasons; life and behaviour of the monkeys and the fantastic demon-world; the reverberating battle scenes; the play of human feelings of every shade, are all there. We have again the mellifluous metre, the similes piled upon similes, the elevating dialogues and maxims on every aspect of human life. We are thrilled by them, sophisticated and modern though we be. Through all these the sage displays before us the triumph of truth and righteousness. Dasharatha is a good king and a fond parent, and he kept his word at the most difficult crisis; Rama, the perfection of a son, obeyed his father; the brothers loved each other; Lakshmana embodied service, and followed Rama to forest voluntarily, Bharata exemplified brotherliness; Sita symbolised purest womanhood, and Hanuman displayed devotion. Valmiki shows through these characters the triumph of human personality and of fundamental values of life.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Of the excelling and intimate descriptions, one can easily mention the hills of Chitrakuta, the forests and the lake of Pampa, the onset of the night in Atri's hermitage, the rains, the spring and the splendour of autumn. Of the moving scenes one can cite the coronation crisis, the meeting of Rama and Bharata at Chitrakuta, or Sita abusing Lakshmana, or Vibhishana's Sharanagati. For the tenderest pathos, we may cite Dasharatha's grief and death on his son's separation and Sita's fire ordeal. For ennobling passages, shall we cite the words of Sita to Rama when the latter initially refused to take her to the forest with him? Or the words of Rama to Ravana to go home, refresh and replenish and come back the next day? Or Rama's words to Vibhishana to do the final rites of Ravana? Or the crowning piece of the whole epic, Sita asking Hanuman not to kill the demonesses, her erstwhile tormentors, but to forgive them? Ramayana is truly the First Poem, unrivalled in sublimity of poetry, pathos and scenes.

Scholars do not find in the Ramayana an unmixed historical record. Several of them have expounded different theories about the allegory in its theme; it is an allegory representing the early attempts of the Aryans to conquer south India (Lassen); it signified the spread of Aryan culture to the South, and particularly to Sri Lanka (Weber). It is a poetic version of the conflict between Brahmanism and Buddhism in the South (Talboys Wheeler). (On the face of it, this is an absurd suggestion). It is a Vedic myth of Vritra and Indra, elaborated into a poem (Jacobi). These theories are built only on sandy foundation. That the Ramayana is an epic poem wherein the highest form of human life is depicted, and where God fulfils in the best Man, Rama, and the Man as Dasharatha's son rises to his full stature by pulling up his manhood to Divinehood is the traditional belief, accepted for centuries.

The Ramayana is one of the germinal sources linking the different cultures of the Indian sub-continent and also various nations of Asia. True to a prophecy, appearing in the opening of the epic itself, that it will stand in all countries as long as mountains stand and rivers flow, the Ramayana crossed the limits of the country and brought under its spell the whole of South East Asia from Cambodia to Java; not only local literature, but art, dance and drama arose in these countries out of the Ramayana. For the most beautiful Ramayana sculptures we have to go to Prambanan in Java, and for a temple to its immortal sage author to Tra-kien in Champa. In its own country the Ramayana more than fulfilled the same prophecy. There is not a single regional language in India which has not got its own Ramayana, and two such, of Tulsidas in Hindi and Kamban in Tamil, are worshipped as scriptures by millions. Gradually the idea that in his Rama, Valmiki depicted no mere national hero, but a divinity that came to earth to redeem humanity struck deep into the hearts of the people. So the Ramayana soon obtained canonical authority as a gospel of devotion, bringing up, around it, minor Upanishads on the Rama-cult, spiritualised versions of the story and a mass of exegesis. A number of other Ramayanas arose. Commentators and compilers became busy. Buddhism and Jainism, too, used the Ramayana story with oriented versions to suit their purposes. Almost every Purana vied with each other to include the story of the Ramayana in some long and short narratives. Poems and plays were written. Rama-bhakti cult developed. Temples in honour of Rama and Sita were built; festivals based on the Ramayana became common; music, art, dance and ballet based on Rama stories became popular. The work was treated as a text-book in education and discipline. Boys and girls were christened after the great and virtuous characters of the Ramayana. It also became a source of poetic theory—the shoka-shloka equation, the story of the birth of poetry from the sorrow-filled heart of Valmiki, as already referred to, forming the bedrock, the 'Adhara-shruti' of the Indian aesthetics. In brief, the nature and extent of its influence on the mind and life of the people of this country and around, down to this day, is something unique and unsurpassed.

T.S.Kr.

RAMAYANA CHAMPU (Malayalam). Better known as Bhasharamayana champu, this beautiful work belongs to

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

the genre of the champukavyas in which there is an agreeable blending of prose and poetry. The main difference between Malayalam and Sanskrit champus is perhaps that in the former very often the prose passages too are composed rhythmically with metres like dandaka pressed into service. Among the champus in Malayalam the present work occupies an important position by its charm, scope and poetic qualities.

The work is generally attributed to Punam Nambutiri, a great contemporary of Uddanda Shastri, (the author of Kokilasandesha), who flourished in the fifteeth century. There is no conclusive evidence to show that the author of Ramayana champu was Punam, but there are passages and stanzas that warrant such an assumption.

Divided into twenty sections, the work has for its theme the entire gamut of the Ramayana story. Each section is given a separate title and more or less forms a unit in itself. The motive behind this classification into sections is obviously to facilitate their use on the stage in temple theatres of Kerala where professional exponents used to perform or expound them of festive occasions.

Through the author has generally based his story on the Ramayana of Valmiki, he has freely introduced suitable innovations here and there. In dealing with his story he has sometimes epitomised certain portions of the theme, while at times he has gone into digressions effecting changes in the course of events. Works like Uttararamacharita of Bhavabhuti and Ashcharyachudamani of Shaktibhadra have been made use of for such digressions. While Valmiki has dealt with the curse pronounced on Dasharatha by a sage in the 'Ayodhyakanda' of the epic, in the champu it occurs in the section on Ramavatara (the birth of Rama). Similarly, the sacrificial horse is led by Lakshmana in the original while in the Champu it is Chandraketu, the son of Lakshmana, who leads it and fights with Lava. Such and other changes are effected by the poet based on the Rama stories found in Sanskrit literature.

Ramayana champu marks an important stage of development in the history of Malayalam literature. Till then Malayalam champus had their themes drawn from social history. Puranic stories were seldom accepted for this medium. Early champus like Unniyachchicharitam, Unniyaticharitam and Unnichchirutevicharitam were based on social themes, the heroines around whom these works were composed belonging to the clan of Devadasis, i.e. professional dancers employed in Kerala temples. The author of Ramayana champu adopted for the first time an epic story which has a wider scope and purpose. Moreover such treatises were more useful for exposition in kuttu performances in Kerala temples. There are several passages in them referring to this aspect.

Though it is a Malayalam champu, it contains numerous Sanskrit prose passages and stanzas quoted from a wide variety of Sanskrit texts like poems, dramas, champus, etc. The Ramayana champu of Bhoja is seen chiefly drawn upon for some excellent verses. Other important works which are quoted by Punam include Raghuvamsha, Shishupalavadha, Naishadhiyacharita, Uttararamacharita, Balaramayana, Mahanataka, Anargharaghava, Prasannaraghava, Raghuviracharita and Vasavadatta. It goes to the credit of the author that he has selected only the most beautiful stanzas from such works. Hiw own Malayalam stanzas are reprsentatives of the best traditions of manipravala style. The admixture of Sanskrit and Malayalam stanzas and passages presents a wonderful aesthetic experience to the readers. All the best traits mentioned by rhetoricians such as lucidity, charm, excellence in style, figures of speech and delineation of sentiments are discernible here. The work caters to the taste of the elite rather than the ordinary reader.

The language of Ramayana champu is at once interesting and intriguing. There is a blending of beautiful Sanskrit words and idioms, and Malayalam words. In addition to this the work has preserved for the lexicographer a number of old words, proverbs and idioms that were in vogue in the fifteenth century and which disappeared altogether in later literature.

The work is full of picturesque descriptions. The love lorn condition of Rama is described in his own words as follows:

> Above I see the dark rain-clouds,
> And around I behold fresh green sprouts;
> Everywhere is seen peacocks dancing,
> And the cool gentle breeze kindling my pangs;
> O daughter of Janaka, where can I rest
> My wandering eyes—I am lost for ever!

As a document of social conditions of the age in which it was written, the work has a significant role. In common with manipravala works, it too has preserved some of the peculiar features of the period. Though the locale is Koshala, the author treats of contemporary Kerala life with many of its specialities. The witty dialogue of the Nambutiri brahmins, the tall claims of pseudo-physicians, the boastful predictions of astrologers, and the mock bravery of soldiers are aptly mentioned in the course of the story.

Ramayana champu occupies an unparelleled position in the history of Malayalam literature for its boldness of execution and range of conception.

N.P.U.

RAMAYANA-KALPAVRIKSHAMU (Telugu) is an epic poem by Viswanadha Satyanarayana on the celebrated and oft-attempted theme of Valmiki's immortal epic in Sanskrit. He received the Bharatiya-Jnanpith Award for this work.

Raising the question, 'Why another Ramayana', the poet states that he chose the subject for his most ambitious literary work, partly to fulfil his father's wish and partly to satisfy his own inner urge. Running into about 12,800 verses, the poem is undoubtedly the most important work in the classical tradition to appear in the present century in Telugu. While it follows Valmiki's epic as far as the main story is concerned and even some stanzas from the original Sanskrit are translated quite closely, the poet sometimes deviates from Valmiki in the narration of events and portrayal of character. He introduces in it the customs and traditions of the Telugu people and the atmosphere prevailing in their homes.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Satyanarayana revels in elaborate descriptions, and handles a number of uncommon metres to suit the occasion. His description of the cycle of seasons in Balakanda, for instance, is quite extensive and impressive, and he chooses the rare Gaja-vilasitam metre to describe the majestic walk of the elephant. A variety of metres, suited to the occasion, is similarly chosen to describe the episode of Rama's pursuit of the golden deer in Aranyakanda. His innovations include the swan-messenger to mediate between the two factions before the outbreak of war, and a meeting between Rama and Parashurama before Rama's wedding with Sita in Mithila. Unlike in most Ramayanas, he redeems the character of Kaikeyi by suggesting that she willingly courted the public odium for sending Rama into the forest for fourteen years, as she knew well that the destruction of the evil forces, which is the purpose of his advent, cannot be fulfilled otherwise.

Satyanarayana's erudition is at once his strength and his weakness. His high-flown style and narrative devices dazzle the common reader, but the poem is uneven sometimes quite abstruse, and fails consequently to gain the popularity enjoyed by the Bharata and the Bhagavata and the even a few other Ramayanas in Telugu.

A.R.R.

RAMAYANAKATHA (Assamese). Ramakatha entered Assamese folklore long before Valmiki's Ramayana was rendered into Asssamese verse by Madhavakandali in the middle of the fourteenth century. From Kandali's auto-reference it is evident that the people were quite familiar with the Ramakatha. It was probably around this time that a cult known as 'Ramaramiya sampradaya' came to exist in Assam. This cult was referred to in later biographical works of the Vaishnava saints.

Madhavakandali, 'the unerring poet predecessor' as he was called euologistically by Shankaradeva after a century, rendered the Ramayana into Assamese verse under the patronage of the Varahi king Mahamanikya:

"I, called Kaviraja Kandali (the king among the poets), at the behest of the Varahi king, Mahamanikya, have rendered the seven books of the Ramayana into fine Assamese verse for the knowledge of the people, and in doing so I have extracted the substance of the original and left out the details; further, as advised by king Mahamanikya, I have added some literary embellishment to my composition."

That the entertainment of the masses was also intended by the poet is evident from his depiction of a number of scenes such as that of Manthara, the old hunchback woman who served Kaikeyi. When Rama is exiled she is so overjoyed that she thinks she will be the chief queen of Bharata. So she applies a strong makeup on her face and puts on a dress which evokes laughter. The description, though it sometimes verges on vulgarity, provided good entertainment to the listeners, drawn from the different strata of society. Neither the poet nor the listeners thought it sacrilegious as it was part of a 'kavya' and not of a scripture (Shastra).

The Assamese rendering of the Ramayana in simple Assamese verse undoubtedly brought the Ramayanakatha to every hearth and home. Soon certain episodes of the Ramayana found their way into folk-tales and popular beliefs. Separation of Sita from Rama, her confinement in the garden, her reunion with Rama, her banishment when she was in an advanced stage of pregnancy and similar other episodes attracted the popular imagination, and men and women shared her sorrow equally. It is interesting to observe that neither the heroic exploits of Rama nor the loyalty of Lakshmana to his elder brother, nor the unique devotion of Hanumana to Rama did so stir the mind of the people as the pangs of separation Sita suffered.

Here is an example how the folk mind came to be saturated with Ramakatha. A chakravaka pair, a variety of Indian crane, it is said, live in separation from each other during the night. They cry pathetically all the night longing for each other's company. The folk imagination traces the cause of this separation to the curse of Rama, who wanted to know from them as to who had stolen away Sita which, though they knew, they did not disclose. The folk tradition has it that when Rama pronounced the terrible curse the pair offered to tell him the truth thus: 'Rama kaon' (O Rama; we are telling). This is how the nocturnal cry of the birds is interpreted by the popular imagination with the help of the Ramayanakatha. There are many other tales, folk-tales and superstitions which have been influenced by the episodes of the Ramakatha. In the literary tradition, which drew also from the folk tradition, some stories from the Ramayana are re-told with variations. Some stories are almost wholly invented without having any basis in the original.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Lava-Kusara juddha, the fight of Lava and Kusa with Rama and his army, is a popular narrative of more than four hundred verses, assigned to Harihara Vipra, a contemporary of Madhavakandali. The work with its description of the valour of the two young boys fighting against a vast army, was so popular that the manuscripts of this work were profusely illustrated in colours.

The siege of Lanka by Rama with his motley army and the resistance offered by the generals of Ravana caught the popular imagination. There are certain popular stories which narrate the episodes either linked with Rama's attempt to destroy Ravana or with the war efforts of Ravana. These are derived largely from sources like the Adbhuta Ramayana and the Bhushundi Ramayana. They have been told and handled by the common people generation after generation. One such tale is Mandodari maniharana (The stealing of the gem belonging to Mandodari, the queen of Ravana). This tale is based on the folk-motif that so long as the wife wears a particular gem, charmed with some mystic power, the husband remains invincible. Mandodari used to wear a gem of such efficacy, but it was taken away by Hanuman from her in the guise of a Brahman.

Ravana mobilises all his generals and warriors and prepares to fight Rama. His son Mahiravana, the king of the nether world, is summoned. He comes and joins Ravana's army and dies in the struggle. This story is narrated in Mahiravanavadha, a work of 222 verses.

Durgavara, a poet of the early sixteenth century, who lived in the Nilachala village (Kamakhya), was said to have composed the Ramayana songs. That is to say, he rendered the narrative into verse intended to be sung by a group of performers. The leader, called Oja, sings the verses in accompaniment with cymbal, while his followers called Pali sing the refrain. The rendering is abridged.

The first and the last books,'adi' and 'uttarakanda', of Madhavakandali's Ramayana were lost in the course of time. Madhavadeva and Shankaradeva rendered these two books into Assamese verse again and added them to Madhavakandali's work.

During the period of the neo-Vaishnava movement in Assam, Krishnakatha came to occupy a prominent place and Ramakatha was relegated to the background. However, the identity of 'Shrinatha with Janakinatha' (of Krishna with Rama) soon came to be recognised and Ramakatha became popular again. Shankaradeva himself composed a drama called Ramavijaya (Victory of Rama over Parasurama). In a 'bargita', Shankaradeva described the marching army of the monkeys and their invasion of Lanka.

Anantakandali, a Vaishnava poet of the sixteenth century, was not satisfied with the Assamese rendering of the Ramayana by his predecessor Madhavakandali, who had presented Rama only as a human being and a hero. He, therefore, ventured to render anew the entire work projecting Rama as the Supreme Being. The work was either not completed or lost in part.

Mention may also be made of Raghunath, a poet of the seventeenth century, who told the story of the Ramayana in simple Assamese prose. His was an abridged version without any literary embellishment.

In later periods the Ramayanakatha turned out to be a kind of source-book. Poets and authors turned to it for the plots of their works. It also came to influence arts, sculpture and architecture.

B.S.

RAMAYANA THEME (Pali) has been a great vehicle for transmitting the ideals of Indian culture and mythology. The story of Rama is very popular throughout India. It has been extensively recited, sculpted and performed all over India as well as abroad, and has been a great source of power and creativity in Indian literature. The story of Rama has been adopted by the Vaishnavas, Buddhists and Jainas in their literatures, and sometimes adapted to explain their doctrines. In the realm of Indian literature the Rama story was in vogue about 400 BC. It is evident by the Tipitakas wherein occurs the Rama story in an abridged form, and the one which is different from the theme in Valmiki's Ramayana.

The allusions made to Valmiki Ramayana in the different variations of the Ramayana theme in Pali literature clearly show that Valmiki was the oldest poet of India and the first to sing the story of Rama in the epic form, and all later variations of the themes are based on the popular story of Valmiki. However, the Rama story was prevalent before Valmiki, and it is not the same story as found in Sanskrit literature which contains some variants, and therefore, it is not correct to say that Valmiki's Ramayana is based on the Pali Ramayana theme. It is evident from certain references found in Pali literature. Although Rama as God had not appeared in any literary form, yet the Chinese edition of Abhidharma mahavibhasha, famous Buddhist work, mentions the Ramayana which was composed originally in 12,000 shlokas (verses).

Sadharamasmratupakhyana (1st c.) and Kalpana manditika (AD 300) by Kumaratala also mention the Ramayana. Besides these, 'Dasharatha Jataka' and 'Anamaka Jataka' in Jatakatthavannana provide a framework of the Rama story. It is said that these two Jatakas are originally outlined in the 'Khuddakanikaya' of the Suttapitaka. The Rama story in 'Dasharatha Jataka' is at variance with the popular version of the story as narrated by Valmiki and the Jaina poets. It is said that Buddha narrated the story of 'Dasharatha Jataka' to console an anguished man whose father had died. The story is like this: Dasharatha, the King of Varanasi, had 16,000 queens. The chief queen bore him two sons named Rama pandita and Lakshmana pandita and a daughter named Sita. After the death of the chief queen, another queen gave birth to a son named Bharata. The queen wanted Bharata to become king. Sensing danger, the king persuaded Rama and Lakshmana to go into exile. Both the brothers went to the forest taking their sister along with them. After nine years Dasharatha died. Bharata could not ascend the throne because of opposition from ministers. Bharata found Rama in the forest and requested him to return home, but Rama refused the throne and told Bharata to go back. Rama returned to Varanasi after three years and was accorded a hearty welcome by the people.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In Anamaka Jataka, Rama, apprehending trouble from his maternal uncle, goes to the forest, abdicating the throne of his own free will. It narrates the episodes of the exile of Rama and Sita, the abduction of Sita, Jatayu's death, war with Bali who fled seeing Rama, construction of the bridge over the ocean, etc.

Thus we find different versions of the Rama story in Pali literature.

D.S.

RAMAYANA THEME (Sanskrit). The permeation of the Ramayana in the later Sanskrit literature can only be compared with the Creator's immanence in his creation. Valmiki, according to the Indian literary tradition, is an 'adi kavi' (the first poet), and his Ramayana is rightly regarded as an 'adi kavya', the first poem. It is the precursor of all later literary forms—poems, dramas, 'champus'. The later poets drew freely upon it for their ornate style. As Keith wrote, 'Imitation in detail of the Ramayana was frequent and patent, and its language and verse technique deeply affected the whole of the history of the Kavya.'

The popularity of the Rama-story can be inferred from its presence not only in the Mahabharata, the sister epic, but also in the earlier Bauddha and Jaina traditions. The 'Ramopakhyana' in the Mahabharata shows that the author knew the full text of the Ramayana available in his time with all its seven 'kandas'.

As far as the Puranas are concerned, there is hardly a Purana or an Upapurana that has not got a long or short narrative of the Ramayana.

The influence of Valmiki on classical Sanskrit writers is wide and unparalleled. Valmiki's Rama, a repository of exalted character and noble qualities, presented an ideal hero to later poets and playwrights.

The earliest poet to draw ideas and expressions from the Ramayana is Ashvaghosha (1st c. AD) in whose Buddhacharita and Saundarananda one can easily notice its conspicuous influence. Kalidasa (4th c. AD) is the greatest admirer and follower of Valmiki. The titles of his poems,namely Raghuvamsha and Kumarasambhava, are taken from the Ramayana itself. He has presented the Ramayana story in cantos IX-XV of his Raghuvamsha. In canto XII he gives a rapid and brief summary, in Valmiki's shloka (metre), of almost the entire Ramayana. In his other poems and dramas also one can easily find parallel expressions, similes and ideas. His Meghaduta was inspired by a similar Ramayana motif—Hanuman carrying Rama's message to Sita.

Bhatti (6th c. AD) chose the Ramayana to illustrate rules of Panini's grammar in his poem Ravanavadha where he has woven interesting details of the Rama-story. Ravanavadha is further important, as it forms the basis of the Javanese Ramayana, known as Kakawin, which represents partly close and partly free translation of it.

Kumaradasa's Janakiharana, composed in Lanka (6th c. AD) is the next Ramayana poem. In Bengal Abhinanda wrote (AD 900) his incomplete poem Ramacharita which contains a few story-elements not found in the original.

Kshemendra of Kashmir (11th c. AD) presents in his Ramayanamanjari a complete summary of the Ramayana in 6400 stanzas, reproducing the very words of Valmiki. The same poet gives a shorter version of the Rama story, while describing the incarnation of Rama, in 293 verses, in another poem Dashavataracharita.

The Ramayana champu of king Bhoja (11th c. AD) is a work in prose and verse covering the Rama-story up to the end of the 'Sundarakanda'. The 'Yuddhakanda' was supplemented by Lakshmana Bhatta, and Rajachudamani Dikshita wrote Yuddhakanda champu. The last, 'Uttarakanda', was written by Venkataraja.

By the 11th century a new type of poetry, known as 'Shlesha-kavyas', came into vogue. Sandhyakaranandi (11th c.) wrote his Ramacharita simultaneously to relate in 220 'arya' verses the story of Rama and the history of king Ramapala of Bengal with the help of paronomasia. The poet proudly calls himself 'Kalikala' Valmiki.

This Shlesha-kavya device later became very popular among the poets, and we have many such poems known as 'dvisandhana kavyas'.

Dhananjaya, a Digambara Jaina poet, wrote (between 1123 and 1140) Raghava-pandaviya in 18 cantos. Here each verse is related equally to the story of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata at the same time.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Another poem of the same name is from the pen of Kaviraja (12th c.) in 13 cantos in the same style. Raghava-naishadhiya of Haradatta Suri (not before 17th c.) likewise related the stories of Rama and Nala. Venkatadhvari (first half of 17th c.) in his poem Yadava-raghaviya narrates in 300 stanzas the stories of the Ramayana and the Bhagavata simultaneously.

This style further developed into a use of treble punning, an example of which is found in the Raghava-pandava-yadaviya of Chidambara (17th c.), narrating at the same time stories of the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata.

Coming to the dramas drawing upon the Ramayana for their theme, one will find the impact of the Ramayana on Bhasa (3rd or 4th c. AD), the first dramatist who has given us two Ramayana plays, the Pratima and the Abhisheka. The former dramatises in seven acts almost the entire Ramayana in brief. Its interest lies, however, mainly in ennobling the characters of Bharata and Kaikeyi, the latter presented as une femme incomprise. The Abhisheka, on the other hand, justifies, the title by presenting the coronation of Sugriva in the beginning and that of Rama in the end.

Many more dramas based on the Ramayana theme were written during a period of the three centuries between Bhasa and Bhavabhuti. But the excellent plays of the latter threw into oblivion all the dramas written before him. His incomplete Mahaviracharita presents the earlier life of Rama and is not so appealing as his excellent drama Uttararamacharita, depicting the later life of the Ramayana hero. The lyrical poetry and the powerful delineation of pathos in it have earned him a place next to Kalidasa as a dramatist.

The Anargharaghava of Murari (9th-10th c. AD) dramatises the traditional narrative of the Ramayana with slight modification. It has earned the title Bala Valmiki for its author.

The Bala-Ramayana of Rajashekhara (9th-10th c. AD) presents in ten acts the entire Ramayana story up to Rama's coronation. His style and treatment, it is said, like Murari's, are chaotically poetic, rather than sensibly dramatic.

Ashcharyachudamani of Shaktibhadra (9th c. AD) employs a pretty device, with the magic crest-jewel of Sita as a token of recognition. With the Abhisheka of Bhasa it imitates the 'kudiyattam' style of the traditional Sanskrit theatre of Kerala.

The Kundamala of Dhiranaga, likewise, introduces the device of a garland of 'kunda' flowers as a token of recognition and is modelled on Bhavabhuti's Uttararama-charita.

Kshemendra, the author of Ramayanamanjari, has also written a play Kanakajanaki, named after the golden image of Sita with which Rama performed the 'Ashvamedha' sacrifice.

The Prasannaraghava of Jayadeva (12th c. AD) is the best known of the later Ramayana plays. The interesting spectacular scene of the five river-goddesses gathered round the ocean forms a novel feature in the drama.

Ramabhadra Dikshita (17th c. AD) wrote Janakiparinaya after the style of Bhavabhuti, Murari and Rajashekhara. His contemporary Mahadeva's Adbhutadarpana deals with the battle of Lanka. A magic mirror dominates the whole play and justifies the title.

Unmatta-raghava, a one-act play, called Prekshanaka by Bhaskara, describes Rama's maddened soliloquies on Sita's transformation into a gazelle by the curse of Durvasa. Another one-act play, Dutangada by Subhata, which calls itself a 'chhayanataka' is not a shadow-play, but is so-called because its author has drawn many of his verses from other Rama-plays and therefore the play bears the chhaya, semblance, of other dramas.

The huge, anonymous and semi-dramatic Mahanataka or Hanumannataka deserves a special mention. It is an anthology of verses culled out of the well-known Ramayana plays and arranged in the form of a play by supplying a few stage directions, obviously for the recital of a Ramayana pageant or shadow-play.

The Rama-poems and the Rama-plays continued during the later periods and are written even in the modern times.

The Brihaddharma purana (13th-14th c. AD) eulogises the Ramayana as a source and model for all 'Itihasa-purana' (historical-mythical) literature. Valmiki, on being commanded by Brahma to compose the Mahabharata, promises him that he will pass on the eternal seeds of poetry (kavyabijam sanatanam) to Vyasa and other poets. The enormous influence of the Ramayana on classical Sanskrit literature composed afterwards shows how the spirit of Valmiki permeates the entire field of Sanskrit literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, History of Sanskrit Literature; V.Raghavan, The Ramayana in Sanskrit Literature, The Ramayana Tradition in Asia, The Greater Ramayana; M. Krishnamachariar, History of Sanskrit Literature.

Ar.J.

RAMAYYA PANTULU, JAYANTI (Telugu; b. 1869, d.1964) was born at Mukishwaram in Amalapuram taluk, and is the founder of Andhra Sahitya Parishat and the chief compiler of Suryaraya Andhra nighantuvu (Telugu dictionary, named after its patron, Surya Rao, Raja of Pithapuram). This Nighantuvu is still the most authoritative and comprehensive lexicon, the only 'encyclopaedic dictionary' in the Telugu language.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Jayanti started his professional career as a teacher at a Middle School. After a while he joined civil service. Starting as a scribe in the District Magistrate's court, he retired as a Presidency Magistrate. Later, he became a member of the legislative assembly of the composite Madras State. In 1937 he was awarded the title of Kala Prapurna by the Andhra University.

The Government of India entrusted him with editing some eight hundred ancient edicts, concerning the Andhra country.

He was a champion of the literary style (granthika) against the colloquial (gramya or vyavaharika), his convinçing argument being that the language of literature should have a standard diction and must not be corrupted or confused by varying dialects spoken in the various regions of the Telugu country.

His works include Andhra vajnmaya vikasa vaikhari (The development of Telugu literature) and Muktishwara shatakam (A hundred verses in praise of Lord Muktishwara). He translated the Sanskrit books Amaruka kavya and Uttararamacharita and wrote two versions of the Ramayana. He contributed about fifty essays of historical and literary interest to Andhra sahitya parishat patrika and published in English Defence of Literary Telugu, Dravidian Lexicography, Southern School of Telugu Literature and Krishnaraya.

R.M.C.

RAMBHAMANJARI (Prakrit) is a play modelled on the structure of Karpuramanjari. Its plot develops as follows:

Act I: King Jaitrachandra and his queens are very happy as the season of spring has set in. However, there ensues an unseemly squabble between the jester and the maid Karpurika over a literary contest. The jester defeated, pours out vulgar abuses on Karpurika and exits in a huff only to re-enter with Narayanadasa and Rambhamanjari in her wedding dress. The king is fascinated by the bewitching beauty of Rambhamanjari and she, in her turn, is charmed by the king's handsome figure. The jester, acting as a priest, joins the two lovers in wedlock. Along with the other queens Rambhamanjari is sent to the harem by the king.

Act II: The king learns that Rambhamanjari is personally taken care of by queen Rajimati. A letter from the beloved avowing her passion heightens the king's passion. The jester narrates to him his strange dream which indicates the early union of the two lovers. Karpurika secretly brings about the meeting of the lovers. They enjoy amorous pleasures. The queen arrives and the lovers are forced to disperse.

Act III: The love-lorn queen welcomes the king and after hearty amorous pleasures permits him the company of Rambhamanjari.

The play imitates Karpuramanjari in several respects. We have here the same celebration of spring, a similar squabble between the jester and the maid, the jester's fantastic dream and the heroine's love-letter, all reminding us of the original story. However, Nayachandra's Prakrit verses, perhaps, lack the charm and freshness of Rajashekhara's Karpuramanjari.

V.M.K.

RAMBRIKSHA BENIPURI (Hindi; b. 1899, d.1967) was born in Benipur, a village in Muzaffarpur which gave him his pseudonym 'Benipuri'. When he was only four his mother died, and a year later he lost his father. Consequently, he spent the next fifteen years at his maternal uncle's house in Banshipachra village. The natural surroundings of this village are reflected in a myriad descriptions of nature in his works. His early education was completed in this village where listening to and reading the Ramayana stirred in him an inclination for literary creativeness. The spartan life he lived was the result of the years he had spent in this village.

He migrated to the city where in a new environment he developed an abiding involvement with nationalism and journalism. At the early age of sixteen he was married to Uma Rani. One can trace the influence of his father-in-law, an active participant in the freedom movement, on his life and letters. In 1921, following Mahatma Gandhi's visit to Muzaffarpur, Benipuri himself became actively involved in the freedom struggle and spent several years in jail.

The literary career of Benipuri began with the third decade of the present century. His early writings reflect the influence of Hazariprasad Dwivedi. His successive writings exhibit an intermingling of mysticism, naturalism and new experiments in the Hindi literature of his time, subsequently leading to his full flowering as a writer during India's attainment of freedom. In fact, it is in the context of India's struggle for freedom that his writings have to be finally evaluated. His works mirror the Satyagrah Movement of 1930-1947, the role played by the different organisations like the Socialist Party, Muslim League and Azad Hind Fauj Army. He was as familiar with the problem of the labourers as with the conflict between tradition and society. All this finds a place in his literary work indicating the farsightedness of a thinker.

He was essentially a writer with a progressive personality and wanted to create a new society, while being opposed to the traditional values of the age. This is one of the major thrusts of his writings.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In 1951 he went to England to take part in the Festival of Britain, and travelled all over Europe which resulted in the writing of a European diary. In his writings Benipuri used every literary form. Irked by the faulty and ineffective children's literature in Hindi, he carefully studied such literature in English and wrote some highly readable books for children. He himself admitted that some of his works were written as bread-winners, but by nature he was a revolutionary. While his works reflect the age in which he lived, there is also evident a desire for ushering in a new era. In his works a writer's individual sensibility and his social consciousness are intertwined with a poet's idealism. His major works are: Mati ki murten (Sketches, 1946); Ambapali (Play, 1947); Jaiprakash (Biography, 1947); Prabhakar (Play, 1948); Netradan, Sita ki maa, Sanghmitra (One-act plays, 1948-50); Gehun aur gulab (Essays, 1950); Zanjiren aur diwaren (Autobiography, 1956); Chita ke phul, Bete hon to aise, Betaian hon to aisee (Short stories); Shatranga dhanush (published posthumously, 1975). He also edited a number of magazines, such as Janata, Nayee dhara, Chunnu-munnu. His translated works are Don ke kinare, Rabindra bharati and Tulips.

M.Jy.

RAMCHANDRA (Urdu; b.1821, d. 1880), one of the greatest Urdu prose writers, was born at Delhi. He was a brilliant student and had a scholarship throughout his schooling. His father died when he was nine years old, and he married the blind daughter of a rich man at the age of eleven.

Ramchandra was appointed a teacher in Delhi College after he completed his studies and helped the college authorities in establishing a vernacular translation society, which was entrusted with the work of translating books of science and other disciplines into Urdu. He brought out a monthly journal, Favaid-e-nazirin, in 1846. He also started publication of another magazine, a weekly, Qiran-us-sadain, at the instance of Sprenger, Principal of the Delhi College. In these journals Ramchandra published not only his translations of seven articles, but also his original writings on current topics. He wrote in a lucid and simple style.

Ramchandra's contribution to the development of Urdu prose is without parallel. He was the first to write serious and thought-provoking articles on subjects of great social significance, in simple and chaste style. He introduced to Urdu prose a new type of rationalism hitherto unknown. He was a pioneer of Urdu journalism and established it on solid grounds. Two of his pupils, Zakaukah and Nazir Ahmad, achieved great fame as masters of Urdu prose. Ramchandra also tried his hand at religious subjects and wrote a number of works on them. Ramchandra is regarded as one of the greatest and most versatile prose writers of Urdu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Abdul Haq, The Late Delhi College (1945); Ahsan Marahram, History of Urdu Prose (1930); S.R. Kidwai, Master Ramchandra (1961); Syeda Jafar, Master Ramchandra (1961).

A.H.

RAMI REDDY, DUVVURI (Telugu; b. 1895, d. 1947), born at Gudur in Nellore district of Andhra Pradesh, was among the first poets in Telugu to shift the subject of poetry from the traditional to the contemporary. In place of kings, their consorts and their courtiers, the poet chose as the heroes of his poetry the farmer leading a hard life in the village, the old untouchable woman, and the simple shepherds. A farmer himself, Reddy was intensely aware of the promise and poignancy of life on the village farm and he evoked it with admirable authenticity. Rami Reddy did not have formal education, but through his own efforts he acquired mastery over Sanskrit, Bengali, Tamil, Urdu, English, Persian, French and German. He started composing poetry in his nineteenth year and wrote a large volume of poetry, plays, critical studies, diaries and translations. Apart from literature, he tried his hand at painting, sculpture, and film-direction also.

Nalajaramma (Martyrdom of Nalajaramma, 1918) is his first important poetic work. Vanakumari (Child of the forest, 1918) brought him fame. His Krishivaludu (The farmer, 1919) describing the farmer, the seasons and the Indian way of rural life carved for him a niche in the world of modern poets. Kadapati vidkolu (The last farewell, 1924), considered to be his literary masterpiece, is a work of 150 verses. Nakshatramala (1921), Bhagnahridayamu, Jaladangana (1924), Kavi-ravi, Matrishatakamu, Musali maleta, Naivedyamu, Palitakeshamu, Prathama kavitvam, Yanakalapu varichelu, Yuvakasvapnamu are his other poetic works. Inspired by the national movement, he wrote Ratnampata, Svatantryaratham, and Matrishatakamu.

Karshakavilasamu is his first play. Sitavanavasamu (1921), Kumbharana (The story of Mirabai, 1924), Madhavavijayam (1925) and Congressvala (1935) received some recognition.

Rasikajananandamu, Svapnashleshamu, Ahalyanuragam, Krishnarayabharam (all written during 1916-18),

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Telugu kavitalo kotta tennulu, Radio vyasamulu, Khandakavyamulu and Vyasamulu (1935) are collections of his essays. His articles on painting and pictorial art were published in Kala.

Rami Reddy's poetic contribution lies in elevating the common farmer in Krishivaludu (1919), the old untouchable woman in Musali maleta and the simple shepherds in Vanakumari as the subjet matter of poetry. He displayed patriotic sentiments in poems like 'Swatantryarathamu' and 'Matrumandiramu', and unreserved religious devotion in 'Naivedyamu'. As a poet who grew up in the lap of nature, he presented an impressive portrait of nature in its sweet and frightful moods in works like Jaladangana. Even in Krishivaludu, the poet is concerned with an imaginative description of the change of seasons in the countryside, besides the presentation of the daily chores of the farmer. The poetic element involved in such evocative descriptions saves his work from being a mere photographic presentation of the rural scene of India. His plays deal with puranic themes as in Sitavanavasamu and contemporary themes as in Congresswala.

As a competent translator, Reddy rendered into Telugu Omar Khayyam's Rubaiyat under the title, Panasala, directly from Persian. He also rendered Sheikh Sadi's Gulistan and Bostan into Telugu, besides writing a volume of poems, The Vioce of the Reed, in English. Reddy also wrote some critical essays like 'Kavitvatatwa nirupanamu', 'Tikkana' and 'Miabaib A Tagedi', included in his volume of essays. His works have been collected and printed in seven volumes under the title Kavikokila granthavali. Incidentally, Kavikokila was the title conferred on him by the Andhra Mahasabha in 1920.

S.S.P.R.

RAMKUMAR (Hindi; b. 1924) was born at Simla and did his M.A. in Economics from Delhi University. Besides being a Hindi writer, he is a painter of distinction. He lived in Paris from 1950 to 1952 and was a member of a group of young programme artists. At present he has settled in Delhi.

Ramkumar has written little, compared to his output as a painter; but low-keyed and subdued as his short-stories and novels are, they arise out of the same keen perception and sensitivity which has make him one of the best Indian landscape painters. Perhaps it is due, in some way, to the fact that he is basically a painter, that his stories have a haunting sense of the void perceptible in between the words. Silence often becomes eloquent in his short stories, most of which are about lonely, broken men and women, cut off from their fellow humans by the peculiar situations they find themselves in. The artists in the story 'Khali canvas' and the dreamy emigre in 'Jeanine' are such characters.

What holds his characters on to life eventually is a lingering, disinherited humanism, a sort of wish-it-were-true loyalty to the ordinary dreams and longings of a simple human being. He leaves the earlier satirical attitude of stories like 'Picnic', and heads for a more rugged and economical use of the language which constitutes his peculiar strength.

The world of Ramkumar's stories and novels is a precariously balanced one. If all things are transient and man is a puppet in the hands of time and fate, one may ask what the alternative is. What these stories and novels seem to suggest is that what is possible for a human being to hold and savour is a second best kind of time, a mixture of memory and the immediate present. His works include: Novels: Ghar ghar tute, Der saber; Collections of Short stories: Husna bibi aur anya kahaniyan, Ek chehra, Samudra, Jhinguron ke svar, Meri priya kahaniyan; Travelogue: Europe ke sketch.

M.P.

RAMTANU LAHIRI O TATKALIN BANGASAMAJ (Bengali) by Sibnath Sastri is a biography of Ramtanu Lahiri (1813-1898) and the history of the socio-cultural movements that took place in the 19th century Bengal. In this comprehensive book, comprising fifteen chapters, Sibnath has interwoven the life-story of Ramtanu and the various cultural movements which helped shape a new and modern Bengal.

Ramtanu was born in a respectable Brahmin family of Krishnanagar (Nadia), which was closely connected with the royal family of Krishnachandra Majumdar. In the first chapter Sibnath gives the detailed history of the royal family and the geographical and social picture of Krishnanagar of that time.

To avoid the degrading influence of the so-called elites of Krishnanagar, Ramtanu was sent to Calcutta for his studies. He was admitted, as free student, to the school of David Hare, and thereafter as a meritorious student to Hindu College. Here he came under the direct influence of the young teacher, Derozio. Chapters 2-5 describe Ramtanu's school and college education, along with the lives and activities of Rammohun Roy, Dwarakanath Tagore, David Hare, Radhakanta Deb, Ramkamal Sen and Motilal Sil. The establishment of Brahmo Samaj by Rammohun Roy, Bentinck's enactment preventing the Sati (1829) and Derozio's character-building activities as teacher have been narrated in these chapters.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In the next three chapters Sibnath covers the events of the fourth and fifth decades of the 19th century, which include the activities of Ramtanu's Derozian friends.

The widow-remarriage movement and various other reformist activities of Iswarchandra Vidyasagar and his followers around the sixth decade have been narrated in the next two chapters. Some other events included here are the Sepoy Mutiny and its impact on the Bengali intellectuals, the 'Black Act' movement of the British residing in India, and the movement for spreading women's education. Other personalities covered in the chapters are Iswarchandra Gupta, Aksaykumar Datta, Harishchandra Mukherji, Madhusudan Dutta and Dinabandhu Mitra.

In the tenth and eleventh chapters he describes the cultural movement of Bengal during the seventh decade, covering such personalities as Keshabchandra Sen, Bankimchandra Chatterji, Dwarakanath Vidyabhusan, Mahendralal Sarkar, and Nabagopal Mitra. The role of the journals like Tattvabodhini patrika (1843), Somprakash (1858) and Bangadarshan (1872) has also been described in these chapters.

In the twelfth and thirteenth chapters Sibnath covers the main events of the last two decades of the 19th century and the first four years of the current century, and we learn about the activities of the younger leaders like Anandamohan Basu, Surendranath Banerji, Kaliprasanna Ghosh, Nabakanta Chatterji, Durgamohan Das, Dwarakanath Ganguli and Manomohan Ghosh. The social, religious and political events of this period covered here are anti-Kulinism and anti-poligamy movement, movement against addiction to drinking and immoral life, the ideological controversy among different groups of Brahmo leaders, the national movement and the political activities of the Bharat Sabha. The Bengal Partition movement too has been touched here.

In the last two chapters the author gives an intimate description of the last phase in the life of Ramtanu. It is a noble life, tuned to free rational thinking and deep faith in God.

The author of this encyclopaedic book had a rare opportunity to come in close contact with Ramtanu, Vidyasagar, Mahendralal Sarkar, Bankimchandra, Keshabchandra and other outstanding personalities of the century. One who intends to study the socio-religious trends in the ninteenth century Bengal would find it rewarding to go through this invaluable book, written in a lucid and interesting style.

Ni.Se.

RANA SURAT SINGH (Punjabi) is an epical poem of great metaphysical depth by Bhai Vir Singh (1872-1957), considered to be his magnum opus. It encompasses the problems of self identiy, faith and salvation. Written partly in the form of a medieval dream allegory, its 35 cantos of varying length, carrying 14396 lines of blank verse often with the middle of the line rhyming, make it the longest poem of its kind in Punjabi poetry. To what extent Bhai Vir Singh was aware of the Western models such as The Romance of the Rose, The Divine Comedy and The Faereie Queene, is difficult to tell, though certain conventions, motifs and forms of narration and style do suggest some correspondence. Clearly, the poet had trained himself for a poetic enterprise of great pitch and magnitude. Though wider in import, the poem is securely grounded in Sikh thought and theology. To that extent it is as conscious a poetic exposition of Sikh vision and way of life as Dante's Divine Comedy is of the vision and ways of Christendom. Besides, there are other close analogies that make Rana Surat Singh a long mystic poem involving the Vision Beatific in complete comformity with Sikh scriptural hermeneutics. However, Bhai Vir Singh's erudition and vast scholarship never outweigh the poetic vehicle. One the contrary, they are wholly subsumed in a verse of unparalleled dignity, beauty and splendour.

The poem, in true epic style, launches the story in medias res and reconstructs the earlier and formative events as it proceeds full sail to describe the spiritual voyage of the protagonist, Rani Raj Kaur, a widow, left in utter desolation of heart and spirit, following the martyrdom in battlefield of her princely spouse, Rana Surat Singh. As the poem opens, we find her in a state of deep mourning and shock. Seated in solitude by the Samadhi of her late lord, raised in the form of a marble mausoleum on a hillock, she is a soul in great travail. And that's how she broods over her miseries and misfortune:

> Thou wert pure light, O lord:
> And I stood blind to that aspect;
> My poor, soiled wit
> Lingered over thy flesh alone:

Besides the masoleum, Rani Raj Kaur has got erected a life-size statue of her departed husband. In the midst of all her searchings and strivings, she has, however, shown utter disregard for her duties as a reigning sovereign, and her Rajput mother, Rani Chander Kaur, employs all manners of strategies to get her immersed in palace life and court protocols and mystique. But the young widow has no eye for any festivity, no ear for any music save the one she imbibes from the celestial regions where her lord and master dwells. Mother-daughter relations, and the lyricism of their sacred sentiment, form not an inconspicuous part of this elaborate allegory. If Rani Raj Kaur symbolises the eternal yearnings of the pilgrim-soul for reunion with the lord, her mother is the voice of common humanity struggling for an authentic purchase on life. Long soliloquies and long colloquies ensue, though there are few psychological depths or dramatic moments as such. The aim here is different. What we witness is not the drama of a young attractive widow,. beset by sexual anxieties and doubts, but the lyrical lament of a soul in a state of loneliness and separation. The protagonist is hardly a creature of flesh and bone; she moves through this spiritual romance more like a a wraith in muslin, a disembodied self suspended in space.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Nursing a perpetual vision of her dead lord, Rani Raj Kaur has many a moment of illumination and insight. In an earlier canto called 'The Flight', she is shown as a winged spirit that leaves these mundane regions and surveys the world below from ethereal heights.

> I felft as though I had dropped
> My bodily vestures and risen
> Skyward in a flight hence,
> Like a kite that
> Scours the skles beyond!
> Lighter than a flower,
> Lighter than the wind, I lay;
> And I shone like a diamond,
> Pure and serene
> And I flew unstopped, unawares!

Here in this 'flight', she accosts a beautiful damsel, 'my other half', as he puts it, and together they fly out to the regions of 'Gyankhand', 'Sharamkhand', 'Karamkhand' and 'Sachkhand'—all stages of spiritual heirarchy in Sikh theology. The journey from region to region is reminiscent of Dante's several 'circles', though unlike Dante, Bhai Vir Singh shows little interest in contemporary events and personages. All these dream-figures remain draped in a bright halo or haze, and they do not have the particularity and concreteness of Dante's characters. At last, Rani Raj Kaur is vouchsafed a sight of her lord nestling close to the throne of the Ten Sikh Gurus in 'Sachkhand' or 'The Land of Truth'. Another central canto recounts the secret and arduous journey of the young widow and her trusted maid, Radhika, to the Fairy Palace. Here from the lips of a saintly old woman, she learns something about the deep mystery of Rana Surat Singh's mystc personality. One of the lessons driven home is about the eternal need for religious congregations. And armed with the secret epistles of her late lord, Rani Raj Kaur returns to her palace which had been thrown into a state of turmoil following her precipitate flight. The last ten cantos veer round the theme of 'satsang' or 'the congregation', and through Platonic concepts and homilectic devices, the widowed-queen is at last made to realise the folly of idol-worship and protracted mourning. In the concluding canto, 'Thanksgiving', she affirms the Sikh ideal of living valiantly and authentically, morally and meaningfully in this mundane world. All concepts of 'moksha' or redemption are related to the present life of effort and enterprise. All spiritual states referred to as heavenly regions are actually coextensive states of the human mind, and are simultaneously present in and around it. To discipline one's life, mind and imagination in the service of a higher dream is to achieve the Sikh 'nirvana'.

Written as something of a Sikh Divine Comedy, Rana Surat Singh makes a consistent and continual use of apposite verses from the Gurubani by way of structural-thematic device. Apart from introducing blank verse (with skilful internal rhymes, half-rhymes and slant rhymes), the great poem is memorable for its scenes of nature in its moments of serene charm and beauty. There is a water-colour quality about most of the opening scenes in different cantos. The touch is impressionistic, lyrical and lambent. It is as though the vision on the other side of life were to be revealed only fitfully through the pink onion-peals of reality!

D.S.M.

RANANGAN (Marathi) is a novel written by Vishram Bedekar, first published in 1939.

Chakradhar Vidvans, one of the two chief characters of the novel, is the narrator of the story. A rich, well-to-do person, Chakradhar makes a pleasure-trip to London. After enjoying two years' stay, he is returning to India. After a brief sojourn at Paris, he is on a voyage from Naples to Bombay. In Paris he comes in contact with an English lady who unfortunately was given to prostitution during the war. She tells her own story to Chakradhar which throws light on the social and political atmosphere of the war days.

Chakradhar now comes in contact with Frauline Harta Van, a Jew immigrant working as Assistant Manager in Nobor Company. Harta reveals that she is in love with Franz, the German Manager of the company. Those were the days of war. The Germans believed that the Jews had brought their country to disrepute, and therefore all the Jews in Germany had to be expelled. Harta, with her old mother, has to leave. Afraid of torture by gestapo, her lover Franz avoids her company. Thus her love bears no fruit. A dejected young soul, she comes in contact with Chakradhar. Being a vivacious, young woman she is drawn to him and they get involved in a close relationship. The ten-day journey ends at Bombay for Chakradhar where he disembarks, but before reaching Shanghai, her destination, Harta commits suicide at Hongkong as she is unable to bear her lover's separation. The novel is based on a new theme which created a flutter among ordinary readers and critics. Its characterization, especially that of Harta, was widely appreciated. Further, the novel was a bold experiment in its treatment of man-woman relationship. It also invited attention to the problem of the Jews and their ill-treatment at the hands of the Nazis. The novel became a landmark in the development of the Marathi novel and won wide recognition for Bedekar as a novelist.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A.R.A.

RANATLYA KAVITA (Marathi), a volume of nature poems by N.D. Mahanor, is the poet's first slender collection of sixty-three poems, published by Popular Prakashan in 1967. The consistency of style, tone, mood and technique makes it a tipsy celebration of intense sensuous experiences of a farmer and lover of nature for whom the lush wood is the be all and the end all of his creative sensibility. The poet is, as it were, metamorphosed into the 'world of the green language' of the farm and the wood. All the multitudinous, Protean forms, smells, colours and touches tempt and inebriate the poet. Here's God's plenty, replete with a pageant of colours and rainbow of moods, such as the yellow bamboos that sing, the deep parrot-green horizons, the golden twigs and tendrils, the line of purple clouds that float in the river, the saffron of berries, the vermilion shade on the waters that reflect frozen shadows, the purple sky and the purple wood, the peacock-blue shadows, and the saffron smells in the fields.

The plethoric imagery is firmly sensuous and willingly gives way to candid sensuality as the following umpteen references confirm: a girl making an offering of her young body in the open country; an orgiastic love-making in the midst of jowar fields; the whole farm aflame with love, and the mind aflame with dreams of mating; a young 'bhil' girl impassioned for mating in the wood, braving the flowers with her young fair breasts. It is as if the whole naked wood burns in the turmeric fire of love. The imagery is largely tactile, olfactory and visual.

One of the most frequently recurring expressive devices is animation and personification: the trees are invariably naked; the leaves smile; the tamarind is pithy ripe; the jowar is pregnant; the banana tree is in childbirth; the grass snuggles sensuously the feet of a young girl, the young jowar trembles in the embrace of the lover; the grass whispers clandestinely to the vermilion sunshine; the inebriated wind plays with the midriff garment of the young girl; the moon and the clouds play in zimma dance with the wind and the trees, and so on. This helps the total experience to come alive.

The entire collection offers a surfeit of sensations which is totally unwordsworthian or amoral in tone and vision, an impassioned uninhibited expression of which is unprecedented in the poetry of the other prominent Marathi poets like 'Balkavi' (Tryambak Bapuji Thombre), B.B.Borkar, Mangesh Padagonkar, etc. Nature here is a thoroughly liberating experience in which the poet luxuriates frankly and fondly and, in fact, often identifies himself with it. A landmark achievement for a poet so young, Ranatlya kavita remains a rich and vibrant hymn sung to the unfailing, passionate and compassionate companionship of the wood.

Sh.Ch.

RANCHHOD (Gujarati; 18th c.) was essentially a devotional poet who has to his credit such poems as 'Ranchhodjino garbo', 'Barmas', 'Chaturi', 'Dashavatarlila', 'Nashiketa akhyan', 'Radhavivah' and some padas on Krishna's love sports. He, like other Krishna bhakti poets, sang of the various moods of love-lorn gopis, their yearning for Krishna, their pangs of separation and their union with Him. In his 'Ranchohdjino garbo' he has made use of the garba form, which is often used in Shakti literature to narrate how Krishna who was in the temple at Dwarka shifted to Dakore for the sake of his devotee Bodana. In 'Radhavivah', he has described the wedding ceremony of Radha and Krishna. He is popular for his poem, a hymn to 'Annadeva'. He is the only poet in mediaeval Gujarati literature, who accepts the reality of this world and highlights the importance of food which he regards as God. He was the first person to write on the genre of short story, pointing out the difference between the novel and the short story. He also compared the characters of Kalidasa and Shakespeare, which was the first attempt at comparative study. He also translated the Bengali drama Ashrumati by Jyotindranath Tagore into Gujarati.

C.M.

RANCHHOD BHAI UDAYRAM (Gujarati; b. 1837, d. 1923) was a dramatist who was able to fulfil his dream of evolving a new stage, dispensing with some of the elements of folk drama, Bhavai, which he was exposed to as a child in his village. He had his schooling and collegiate education at Ahmedabad. He had left his village with a dream and worked for its fulfilment with a missionary zeal. In order to establish a stage where decent plays could be staged, he first wrote a play according to his ideal and then persuaded rich people and drama companies to give him support so that he could refine the taste of the theatre-going public. His first play Harishchandra was staged by Victoria Natak Mandali, and it took the theatre-goers by storm. His second play Nala-Damayanti based on mythology was also very successful on the stage. As professional dramatic companies tried to exploit him, he with the help of the traditional actors of folk drama staged his third play, Lalita dukh darshak (Depiction of the woes of Lalita), based on the theme of unequal marriage and tragedy resulting therefrom. The play became highly popular and won him great laurels. He wrote fourteen plays, and all of them for the stage, but it was Lalita dukh darshak which earned him a permanent place among the dramatists of Gujarat. He also translated two dramas of Kalidasa, Malvikagnimitra and Vikramovarshiya. He also wrote a treatise on drama Natya prakash (Light on drama) in which he discussed the dramatic elements of the east and the west. His Ran pingal (book on metres) gives a detailed history of the evolution of metres. Ranchhodbhai's main contribution lies in creating and refining the taste of the theatre-going public.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

C.M.

RANGA BINNAPA (Kannada) is a collection of 1212 musings and homilies in poetic-prose modelled on the 'vachanas', written by S.V. Ranganna. It is the work of a life time, containing the crystallised wisdom of a dedicated scholar who was also an uncanny observer of men and manners. Some of the musings are succinct and pithy while some are long lucubrations woven around anecdotes and imaginary conversations. Since they were written over a long duration of time, they were collected drop by drop, gleaned sheaf by sheaf. The writing is uneven, and at times tends to become trite and tiresome. But the best of these gem-like sayings deserve to be 'chewed and digested'. 'Life is like a mighty book in two volumes—the one is full of zigs and puzzles, the other contains the keys, the solutions. But where is it, ay, where?' 'It's better to die standing erect on your feet than to live crawling on your belly'. 'If half the efforts of those who are descending into Hell are directed otherwise, they could ascend to Heaven'. 'It is no shame if you slip and fall, but it is, if you do not stand up'. 'The master promised a warm rug to the servant. That's all. The warmth of the promise was all that lasted'.

Not all the musings are serious. Some of them are amusing anecdotes like the story of Falsehood in the stolen garb of her sister Truth who has to go naked. There is also a lively colloquy between a gentleman and a blind man in which the latter teaches the other to 'see better'.

The sayings must be numbered among the books that deserve to be preserved and taken in as nourishment, in small measure like some richly dressed food. The book earned the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1965.

H.K.R.M.

RANGACHARAYA, DASARATHI (Telugu; b. 1930) is a distinguished Telugu fiction writer. He discontinued studies after the sixth class and settled at Garla, Khammam district. He wrote articles about life under the Nizam's rule and was arrested at the age of seventeen for indulging in anti-Nizam activities. He participated in the Freedom movement until the police action is September 1948 in the Hyderabad state. Later, he acquired academic qualifications (B.A., Ll.B., etc.) in the midst of adverse conditions. He compiled war songs of the Telugu poets, entitled Ranabheri (1963), written during the Chinese aggression and compiled an anthology of short stories, Ranarangam, on the Chinese aggression, translated into Telugu from different Indian languages. His Turpu tellavarindi, a radio-play written in the Telangana dialect, won him laurels from the Telugu literary circles. He received the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi award for his maiden novel, Chillara devullu (Demigods, 1969), His Modugupulu (Mahua flowers, 1971), deals with the atrocities of Nizam's henchmen on the people of the Telangana region during pre-1947 days, the rising anger of the people crystallizing into a movement and the participation of even tribals in this movement. Modugupulu was written in the spoken idiom of the Telangana region of Andhra Pradesh. All his stories have immense power and purpose. He was a member of the modern literature sub-committee of the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi. He is also associated with the Andhra Pradesh Abhyudaya Rachyitala Sangham (Progressive Writers' Association). He regularly contributes atricles on contemporary Telugu literature to leading Telugu periodicals, All India Radio, etc. He has several Telugu translations to his credit and knows Telugu, Sanskrit, Urdu, Hindi and English. His other important works are: Vivekanadudu (1960), Shakuntala (1960), Malavika (1960), Urvashi Vikramudu (1960), Mahatmudu, Shrimadramayanamu (1963), Janarangam (poems, 1965), Srimadbhagavatamu (1969), Mayajalataru (novel, 1973), Ranunnadi edinijam (novel) (1973), Janapadam (novel, 1976), Manavata (novel, 1978), Nallanagu: kathala samputi (1978), Premchand jivitam sahiti (1981).

M.C.

RANGANATHA RAMAYANA (Telugu), presumably the first Ramayana in Telugu language, is a free rendering of

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Valmiki, though there are several deviations from Valmiki's work, probably based on other allied works like Ananda Ramayana and the folk songs prevalent in those days. There is some controversy about the authorship of this work, even though the internal evidence clearly shows that a princely poet called Gona Buddha Reddi—also known as Buddha Natha, Buddha Raju or Buddha Bhupati—wrote this at the instance of his father, king Vitthal Natha. The basis for the controversy is that the title of the work is Ranganatha Ramayana and there was a poet called Chakrapani Ranganatha, more or less a contemporary of Buddha Raju. But the possibility is that Buddha Raju named his composition after his father Vitthal Natha and preferred the word Ranganatha to Vitthal Natha as both are almost synonymous and the term Ranganatha is more poetic and suggestive than the other one. This is the most accepted theory about the authorship. Based on this theory it can be easily established that this work belongs to the later half of the thirteenth century.

The twelfth and thirteenth centuries in Telugu literature witnessed a keen controversy, amounting to religious and literary conflict among Shaivite and Vaishnavite poets. But Buddha Raju, who hailed from a royal family, was confident of considerable popularity for his work. Though it is based on the story of Rama, an incarnation of vishnu, who defeated Ravana, a devotee of Shiva, the poet was sensitive enough to depict his hero, Rama, as a combination of both Vishnu and Shiva. Thus Ranganatha Ramayana became popular both in the literary circles and among the religious sects.

Further, the poet used very simple almost conversational language, and employed a popular metre called 'dwipada'. The simplicity of the language and style employed by him encouraged the puppet-showers to appropriate the text for their folk-demonstrations. The poem thus catered to the tastes of both scholars and common men. As the two-lined metre dwipada lends itself easily to musical rendering, it became immensely popular, particularly with women and the singing classes.

Barring a few innovations here and there, Ranganatha Ramayana closely follows Valmiki's version. The preliminary chapters pertaining to the conversation between Valmiki and Narada, performance of Yajna by Dasharatha, the deputation of Rama and Lakshmana in response to the desire of Vishvamitra, and the narration of fascinating stories by Vishvamitra to entertain the two princes are all directly taken from Valmiki.

One minor deviation in the episode of Ahalya is that Indra approaches the hermitage of the sage Gautama in the disguise of a cock and with an untimely call manages to isolate Ahalya from the sage who, listening to the cock's crow, leaves for the river for morning bath. The other details of the story are the same as in Valmiki.

Buddha Raju also makes a slight deviation from Valmiki in describing the pre-marital love of Sita for Rama and also the elaborate celebration of marriage. The focus, however, is more on the mutual attraction between Rama and Sita than on the social customs and rituals.

Manthara's evil motive towards Rama is given a strange explanation in Ranganatha Ramayana. It is said that Manthara was badly hit by Rama while playing with his friends just casually, though Manthara takes it seriously. The incident must have caused some physical disability in the old woman who had since then been waiting for an opportunity to take revenge on Rama.

A more interesting provocation attributed to Shurpanakha for approaching the two princes Rama and Lakshmana in Dandaka forest is that Jambumali, son of Shurpanakha, was slain by Lakshmana—by mistake—with a sword that was hanging in space near a tree where Jambumali was performing penance. It seems that the sword was given to Jambumali by Brahma as a reward for his penance, but the self-conscious youth refused to take it as it was just sent to him and not given to him personally by Brahma. That is how the sword was hanging in space and Lakshmana out of his curiosity to test the sword cut the tree and with it was cut the head of Jambumali. This enraged Shurpanakha who rushed to the hermitage where the two princes were staying. But looking at the extraordinary beauty of Rama, she forgot her grief and evil motive and craved for the tender touch of Rama or at least of Lakshmana even at the cost of her own safety and honour.

Hanuman approaches Rama with a mango fruit in his hands when he meets him for the first time as a typical devotee. Though a minor innovation, this gives a local colour to the composition.

When Rama tries to construct a bridge across the ocean, a small squirrel tries to help him to the best of its limited capacity by carrying a tail-full of sand on its back again and again. Rama observes this with love and affection and pats the squirrel on its back. According to the text, the impression of the fingers of Rama is still visible on the squirrels. This incident made 'the devotion of a squirrel' proverbial among Telugu people.

'Yuddha Kanda' covers almost half the text of Ranganatha Ramayana. The episode of Kalanemi, obstructing the path of Hanuman when the latter goes in search of the life-giving plant Sanjeevani is another deviation from Valmiki. This, is, however, based on Ananda Ramayana.

The major deviation from Valmiki, is however, the creation of two women characters—Kaikasi, the mother of Ravana and Sulochana, the wife of Indrajit. The presence of Kaikasi, the old mother who persuades Ravana again and again to refrain from the unlawful battle with Rama and surrender at his feet, adds a dignified touch to the royal family of Ravana. Even Vibhishana takes the blessings of his mother, while defecting from Ravana to take shelter under Rama. Sulochana, the wife of Indrajit, goes to the battle-field and demands the dead body of her husband. Rama appreciates her transparent devotion to her husband and grants her the justified demand, while Ravana expresses his inability to help her.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

There is no 'Uttara Kanda' in Ranganatha Ramayana. The work concludes, therefore, with the coronation ceremony of Rama. There are about 18000 verses in the six Kandas. It is not known whether the 'Uttara Kanda was' not written at all or got lost though composed.

The present text available today, however, served as a source of inspiration for the later poets who handled the Ramayana theme. As a pioneering work in Ramayana literature in Telugu, Ranganatha Ramayana has a unique place in Telugu literature..

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kumara Venugopala Swamy (ed.), Telugu vangmayamu; Mallampalli Somasekhara Sharma (ed). Ranganatha Ramayana (Cuddapah, 1957); P. Samantaka Mani, Telugu sahityamulo Ramakatha (Hyderabad, 1972); Telugu samskriti; Vijnana sarvasvam;.

I.P.R.

RANGANATHAN, Ti. Ja. (Tamil, b. 1901, d.1974) started writing in the later half of the twenties. His initial foray was in the short story form wherein he showed his early mastery of craft and form. His pioneers in this form, which came rather late in Tamil, were C. Subramania Bharati, V.V.S. Iyer, A.Madhaviah, C. Rajagopalachari, etc., who were well aware of the demands of the form, but were, however, disinclined to conform to its strict demands in practice. It was in Ranganathan's short stories that we see the form well-realised and the writing well-crafted for the first time. By 1933, when the Little magazine, Manikkodi appeared on the scene, bringing with it a renaissance in creative fiction and the flowering of many a talent in short story, Ranganathan brought out a number of short stories, each attempting to experiment with a different form and with varying contents. By the end of the forties, he had brought out two volumes of short stories, Chandanakavadi and Nondikizhi. In the fifties, however, he seems to have given up writing short stories. At a time when short stories revolved strictly round incidents, characters and emotions, Rangathan believed that 'our short stories should depict our environment, our atmosphere, our way of life', and his stories were each an embodiment of these requisites he had set for himself. Some of his stories like 'Noddikili', 'Elephant doll', and 'Chandanakavadi' would rightfully find their place in any anthology of Tamil short stories. But by some quirk of events or fate, Ranganathan is now known only for his essays and prose style. In the essays, again, he showed his mettle so different from that of others. Show of pedantry and an artificial and tortuous prose were taken to be the hall marks of creativity and scholarship in the twenties. Ranganathan was in the good company of Bharati and V. Raa. who gave a vigour, a directness, and a simplicity to Tamil prose. Ranganathan wrote essays on everything under the sun, on even commonplace subjects, to show that an absorbing piece of writing was possible on 'even trite subjects and there could be a fresh way of looking at them and make them enduring.

Rangathan had been connected with the editorial responsibilities of quite a number of magazines for varying periods of time and his last editorship was of a digest-like magazine in Tamil, called Manjari. His essays have been brought out in collections like Yosikkum velayil and Pozhudu pokku.

Ve.S

RANGANEKAR, MOTIRAM GAJANAN (Marathi; b. 1907) was a popular Marathi playwright. He started his literary career as a journalist and was editor of such popular weeklies as Tutari, Vasundhara and Chitra. He tried his hand at writing novels, and wrote a few, such as Simollanghan (1954), and finally returned to the theatre and founded Natyaniketan, for which he wrote, produced and directed his own plays. The first one Ashirvad (1942), with its galaxy of distinguished stage and screen actors, attracted a good deal of attention. It was Kulavadhu (1942), however, with Jyotsna Bhole in the lead, which became an instantaneous hit. Themewise, it is a meek imitation of Ibsen's A Doll's House, but by no means is it a serious play. Then followed in succession plays like Nandanvana, Kanyadan, Majhe ghar, Vahini, etc. Bhatala dili osari (1956) was another hit to his credit. The Kulvadhu pattern of plays consists of a light theme with some pretence of a social problem, accompanied by lilting music and a dash of humour. The plays themselves do not count for much now, but what matters is the fact that they kept the theatre alive in its hour of darkness, and therein lies the contribution of Ranganekar. He was elected to preside over the Marathi Natyasammelana at Mhapse (Goa) in 1968.

M.M.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RANGANNA, SALAGAME VENKATASUBBIAH (Kannada; b. 1898, d. 1987) was a critic, prose writer and a distinguished scholar in English and Kannada. He had his early education in Chikmagalore before he joined the Central College for his B.A. He did his M.A. from Maharaja's College, Mysore, where Professor B.M. Sri was his teacher. He joined the Department of English as a Tutor, and rose to be a Professor. He was the Principal of Maharaja's College when he retired in 1954. He was actively involved in the Rover Scout movement for several years and was associated with the Kannada Sahitya Parishath as its honorary Secretary for sometime.

Ranganna is chiefly remembered for his scholarly works on literary criticism. As early as 1928 he helped bring out a pioneering critical work, Rannakavi prashasthi which contained scholarly articles by several hands on the tenth-century Kannada poet. He published some daringly frank and original critical essays on Kannada poets and literary tradition. His Samanya chitrakke Suvarnada chowkattu, an essay on poet Muddana's work, created a veritable flutter in the dove-cotes of scholarship. He wrote a brilliant booklet on Kumaravyasa and pointed out how the fifteenth century poet was our nearest approximation to Shakespeare. He wrote an innovative series of books on the literary styles of classical poets like Pampa, Ranna, Janna, Nagachandra, Harihara, Lakshmisha, and Kanakadasa. A collection of his critial writings Honna shula (Golden gallows) published in 1959, contained many controversial views. His major critical work is Paschatya gambhiranatakagalu, a kind of critical compendium of Western tragedy from Aeschylus to Bertolt Brecht. He wrote exhaustively on the plays of Kalidasa. He took the cue from B.M. Sri's Gadayuddha nataka, and wrote a play on Harishchandra gathering together all the dramatic elements found in Raghavanka's renowned poem, Harishchandra kavya. Kavikathamritha is a garland of anecdotes relating to the life and character of ancient poets, thinkers and philosophers. Ranga kavya binnapa, his major work, is a collection of 1200 odd musings and meditations in the style of the vachanas. The book was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1965. Mysore University conferred the degree of D.Litt. on him in 1970. He was President of the Kannada Sahitya Sammelana held in Shimoga in 1976.

His books in English include B.M. Sri, The Lady and the Ring, Old Tales Retold and On the Self.

H.K.R.M.

RANGANAYAKAMMA (Telugu; b. 1937) was born in a middle class Vaishnavite family and had little of formal education, but coming uder the influence of Marxism and turning a feminist she made a deep study of the Communist philosophy. She challenged the injustice of the ruling classes and attacked the system that exploited the helpless masses. In her writing she shows vigour and an uncompromising adherence to principles.

Ranganayakama's maiden novel Krishnaveni (1957), revealed a touch of sentimentalism, and the next Andalammagaru (1958) had a humorous vein. But her feminist instincts surfaced form her third novel Balipitham (1959) which won her the State Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966. It explored the possibilities of an intercaste marriage, but as the writer was still experimenting with the novel from it failed as a work of art in spite of its mass appeal. Afterwards a series of novels were produced by her: Kulina godalu (The fallen walls, 1962), Andhakaram lo (In the darkness, 1963), Chaduvukunna Kamala (The educated Kamala, 1964), Prema premanu jayistundi (Love wins over love, 1965), Idena nyayam? (Is this justice, 1966), Kala enduku? (What is art for? 1967), Sweet home, Parts I & II, (1968), Rachayitri (The woman writer, 1968), Na diarilo oka peji (A page in my diary, 1969) and Peka medalu (Houses of cards, 1970). She has also written many volumes of short stories, such as Amma (Mother, 1964) and Pellaniki premalekha (Love letter to a wife, 1967). She edits Vasudha, a Telugu monthly, and has translated Das Capital into Telugu. However, she has become controversial with her critical work on the Ramayana in three parts (1967-68). It was called Ramayana vishavrikshamu (Ramayana, the tree of poison) in which she condemns Rama and ridicules the Vedic order. In her latest novel Janaki vimukti (1980) she thinks that the male is an uncultured despot, and it is time for the woman to rebal against the establishment. Her commitment is both her strength and her weakness. It gives her a flowing style but, perhaps, a prejudiced theme.

S.R.K.

RANGARAJU, J.R. (Tamil; b. 1875, d. 1959) is a major writer of detective fiction. A devout Vaishnavite, he started writing during the first decade of the present century. He soon developed a fluent and racy style and had an avid following. In all his novels, he created and perpetuated a memorable character, Detective Govindan. Draping himself in the translucent attractive garb of detective fiction, Rangaraju lambasted social ills, perpetuated in the name of religion and tradition. His works are Rajambal, Chandirakanta, Mohanasundaram, Anandakirushnan, Rajendiran, Varadarajam, and Jayarangan. Some of these have also been staged. Based on Rajambal and Mohanasundaram, popular Tamil films were made. Vaduvur K. Duraisami Ayyangar and Arani Kuppusami Mudaliyar continued the tradition of Rangaraju in Tamil detective fiction. M. Ramalingam in his Irupadam nurrandut Tamil ilakkiyam remarks that though Rangaraju and Duraisami Ayyangar were very popular and enjoyed a very enthusiastic following, their writings could not withstand the test of time.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Ramalingam, Irupadam nurrandut Tamil ilakkiyam (Madras, 1973); Madhu Vimalanandam, Tamil ilakkiya varalaru.

K.Su

RANGEYA RAGHAV (Hindi; b. 1923, d. 1962). Tirumalnimbarakkam Vir Raghav Tatacharya, popularly known as Rangeya Raghav, was born in a Tamil speaking Iyengar family at Agra. His father, Rangacharya, was a profound scholar of Sanskrit, Persian and Tamil. His ancestors had moved from Sribhushanam in South Arcot and settled in Vair, a village in the erstwhile Bharatpur State. Here his father was the chief priest of the famous temple of 'Sitaramji' under the Vaishnavite order of the Ramanuj cult.

Rangeya Raghav did his M.A. in Hindi from St. John's College, Agra, at the age of 21, and received his Ph.D. degree in 1948 on his thesis Gorakhanath aur unka yug. During the course of his research he had to stay at Santiniketan where he developed a taste for music and painting.

After having stayed at Agra for a long time he came back to Vair in 1954 where he devoted his time to writing the best of his stories and novels on rural and tribal life. In July 1961 he settled at Jaipur, and the same year in September, it was diagnosed that he was suffering from cancer, a disease he succumbed to a year later.

His entry to the literary field coincided with the rise of the progressive movement which shaped his thinking and had a great impact on his creative genius. His first novel Gharonda (1946) reveals the life of students at college and is noted for its style, and reflects his desire to depict the experiences of real life. In 1943, when Bengal saw the worst famine of the century, he went there along with the members of a medical team to provide relief to the famine-stricken helpless people. He was so deeply moved by this tragedy in Bengal that on his return he prepared a reportage which was later included in his Tufanon ke beech. It got recognition as a new genre of reportage writing in Hindi prose.

Basically a poet of fine sensibility and humanitarian values, he rebelled against tyranny, exploitation and disparity in society. His first khand-kavya (narrative poem), Ajey khandhar (1944) gives a heroic account of the valour and sacrifices of the Soviet Army in Stalingrad against the brute Nazi forces. However, his progressive Marxist ideology is reflected in his more mature work Medhavi (1947). Here the poet traces the development of human civilization and examines certain events of history from the Marxist point of view, reacting strongly to the decadent tendencies of the times. The poem is an epic on the pattern of Prasad's Kamayani, though it does not conform to a narrative design.

His most talked of novel Murdon ka tila was published in 1948. Making use of the material and information obtained from archaeological excavations, the author, with his fertile imagination, has given a lively description of the vastness and grandeur of the pre-historic civilization of the Sindh valley. The author's power of description and his fluent style make the readers feel as if they are witnessing a whole spectrum of life. This novel has, indeed, a pride of place among the historical novels of Hindi.

Another novel Kab tak pukarun (1957), recently serialised on T.V., is also a landmark in the history of the Hindi novel. It deals with the little known nomadic community of the Nats (rope dancers). In his immaculate style he gives a graphic description of the tribal life-style of these people and their profession, habits, beliefs, and rites. In his other novel Dharti mera ghar (1961), he gives a lively account of the people of another tribe who earn their living by doing crude smithy. Here too the author has sympathy with the exploited and the downtrodden and expresses his resentment against the tyrants and the privileged. His last novel Akhiri awaz (1962) exposes the moral hollowness, corruption, political equations, lust for power and economic disparities among the so-called civilized society. The author thus examines human relationships in all their complexities.

His short stories have been collected in various volumes. The notable among them are Devadasi, Samrajya ka vaibhav, Jiwan ke dane, Angare na bujhe, Samudra ke phen, Pancha parmeshwar, Nai zindagi ke liye. In these works we find idioms and phrases mostly prevalent in and around Agra where he had lived long. His story 'Gadal' has found a place in almost all the representative collections of Hindi stories.

As a playwright Rangeya Raghav is one of those writers who have written extensively on mythological and historical subjects. His three plays Ramanuj, Virudhak and Swargbhumi ka yatri were written during 1949-53. Swargbhumi ka yatri provides a new perspective to the character of Yudhishthir who is blamed by Draupadi for the Mahabharata war. Despite opposition from his brothers and Draupadi, Yudhishthir stands firm in his resolve to fight the battle on grounds of propriety and righteousness. This play portrays the character of Krishna as a statesman and diplomat who believes that there are situations when war is inevitable for the vindication of justice and truth.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ramanuj is a dramatised story of the life of Acharya Ramanuj. The dramatist criticises those who believe that Ramanuj worked for the resurrection of Brahminism. Rather, he performed a revolutionary role in attacking orthodox Brahminism and stood for human rights, and upheld the dignity of woman and the law of piety.

In Virudhak, the author criticises the evils that had crept into Buddhism and extols the character of Buddha and his message of universal love and compassion.

Rangeya Raghav is also credited with writing some one-act plays like Akhiri dhabba and Hatim mar gaya. The former was written in the context of the freedom movement of Goa.

A man of versatile genius, Rangeya Raghav has enriched Hindi literature in almost all the genres—poetry drama, novel, short story, criticism, reportage, essay. He has written on sociology, criminology, anthropology, history and culture too. His output is astounding—122 published and 18 unpublished works during a short life of 39 years. All his works have been collected together in Rangeya Raghav granthavali in several volumes.

He has translated several Sanskrit works besides the plays of Shakespeare into Hindi. His own works have been translated into a number of Indian and foreign languages. Besides poems, plays, novels and short-stories mentioned above, his other notable works are—Criticism: Pragatishil sahitya ke mandand; History: Prachin bharatiya parampara aur itihas; Essay: Sangam aur sangharsh.

He was honoured by the government of Uttar Pradesh and Rajasthan Sahitya Academy, and was a recipient of several awards such as Dalmia Puruskar and Gandhi Puruskar.

Gov.R.

RANGIN, SAADAT YAR KHAN (Urdu; b. 1756, d.1834) was the son of Tahmasap Beg Khan, a Persian nobleman. After his death, Rangin shifted to Delhi and began an army career. In 1787, he left the job and went over to Bharatpur and after two years again shifted to Lucknow where he was in the service of Mirza Suleman Shokoh. After a stay of nine years in Lucknow, he left to travel in Bengal. Later, he reached Gwalior and served the Sindhias for six years. He again resigned from service and took to trading of horses and touring. He reached Banda in 1827 where he died.

He knew several languages and composed poems in them. He was a disciple of Shah Halim in poetry. He has written Urdu ghazals, a diwan of Rekhti, a disreputable genre in which he excelled, numerous masnavis and a few insignificant prose works. His four diwans are, Dewan-e-Rekhta (1787), Diwan-e-Bekhta, Diwan-e-Amekhta and Angekhta. He has grouped his numerous works in bewildering permutations and combinations. His better known masnavis are Masnavi Dilpazir, Farasnama, Ijad-e-Rangin, besides a prose-work, Majalis-e-Rangin.

The Rekhti is written in feminine idiom and has lowly love-making as its theme. It abounds in describing the superstitions and rituals associated with females and embraces the entire life of women, its core being sexual intimacy and suggestiveness. Rangin is at his best in this genre. His masnavi Dilpazir, written by him in 1798, is yet to be published, and is one of the best fairy-tale type masnavis.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Gian Chand, Urdu masnavi shumali Hind men (Aligarh, 1969); Khalil Ahmad Siddiqi, Rekhti ka tanqidi mutala (Lucknow, 1974); Sahir Ali Khan, Saadat Yar Khan Rangin (Karachi, 1956).

G.J.

RANGMANCH (Punjabi) is a work on the history of Indian theatre, published in 1961, and authored by Balwant Gargi, a Punjabi playwright and director. This voluminous work includes photographs and sketches in addition to a detailed account of the development of theatre in India. Beginning with the origin of drama, the work discusses Greek and Indian theatrical traditions, various terms of drama, regional and folk-drama, children's theatre, and dilates upon the new trends in Indian drama. The author also registers his opinion about the Indian dramaturgists' and directors' understanding of the Indian theatrical traditions and folk-drama.

This book is divided into two parts. The first part of the book deals with the traditional theatre of the East and the West in which the author discusses two major Indian epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharta, Sanskrit drama, classical dances, folk-dances, folk-drama, Ramalila and Krishnalila. The second part of the book deals with the regional drama, such as the dramatic art of Bengal, Tagore's plays, Marathi and Gujarati drama, Indian regional drama, some theatrical trends related to Parsi Theatre, Prithvi Theatre, People's Theatre and Amateur Theatre. This part also includes discussion on Punjabi and Hindi drama, ballet, little ballet, opera, children's theatre, and explores the possibilities of new trends in the Indian theatre. For further reading on the subject, a select bibliography has also been added at the end. The work is replete with comprehensive details of the various forms, styles and trends of Indian drama and historical development of Indian theatre. While discussing the impact of the western drama on the Indian drama and vice versa, the author admits that the East and the West seem to be in search of their roots in their ancient traditions. He concludes that Indian theatre is bound to borrow certain theatrical devices from the West, but it will remain Indian in its basic character and tradition.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The book received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1962.

A.S.P.

RANI KETAKI KI KAHANI (Hindi/Urdu), by Insha Allah Khan, written during his stay at Lucknow, is a literary prose-work known for many of its qualities, besides its historical importance in the development of Hindi/Urdu prose. It is the first composition in 'thetha' (pure) Khariboli, having a remarkable lively style. While the date of publication of the book differs according to various commentators, Muhammad Sadiq has put it as 1803 in his History of Urdu Literature (1964).

It is a simple romantic tale based on the theme of love, war and magic. The author's aim is to provide entertainment to his readers with an interesting story full of erotic under-tones, element of suspense, make-believe situations, chivalry of the hero (prince Udayabhan) and unflinching love of the heroine, princess Ketaki.

Prince Udayabhan, following a deer, finds himself in a grove where princess Ketaki is enjoying herself on swing along with her mates. They fall in love at first sight and exchange rings. Back home, the prince is sad and depressed. The king, when told about the reason of his sadness, sends a marriage proposal to the father of the princess, who turns it down. However, after encountering many odds in the path of love, the two lovers meet and are ultimately married.

Thus, the story by itself has nothing special to offer except that it impresses the reader with ,the author's knowledge of Hindu mythology and style of life and marriage ceremonies. His knowledge of prostitutes, music and embellishments of life, too, is astounding.

Apart from its historical importance, the real value of the work lies in its language which is forthright and direct. The entire narrative is free from the use of Sanskrit, Persian and Arabic words on the one hand, and words of dialect, mainly Brajboli, on the other. In fact, the 'thetha' khariboli words used by the author add a kind of distinct flavour to the narrative. However, well-versed in Urdu and Persian, he makes use of the Urdu syntax. His style reflects all the traits of his personality—gaiety and gaudiness.

Humour, satire, erotic scenes, lively pen-portraits, graphic descriptions of places and scenes—all mark his style. The use of rhyme in words, phrases, clauses and even sentences gives the language a musical touch. Idioms, proverbs, figures of speech, such as simile and metaphor, give an additional charm to his expression. The note of gaiety in the style has often been compared with the trotting of the horse. The tale is written in a narrative style with dialogues interspersed and verse studded here and there.

S.S.G.
Sh.K.

RANMALL CHHAND (Gujarati/Rajasthani) is a heroic poem, historical in character, ascribed to one Sridhar Vyas (14th-15th c.). The poem is in the bardic tradition. It is a historical poem in 70 verses, describing the battle between Ranmall Rathore of Idar and Zafar Khan, the Governor of Gujarat. The approximate date of its composition is 1400, though some critics have argued for a later date between 1408 and 1411.

Though a slender volume, it is an important work from the viewpoint of both political and literary history. The poet is remarkably faithful to history and does not allow his imagination to twist historical facts, notwithstanding his eulogical description of the battle and the chivalary of the hero, Ranmall. Ranmall pushed back the first attack on Idar by Zafar Shah in 1398. In the second attack that followed next year, he had to retreat, but within a year he re-captured the lost territory. The poem, besides dwelling on the heroic deeds of the protagonist, gives a vivid description of the ruthlessness of the invaders, the sufferings of the afflicted masses and the fight put up by Ranmall in defence of his people.

The poem is a specimen of Maru-Gurjar or old Gujarati/Western Rajasthani which often carries the influence of later Apabhramsha or Avahatta. The first ten verses in the Arya metre are in Sanskrit, while the rest of the poem uses 'matric' and syllabic metres as well as the mixed 'matric' ones. The popular metres used are chaupai, duha, sarasi, durmila, chhapaya, bhujangaprayat, etc. The language is vigorous Dingala and, as in Avahatta, there is a tendency to repeat the consonants. Most of the bards right from Chand Bardai had used an ornate, though at times a little artificial language, somewhat removed from the language of ordinary conversation.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As a result of an interaction with Islam, the contemporary language of Gujarat and Marwar acquired a number of Arabic and Persian words, as is evident from such early works as Bharateshwar Bahubaliras (1184) and Samar rasu (c. 1315). This applies to Ranmall chhand as well; in fact, the number of Persian and Arabic words used in the poem is much larger. Even where the poet uses the Sanskrit Arya metre, he freely employs words like sultan, fauj, badshah, bazaar, etc. Further, we find such words as ardas, alam, firman, halal, haram, hairam, hoshiar, khan, raiyyat used in the poem. The apt use of bardic language earned Ranmall chhand wide recognition. No poet in the later generations except, perhaps, Padmanabh in Kanhada de prabandh used the language so effectively as Sridhar Vyas had done in Ranmall chhand.

The only available manuscript of Ranmall chhand is at Deccan Collage, Pune (No. 1541 of 1891-95), which attributes the authorship of the poem to Sridhar Vyas. Based on this manuscript, Keshav Harshad Dhruva has produced a version of the poem with a few changes in spelling and proper names, though he gives the original words also in the footnotes. The poem is, indeed, of great importance in the study of the early Gujarati/Rajasthani language and literature, besides its significance as a heroic poem.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dashrath Sharma and Dashrath Ojha, Rasa aur rasanvayi kavya (Kashi, 1959); Jayant Harikrishna Dave, Gujarati sahitya ka itihas (Lucknow, 1967); H.L. Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature (New Delhi, 1980); Keshava H. Dhruva, Pandarma shatak no prachin Gurjar kavya (Ahmadabad, 1927); K.K. Shastri, Kavicharit, parts 1 and 2 (Ahmadabad, 1952); Mulchand 'Pranesh' (ed.), Ranmall chhand (Text with Hindi tr., based on Dhruva, Bikaner, 1972).

K.K.S.
Hi.M.

RANNA (Kannada; b. 10th c.) is one of the foremost poets of Kannada. He seems to have lived between AD 949 and 1020. Mudhol in Bijapur district of Karnataka was his place of birth. He belonged to the clan of bangle makers. Ajitasenacharya, a resident of Bankapur in Gangamandala, was his preceptor. Ranna has preferred to style himself as 'Abhimata Jainendra Vachovibhava' (learned in the grand vocabulary of Jainology), 'Shabdanushasanaprabhava Vachovibhava, (one having mastery over the word and its meaning) and 'Ubhayavyakarana Pandita' (a scholar well versed in the grammar of both the languages, Sanskrit and Kannada). He seems to have been proficient not only in rhetoric and grammar, but also in fine arts like music and dance, and was deeply learned in Jaina religion and philosophy.

Ranna was under the patronage of the Chalukya king Ahava Malla and his son Iriva Bedanga. The Tailapa emperor honoured him as poet-laureate, and he himself seems to have been conscious of his rare poetic talent, as his works reveal.

He has to his credit both secular and religious compositions. Gadayuddha, or Sahasa Bhimavijaya, Ajitapurana, Parashurama charite and Chakreshwara charite are his celebrated works. Parashurama charite and Chakreshvara charite have not been discoverd so far. A lexicon entitled Ranna kanda is also attributed to him. Eleven stanzas of this work were published earlier; of late a few more have been unearthed.

Scholars are of the opinion that Ajitapurana (AD 993) is his first work. It is an epic of the champu style. It consists of twelve cantos. In the first and the last cantos Ranna freely extols his patron on the one hand, and Attimbee, a devout lady, on the other, under whose patronage he composed the epic.

Ajitapurana draws upon Uttarapurana by Gunabhadracharya. The story of Ajitatirthankara narrated in 143 stanzas of Uttarapurana has been enlarged to the scope of an epic running into twelve cantos. There are no marked deviations from the original, except a slight change here and there. The episode dealing with the renunciation of Ajitatirthankara makes a marvel of emotions. Ranna has described it with utmost human concern.

Ajitapurana is replete with Jaina terminology and in this sense it befits the title 'Purana tilaka'. There is not a single episode in this work where Ranna's scholarship does not give splendid colour to the narration. His knowledge of rhetoric, dance, music and other arts enriches the account.

Gadayuddha or Sahasabhimavijaya is a superb achievement. It is again an epic in the champu style and runs into ten cantos. It is based on the story in the 'Gada' and 'Sauptika' books of the Mahabharata. Ranna has drawn upon the thirteenth and fourteenth cantos of Pampa's Vikramarjuna vijaya also. Further, the influence of Bhattanarayana's Venisamhara and Bhasa's Urubhanga can also be made out. But Ranna does not even bother to mention the names of Pampa, Bhattanarayana, or Bhasa.

Following Pampa, Ranna also has likened his hero Bhima to his patron-king Satyashraya Iriva Bedanga in his epic which revels in acclaiming the valour of Bhima throughout.

The story of Gadayuddha is very well-known. Duryodhana, who refuses to pay heed to the proposals for a treaty, declares war on the Pandavas. Krishna's mission also proves a failure. Draupadi motivates Bhima to fulfil the vows she has made. In the ultimate mace-combat Duryodhana meets with his death, and Bhima ascends the throne. This is the substance of the epic. However, Ranna has declared that the entire story of the Mahabharata is presented in his epic in an epitomised form.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Gadayuddha is Ranna's classic. It is exceptionally dramatic. B.M. Srikantia has, in fact, adapted it to the form of a play. 'Raudra rasa' (the sentiment of valour) dominates the epic. Many human values have found their deepest expression here. Description of friendship between Karna and Duryodhana, and Duryodhana's lamentation over the death of Karna are deeply moving. Duryodhana's tribute to the dead Karna rises from the heart and is at once noble and touching. It is one of the most celebrated passages in classical Kannada poetry.

Duryodhana is naturally moved at the sight of the corpse of Lakshmanakumara, but he is noble enough to bow to Abhimanyu. His sense of justice on the occasion of his mace-war with Bhima also indicates his understanding of the right principles of politics. In a word, Duryodhana, as depicted by Ranna, is a noble man. Gadayuddha is, indeed, a great poem in Kannada literature.

Both as an exponent of Jainism and as a poet, Ranna has won immortality. He has come to be known as 'Shaktikavi Ranna', Ranna the poet of power.

N.Ba.

RAO, BALAKRISHNA (Hindi; b. 1913, d. 1976) was the son of C.Y. Chintamani, the famous liberal leader and editor of the Leader. After taking his B.A. and M.A. degrees from Allahabad University, he passed the I.C.S. examination and served as a Civil Servant for fifteen years, but then gave up Government service. His first poem was published in 1928 in Madhuri at the age of fifteen. In 1931 his first collection of poems Kaumudi was published. Kavi aur chabi (1947) was his second collection of forty-four poems which shows a marked influence of chhayavad, though he was never taken as a chhayavadi poet. Later on, he joined the movement of 'Nai kavita'. Raat biti was published in 1954 and Hamari baat in 1957. He also translated Milton's poetic drama Samson Agonistes under the title Vikranta Samson.

Balakrishna Rao had a distinguished career as a journalist also. In 1960 he started the publication of the famous Hindi magazine Kadambini. For sometime he was editor of Madhyama, published by Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Allahabad, and brought out some special numbers of the journal. He was always a progressive in his outlook. He also served as Vice-Chancellor of the Universities of Gorakhpur and Agra. An administrator, a poet, a critic and a journalist, he was all rolled into one, and wrote with a sense of fine discernment.

Bha. M.

RAO, BHANUJI (Oriya; b.1926), a well-known Oriya poet, is the grandson of the famous Oriya poet, Bhaktakavi Madhusudan Rao. He studied English Literature for his M.A. at Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, but could not sit for the final examination. He was the first editor of Prajna, a quarterly, devoted to modernist writings.

He collaborated on a collection of poems with Guruprasad Mahanti, and the book, Nutana kavita (New poetry), came out in 1955. The two poets have many things in common; both are committed to the modernist tradition; both are competent craftsmen and have striven in their poetry to be objective and impersonal. Bhanuji has one more collection of poems to his credit, Bishada eka ritu (Sadness is a season, 1973). He has had, however, few followers. The reasons for this are not far to seek. First of all, his organisation of poetic material in any single poem is inimitably flawless. Second, his short lyrics did not look quite fashionable before the long poem which came into vogue in Oriya poetry in the late 60s. Few can, however, deny their beauty and charm, and it is a welcome relief to turn to them from the repetitive and verbose writings of some contemporary poets.

The chief excellence of his poetry lies in its easy communicability. Whether the poem is reflective ('Bhabana,' 'Bharatabarsha'), or slightly ironical ('Konarka') or even frolicsome ('Sabun'), it always establishes an immediate rapport with the reader. The poet does not strive to probe the mysteries of life and death or of the world beyond; he is content with the here and now. He writes about moonlight, sea, river, birds, Sunday and the simple joys of domestic life. 'Bahuda' is unique in its fusion of the beauty of the moonlit night with the warmth of hearth and home. Prose-poems like 'Stana' and 'Hueta' are quite successful as experiments in Oriya poetry. The poems like 'Kathajodi,' 'Digha' and 'Machha' are descriptions of natural scenery, but the beauty of the river and the sea suggest an almost mythic sense of renewal. An orange-coloured moon rises above the railway bridge across the river Kathajodi, the sea near Digha rolls and polishes the poet's body into a dazzling oyster-shell, and the fish caught in the net are as bright as the sun. In 'Satta O samudra' the sea brings to the poet the promise of a home and children. These are poems of joy, of celebration, of the triumph of light over darkness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jatindra Mohan Mohanty, 'Introduction' to Adhunika Odia kavita (Cuttack, 1978) and 'Bhanuji Raonka kavita' in Asantakali (1968).

S.K.M.

RAO, MADHUSUDAN (Oriya; b. 1853, d.1912), considered the father of modern Oriya lyric, was born at Puri in

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

a Maratha family which had settled there. He started as an essayist. In 1873 he translated a few pieces of prose and poetry from Sanskrit and English which appeared in Utkal darpan, a literary journal. Two volumes of a collection of poems entitled Kabitabali, prepared in collaboration with Radhanath Roy, appeared in 1873 and 1874. They marked the beginning of a new era in Oriya lyric. The old lyrical forms like the chautisa, koili, boli, padia, etc were replaced by ode, elegy, sonnet and other forms of Western poetry. Towards the end of his career Madhusudan wrote two short stories and translated Uttar Ramcharita of Bhavabhuti into Oriya. His literary creations mainly consist of lyrical compositions. During a period of thirty years from 1880 till his death, he enriched Oriya literature with his exquisits lyrics. The most well-known of his verse-collections include Chhandamala (Vol. I, 1880; Vol. II, 1895), Sangitamala (1894), Basanta gatha (1910), Kusumanjali (1903) and Utkalgatha (1908).

Basanta gatha, which contains seven sonnets, was the first of its kind in Oriya literature. Kusumanjali contains a number of elegies, such as 'Shoka lahari', 'Mahadevi Victoria', 'Radhanath biyoge' (an elegy on the death of poet Radhanath), 'Shoka shloka' (couplets on grief), etc. His poems 'Pruthibi prati' (Ode to Mother Earth), ' Nadi prati' (Ode to the river), 'Akasha prati' (Ode to the sky), 'Jiban chinta' (A psalm of life) and 'Kounasi paraloka basini prati' (Ode on the death of an unknown lady) are a few instances of his odes on various themes. Pious and devout in personal life, his poetry is charged with profound religious emotions. He is also regarded as a great mystic poet, for he sees divinity in every being.

With the spread of nationalism in the last decade of the 19th century, the mystic Madhusudan became a true patriot. He turned from the religious themes to the patriotic and the nationalistic. His Utkala gatha, containing such types of poems, testifies to his change of attitude. His poems like 'Bharata bhabana' (Thoughts about India), 'Bharata bandana' (The worship of India), 'Utkala bandana' (The worship of Orissa), and 'Janmabhumi' (The motherland) are replete with patriotic sentiments. In one of his poems of Utkala gatha he prays to God to fulfil the aim of his life which is to serve his motherland and mother-tongue. In these poems, he tries to recapitulate the past glory of Orissa and calls upon the people of different parts of the state to unite, ignoring the barriers of caste, creed and religion and to dedicate themselves to the cause of their country. He tries to infuse in them a Pan-Indian consciousness. In most of his poems, both religious and nationalistic, he shows robust optimism. He believes that the people of India will prosper if they accept the new education and the new religion (possibly the religion of Bramho Samaj which he embraced wholeheartedly). As a reformer, he voices a spirit of revolt against old superstitious beliefs, religiosity, and conservatism. For the first time in Oriya literature he preaches universal brotherhood.

His finest lyrical compositions are 'Patita ramani' (The fallen woman), 'Bichhede' (In separation), 'Risiprane debabatarana' (The descent of God into the soul of a saint), 'Himachale udaya utsaba' (Sunrise on the Himalayas), 'E shrusti amrutamaya he' (The creation is immortal), etc. His poems on the seasons of the year, and also such other poems as 'Prabhat' (The morning), 'Sundar sansara' (The beautiful world) and 'Shova' (beauty) are of abiding interest to young men.

As an essayist, Madhusudan shows a preoccupation with moral and philosophical ideas, but his genius lies in the literary prose that he wrote. He developed an Oriya prose style that continued long after his death. His contribution to the growth of juvenile and children's literature is significant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Avanti Devi, Bhakta kabi Madhusudan Rao o Utkala nabajuga (Jignasa, Calcutta, 1963); Brajamohan Mohanty, Kabi Madhusudan; K.C. Panigrahi, Bhakta Kabi Madhusudan.

J.B.M.

RAO, SUKHALATA (Bengali; b.1886, d.1969) was the eldest daughter of Upendra Kishore Raychoudhuri. Born in Calcutta, she was educated at Brahmo Balika Shikshalaya and Bethune College, Calcutta. She married an Oriya physician, Dr.Jayanta Rao. She lived mostly in Cuttack and established Shishu O Matri Mangal and Oriya Nari Seva Sangha. She was decorated by the Govt. of India for her services. She was a remarkable artist in water-colour. She contributed short stories, mostly fairy-tales from many lands, to Sandesh, a children's monthly, founded by her father in 1913. These beautifully written fairy-tales were later published as books. Though her stories were not original, she composed and published a large number of good lyrical poems, some of which were set to music and broadcast. Her works include Hitopadesher galpa, Nanan desher rupkatha, Dui bhai, Aesoper galpa, Sonar mayur, Khoka elo beriye, Bone bhai kato majai, Nanan galpa, Khelar dada, Pather alo, Aro galpa (1915); fairy-tales from foreign lands, Galper boi (1917); more fairy and folk-tales: Galpa ar galpa; short stories: Notun chhara; Lali Bhulir deshe, a fantasy; Nije poro (1956), first lessons in reading (awarded by the Indian Govt.).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Alor Phulki (Dept. of Information and Cultural Affairs, Govt. of West Bengal, 1980); Bharat kosh (Bangiya Sahitya Parishat, Vol.5).

L.M.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RASA

RASA (Sanskrit). The word 'Rasa' was originally used to denote various meanings, such as 'drink', 'water'and 'mercury'. In Sankrit aesthetics, the term was employed intially in the context of drama and later extended to poetry. From Bharata (2nd c. AD) onwards, the term signifies aesthetic pleasure or thrill, invariably accompanied with joy that the audience experiences while witnessing the enactment of a drama or the reading of a poem.

Rasa as a doctrine emerges first in Bharata's Natyashastra, mainly concerned with the emotional effect of drama. To Bharata the main purport of dramatic creation or enactment is the evolution of rasa, for without rasa drama can have no appeal to the spectator: 'Na hi rasadrite kashchid arthah pravartate'. Rasa being the intrinsic aesthetic element of drama and poetry, it is over and above the commonly understood meaning, called 'vakyartha'. 'Artha' par excellence is rasa itself. Proclaiming its significance in dramatic creation, Bharata analyses the process and method of rasa-evolution in his famous sutra, 'Vibhavanubhava-vyabhichari samyogad rasanishpattih': Rasa comes from a combination or commingling of vibhavas (causes), anubhavas (effects) and vyabhicharis (accessories).

He clarifies his point by using an analogy: just as rasa (flavour) results from the combination of many spices, herbs and other substances (dravyas), so does rasa in a drama come from the combination of many 'bhavas'. The beverage such as 'shadava' is made by the combination of such substances as molasses, spices and herbs; similarly permanent emotions, called sthayi bhavas, crystallise into rasa when they are nourished by the accompanying bhavas. Bharata coins the term rasa for aesthetic relish because it can be tasted—'asvadyatvat'.

The treatment of rasa by Bharata on the analogy of shadava makes rasa an external and objective entity, relished by a spectator while witnessing a dramatic performance. It is also free from the philosophical colour imposed on it by his interpreters, e.g. Bhatta Nayaka and Abhinavagupta.

Bharata's explanation of rasa may not answer all the problems arising out of it, but they were fully discussed by his commentators like Bhatta Lollata, Shankuka, Bhattanayaka and Abhinavagupta. We have no independent works of the first three with us now, but we know them through Abhinavagupta and Mammata.

In brief, the view of Bhatta Lollata is that a sthayibhava (stable emotion), when intensified by poetic description or histrionic representation through vibhavas, anubhavas, etc, becomes rasa. The rasa primarily resides in the original characters like Rama and Sita, since they were the first to experience emotions like love, grief, etc. Then through "anusandhana", i.e. the mental activity or the imagination by which the actor attributes to himself or superimposes on himself the role of original characters, he also experiences rasa secondarily. Lollata leaves out the poet and the audience in his analysis of the process of rasa-experience. He completely ignores the way the audience realise the rasa, the addressee for whom the poet creates or the spectators before whom the actor gives performance on the stage.

His views are, therefore, criticised by Shankuka, who advances the process of rasa-experience a step forward by making the spectator a participant in the rasa-process. His view is that during the performance of drama, the acting and allied gestures of the actor, due to his superb imitation, appear so real to the spectator that he is totally absorbed in what is being represented on the stage, and is little aware of the fact that what is being presented is only imitation. Shankuka brings home his point beautifully by the analogy of a picture-horse (chitra-turuga nyaya). A picture-horse is taken as a horse since it successfully imitates a horse, but we know fully well that it is a lump of clay or a piece of wood or some lines of colours on a base. Similarly, we take an actor as a real hero knowing well his personal identity. Shankuka made a bold attempt to include it within one of the accepted processes of knowledge, and tried his best to bring it under the jurisdiction of inference. His rasa-theory is, therefore, designated as 'anumitivada'. The weak point of his theory is that inference is not direct apprehension, and inferential knowledge is not immediate. How is it then possible to have the realisation of poetic thrill through inference? Further, inferential knowledge lacks that sense of fulness which is present in the experience of rasa. So, it is unsound to say that the cognition of rasa is a process of inference.

Bhattanayaka and Abhinavagupta are the two stalwarts of the rasa theory, who imposed on it a system of theology and philosophy. From being an objective entity, rasa became a subjective entity, the direct experience of the spectator or the reader-critic. These masters hold that rasa-experience is not mundane pleasure, but an abiding bliss where the spectator's own self becomes one with the absolute soul, Parama Atman. Thus, rasa is a sudden flash of bliss, innate in the atman, which is realised by the spectator from the enactment of a play on the stage or in reading and responding to a poem. Rasa-experience, therefore, is 'swarupananda' which is an entirely infinite subjectivity of the Supreme Soul and is devoid of all objectivity and is almost of the same nature as the bliss experienced by a yogin in 'atma-sakshatkara' (self-realization).

According to Bhattanayaka, this identification is achieved through the poetic process 'Bhavakatva', otherwise known as 'sadharanikarana', which is the master-key to unlock the riddle of rasa-experience. Sadharanikarana is a process which makes 'asadharana' (uncommon) 'sadharana' (common). In poetry, the experiences of the poet, the experiences of the characters and actors as well as that of the spectators or the readers, which are strictly different from one another, are made common through the magic power of poetic process, sadharanikarana. Then rasa-experience becomes a common, shared experience, and is stripped of limitation of time, place and individuality. Bhattanayaka knew that one great difficulty in the way of rasa-experience is the individualistic element of the spectators on the one side and of the actors and characters on the other. Another difficulty is the painful experience of emotions like sorrow, grief, etc, which necessarily must be painful. He found their solution in sadharanikarana which, shedding individualism in rasa-experience, removes these obstacles and turns the rasa-experience into a blissful experience.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The theory of rasa-experience is analysed by Bhattanayaka by postulating three functions which were later opposed by Abhinavagupta: (1) Abhidha (significative) function (of language), (2) Bhavakatva (universalising or generalising) function, and (3) Bhojakatva (realisational or experimental) function. Under abhidha comes linguistic expression. Bhavakatva differentiates the poetic expression from the ordinary expression and plays a major role in sadharanikarana. Bhojakatva or Bhoga enables the critic to appreciate the generalised emotions and situations.

Abhinavagupta, the profound philosopher and poet, explains the theory on the basis of Kashmir Shaivism. He brought technical terms like 'samvitt', 'paramarsha' and others from Shaiva philosophy to his analysis of the theory of rasa. Apart from that, he linked rasa to the theory of 'Dhvani' by Ananadavardhana. He discarded the two functions, bhavakatva and bhojakatva of Bhattanayaka, since they were nowhere recognised in philosophical system, and amalgamated them in his idea of dhvani, which stood on the solid ground of the 'sphota' philosophy of the grammarians like Bhartrihari.

Abhinavagupta, following Anandavardhana, argues that rasa, being the experience of emotions, cannot be communciated by the method of direct statement. Neither the primary denotative function of language called 'abhidha', nor the secondary figurative function called 'lakshana' is adequate to serve the purpose of evoking rasa, since each is concerned with non-poetic linguistic discourse. Hence there is need for a function exclusively operative in poetry, and he calls it vyanjana. Rasa is never expressed; it is always suggested. So rasa is conveyed through vyanjana and is always vyangya. Abhinava, therefore, on the basis of dhvani, interprets the term 'samyogat' as the relation between the suggester and the suggested and 'nishpatti' as manifestation (abhivyakti), and his theory is designated as 'Abhivyaktivada'. The impact of Abhinavagupta on the interpretation of Bharata's 'rasa sutra' was so powerful that every one fell in line with him. Following Bharata, the philosophisation of rasa had been set in motion with the result that there were as many explanations of the term nishpatti as there were philosophical systems. Shankuka's explanation of the rasa sutra is said to have been based on Nyaya, Bhattanayaka's on Samkhya, Abhinavagupta's on Shaivism, Panditaraja Jagannatha's on Advaita Vedanta, and Rupa and Jiva Goswami's on Vaishnavism.

Another aspect concerning rasa is its number. Bharata mentions only eight rasas, so does Kalidasa, the dramatist. Later, the number of rasas grew, and shanta, preyas, bhakti, vatsalya, etc. were added to it. Bhoja increased the number of rasas to twelve. Rudrata recognised all the bhavas capable of becoming rasas. With the multiplicity of rasas there was also an attempt at rasa-synthesis. Bhavabhuti held that there was only one rasa, karuna (pathos), which assumed different forms even as the same water assumes the forms of whirls and bubbles. Thus karuna is the prakrit (original) rasa and the other rasas are its vikritis (transformations). Likewise, Abhinavagupta endorsed the shanta-synthesis, Bhoja the Shringara-synthesis, and Narayana the adbhuta-synthesis. Even Bharata regarded four major rasas— the erotic (shringara), the wrathful (raudra), the heroic (vira), and the disgusting (bibhatsa). The comic (hasya) comes from the erotic, the compassionate (karuna) from the furious, the awesome (adbhuta) from the heroic, and the terrifying (bhayanaka) from the disgusting. Bharata even assigns colours and the presiding deities to the rasas. The erotic is shining dark, the comic white, the compassionate light grey, the furious red, the heroic light green or skin colour, the terrifying black, the disgusting blue, and the awesome yellow. The presiding deity of the erotic rasa is Vishnu; of the comic, Pramatha (the attendant of Shiva); of the furious, Rudra; of the compassionate, Yama; of the disgusting, Shiva; of the terrifying, the god of time; of the heroic, Indra; and of the awesome, Brahma.

Another interesting problem related to rasa, discussed in Sanskrit poetics, is the question of vulgarity and obscenity. The criterion by which we judge literature is auchitya (propriety). Anandavardhana emphatically states that except for impropriety there is no other source of harming rasa. When rasa suffers in propriety, it is reduced to rasabhasa (semblance of rasa). For example, Rama's love for Sita in poetry is shringara, but Ravana's passion for Sita becomes shringara rasabhasa since it militates against the norms of propriety and cannot be appreciated.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Hence when impropriety of any sort, whether psychological, social or ethical, creeps in, rasa is relegated to the position of rasabhasa.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.Sankaran, Some Aspects of Literary Criticism in Sanskrit (Delhi 1973); J.L.Masson and M.Patwardhan, Aesthetic Rapture (Poona, 1970); K. Krishnamoorthy, Indian Literary Theories (Delhi, 1985); V.Raghavan, The Number of Rasas (Adyar, 1940)

Rav. N

RASA JAVIDANI, ABDUL QUDOOS (Kashmiri; b. 1901, d. 1979) was a poet, who wrote both in Urdu and in Kashmiri. He belonged to a Muslim family which had migrated from village Kadipore in Anantnag to Bhadarwah during the Sikh rule in Kashmir. He was greatly influenced by his father, Khwaja Manawar, who was a wealthy trader and a scholar.

He was well-versed in Persian, Arabic, Urdu and English, and privately passed the Munshi Alim and Munshi Fazil examinations. He got married in 1912 and joined the flourshing trade of his father.

In 1928 there was a great cloud-burst which inundated the whole town, causing immense destruction of property. It broke his heart, but at the same time it brought out the poet in him. Later on, his five shops were gutted by fire. He wound up his business and became a forest contractor, but there, too, he suffered losses. He was compelled to take up the job of a teacher and continued in that profession till his retirement.

Two men left an indelible mark on his mind and thought. In his early childhood, a dervish, Nawab-ul-Din, came to Bhadarwah. Rasa was greatly influenced by his discourses on spirituality. The other man to influence him was his teacher, Ahmad Shah Rafiqi.

His publications include Toofan (Urdu 1928), Lalai Sehra (Urdu 1945), Topha Kashmir (Kashmiri, 1954), Nairangi ghazal (Kashmiri, 1961), Nazimi Surya (Urdu).

Compared to his Kashmiri poetry, his Urdu poetry is far behind so far as efflorescence is concerned, in spite of the fact that he got his Urdu poems vetted by Brij Mohan Datriya Kaifi, Hafiz Jalandhari and Seemab Akbarabadi before publication. But in Kashmiri poetry he made his mark quickly.

The quintessence of his poetry is love which he feels is 'Truth' to be realised. In one of the couplets of his ghazal he says:

> Love alone brings splendour to the universe
> And gives life to the whole earth.

Rasa glorifies love with all fervour. He is fundamentally an erotic poet and sings the songs of human love, though in many of his poems we may find spiritual love as well. Most of his poems, however, revolve round sensuous beauty:

> In the tavern of love deep I drank,
> When like cups of wine thy eyes looked around.

He is conscious of the power of beauty and love, and the mood changes as he moves from one couplet to the other in a ghazal when there is a sudden transformation from passionate physical love to the love of the Absolute:

> This the copy of the Supreme
> If this the Beauty, what about its creator.

Rasa's poems are, by and large, spontaneous effusions. He was a good singer and used sweet and sonorous words in his poems which abound in homely phrases and imagery. He had no interest in the socio-political upheaval of the State, and therefore, he withdrew within himself. Like all romantics, he is a poet of isolation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.L. Kaul, 'Kashmiri Lyrics' (1945); Sheraza (Kashmiri and Urdu editions, 1979); T.N. Raina, An Anthology of Modern Kashmiri Verse (1972).

So.V.

RASA KALLOLA (Oriya), that is 'The waves of Rasa', was written by Dina Krushna who belonged to the Atibadi sect of the Vaishnavas and lived at Puri in the later 17th and early 18th century (approximately from 1650 to 1710). Rasa kallola is one of the finest specimens of ornate poetry and one of the very best in ancient Oriya literature. Its musicality is immense, and moving away from contemporary Sanskrit domination, it used contemporary Oriya language in a contemporary context as few kavyas have done in Oriya literature.

Following the Vaishnavite tradition, the book deals with the traditional story of Radha and Krishna and the manifold aspects of their love along with Krishna's association with other gopis too, described in extremely lucid as well as realistic details of life.

It may be said that Rasa kallola is an important poetical work of sustained vigour, great structural skill and immense metaphysical force. Each line begins with ka throughout the book. The entire kavya is divided into 34 chhandas (cantos) and each chhanda is organized in a musical metre with vivid description of natural beauty such as the description of seasons in relation to the delicate and unmatched feminine youth and elegance of the women folk (gopis) of Gopa-pura. Besides figures of speech, such as alliterations, assonances, similes and metaphors, etc. each stanza in the kavya is packed with a number of poetic devices. The first chhanda is devoted to the praise of Lord Jagannath and adoration of ancient scholarship. The emergence of Lord Krishna in the second chhanda, the enchantment of gopis at the news of the birth of Krishna in the third, the episode of Putana in the fourth, the description of the childhood of Krishna in the fifth and the sixth, the passionate romance of Krishna and gopis in the seventh and the eighth, the subduing of the serpent Kaliya in the ninth, and the appearance of the amazingly charming Radha in the tenth chhanda constitute the first phase of the kavya. The description of seasons, such as winter, spring, summer, rains and autumn in succession and the corresponding response of love-soaked Radha and gopis make the enriching contexts of the subsequent chapters. The amorous love-play of Krishna with gopis and his thrilling love-play in the company of Radha make up the nineteenth and twentieth chhandas. The subsequent three or four chhandas are devoted to the same erotic descriptions of 'Shringar rasa'. The journey of Krishna to Mathura, the sorrow and agony of gopis at the separation of their lover, the delight of the women of Mathura at the sight of Krishna, the killing of Kansa, Krishna's sympathy with his aunt and his love-play with Kubuja, the bemoaning of gopis, the arrival of Udhab in Gopa-pura etc. occupy the rest of the chhandas. The dialogue between Udhab and gopis, and the exposition of the philosophy of love and devotion by Udhab in the thirty-second and thirty-third chhandas highlight the importance of the philosophy of Vaishnavism and the essence of the worship of Radha and Krishna through knowledge and devotion. The last, the thirty-fourth canto, relates how Udhab returned to Krishna and conveyed to him the deep concern and anxieties of gopis at the separation of their lover, Krishna. Briefly, it may be said that the poet in Rasa kallola laid emphasis on the total surrender of the devotee to the divine-being for ultimate bliss and deliverance. The theme of Radha and Krishna had attracted many medieval poets in Indian literature and Dinakrushna Das in Oriya poetry was one of them.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The chief merit of Rasa kallola is the pervading tone of devotion and romance. Emotion and romance underlying devotional feelings add to the precision and perfection of a poetic diction, and on the whole Dinakrushna's powers of narration and observation are superb. In addition, there are several stanzas which spell out the characteristics of poetic craftsmanship and the true virtues of a poet with some commitment. Complete merger with the divine is the common phenomenon of Vaishnavite love as manifested in the life of Krishna, gopis and Radha. Rasa kallola, remarkable for its diction, creative imagination, poetic flashes and classical quality, ranks high among the medieval Oriya kavyas and it brought a measure of stability to the literary landscape of medieval Oriya literature.

G.M.

RASAGANGADHARA (Sanskrit; 17th c.). Jagannath's Rasagangadhara (lit. Shiva-like support to the Ganga of 'rasa') is one of the most significant works on Sanskrit poetics. It takes stock of all the earlier concepts of literary theory like rasa-dhvani, alankara, guna, riti, dosha and auchitya. Jagannatha is as original in his critique as in his exposition, and his perspective is as new as it is all-embracing. He does not blindly follow a tradition, but clears out a path for himself in an eclectic spirit with telling illustrations from his own pen, and writes in a scholastic style which is at once the despair of ordinary readers and caviare to the learned, versed in the jargon of 'Navya nyaya' (neo-logic).

Can poetry be cirumscribed in a logical definition? Evidently not, judging by the almost universal failure of the numerous attempts made by celebrated thinkers. If rasa is made the differentia, it will leave out the beauty of alankara or under-estimate it. The same fallacy is obvious even if their positions are reversed. But surely, there must be a consensus possible on the soul (Atman) or essense of poetry. It cannot be riti, guna, dhvani, vakrokti, auchitya and so on, depending on the whim of the theorist. So too, one should be able to pinpoint the 'body' or form of poetry and its status vis-a-vis the soul. In Indian poetics some regarded both word or sound (shabdha) and sense (artha) as the body, while others favoured exclusively the one or the other. But none had turned to logic for guidance. This is precisely what Jagannatha does and shows a way out. According to him, the differentia of poetry is 'language conveying beautiful meaning'. This marks off poetry clearly from science and is broad enough to include all accepted categories of poetic beauty. It is free from logical fallacies and yet non-technical. But Jagannatha can turn it into logical jargon by defining poetry as one the language of which signifies a meaning that can serve as an object of contemplation, producing aesthetic experience. It frees the meaning of poetry from the bondage of unexplained words used in it.

Jagannatha recognises differences in taste and admits as many as four grades of poetry, the first three being good for different reasons like the dominance of dhvani (grade I) , its subordination (grade II), and dominance of arthalankaras without dhvani (grade III). The last is constituted by similar shabdalankaras (grade IV). The creative genius, according to him, is the sole cause of poetry, while equipment and practice together build it up.

Jagannatha regards the process of 'rasa bhavana' (aesthetic contemplation) not as an undiluted spiritual ecstasy, as Abhinavagupta did, but as involving an ineffable modicum of illusion induced by poetry, and thus keeps mystic experience and poetic enjoyment apart.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Qualities of style like 'sweetness' are admitted by him to be factual and not fictional entities really belonging to rasas as attributed by Anandavardhana. For the first time he spells out the excellence and their opposites in style.

As a critic, he strongly resents the portrayal of passionate human love in divinities and condemns Jayadeva's Gitagovinda outright.

In the field of applied criticism, he corrects the errors of Appayya Dikshita who demands in dhvani (suggested sense) an invariability expected only from logical inference.

The greatest contribution of Jagannatha, however, lies is in the clarity he adds to our understanding of individual alankaras or figures with illuminating examples, preceded by a detailed critique of earlier views. He also shows his originality in recognising new alankaras. It is indeed a pity that the last portions of this alankara section are lost.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : A.K.Warder, Indian Kavya Literature, Vol.I (Delhi, 1972); Durgaprasad and K.P.Parab (eds.), Rasagangadhara (Bombay,1888); Edwin Gerow, Indian Poetics (Wiesbaden,1977); K, Krishnamoorthy, Studies in Indian Aesthetics and Criticism (Mysore, 1979); V.A.Ramaswami Sastri, Jagannatha Pandita (Annamalainagar,1942).

K.Kr.

RASAKA (Prakrit/Apabhramsha), also called Rāsa or Rāsabandha, was originally a Prakrit literary genre, which got new orientation in Apabhramsha literature and underwent further development in some New Indo-Aryan literatures (e.g.Gujarati and Rajasthani literatures).

Rāsa was a type of popular dance associated with religious festivals, and known in western and northern India since the early centuries of the Christian era. Initially, the song accompanying the dance, as also the metre and the 'tala' (time-beat) used for that song, was also called rasa or rasaka. Later, it developed as a literary type with a very long and diversified form over some fourteen hundred years. Over and above being principally a lyrical mode, it also developed into a type of ballet (uparupaka), mostly called 'Natya-rasaka'.

All the rasaka poems in Prakrit and most of those in Apabhramsha are lost. Only one specimen in Apabhramsha, comparatively of a very late date, is preserved. So we are almost in the dark about the form, structure, development, etc. of that genre when it flourished in Prakrit and Apabhramsha. Fortunately, we can form some idea of the early rasa from some descriptions by Prakrit prosodists.

The rasa in Prakrit seems to have been a short lyrical poem with a well-defined metrical structure. From Virahanka's description in his Vrittajati-samuchchhaya (c.7th c.AD), we learn that the typical rasa had eight stanzas, alternately in a longer and a shorter matra metre, the latter at times taking the form of a refrain. Virahanka has quoted several earlier authorities (including Satavahana) on the prosody of the rasa, which shows that it was much in vogue.

In Apabhramsha another variety of rasaka or rasabandha developed. Virahanka and Svayambhu (later half of 9th c.) define it as a composition in choice metres, and the latter tells us that it was a highly favoured form, enjoyed in the gatherings of literary experts. The Apabhramsha poet Vira has referred to Devadatta's Amba-devi-rasaya (10th c.). Similarly, there is a reference to Manikya-prastarika-pratibadha-rasa (12th c.). Except these titles, we do not know anything about these works, which were evidently religio-didactic Jaina rasas. The only two preserved rasas are the Samdesha-rasaka of Abdal Rahaman and the Upadesha-rasayana-rasa of Jinadatta Suri, both written in the 12th c. Of these the Upadesha-rasayana is a didactic work, and represents a new development in the rasaka form that took place during the rise of New Indo-Aryan literatures. The Samdesha-rasaka, even though a late rasa and written by a Muslim, may be taken to some extent as a typical specimen of the Apabhramsha rasaka. It has the theme of love in separation. For articulating the rich variety of emotions connected with intense attachment, the poet has used a great variety of matra-metres. The description of the city-life, the botanical lists and descriptions of six seasons, appear to be later features of the rasaka form and account for the length of the Samdesha-rasaka, which is quite unusual for such a genre and extremely unsuitable for dance performance. In spite of this, the Samdesha-rasaka certainly gives us some idea of the lyricism, lively and vivid depiction of sentiments, and rich musicality that characterised the rasaka. In the later New Indo-Aryan period, it developed several varieties, based on variations in structure, metrical form and features connected with stage performance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dashrath Ojha and Dashrath Sharma, Rasa aur rasanvayi kavya (Delhi, 1959); H.C.Bhayani (ed.), Apabhramsha vyakran (Bombay, 1960); H.D.Velankar (ed.), Vrittajati samuchchhaya (Jodhpur, 1962); and Svayambhuchchhandas (Jodhpur, 1962); Jinavijaya Muni and H.C.Bhayani (ed.), Samdesha-rasaka (Bombay, 1945).

H.C.B.

RASAL, RAMASHANKAR SHUKLA (Hindi; b. 1899, d. 1980), a profound scholar of Brajbhasha literature and

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Indian poetics, was born in village Mau of Banda district. His father was Headmaster of the Middle School of Banda and had deep interest in the old literary works of Hindi, and had a good collection of books. He had memorised thousands of Hindi verses and could recite them for hours. It was due to his inspiration that 'Rasal' devoted himself to the study of ancient Hindi and Sanskrit poetry. He did his B.A. in 1925 and M.A. (Sanskrit) in 1929 from Allahabad University, and then joined Kanyakubja College, Lucknow, as a teacher of Hindi and logic. After some time he shifted to Allahabad where he worked on his dissertation 'Evolution of Hindi Poetics' which earned him a D. Litt. degree in 1936. Three years later in 1939 he was appointed lecturer in Hindi at Allahabad University where he served for a number of years. From there he moved to Saugar University as Reader. He also served the departments of Hindi at Gorakhpur and Jodhpur Universities.

Besides being a scholar of Brajbhasha, Rasal was himself a poet of repute and made a place for himself in modern Brajbhasha poetry. His poems in Khariboli too are of no mean standard. He devoted himself to the task of propagating Brijbhasha literature and his dedication to its cause is still remembered. For this purpose he founded 'Rasik Mandal' in 1931 at Allahabad. Ram Prasad Tripathi, eminent historian, was its President and Rasal Vice-President. The Mandal organised poetic symposiums every month which attracted a good many poets and scholars.

Rasal wrote a number of books on poetics, criticism and history of Hindi literature which bring out his great scholarship. As a lexicographer too he did valuable work. The novelty of his dictionary Bhasha shabda-kosh lies in the fact that he quotes lines of poetry to elucidate the meaning of words. His commentaries on Raspanchadhyayi and Bhanvargit are known for their lucid and simple style. His works include: Brajbhasha poetry: Uddhava-shatak, Ajas mochan; Khariboli poetry: Kavya purusha, Bhojraj, Gurudakshina; History of Literature: Hindi sahitya ka itihas, Sahitya prakash, Sahitya parichaya; Poetics: Alankar piyusha, Alankar kaumidi, Natya nirnaya; Criticism: Alochanadarsha, Alochanalochan, Sur samiksha, Gadya kavyaloka; Essays: Gadya kusumanjali, Rachna vikas; Edited works: Mira madhuri, Ratnakar's Uddhav-shatak, Adhunik Brajbhasha kavya and Nutan Brajbhasha kavyamanjari.

Ra.T.

RASIKA (Sanskrit). In Sanskrit literary criticism there are many terms like Rasika, Sahridaya, Kavyatatvajnana, Sumanas, which correspond to the term 'critic' in western literary criticism. The Sanskrit term 'Rasika' is perhaps more comprehensive than the western term as it emphasises the fact that the critic also shares the experience of the poet. Udabhata's commentator Pratiharenduraja quotes a verse: 'Rasollasi kaveratma svachchhe shabdarthadarpane', meaning when the heart of the poet is filled to the brim with rasa, it bursts forth and overflows. Thus, the poet must be the first experiencer of rasa and the person who shares the poet's experience from his poetic work is a Rasika. The term rasika came into vogue with the advent of the rasa doctrine, since no work of art, however great it may be, can gain popularity unless it is appreciated and evaluated by a critic, capable of identifying his experience with that of a poet.

Realisation of happiness through aesthetic experience is the aim of all branches and forms of art. A rasika is one who is gifted with the well-experimented analytical process of judgement, besides being endowed with a supersensuous taste for aesthetic beauty. As no poet can create a work of art instinct with rasa without the gift of creative genius, no critic can ever enjoy a great work unless he is gifted with literary sensibility. The capability of the poet to create is termed in Sanskrit as 'Karayitri pratibha' (creative genius), and the contemplative quality of the critic as 'Bhavayitri' genius which can be called 'rasikata' or 'rasajnanta', i.e. the critic's capacity to enjoy and relish rasa. Viewed in this context, both poet and critic complement one another and are not like two poles standing apart. Together, they complete the circle of poetic art. Emphasising the role of a critic, Kalidasa, in his famous drama Abhijnana Shakuntalam, emphatically states that however great his drama may be, he is not satisfied unless it is fully evaluated as good by worthy critics. It means that the greatness of the work depends upon the fact that it must meet the standard of the critic's enjoyment. It is rasika, therefore, who is competent to offer sensitive analysis of all the elements in a poem. To be a rasika in the true sense, the critic must refine his innate sensibility by application to good literature so that he can enjoy the rasa. This capacity of rasika is called 'Hridaya samvada'. the communion of hearts.

The great poet-critic Anandavardhana uses more frequently the term 'sahridaya' for rasika, and his epoch-making work Dhvanyaloka is also called Sahridayaloka. He believes that the true appreciation of rasa is rare, and it belongs to a few privileged, gifted with a refined sensibility by birth. To them he gave the name sahridayas, i.e. 'kindred hearts', because they could respond fully to the heart-throbs of a poet which find expression in his poetry. The ideas deep rooted in the term sahridaya of Anandavardhana is beautifully brought out by his commentator Abhinavagupta in his Lochana commentary,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'Those who are capable of reaching out to the subject of a poet, whose hearts are refined through constant recitation and study of poetry and who show sympathetic response to poetry, are known as sahridayas'. Those who lack the ability to respond to poetry are no literary critics, however learned they may be in diverse branches of learning. Hence Anandavardhana stresses that mere initiation in grammar and linguistics does not make a person sahridaya. With the mastery of grammar and lexicon one may be able to grasp the surface meaning of a poem, but not its rasa, the real centre of beauty in the poem. A sahridaya is an ideal critic, because what the poet creates, he re-creates in his mind with his imagination and enjoys it fully. In Sanskrit criticism the creative genius of a poet and the responding taste of the sahridaya are not two things standing apart. The two qualities or gifts are virtually the two facets of a single sensibility, because a true poet and an ideal critic share in common the aesthetic ability known as 'pratibha'. There is no rasa in the absence or deficiency of either. Even when a poet creates a poem, he has in mind at least one responsive reader. This fact is beautifully brought out by Bhavabhuti, when he says "utpatsyate mama tu ko' pi samanadharma", meaning: I firmly believe that there is, or will be born in future, at least one responsive reader, rasika, who will share my art experience and fully respond to my work.

Rav. N.

RASAKHAN (Hindi; c. 1540-1630). Not much is known about the life of Rasakhan, a poet perhaps belonging to a royal family. Most probably he was born in Delhi. According to Do sau vaishnavan ki varta, he was a disciple of Goswami Vitthalnath and composed his devotional poetry on Lord Krishna based on the teachings of the Pushtimarg of Goswami Vallabhacharya, but Chandrabali Pandey is of the opinion that his poetry is in no way connected with the religious doctrines of the two above-mentioned preceptors, though the theme of his poetry is undoubtedly love of Krishna, a changed version of the agony of love found in sufi poetry.

The following four books are ascribed to Rasakhan: (i) Sujan Rasakhan (214 verses), (ii) Prem-vatika (53 verses), (iii) Dan-lilā (11 verses), and (iv) Ashtayama (a small booklet). All these works, composed in figurative yet lucid style in chaste and standard Brajabhasha on the love of Krishna and gopikas, depict his own great love, devotion and reverence for the Lord. Though a Muslim by birth, he became so much absorbed in the love of Krishna–the inexhaustible Rasakhan (mine of joy)—that he himself became 'Rasakhan', the receptacle of divine pleasure: 'Tyom rasakhani vahi rasakhani ju hai rasakhani so hai rasakhani.' That is why we know him by his nick-name only and his original name has totally got effaced from the memory of the people.

Rasakhan's Brajbhasha is free from all strain and artifice, and his poems are a spontaneous expression of a poet deeply immersed in the love of the Lord. Whether he writes kavitts or savaiyas or sings kirtans, there is a poignancy of feeling expressed with such naturalness of rhythm that it touches the chords of every sensitive reader of poetry.

V.R.P.

RASO (Gujarati; 12th - 16th c.) is a versified romance of a popular character, mostly from Rajasthan and Gujarat. Raso compositions often use metres like duha, chaupai, etc. The prototype of these compositions is said to be a lost Munjarasa in Apabhramsha, whose fragments are quoted in the Prakrit grammar of Hemachandra (12th c.). From the 12th century onwards, an abundant 'Raso' literature developed in an Indo-Aryan vernacular known as Old Western Rajasthani (OWR) or Old Gujarati, also called Dingal. The most ancient specimen of the OWR raso is said to be the Bharateshvara Bahubali rasa (1185) composed by a Jain author, Shalibhadra Suri.

The theme of the rasos is either heroic, centring on the warlike prowess of some Rajput hero, or romanesque and sentimental love-affair between a Rajput prince and princess, entailing long and painful separations between the lovers which lend themselves to lyrical development. Kanhadade prabandha is a typically 'heroic' raso, whilst Bisaldevraso, whose date is uncertain, represents an archaic type of sentimental raso: it is a simple love-ballad composed in a mixture of OWR and Pingal, an old Braj dialect. In fact, most of the non-Jain rasos are composed in that mixed language.

By far the most famous is Prithviraj raso attributed to Chand Bardai, a long composition in Pingal, mixed with OWR and some archaic Apabhramsha words. As Chand Bardai (sometimes called the first great Hindi poet) appears to have been the contemporary and principal adviser of the hero, King Prithviraj of Ambar (defeated by Shahab-ud-Din Ghori in 1192), the poem is supposed to have been composed in the first half of the 13th century. But there are no ancient manuscripts, and the poem, which has come down to us under various forms, seems to have been very largely interpolated. Both the heroic and romansque elements are present. Yet some modern critics are of the opinion that the primitive Prithviraj-raso ended at the brave hero's conquest of the fair Rajput princess Samjogita; so the poem might have been originally a lyrical exaltation of Rajput chivalry, rather than the all-embracing folk-epic we know. All critics agree, however, in considering Prithviraj-raso as the most remarkable specimen of the whole raso literature. No translation of any raso in any European language has been attempted so far.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Tod, Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan (2 vols., reprinted London, 1957); Forbes, Ras-mala (London, 1856); G. Grierson, Modern Vernacular Literature of Hindustan (Calcutta, 1889).

RASO (Rajasthani), or 'Rasau', claims its derivation from the Sanskrit word 'Rasa', meaning a circular dance accompanied by music, performed by a male dancer and a prescribed number of dancing damsels numbering up to sixty-four. The text of the song varies in each rāsa. Scholars hold that rasa was performed in Jain temples by male and female devotees during the nights. There were certain varieties of rasa, such as Tala rasa, Lagud rasa, etc. Gradually this practice was discontinued in the temples and only the textual portion was retained for recital. Remnants of the old rasa, as described in Shrimad Bhagawat, are to be seen in the tribal dances— Garba of Gujarat, and Dandiya, Ghoomar and Gindhad, etc. of Rajasthan. This is perhaps the oldest form of community dance in the country.

Bharata has styled it as 'Kridaniyaka', while Vatsyayana has described it as 'Hallisaka'. Abhinavagupta has defined Hallisak as a circular dance. The commentary Jayamangala on Kamsutra by Yashodhar has defined Hallisaka as a dance performed by one male and a number of female dancers. Rasaya or Rasak is also the same as rasa, as described in Updeshrasayan. Vijaipal Vaidya has described rasa as a long poem with events showing the development of characters. Thus, the word has been variously described by ancient authorities on the subject. Originally, it was a 'Roopak' put to music, but gradually it lost its character and was in various metres to be read or recited. 'Raso' books are not available in Sanskrit or Prakrit. They were written during and after the Apabhramsha period and were accompanied by song, dance and acting.

The 'Raso' works contained a variety of metres. Swayambhoo has called the latter variety 'Rasabandh . These were also styled as Rasak. There is no restriction on the nature of the subject-matter; love, devotion, philosophy—any subject could be adopted. It may be noted that even after the word 'Raso' came into use, the Jain poets continued to compose their works in both the varieties. Stock may be taken of rasa works based on dance and music and those consisting of a variety of metres. A chronological list of both the kinds is as follows: Upadesh rasayan (1143) by Jindutta Suri, Bharateshwar-Bahubali rasa (1184) by Shalibhadra Suri, Buddhi rasa (1184) by Shalibhadra Suri, Jeevadaya rasa (1200) by Asigu, Chandanbala rasa (c. 1200) by Asigu, Jambuswami rasa by Dharmasuri, Ravantgiri rasa (1232), Nemijinand raso or Abu rasa (1232), Gayasukumal rasa (1243) by Delhani, Saptakshetri rasu (1270), Pethad rasa (1303) by Mandalik, Kacchuli rasa (1306), Samara rasa (1314) by Ambadev Suri. Some sources give the following other works: Shantinath dev rasa (1236) by Somkirti, Mahavir rasa (1250) by Abhai Tilak Gani, Shalibhadra rasa (1275) by Jin Prabodh Suri, Barahvrat rasa (1281) by Vinayachand Suri, Stulibhadra rasa (1281), Kumarpal rasa by Devprabhagani, Shrivakvidhi rasa (1314) by Sudhali Suri, Jinkushal Suri pattabhishek rasa (1320), Pattabhishek rasa (1333), Panch pandava charat rasa (1353) by Shalibhadra Suri, Neminath rasa, Trivikram rasa (1358) by Jinodaya Suri, Jinodaya Suri Pattabhishek rasa (1358), Bhattarak Devasundarsuri rasa (1388) by Champ kavi, Siddiha chakra shripal ras (1411) by Mandan, Shalibhadra Rasa by Sadhu Hans, Jinadattsuri pattabishek ras (1418) by Mandan, Prithvichandra gunsagar ras (1424) by Abhai Tilak Gani, Vayarswami rasa (1432) by Mandan, Nala-Damayanti ras (1441) by Chand Kavi, Jineshwar Suri Vivaha varnana rasa, Bisvirahman rasa (1511) by Sudhali Suri. Apart from the above rasa works which are more or less sectarian in nature, there are some other books based on a variety of metres. Prominent among them are Hammir raso by Jodhraj, Hammir raso by Sarangdev (1293), Prithviraj raso by Chand Bardai (12th c), Visaldev raso by Narpati Nath (13th c.), Parmar raso, Vijaipal raso (1543) by Nalsingh, Ram rasa by Surjandas Puniya (16th c.), Ramraso (1618) by Madhodas, Kayam Khan raso (1634-53) by Nyamat Khan alias Jan kavi, Satrasal raso (1653), Raghu raso (1668) by Muhata Raghunath, Rana raso (1698) by Dayal, Sagat Singh Raso (1698) by Girdhar Asiya, Sandesh rasak by Abdul Rehman, Binhai raso by Mahesh das (17th c.), Ratan Raso by Kumbhakarna (17th c.), Mankar raso by Kirti Sunder (17th c.), Sujan Raso (1712) by Jogidas and Pratap rasa by Jachak Jeevan (19th c.).

The process of development from Rasa to Raso is very interesting. It is worth noting that it changed from dance-cum-music to a readable book in various metres. The Jain and other writers wrote the raso in a spirit of despise too. Satirical and humorous works were called raso. Charan poets also wrote raso like Banya raso. Out of these numerous rasa works, Bisaldev rasa is the main work which tells us of the formation of a rasa dance, number of dancers and songsters, and reveals the original nature of rasa and rasayan. This form of entertainment gradually lost its character and was limited to wars and warriors, and further degenerated to humorous subjects.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirendra Varma & others, Hindi sahitya kosh, (Banaras); Hariji, Adikal ke agyat Hindi rasa kavya (Jaipur).

Ha.

RATH, BRAJANATH (Oriya; b. 1936) started his literary career as a poet in the early fifties. He is a poet with leftist leanings. His works exhibit considerable artistic excellence. Rath has not sacrificed the lyrical grace of his poetry for the sake of experiment. He has the following collections of poems to his credit: Maru golap (1960), Tinoti niswasar akash (1962), Nijaswa samlap (1969), Maru golap o anyanya kabita (1972) and Nisabda pratibad (1977).

Brajanath Rath was the editor of a periodical called Kavya and has co-edited two anthologies of modern verse, viz., Dharitri (1957) and Samasamayika Oriya prema kabita (Contemporary Oriya love poems, 1962). Several of his poems have been translated into Hindi and published under the title Kanch ka ghar. He has been associated with a number of literary organisations. He has received many awards for his literary contribution. The earlier poems of Rath were essentially romantic, but later he eschewed romanticism and propagated a revolutionary ideology. His style is simple and graceful.

N.Sa.

RATH, CHANDRASEKHAR (Oriya; b. 1929), essayist, novelist and short-story writer, was born in the town of Balangir. He took his M.A. degree in 1952 from Lucknow University and joined the educational service of the Orissa government. A widely read man, he knows equally well Oriya, English, Hindi and Bengali languages.

His first articles were in English, but in about 1961 he turned to writing in Oriya. He is a writer of excellent essays, which embody fervid intellectualism. Drusti o darshana, Asruta swara, Mu satyadharma kahuchi, Uttara aranya, Madhu sandhana and Kritadasara swapna are collections of his essays. His short stories reveal him as a humanitarian and a realist, and have brought him wide recognition. Aneka banya pare, Ashwarohira galpa, Samrata o anyamane and Anya eka sakala are collections of his short stories. His novels, which equally bear the stamp of his humanitarianism, include Jantrarudha, Asurya upanibesha and Nabajataka.

He received the Orissa Sahitya Academy Award for his novels in 1980 and for his essays in 1981. In 1982 he received the Sarala Award for his short stories.

P.P.

RATH, KABISURYA BALADEBA (Oriya; b. 1779, d. 1845) was born in Bijayanagara Goda and got his education under the supervision of his father and maternal grandfather, both of whom were Sanskrit scholars. He was well-versed in Sanskrit. The zamindars of different estates of Ganjam (Jalantara and Athagada) appointed him their chief court poet.

For his outstanding poetic gift he was honoured with the title 'Kabisurya Rayaguru'.

Being a gifted poet and scholar of repute he exhibited his talent in various forms of Oriya poetry: chaupadi, chautisa, chhanda, champu and kavya. His Kishorachandrananda champu is a unique creation of its kind. It is a beautiful well-knit miniature poem based on the conventional story of the union of Radha and Krishna in the bowers of Vrindavana in which Lalita, the dearest companion of Radha, plays a vital role. It can be called a miniature song-drama (giti-natya) written in the form of song-dialogues. It contains thirty-four beautiful chaupadis composed in chautisa form in various ragas and raginis befitting the emotion and atmosphere. Besides Kishorachandrananda champu, he wrote a large number of chaupadis, jananas, chautisas and chhandas. They were published under the titles, Chaupadi ratnakara (Ocean of chaupadis), Samgita kalpalata (Divine creeper of music) and Kabita kallolini (River of poetry). We experience an important tone in these songs and that is evidently the tone of passion for earthy love. Baladeba is chiefly a poet of love-in-union (sambhoga shringara) where lust is preferred to love. The erotic consciousness and word music of Jayadeva's Gita-Govinda being the main inspiration, his chaupadis convey the exuberance of erotic love. They are not like the devotional songs of the Vaishnavas, but are songs of life, love, joy and beauty. The same can be said of his Chandrakala, a long descriptive fictional poem on conventional theme in conventional rhetoric and style.

But there is the spontaneous emotion of a devotee discernible in his 'Bhajanas' and 'Jananas' where he sings of the glory of the Lord, of hope and despair and anxiety for emancipation. Baldeva had also a sense of humour and was a good satirist. This can be seen in his Hasyakallola (Wave of humour), written in poetic prose. His Chhanda-Chautisas are stereotyped long erotic poems. He is the exponent of a type of folk-song, called 'dhumpa', which is erotic in nature and has a close relation with rain. Though this form is an admixure of both the elite and the folk, it is, in spite of its musical appeal, a creation of unrefined, rustic taste. He is no doubt, a major poet in old Oriya literature and is a favourite with the people.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dasarathi Dasa, Kabisurya kabya-bibha (Cut-tack, 1978); Kulamani Dasa (ed.), Kabisurya granthabali (Cuttack, 1947); Mayadhar Mansingha, Odia sahityara itihasa (Cuttack, 1967).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

G.B.

RATH, MRUTYUNJAY (Oriya; b.1882, d.1924) was born at the village of Dakshina Rajasa in the district of Puri. He was a brilliant student and stood first in the degree examination, and received the title 'Vanibhushan'. He became a Sanskrit teacher at the Cuttack Collegiate School.

Mrutyunjay was a devoted writer who enriched Oriya prose with his essays, biographies, criticism archaeological studies, and translations. He knew Oriya, Sanskrit, Bengali and English.

In the first phase of his literary career he wrote a number of educational books, such as Odia rachana o anuvada, Engraji-Sanskruta anuvada and Odia mulasabdabodhika. He also wrote a descriptive poem called Naraja (1922), a novel called Adbhuta parinam (1915), and two collections of essays called Naridarpan and Prabandha -path (1927). His other works are Sarala charita (1911), Karmayogi Gourishankar (1925), Brahmajna Madhusudan, which were serialized in periodicals like Utkal sahitya, Mukura and Prajabandhu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gopalchandra Mishra (ed.), Mrutyunjay granthavali (Cuttack, 1971); N.B. Samantaray, Odia sahityara itihasa (1964); Srinivas Mishra, Adhunika Odia gadya sahitya (Cuttack, 1978).

A.P.

RATHA, RAMAKANTA (Oriya; b. 1934) eminent poet, studied English literature, taught for sometime as lecturer in English at Balasore and subsequently joined the Indian administrative service. His first collection of poems, Kete dinara (1962), contains some of the outstanding poems of our time. The poet contemplates the world of familiar objects—a prostitute, a tiger, a lantern—with a kind of philosophical detachment. In some poems he turns inward and evolves a very personal kind of symbolism which was to characterize much of his later poetry. The voice that speaks through these short, compact poems is the voice of a sensitive, though alienated man. The reader is led into a world of strange shapes and forms; a shoe-shine boy eating butterflies, a man playing violin in a desolate house on the sea-beach, a man withdrawing from a ball because of a sprained ankle.

His second and third collections, Aneka kothari (Several rooms, 1967) and Sandigdha mirgaya (Dubious hunt, 1971) raise profound metaphysical issues but do not offer any solution. In such poems as 'Bagha shikara', 'Ananta shayana,' and 'Bimana durghatanare mrutyu,' the theme is Time, its intransigence and destructiveness. The poet seeks a state beyond death in which he can at least try to understand the life he has lived. But such an understanding is, perhaps, beyond one's grasp and the poet's search for meaning reaches a dead end. Rath's is not a poetry of achieved certainties but of ambiguous possibilities.

In his subsequent collection, Saptama rutu (Seventh season, 1977), which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1978, the poetic voice takes a new turn and its symbolism offers a new world of rich and varied experience. His use of common speech rhythms and of Oriya folklore is very effective. On the whole, his poetry is the saga of an inward voyage undertaken with admirable courage.

His latest volume of poetry entitled Sri Radha (1985) maps this 'inward voyage', linked with life, death and time in the form of Radha's many appeals to Krishna, with a power and sensitiveness almost rare in modern Oriya poetry.

Ramakanta has been a recipient of many honours besides the Sahitya Akademi Award.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Das, 'The Metaphysical Mode in Modern Oriya and Sister Languages' in Indian Literature (1979); Dasarathi Das, Adhunika kavya jijnasa:chitrakalpa (Cuttack, 1974) and Mrutyaulokare rutu saptama (1079); Nityananda Satapathi, 'Sri Ramakanta Rathanka kavyamanasa eka anudhyana' in Istahara (1978); Soubhagya kumar Misra, 'Ramakanta Rathanka kavita: drusti o darshna' in Nabarabi (1975).

S.C.P.
S.K.M.

RATHA, TARINICHARAN (Oriya;b.1883, d.1922) came of a cultured and well-to-do family of Berhampur in the district of Ganjam. He graduated from Presidency College, Madras, and joined government service as a sub-Assistant Inspector of Schools. He left the service after two years, obtained a degree in law and joined the bar at Berhampur in 1908. Later, he was appointed as District Munsif, the first Oriya munsif in the Madras Judicial Service.

During his short span of life Tarinicharan, in spite of his busy career as a legal practitioner and judicial officer, devoted himself to literature. He contributed articles on various subjects to Utkal sahitya, the leading Oriya monthly. His writings include poems, short stories, historical essays, epigraphy, folk lore and literary criticism. He was also reputed for collecting Oriya folk-tales which appeared in Utkal sahitya.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His original literary works include a poetical work called Rusikulya and a historical novel named Annapurna, dealing with a historical episode of the 16th century; the fight of Prataprudra Deb, the king of Orissa, with Krushna Deb Roy of Vijaynagar and the marriage of Prataprudra's daughter to Krushna Deb Roy. His another published work is Mohini or Utkal bijoy. A pioneering work of Tarini Charan is Utkal sahityara itihas (History of Oriya literature). The book reveals the author's wide range of study and an unbiased viewpoint. His Ghumsar itihas (History of Ghumsar) is also a notable work which speaks of his ability for historical research. He first brought to light Madana manjari, an unpublished poetical work of the celebrated poet, Dhananjay Bhanj (1637-1701). It was published in 1915 with a learned introduction and notes from him.

A few of his articles written in English also deserve mention. These articles, written on ancient rulers, temples and inscriptions of Orissa, and published in the Bihar and Orissa Research Journal and Ipigraphica Indica, brought him fame and approbation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Shreedhara Mohapatra, Oriya prakasaka o prasaranara itihas (Granth Mandir, 1986); Eitihasika Tarinicharan Ratha (1976).

J.B.M.

RATHCHAKRA (Marathi). S.N.Pendse is a major Marathi novelist, and Rathchakra is considered to be one of his best works.

Pendse's novels generally deal with a particular colourful locale in north Konkan and its residents. It is a small restricted community and its members are generally poor and hardworking. They have their own customs, and cultural and social traditions. The farmland yields barely enough for livelihood and makes the people hardy. The protagonists in a Pendse novel have, therefore to strive hard to overcome the adverse circumstances of life, and their heroism lies in earning enough for bare sustenance.

The story of Rathchakra revolves round an unnamed young woman, who is let down by her husband and selfish in-laws and has to fend for herself and her children. She is forced to stay at a distant place, far away from home. The novel is an account of her trials and tribulations.

It is a peculiar trait of the novel that almost all the characters are unnamed. If there are no names attached to persons, they belong to the general mass of humanity or they become types. The unnamed young heroine, abandoned by her husband and hounded by the family, decides to stay away with her children. Though the struggle for livelihood is hard and painful, she succeeds in educating her son within her means. But much to her chagrin, she finds him worshipping his father and nursing some sort of hatred for the mother. His ingratitude finally leads the desperate mother to an act of suicide.

The title of the novel Rathchakra is related to an incident in the Mahabharata. Karna, the Kaurava commander, while fighting with his opponent Arjuna, finds his chariot-wheel stuck up in mud and knows immediately that he has lost the battle. In the novel the brave woman lost both the wheels of the chariot of her life, one after another—earlier the husband, and now the son.

Pendse, the novelist, appended an explantory note to the second edition of the novel. In this note the author argued that the local colour of the novel should not be over-emphasized and Rathchakra ought to be judged on its artistic merits alone. In a sense, every novel has its own regional flavour, because each story is bound to have a 'local habitation'. The local habitations may differ, but they are not necessarily integral to the artistic appraisal of a literary work. It is not the local colour alone which lends distinction to a piece of work. The novel has its own norms and needs be judged accordingly. Rathchakra, by any artistic standard, is a novel to reckon with.

M.M.

RATIRAHASYA (Sanskrit) by Kokkoka (c. 12th c.) is a work on Kamashastra (erotica). The work is divided into fifteen chapters, dealing with the fourfold classification of women, the period of their excitement and the way they should be approached; the centres of sexual passion and days suitable for mating; classification of men and women according to the dimension of their organs and the types of union; characteristics of women according to their age, nature and temperament; women of different provinces and their sexual characteristics; varieties of embrace, kiss, nailmark, and different postures of sexual union and the processes involved therein; selection and acceptance of the bride and ways of creating confidence in her, of courting and winning her heart; the position and behaviour of wife; the stages of love and extramarital relations; methods of getting acquainted with women and practical and magical efforts to win them over; and the use of aphrodisiacs for increasing sexual power and regaining lost vitality, and for other miscellaneous purposes.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kokkoka has mainly followed Vatsyayana while describing the act of sexual union, but there are certain features in his work in the case of which he has followed a different tradition. The concept of the centres of sexual excitement in the bodies of women (kamasthanas) and that of the shifting tension of sexual passion (anangasthiti) in accordance with the changes in the phases of the moon were probably derived from some source other than Vatsyayana. In this connection Kokkoka refers to the works of Nadikeshvara and Gonikaputra. The classification of women into Padmini, Shankhini, Chitrini and Hastini types was probably adopted by Kokkoka from the Natyashastra of Bharata. For women to be employed in sexual purposes, Kokkoka makes a distinction between the inexperienced (abhukta) and experienced (bhukta) ones, and prescribes different forms of love-plays for these two groups. The work of Kokkoka thus shows some features of extra interest like classification of women into four types according to their nature and temperament, days and time congenial for sexual excitement, centres of passion in women's body, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Comfort (tr.), Ratirahasya (English tr., London, 1964); D. Parajuli (ed.), Ratirahasya, with Kanchinatha's commentary (Lahore); S.C. Upadhyaya (tr.), Ratirahasya: English tr., Bombay, 1965).

N.N.B.

RATNAKAR, JAGANNATH DAS (Hindi; b. 1866, d. 1932) was a famous Hindi poet who initiated the modern era in Hindi literature. Born in a Vaisya family, he studied Persian for his M.A. Later, he studied law also. He worked as private secretary to Naresh Pratap Singh, Raja of Ayodhya, from 1902 to 1906. He was one of the founder members of the Kashi Nagari Pracharini Sabha and editor, Sahitya sudhanidhi and Saraswati. His poetical works are Hindola (swing, 1894), a collection of poems; Samalochanadarsha (Essay on criticism; 1919), a poetical translation of Pope's Essay on Criticism; Harishchandra (1921), a narrative poem based on Bhartendu's play Satya Harishchandra; Gangavataran (The descent of Ganga, 1927), a narrative poem of thirteen cantos; Udhava-shatak (1929), a bhakti poem in which Udhava comes to Vrindavan with Krishna's message for gopis. All these poetical works are written in Brajbhasha. Besides these, he edited Sudhasar (1887), a collection of amorous poems by old Hindi poets; Kanthabharan, a book on poetics: Sundar shringar (1893), a long amorous poem by the poet Sundar; Hitatarangini (1884), a book on the sentiment of love.

Ratnakar's prose articles are mostly written on the various topics of poetics or on epigraphy. Mostly he wrote poems dealing with the philosophy of Bhakti which was influenced by the Vaishnava ideology of Madhava, Vallabha and Chaitanya. He held a broader view of Vaishnavism, having Radhakrishna as his personal God. As a poet of the renaissance, he displayed his eagerness for national awakening. His style was traditional and decorative akin to that of the Riti school of Hindi poetry, and because of the influence of traditional ethics his amorous poems observed a sense of propriety and did not cross the bounds of decency. He certainly belonged to the old order, but did not confine himself to sentiments of love and bhakti only. He wrote poems on bhakti, shringar (love), niti (morality) and vir rasa (heroic sentiment), and gave an authentic touch to the various trends in vogue during his time. He was a rhetorician too with a critical insight, very much evident in his analysis of metre, language and poetic sentiments (rasas).

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Krishna Shankar Shukla (ed.), Kavivar Ratnakar.

I.C.

RATNAKARA (Sanskrit; AD 9th c.), author of Haravijaya, was a poet of considerable merit. He flourished in the court of two kings of Kashmir, Jayaditya and Avantivarman, who reigned in the ninth century AD. It is stated in Kalhana's Rajatarangini that Muktakana, Shivasvami, Anandavardhana (author of Dhvanyaloka) and Ratnakara were contemporaries. Ratnakara, has three works to his credit: (1) Haravijaya is a Mahakavya, probably the longest in Sanskrit literature, having fifty cantos. As its name suggests, it describes the exploits and greatness of Shiva. The poet boasts at the end of this epic that even an ordinary person can become a Sanskrit poet by studying this work. There are two commentaries on this work, one by Vallabhadeva and another by Alaka. (2) Vakroktipanchashika is a short poem containing fifty verses. It is in the form of a dialogue between Shiva and Parvati. The double entendre is profusely used to explain the words of one with those of the other in a manner not intended by the speaker. (3) Dhvanigathapanvchika is ascribed to Ratnakara. It is a commentary on the Gathas (Prakrit verses) found in Dhvanyaloka.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ratnakara earned a sobriquet 'Talaratnakara' for his vivid description of the setting sun and the rising moon as two symbols in the hands of the sky-damsel (Haravijaya, 15.5)

H.N.V.R.

RATNAKARA VARNI (Kannada; b. 1557) occupies an important place among those poets of the sixteenth century who employed the 'sangatya' metre for their epics. Not much is known about his life. He has stated in his Bharateshha vaibhava that he was born a Kshatriya and his father was Mandaraswamy. He was initiated into the Jaina fold by Charukirti Yogishwara and was led on to the path of deliverance by Hamsanatha, i.e. God himself. Ratnakara Varni was a Jaina, most probably born and brought up at Mudubidara, a town in the Southern coastal belt of Karnataka. He seems to have been known by several other names like Ratnakara Siddha, Ratnakara Anna, and had titles like Niranjana Siddha.

Ratnakara Varni is certainly the author of Triloka shataka, Aparajiteshwara shataka, and Bharatesha charite or Bharatesha vaibhava. He was perhaps the author of some philosophical songs also. Ratnakaradhishwara shataka is also ascribed to him. Triloka shataka consists of 128 quatrains. It deals with the state of the universe in accordance with the concepts of Jaina religion. Aparajiteshwara shataka consists of 121 quatrains dealing with philosophical subjects such as morals, renuniciation, soul, etc. Ratnakaradhishwara shataka, consisting of 138 quatrains, deals with such aspects as the three gems (ratnatraya), the nature of the soul, the cycle of births and death, family life, renunciation, good and evil. This is almost a handbook for the followers of the Jaina faith. 238 songs have been attributed to Ratnakara Varni and have been published under the title Annagalapadagalu (Songs of the elder brother) or Ratnakara annala padajati (Anthology of the songs of Ratnakara). The impact of the vachanas of the Shaiva saints and the kirtanas of the Vaishnava saints is evident.

It is Bharatesha vaibhava or Bharatesha charite which has brought him enduring fame. It is a lengthy epic consisting of eighty books and 10,000 verses. He has stated that he completed this work within nine months.

Bharatesha vaibhava relates the story of the first Lord Bharata. Bharata's family life, his conquests, his achievement in yoga, his renunciation of worldly pleasures and his acquiring deliverance, all these have been beautifully described in the epic. It is true that the story of Bharata occurs in the earlier works like the Purva purana by Jinasena, Adipurana by Pampa and the Chavundaraya purana by Chavundaraya, but it is Rathakara Varni who has raised Bharata to the loftiness of an epic hero. Here is a grand concept of Bharata never before witnessed in any of the earlier works and which at the same time is unopposed to the religious tenets of Jainism and is a harmonious blending of renunciation (yoga) and pleasure (bhoga).

Ratnakara Varni has, indeed, created a place for himself as one of the greatest poets in the history of Kannada literature. Kuvempu, a great poet of modern times, pays him this tribute: 'When viewed from the point of view of content, poetry and philosophy, Ratnakar Varni, the author of Bharatesha vaibhava, seems to get elevated to the status of the epic poets of the very first row.' His epic has rightly been translated into English, Hindi, Gujarati, Marathi and other Indian languages.

N.Ba.

RATANA PADAGALU (Kannada) is a collection of monologues by G.P. Rajaratnam (1934). These monologues are supposed to be uttered by a drunkard, Ratna, and taken down by an educated man. Lively and at times humorous, the monologues are in rustic dialect, and are characterized by vividness, power, freshness of imagery, and frankness which, however, never offends the most exacting taste. Ratna's zest for life and his affection for his wife, Putnanji, render the monologues radiant. Some of the poems expressing Ratna's love of Kannada have become immensely popular. The monologues are supposed to be uttered by a humble drunkard, but are in places shrewd and contain sharp social criticism.

For several decades the collection remained immensely popular, but in recent times sophisticated criticism has questioned whether the sensibilities are those of a humble rustic drunkard, and whether the language suits the sensibilities of a modern man who is really speaking through Ratna.

Rajaratnam here forged an idiom unique and inimmitable.

L.S.S.R.

RATNAPRABHASURI (Prakrit/Apabhramsha), was a well-known scholar as well as commentator in Prakrit literature. He was a Jainacharya who wrote the vritti (explanatory notes) entitled Doghatti on Dharmdasagani's Upadeshmala. The work includes some small kavyas,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

viz. Rishabha-paranaka sandhi, Vira-paranaka sandhi, Gajasukumala sandhi, Shalibhadra sandhi, and Avantisukumala sandhi. The word 'sandhi' means kavya. The vritti was written in AD 1182. Ratnaprabhasuri was a great scholar of Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha. Therefore, the vritti contains a number of Apabhramsha verses. Two of these kavyas depict the lives of Jaina Tirthankaras, particularly Rishabha and Mahavira. The remaining three deal with the lives of Gajasukumala, Shalibhadra and Avantisukumala who were the devotees of Lord Mahavira.

D.S.

RATNAVALI (Sanskrit), a famous Sanskrit drama, technically called 'natika', is ascribed to Shriharsha (7th c. AD). Ratnavali and Priyadarshika (another play by the same author) are variations on a single theme with the same set of characters and almost an identical situation.

In Sanskrit the generic term for drama is 'rupaka', meaning 'poem in forms'. It is divided into ten divisions, while 'upa-rupaka' (lesser variety) is divided into eighteen. Ratnavali, being a natika, comes under the upa-rupaka class.

The Natyashastra states that a nataka ought to depict some events in the life of a distinguished prince of good character and should deal with the past and not with a present or future event. According to later rhetoricians a nataka should have a celebrated story for its plot and contain five acts and five junctures, etc. As against this, a natika may be based on an invented story, consisting of four acts and abounding with female characters. The hero of a natika should be an illustrious prince— a character gay and thoughtless but firm. It will be observed that Ratnavali conforms to this definition and possesses all the characteristics of a natika.

The play is a comedy of court life, centring round the light-hearted love-intrigue of king Udayana with a lowly maiden of unknown descent, their secret meetings through the help of a jester and the damsel's friend, the jealousy of the queen and her anger and resentment, and finally her acceptance of the situation when the maiden is discovered to be her lost cousin.

If a drama is the reproduction of certain situations so as to induce in the spectators a sense of identification with the hero or other characters, and if composing drama is an art of presenting a story in the form of dialogues, Shriharsha is a success by any standard. He has been able to depict beautifully the scene of Udayana's secret love-making with the accompanying sentiments of desire, anxiety, and frustration. He is skilled in touches of lightness, vivacity and tenderness, although he is far behind Kalidasa in brilliance.

In depicting characters, the playwright followed the traditional framework. Udayana and Vasavadatta come from tradition. Sagarika is his own invention.

In presenting dramatic situations like Sagarika's despair, Udayana's sudden appearance, unexpected discovery of the lost cousin of queen Vasavadatta in the person of Sagarika— an object of hatred turning into an object of love, Shriharsha shows his skill.

The plot of Ratnavali is borrowed from the Brihatkatha of Gunadhya, and it is obvious that Shriharsha has taken Kalidasa's Malavikagnimitra as the model for his play. Dramatically, the characters are stereotyped, but the language and descriptions are simple. In fact, the simplicity and raciness of the play offer a pleasant contrast to the involved style of Bana. The action moves swiftly and the development of the plot leading to the fruition of the protagonist's love is logical.

Several rhetoricians have taken verses from this play to illustrate technical terms of dramaturgy and figures of speech. Shriharsha's influence on later Sanskrit dramatists is considerable which is explained by the play's popularity and success on the stage.

The play has also been translated into modern Indian languages because of its dramatic quality.

B.S.
H.P.M.

RATNESHVARA (Gujarati; b.1654, d. 1714) was a notable Gujarati poet. He was a Shrimali Brahmin from Dabhoi, a town in central Gujarat. He was an excellent scholar of Sanskrit and an able poet in Gujarati. He rendered the whole of the Bhagavata Purana into Gujarati verse, strictly following the erudite commentary of Shridharacharya. The date of composition of the Gujarati version of the first canto of this celebrated Sanskrit work is 1684 and that of the second canto is 1693. Ratneshvara also gave versified translations of some parts of the Mahabharata. Moreover, he wrote a number of didactic poems. If the Murkhavali (line or description of fools) ascribed to him is his genuine work, then he was living in 1714, the date of its composition. He has written a number of devotional lyrics and also Mahina (Twelve months), describing pangs of separation from and union with God personified as Krishna. Ratneshvara is remarkable for his chiselled verse, especially his verse in syllabic metres in Sanskritised style, which are comparatively rare in Old Gujarati literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Anantrai Raval, Gujarati sahitya (2nd ed.,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bombay, 1963); Kanhaiyalal M. Munshi, Gujarat and its Literature, Bombay, 1935); Keshavram K. Shastri (ed.), Srimad Bhagavata, Pts. I-II (Ahmedabad, 1935); Umashankar Joshi, Anantrai Raval and Yaswant Shukla (eds.), Gujarati sahitya no itihasa, Pt. II (Ahmedabad, 1976).

B.J.S.

RATNO (Gujarati; 18th c.), was an eminent poet who lived at Kheda near Ahmedabad and did cloth-printing. He is known by his only published work, entitled Mahina (months), describing the pangs of love suffered by gopis on their separation from Krishna. Mahina or Baramasi (Twelve months) is, generally, an erotic poem describing love in separation and delineating the mental and physical condition of a lover in terms of changing seasons, month by month. Mahina by Ratno, composed in 1739, is a veritable gem of lyrical poetry. It gives beautiful pictures of nature in various months and describes the agonies of the gopis' heart. In addition to the twelve months beginning with Kartika the poet also describes the thirteenth month - the intercalary month—which has become a new obstacle in meeting with Krishna. At the end there are a few lines hinting at the ultimate meeting of the gopis with Krishna and their love on union with him. Ratno has written another poem, 'Danalila', describing Krishna's sportive exactions of dana or cess in the form of curd from the gopis. The work is not published and is available only in the manuscript-form.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anantrai Raval, Gujarati sahitya (2nd ed., Bombay, 1963); Itchharam S. Desai, Brihat kavyadohan, Vol. I (6th ed., Bombay, 1915); Krishnalal M. Jhaveri, Milestones in Gujarati Literature (Bombay, 1914); Umashankar Joshi, Anantrai Raval and Yashwant Shukla, Gujarati sahityano itihasa, Pt. II (Ahmedabad, 1976).

B.J.S.

RATRICHA DIVAS (Marathi) by B.S. Mardhekar is an experimental novel which, as the novelist asserts, is based on the idea that man's life is a continuous stream of consciousness, working on three levels: conscious, accessible to all; sub-conscious, known only to the person himself, and the unconscious, not known to any one. The novel Ratricha divas (Night into day), registers myriads of impressions during twelve hours in the life of Dikpal, sub-editor of a Bombay-based journal. The novel succeeds in giving a native garb to the foreign model and may be considered a substantial contribution to the genre of the stream of consciousness technique. The hero's interior monologue provides an emotional and aesthetic unity to the narration, and becomes almost a theme rather than a narrative technique.

The beginning of the novel shows the hero's fascination for colours and his love of literature. He reflects on the rays of the setting sun passing through his glass of orange juice, the light of the moon entering his bed room, butterflies and their wings, etc. His mind appears to be richly stored with snatches of poetry too from Marathi (Balkavi), English (Coleridge, Shelley, Hopkins, Keats, A.A.Milne), Italian (Dante)—poets known for their love of evocative images and words with musical connotations. There are recollections of childhood, the father's discipline and the mother's gentle admonitions to be neat and clean, which have a palimpsest-like effect on his mind.

In his discussion with his friend Mulam, he attacks the corruption in the universities, petty malpractices of the so-called academics and the economic dogma of Marx. He is for social justice and is a believer in kindness and mercy. Coupled with his love of literature is his sense of the comic and the ridiculous. His conversation has all the devices of the comic: punning, alliteration, and assimilated or distorted quotation. Laughter helps him relieve the monotony of daily routine and ease the tensions of everyday life. There is also a hint of romance with Harini, the boss's daughter, and his great expectations.

A dream sequence in the third phase is an attempt at fantasy wherein the hero and his friend grow fishlike tails and float in the sea with fairies. They eat coloured, rich food from coral dishes and ultimately land on the wings of a windmill. This is interesting but does not thrill the reader as a fantasy should.

In the final section, he and his friend land in a machine-ruled Utopia. Committees on Social Welfare, Science and Technology, Education and Philosophy decide the State policies which are executed by the machines. Dikpal's complaint is that they have no self-will. He asks the girl who guides him if she too is a machine. Though he receives a kiss in reply, his complaint still is that it aroused no emotion, before or after. He wakes up frustrated and disappointed.

In a brief epilogue, back in his office, the rotary machine gives the news of Harini's wedding and later of Japan's entry into the war, ironically in the Pacific Ocean. There is no scope here for the creation of a myth or the building up of a philosophy to sustain one's faith in life except Dikpal's own aesthetic conscience.

A.K.B.

RAUT, BENUDHAR (Oriya; b.1925) was born in the village of Harichandanpur in Keonjhar district. He did his M.A. in Oriya in 1949 from the Utkal University and joined a Government College as lecturer in Oriya. Benudhar has written primarily poetry, but he has also to his credit a number of articles on art and literature which appeared in different periodicals from time to time. As a poet he is basically an experimentalist and has tried diverse techniques. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he does not blindly imitate the new poets of the West. He believes that problems and their solutions in the east and in the west cannot be the same and they call for totally different approaches. Benudhar does not try to imitate a technique which does not suit the subject. He often seeks to modify the technique to suit his need.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His poetical works include Pingalar surya (1967). He also wrote some essays which, though few in number, testify to the clarity and originality of his thought.

P.P.

RAUTROY, SATCHIDANANDA (Oriya; b. 1916), popularly known as Sachi Rautroy, poet and story-teller, was educated at Calcutta and Cuttack. When he was a student he joined the freedom movement, and took part in the people's struggle in the native states besides students' and peasants' movements. He was imprisoned twice. His literary career began when he was barely eleven years of age. Some of his poems were banned in 1939 and 1942. He was also fined under the Press Act. He received his training in Industrial Relations and Social Welfare in Australia and New Zealand under the Colombo Plan in 1952 and again at the International Labour Organisation, Geneva, in 1955. He worked as the Chief Labour Welfare Officer and later as the Executive Officer of Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd., Calcutta, for twenty years. He resigned in 1962 and devoted himself exclusively to writing and other cultural activities. He has also been long associated with Diganta, a literary quarterly, as editor. He founded the Diganta Museum and Research Centre at Cuttack in 1967.

Author of more than fifty books in Oriya and English, Sachi Rautroy has been quite active in the literary field. Some of the outstanding collections of his poems are Baji Rout (1938-42), Pallishri (Beauty of the villages, 1941), Pandulipi (The manuscripts, 1947), Abhiyan (Expedition, 1948), Swagata (Soliloquy, 1958), Kabita 1962, Kabita 1969, Asiara swapna (The dream of Asia, 1970), Kabita 1971, Kabita 1974, Kabita 1983 and Kabita 1985, etc. His early poems revealed him as the 'People's Poet' and a socialist realist but afterwards he changed his course to humanism. He became famous for his innovative similes, metaphors and images as well as for his prose poems.

He has also been a successful novelist. He set altogether a new trend with his only novel, Chitragriba (1935) which has all the characteristics of an anti-novel. Collections of his stories include Masanira phula (Flowers of the burning ground, 1947), Matira taj (Taj of the soil, 1947) and Chhai (Shadow, 1948). Generally, his stories are realistic: they delineate petty but interesting incidents of everyday life, and explore the human psyche. He also wrote a number of essays on trends in modern Oriya poetry and the evolution of values in literature.

Some of his well-known poems and stories have been translated into English and published under the titles The Boatman Boy and Forty Poems (1955) and The Short Stories of Sachi Rautroy (1972).

Sachi Rautroy travelled widely in Europe, Asia and America. He received several awards for his contribution to literature including the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1963, the Soviet Land Nehru Award in 1965, and the Jnanpith Award in 1988. He also received the D. Litt. degree honoris causa from Andhra and Berhampur Universities. He is, indeed, a major trend-setter in modern Oriya literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gurucharan Pattanayak, Odia shaityara mati o gati (Cuttack, 1968); Nityananda Satpathy, Sabujaru sampratika (Cuttack, 1979).

K.C.B.

RAVAL, ANANTRAI MANISHANKAR (Gujarati, b. 1912) has been a leading literary critic. After a brilliant academic career, he became a professor of Gujarati literature and retired in 1977 as the Chairman of the Department of linguistics of Gujarat University. He also served for a while as Controller of Languages with the Gujarat Government. While in service as professor, he produced a number of books on literary criticism. On behalf of the Gujarat Sahitya Sabha, he did maximum annual serveys of Gujarati literature. Among his works are Sahitya vihar (1946), Gandhakshat (1948), Sahitya vivek (1958), Sahitya nikash (1958), Sameeksha (1958), Sameeksha (1962), Samalochana (1966), Granthastha vangmay (1967), Taratamya (1972), Unmeelan (1974), Adi vivechangrantha and Upachaya, a collection of educational and other serious topics. He has written a detailed introduction to Raino parvat, a play by Ramanbhai Nilkanth. He has compiled and edited medieval works like Nalakhyan by Premanand (1951), Madanmohana by Shamal (1955), and also works of modern poets like Kalapi, Nanalal, Botadkar, Mansukhlal Jhaveri and short story writers like D. Dhoomketu, Chunilal Vardhaman Shah, Ramanlal Vasantlal Desai, Pannalal Patel, etc. He has also compiled articles by Dhoomketu, Narmadashankar Mehta, etc. and one-act plays for the Sahitya Akademi. He has edited a number of centenary memorial volumes. His history of medieval Gujarati literature has been well received as a good attempt in that direction. He has also translated a number of short stories by Tolstoy.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Raval is known for his scholarly criticism and meticulous evaluation of Gujarati literature. His language in criticism is precise, while elsewhere his prose has touches of poetry.

Anantrai Raval received the Ranjitram Gold Medal for his work in the field of criticism in 1955 and the Sahitya Akademi Award for Taratamya in 1974. In terms of both quantity and quality, his contribution to literary criticism in Gujarati is quite significant. He was elected President of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad in 1980 and has been associated with a number of literary organisations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Indravadan Dave and Hiralal Parekh (ed.) Granth ane granthkar.

C.S.

RAVAL, CHHAGANLAL VIDYARAM (Gujarati; b. 1859, d. 1947) was a research scholar of repute, who engaged himself in research, looking for old manuscripts and writing commentaries and annotations on them, and editing and publishing the works of medieval poets. He published five volumes of Prachin kavya sudha (1922-1924). In these volumes he presented unknown poems of rather well-known poets of medieval Gujarati literature and introduced some of the lesser poets to the reading public. In his introduction he has given all available information about these poets, thus paving the way for further research on them. Besides, he has compiled and edited other compositions of medieval poets in his Prachin kavya vinod.

He has written original poems also which have been published in two volumes: Rasa kallol and Rutuvaranan. The former is a collection of his poems on the 'Rāsa' genre, consisting of songs to be recited while dancing. The poems reveal tender human emotions, depict the beauty of nature, and praise deities like Radha and Krishna, Shiva and Parvati and others. In Rutuvaranan he has described the beauty of different seasons, and the change in the life style of people with the change of seasons. One can see the influence of Kalidasa's Ritusamhar on the poet. We find enough of originality in his works as he has drawn pictures from contemporary life, besides depending on classical poets.

C.M.

RAVAL, NALIN CHANDRAKANT (Gujarati; b. 1933) is a noteworthy poet in the post-Independence Gujarati poetry. He studied at Ahmedabad and started his professional career as a college-teacher of English, and has been vocationally active in literary pursuits. His main contribution to Gujarati was during the 50s and 60s. Classicist by taste, he is temperamentally a romantic. He shows the influence of both Gujarati and English traditional poetry which is one of the sources of his own creative work. His traditional sensitivity and modern sensibility have a combined effect on his expressive style. His refined taste and innovative spirit in the choice of diction make his poetry remarkable. His mysticism and agnosticism 60th may be seen in his lyrics which make them reflective in turn.

He has to his credit two collections of poems: Udgar (1962) and Avakash (1972). Some beautiful rural sights and life in urban society are successfully pictured in these two collections.

Besides poetry, he has written some remarkable short stories which are collected in Swapnalok (1977). Though primarily a poet, he is also interested in writing critical essays on the poets and poetry of Gujarati and some European languages. His critical faculty and scholastic approach are well discerned in the two volumes, Pashchatya kavita (1973) and Anubhav (1975). As a critic, he is serious in his approach without being pedantic.

Nalin Raval, irrespective of the form he chooses to write in, writes with conviction.

D.P.

RAVAL, PRAJARAM (Gujarati, b. 1917) was born and educated in the Jhalawad region of Saurashtra in Gujarat. He was a practitioner of Ayurvedic medicine and Principal of an Ayurvedic Medical College, but from his early childhood he had been a lover of poetry. He began writing poems from his student days, and they were published in Kumar, a periodical of repute, which encouraged many young promising writers. He wrote poems on the beauty of nature, human emotions, and man's spiritual quest. His first book of poems Padma (1954), which has a wide range of subject-matter and style, established him as an up and coming poet.

A well-known Gujarati poet Sundaram had by this time settled at Aurobindo Ashram, spreading the message of the master in Gujarat. Many young poets had been attracted to Shri Aurobindo's philosophy and Raval was one amongst them. Hence his poetry took a turn from the material to the spiritual. His second collection of poems Nandi (1964) contains the spiritual message of Shri Aurobindo. His poems speak of his faith in the evolution of man reaching out to the Supreme. He also gives a glimpse of the celestial lustre that emerges from the supramental. The word 'Nandi' means prelude. The poems in the book are thus a prelude to the life divine as he writes in one of his poems—a prelude to the arrival of the immortal. In this collection of poems we have also his translations of three poems of Swami Vivekananda and fourteen poems of Shri Aurobindo. The translations reproduce the beauty and serenity of the original.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In 1970 his third collection of poems Naivedya was published. In these poems his horizon widens. We have here a section of poems on love which proclaims that love is the greatest object in this world. The poet, in fact, expresses his love for every aspect of the world—even for darkness, ugly animals, thunderstorms and burning deserts. There is another section where he celebrates the beauty of nature.

He has also translated the Raghuvansha of Kalidasa–a lucid piece of work which retains the beauty of the original. Over and above everything, Prajaram will be remembered as a poet who brought the philosophy of Shri Aurobindo to the doorsteps of Gujarat.

C.M.

RAVAL, RAVISHANKAR MAHASHANKAR (Gujarati; b. 1892, d. 1977) was a painter and a writer. He played a significant role in enhancing the prestige of the art of Gujarat and making it widely known. Benefited greatly by his association with Haji Mohammed, the veteran editor of Vismi sadi, at the beginning of his career, he started the magazine Kumar in 1924. His assignments to copy the Ajanta frescoes helped him understand the essence of India's art heritage. He did admirable work bringing painting and literature close together. His album of paintings depicting various characters from K.M. Munshi's novels was well-received. His portrait drawings of eminent writers also received good recognition.

Among his written works are Haji Mohammad samarak granth (ed. 1922), Sol sundar chitro (1925), Ajantana kalamandapo (with others, 1936). Ajuali raat (collection of children's stories, with others, 1938), Chitrashrishti (1938);,Chitrashiksha (1940); Kalakarni samskar yatra (1947), Kalachintan (1947), K.M. Munshini patrashrishti (1953), Kalakarni kalame (1956), Bharatiya samskritina poojak Dr. James Cousins (Biography, 1959), Atmakathanak (Autobiography, 1967) etc. Kalakarni samskar yatra is an interesting account of his travels in Japan, north India and the Kulu valley. Atmakathanak which narrates the experiences of an artist against the background of his times was awarded the 1967 prize of the Gujarat Government. He was the recipient of the Ranjitram Gold Medal (1930) for his contribution to the enrichment of the culture of Gujarat. Rightly known as the Kalaguru of Gujarat, he was made President of the art section of the 13th convention of the Gujarat Sahitya Parishad. The Government of India conferred the title of Padmashri on him in 1966. He won the Soviet Land Nehru Award in 1965 and was made a Fellow of the Lalit Kala Akademi in 1970. Through the establishment of the Gujarat Kala Sangh (1934), he inspired many artists who were his pupils.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Bachubhai Raval (ed.), Kumar (December 1967, and January 1978); Hiralal T. Parekh, Granth ane granthkar II (1931).

C.S.

RAVANAVADHA (Sanskrit) or Bhattikavya is an ambitious work by Bhattiswamy, who is said to have lived during the reign of king Dharasena (6th c.) of Saurashtra. It is, however, more likely that he belonged to the fourth or fifth century AD. Bhatti's main aim was to establish his scholarship, and he wrote his poem to explain the rules of grammar and certain aspects of rhetoric, using the basic narrative design of the Ramayana of Valmiki.

The poem is divided into 22 cantos. Cantos 1-9 and 14-22 illustrate the rules of Panini's grammar, while cantos 10-13 explain certain features of rhetoric. Canto 13 is significant as it illustrates 'bhashasama', for the verses can be read both as Sanskrit and Prakrit due to the employment of words alike in the two languages. In his work Bhatti has ingeniously summarised the whole story of the Ramayana.

Though Ravanavadha is acclaimed a mahakavya (epic), as it fulfils almost all the characteristics laid down for it, it is primarily a 'shastrakavya'. Bhatti's greatness lies not in his being a 'mahakavi', but in striking a new path of writing a poem which, as he proudly proclaims at the end of his poem, would not be intelligible without the help of a commentary to people who are not scholars, and which at the same time would prove a feast to the learned. Bhatti is a pioneer in the field of writing grammatical poetry and he seems to have inspired many other poets to try their hand in this line. Thus we have several poems on the same pattern. First, there is Ravanarjuniya by Bhatta Bhima (Bhaumaka, 7th c. AD), a Kashmiri who illustrates the rules of Panini in the regular order of the Astadhyayi along with the story of Ravana and Kartavirya Arjuna. Then we have Kavirahasya by Halayuddha (10th c.), Vasudevavijaya by Vasudeva (early 15th c.) and Dhatukavya by Narayana. All these poems illustrate the rules of the Astadhyayi. Hemachandra's Dvyashrayakavya (12th c.), perhaps the last poem in this line, illustrates the rules of Sanskrit grammar in 20 cantos.

Bhatti can also be credited as a pioneer in starting a chain of 'Yamakavyas', though the first traces of this kind are found in the Ghatakarpara. In canto 10, Bhatti illustrates different kinds of 'yamaka' in as many as 20 verses. This seems to have inspired Yamakakavis like Vasudeva of Kerala (9th c.AD) to start a new genre of yamakakavyas in poetry which became popular even among the Jaina poets.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In spite of his consciously laboured language, Bhatti does occasionally exhibit really fine poetic flashes. His description of dawn (canto 11) is pleasing. He personifies the dawn and the sky as two loving friends. The former is described as a sincere friend of the latter. She brings the latter to her senses when she faints at the departure of her lover, the moon (canto 11). Bhatti's metrical skill may be seen in canto 10 where he employs many metres. He occasionally uses some uncommon metres also.

The popularity of Bhatti may well be inferred not only from the fact that there are as many as twelve commentaries written on his poem, but also from the fact that he has been imitated by many later yamaka-poets and shastrakavis who carried further the learned precedent set by him. S.K. De's observation on Bhatti is worth quoting, when he remarks that Bhatti is 'conditioned strictly by the necessity of employing only those words, whose grammatical forms have to be illustrated methodically in each stanza, and all thought, feeling, idea or expression become only a slave to this purpose. It must be said, however, to Bhatti's credit that his narrative flows undisturbed by lengthy digressions; that his diction, though starched and weighted by grammatical learning, is without complexities of involved construction and laboured compounds, and, in spite of the inevitable play of word and thought, there is nothing recondite or obscure in his ideas, and that his versification, though undistinguished, is smooth, varied and lively.'

R.T.

RAVAT, BACHUBHAI POPATLAL (Gujarati; b. 1888 d. 1980) was a journalist, an art connoisseur and an expert in printing technology. He did his Matriculation at Gondal and worked there as a school teacher till 1919. He joined the Sastun Sahitya Vardhak Karyalaya in 1920, worked for the Navjivan Prakashan Mandir during 1922-23, and joined Kumar, monthly magazine started by Ravishankar Raval. He took complete charge of the magazine from 1943 and managed it till the end. Kumar has played a significant role in keeping up the tradition of quality journals in Gujarati with art contents which began with Vismi sadi, edited by Haji Mohammed. In this journal the selection of material on painting, sculpture, architecture, music and folk arts as also on astronomy, geography, zoology, botany, physics, etc. was done with a view to shaping 'the minds of the future citizens'. Even the selection of creative literature like poems, short stories, one-act plays, travelogues, biographical sketches, etc reveals Bachubhai's aesthetic taste and sense of discernment. Through the Budh Sabha (Wednesday sessions) organised under the auspices of Kumar, he has been instrumental in shaping many poets directly or indirrectly. He also took interest in the propagation of the art of photography for which he established the Niharika Club. And he was very particular about the faultless printing of Gujarati script. in recognition of his cultural services, he was awarded the Ranjitram Gold Medal in 1948, and the Gujarati Sahitya Parished elected him President of the journalism section at its 23rd session in 1965. He was honoured with Padmashri by the Government of India in 1975, and in 1980 the Gujarat Lalit Kala Akademi felicitated him. He was associated with the compilation of the Haji Muhammad Memorial Volume, besides the compilation of folk literature in Gujarati. Kumar, which has been running for over six decades now, providing a wide range of reading material to its readers every month, is a true memorial to Bachubhai Ravat's contribution to the culture of Gujarat.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirubhai Parikh, Bachubhai Ravat: Kavilok, July-August, 1980).

C.S.

RAVI VARMA, L.A. (Malayalam: b. 1884, d. 1958). Allopathic doctor, Sanskrit scholar and Malayalam writer. Ravi Varma was born at the Lakshmipuram Palace in Kottayam district. After taking medical degree from the Madras Medical College in 1911 he worked as Assistant Surgeon under the government of Travancore till 1919, when he proceeded to England to study opthalmology. On his return two years later, he was appointed Senior Surgeon in the Eye Hospital at Trivandrum, where he continued until his retirement in 1940. He rose to eminence in his career.

To Ravi Varma's credit are a number of works which belong to three classes, viz. Health Education, Religion and philosophy, and Literature and Linguistics. Here, only two, both belonging to the last group, deserve mention. One of them is Prachina Kerala lipikal which deals with the three scripts formerly used in Kerala and illustrates them with examples taken from ancient works. In the second, Aryabhashakalude parasparabandham, the author elucidates, in the first of its two sections, the close similarity between the Brahmi and Deyanagari scripts on the one hand and different Dravidian scripts on the other, while in the second he brings out the changes that take place when words are borrowed from Sanskrit into Dravidian languages and analyses the form and meaning of the roots of many Dravidian words. This is a thought-provoking book though there may be differences of opinion about the conclusions arrived at by the author.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In addition to the above original works, he edited a number of books. These and the numerous uncollected essays both in Malayalam and English contributed by him to periodicals are immensely useful to researchers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Pallippattu Kunjikrishnan, Mahacharita Sangraha sagaram.

M.A.

RAVIDAS (RAIDAS) (Hindi) is said to be a contemporary of Kabirdas. He may, therefore, be placed in the last quarter of the 14th century and the first half of the 15th century. He was a cobbler and lived in Banaras. Though uneducated, he was held in high esteem for his spiritual knowledge and saintly character. Nabhadas, Priyadas and Mirabai have spoken of him with great respect and veneration. As a poet, he belongs to the Nirguna school of which the general tenets and ideals are mirrored in his 'banis'. He regards the ultimate reality as eternal, indescribable, inscrutable, changeless, and present in all things—animate as well as inanimate. According to him, complete renunciation is essential for bhakti. No systematic collection of his poems is available. Forty of his padas find place in Guru Granth Sahib. There are also some padas in Sant bani-sangrah published from Belvedere Press, Allahabad. As a poet Ravidas does not occupy any significant position, but his 'banis' speak of his love of man and God. These are poems of no art and artifice; there is no embellishment and no ornamentation. The language is simple and the feeling equally simple and earnest. He attracted a good number of followers, found in Punjab, Gujarat, Rajasthan and Uttar Pradesh.

De. S.

RAVINDER RAVI (Punjabi; b. 1938), full name Ravinder Singh Gill, did his M.A. in Punjabi from the Punjab University. He opted for the teaching profession and taught in India and Kenya. Presently, he is settled in New Ayaush, British Columbia.

Although he has published his book on criticism Prayogshil kavya darpan (Mirror of experimental poetry, 1964), and other books like a travelogue, Simritian de desh (Lands of memories, 1979), two verse plays, Bimar sadi (Sick century, 1974) and Dar dewaran (Door and walls, 1981), half a dozen collections of short stories, Chravi (Shepherdess, 1963), Juram de patar (Products of crime, 1968), Shahir vich jangal (Jungle in the city, 1969), Kon pratikon (Angle and anti-angle, 1971), Maili pustak (A dirty book, 1973), Jithe dewaran nahin (Where there are no walls, 1978), he is best known as a poet of modern sensibility and has published ten collections of poems during the last twenty years beginning from 1961. These collections are: Dil darya samunderon dunge (Heart deeper than ocean, 1961), Bukal vich chor (The thief in the lap, 1963), Bindu (Point, 1965), Maun hadse (The quiet accidents, 1967), Dil transplant ton bad (The heart after the transplant, 1969), Shahir jangli hai (The city is wild, 1970), Mere mausam de vari (The turn of my season, 1972), Jal, bharamjal (Water and mirage, 1976), Chite kale dhabe (White and black smudges, 1978) and Sima te akash (The horizon and the sky, 1980). Ravinder Ravi is one of the pioneers of the verse-play in Punjabi. His Bimar sadi is considered a landmark in this field. He has beautifully depicted the general disgust and disillusion of the modern man and is known as an experimentalist in modern Punjabi poetry.

Gu.S.

RAVISAHEB (Gujarati; 18th-19th c.) was a devotee of the Kabir sect. His name was Ravidas, but like all those belonging to the sect he was called Ravisaheb. He was a saint and his teacher was Bhansaheb. He composed poems in Hindi and Gujarati which deal mainly with the union of the individual soul with the Universal Soul. In his poems he asks people to renounce worldly pleasures and concentrate on the Almighty. He also explains the philosophical concepts of non-dualism and the nature of the soul. At the same time he writes about the pangs of separation the gopis were subjected to on their separation from Krishna who had left for Mathura. His main thrust is towards self-introspection and to find God who is already in the heart. We have just to search for Him and we shall find Him. In other words, Ravisaheb was a bhakta and a poet, singing songs of devotion and spurning temptations of earthly life.

C.M.

RAY, ANNADASHANKAR (Bengali/Oriya; b.1904) was born at Dhenkanal in Orissa, secured first class Honours in English from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, and passed the Indian Civil Service examination while still doing his M.A., topping the list of all successful Indian candidates in 1927. He sought voluntary retirement from administrative service in 1951 to devote himself fully to literary pursuits. In his political philosophy he has been a

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Gandhite, while in his literary outlook, he has been inspired by Rabindranath.

In his boyhood Ray became acquainted with the Vaishnavite lyrics of Jayadeva and Vidyapati through his parents. In later years three great Russian writers, Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Chekhov, influenced him. A Bengali rendering of a short story of Tolstoy and an appraisal of Saratchandra Chatterji's essay, Narir mulya, marked his debut on the literary scene. Ever since he has grown more and more versatile as an essayist, novelist, short story writer, poet and a writer of travel-diaries and nursery rhymes. His first published work is Tarunya (1928), which gave him a footing as an essayist. It is noteworthy that he used to write initially in both Bengali and Oriya. Asamapika, published in a periodical in 1930 and Agun niye khela (1930) are his first novels while Rakhi, his collection of thirty-three poems, was published a year earlier in 1929. As a poet, he is both romantic and mystic. His other books of poems are Vasanta (1932), Kaler shasan (1933), Kamana panchavimsati (1934) and Nutana Radha (1943).

A significant breakthrough in his literary career came with his publication in 1931 of Pathe pravase, a brilliant travel-diary of Europe. It was serialized in the periodical Vichitra during 1927-29, and is a record of a young Indian traveller's first encounter with the life and society of Europe, bringing to light the observations of a pensive but witty artist. Another travel-diary, Europer chithi (1943), is meant for children. Japane, his travel-diary of Japan, was serialized in the weekly Desh (1958), which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1962. Fera is another such diary, also serialized in Desh (1965).

As an essayist, Annadashankar is urbane and sophisticated and combines in his style the qualities of two different kinds of prose, represented by Rabindranath and Pramatha Chaudhuri. Lucidity, brevity, rhythm, wit and humour characterize his prose. As an essayist his best known works include Amara (1937), Jiban shilpi (1941), Ishara (1943), Binur bai (1944), Jiyankathi (1949), Deshkal-patra (1949), Pratyay (1951), Nutan kare bancha (1953), Adhunikata (1953) and Dekhashona (1989). He has also published critical appraisals of Rabindranath, Tolstoy and Gandhi in three separate works. Banglar renaissance is another important work, first serialized in the weekly Amrita in 1973. Lalan o tnar gan (1978) and Sanskritir vivartan (1984) bear testimony to his interest in folk songs and various aspects of our culture.

His fiction includes novels and short stories. Satyasatya, epic in form and intellectual in tone, is his most famous voluminous novel in six volumes Jar jetha desh (1932), Ajnatavas (1933), Kalankavati (1934), Duhkhamochan (1936), Martyer svarga (1940), and Apasaran (1942). India and Europe during 1927-29 constitute the local and temporal setting of this novel. Badal, the protagonist, is whimsical and pensive, while Sudhi probably is the author's alter ego. Putul niye khela (1933) may be regarded as the concluding part of Agun niye khela. Na (1951) and Kanya (1953) are his two other novels. Another voluminous novel is Ratna o srimati, the first part of which was serialized in Desh in 1957 and the third part concluded in the same weekly after a long interval in 1971. A more significant epic novel, which is thematically appealing and closer to our times, is Krantadarshi, a 'novel of ideas' in four volumes. The first part of the novel appeared in Basumati in 1981, while the fourth volume was published in 1988. It deals with the most crucial period of our history, covering the outbreak of the Second World War at the one end and the assassination of Gandhi at the other.

In his short stories, Annadashankar shows himself as a skilled artist. His best-known collections are Prakritir parihas (1934), Man pavan (1946), Yauvan jvala (1950), Kamini kanchan (1954) and Katha (1971). Though he has never seriously tried to become a playwright, Rater atithi (1954) and Chaturali (1955) adduce evidence of how he would have fared in this branch of literature.

Annadashankar is also popular as a writer of nursery rhymes, limericks and doggerels, specimens of which are his Urki dhaner murki (1942), Ranga dhaner khai (1950) and Ata gachhe tota (1974).

In 1980 he was honoured with the Vidyasagar Smriti Award by the Government of West Bengal, and in 1989 he was made a Fellow of the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Buddhadev Bose, An Acre of Green Grass (Calcutta, 1948); Srikumar Banerji, Banga sahitye upanyaser dhara (Calcutta, 1962); Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahityer itihas, Vol. IV (Calcutta, 1958).

J.R.

ORIYA: Following the foundation of the Utkal Sammilani which led to the cultural and linguistic unification of Orissa in 1903, several Oriya scholars made a concerted attempt to enrich their literature. The movement broke up in the 1920s as the writers turned to respond to the call of Gandhi's Non-cooperation Movement; nonetheless, a group of young writers known as the Sabuja, who drew their inspiration from Bengal and the Bengali language, appeared on the literary map of Orissa. This new movement had three distinguished writers—Annadashankar Ray, Kalindicharan Panigrahi and Baikunthanath Patnaik.

A founder member of the Sabuja Movement in Oriya literature, Ray contributed some fine pieces of lyrics and essays to Oriya literature, collected in Sabuja akshara (Green Letters, 1966). In his poems he usually sings of love, beauty and youth. In 'Pralaya prerana' (Impulse for destruction, 1924) the poet wants to destroy all that is effete and inhibiting, while in 'Srijana swapna' (Dream for creation, 1924) his tone changes and he wants to live in an imaginary ivory tower with his beloved. Poems like 'Pari mahal' (Fairy palace), 'Jaubana thare gale au asena' (Once departed, youth does not return), 'Pranayi' (Lover), 'Kaunasi priya prati kaunasi priya' (Some lover to some beloved) and 'Manasi o mu' (Beloved and myself), all sing of passionate love and youth. 'Kamala bilasira bidaya' (Farewell of the lotus-lander) is a magnificent valedictory address to the Muse—'a poem that still remains unique in the whole of Oriya literature symbolic not only of the general spiritual conflict of adolescent mind but of Annadashankar's own unexpected exit from the Oriya language and his adoption of Bengali as the medium of his later creation'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Annadashankar's poems are small in number, but aesthetically among the finest in Oriya literature. Besides, his literary essays on Oriya books and authors too are of a high order. His analysis of Madhusudan Rao's Basanta gatha (Vernal songs) and Padmacharan Pattanayak's Padma pakhuda (Petals of lotus) reveal his critical acumen. Indeed, with his Sabuja friends, he broke new grounds in Oriya literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nityananda Satapathi, Sabujaru sampratika (Cuttack, 1979).

S.C.P.

RAY, BANI (Bengali;b.1920), distinguished poet, story-writer and novelist, was born in the village of Haturia in the district of Palna (now in Bangladesh). Her father was Purnachandra Roy, an advocate of Calcutta and her mother Giribala Devi Saraswati, a reputed woman of letters in the genre of fiction writing. She had her schooling at the Brahmo Valika Vidyalaya and higher education at Asutosh College, Calcutta. An M.A in English, she worked for a time in the publicity department of the Government of Bengal and thereafter took to writing for a whole-time occupation. She first attracted notice with her book of poems Jupiter (1943) which, though penned by a female poet, was nevertheless very bold and forthright in the avowal of passionate love. Among her novels, numbering more than a dozen, special mention may be made of Prem (Love), Kane dekha alo (Twilight time for seeing the bride) and Sakal-sandhya-ratri (Morning-evening-night). The last-named was undoubtedly her magnum-opus in novel-writing, depicting the life of a woman spread over a whole day from morning till night.

Bani Roy, apart from her creative career in prose and poetry, has also acquired a name for doing research on the life and achievements of Michael Madhusudan Datta. Her Madhujivaner natun byakhya sheds new light on the significance of Madhusudan's many-sided innovativeness in the realm of Bengali poetry, particularly his pioneering role in sonneteering. She herself is highly adept in sonnet-composition after the style and technique of Madhusudan.

N.C.

RAY, BHARATCHANDRA (Bengali; b.1712, d.1760) is the greatest poet of the eighteenth century Bengal. Born in decadent Brahmin zamindar family, he left home early and mastered Persian and Sanskrit. Later in life he picked up Oriya, Hindi and the lingo of the Mughal Court. His wandering youth experienced strange vicissitudes of fortune in Burdwan, Cuttack and Puri, until he settled as the court-poet of Raja Krishnachandra of Krishnanagar who gave him the title, 'Gunakar' (Mine of virtuosity).

Striking realism, brilliant humour and artistic embellishments are found in his works. While responding to the popular taste for devotional poetry and the erotic of the urban elite, he lampooned both God and man, exposing the deceptions and follies of life. His verbal felicity, pun and wit, and command of varying verse rhythms made even the prurient an artistic experience.

His important works are Satyapirer panchali (Songs praising Satyapir the deity, 1737), Rasamanjari (an erotico-rhetorical work translated from Sanskrit, 1750), Annadamangal (a trilogy in praise of the food-giving goddess, 1753), Annadamangal Vidyasundar (erotic romance), and Mansimha (historical romance). The brief Nagashtaka (Octet on the Naga) is written in Sanskrit, and the briefer Chandinatak is an incomplete play.

Bharatchandra's reputation rests on Annadamangal and a close reading of the text reveals two significant aspects of the poem. The narrative strongly suggests that it is placed by the poet in a given time and place and its context indicates the continued presence of esoteric religious sects, cults and practices in Bengal. References to Raja Mansingh perhaps indicate the reign of Emperor Akbar, and Mansingh's war, especially against Maharaja Pratapaditya of Jessore, may even provide a definite date for the story. The religious practice suggested and referred to in the narrative is associated with the changing image of Hinduism in the 16th and 17th centuries and, in particular, with the cults of Shakti and Shiva. The second part of the poem has always been particularly decried as spurious and even immoral.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

